eight days before it will be published in our paper, so as to afford you time to publish and answer it in your June number, which I really hope will be done, and that, henceforth, nothing will retard the progress of the discussion.

MOSAIC RITES AND CEREMONIES.

In a former paper I offered some remarks on this subject, explanatory of the peculiar customs enjoined by Moses, showing that however trifling they might appear to us, there were good and sufficient reasons for their injunction. I propose pursuing the same subject in the present article.

We have seen why Moses declared certain animals to be unclean, which were highly revered by the Heathen around him. But many other of his rules in relation to diet, admit of a different explanation. There can be little doubt that where this great Lawgiver had not Heathen rites and ceremonies in view, he regarded the health and other circumstances of the people, in his regulations concerning food. His is the only instance, I believe, of ancient times, wherein a kingdom was not founded on military glory and conquest. Excepting the land of Canaan, which they considered their natural inheritance, and in the attainment of which they believed they were justly punishing its former inhabitants for their wickedness and abominations—with this exception, if such it can be called, the Jews were not bent on foreign conquest, and rested not their fame in it. It is evident, from all his regulations respecting the inalienability of estates—the division of land among the tribes—the years of rest for the land as well as the people—the exemption of those who had newly built a house or planted a vineyard, from military duty, even in times of actual war—that Moses designed the Jews to be an agricultural people. Their secluded and exclusive situation, prevented much commerce—the confinement to the land of Judea of their theocracy, prevented conquest—of course, agricultural pursuits, alone, were left open to them.

This fact will, I think, greatly explain some of the Mosaic laws of diet. It was all important to encourage the raising of that best suited to an agricultural people—to make their wealth consist in flocks and herds, and by every means to attach the Jews to the soil on which they lived, and to the land where they were confined. This, I believe all will admit, was done by the Mosaic laws of diet and sacrifice.

The flesh of swine does not appear to come within these reasons—and is a principle article forbidden. It is generally admitted to be a gross and heating food, and when we consider the climate of Judea, and that its general use in that climate would ultimately introduce loathsome diseases, as leprosy, scrofula, etc., we are furnished with a solution to its prohibition. It is generally rejected by all Orientals, whether of Jewish descent or not.

Blood, so strenuously forbidden as an article of food, is generally allowed to be gross and unwholesome. But it is probable, also, that it was forbidden to the Jews, because it was drank by the Heathen as a mode of communicating with the infernal deities. This would form a strong reason, why Moses should command that it be sprinkled on the altar, or poured out at its foot. For every reader of the Old Testament, must have observed the strong inclination of the Jews to hold intercourse with the fabled deities of the Heathen, and with the supposed spirits of the dead—and the frequency with which they actually did violate the express law of Jehovah on that very subject. Of course, they needed every possible guard against, and prevention of this practice.

Even in our own day, and among Christians, we perceive the same strong tendency to superstition and error.

Silly men and women can be found in abundance, who resort to fortune tellers and conjurers to find stolen goods, or to learn their future destinies—or

"Each finds of love some future trophy,
In settlements left of tea or coffee."

When the Oneida Bank was robbed, some gentlemen deeply interested in discovering the property, it is said, applied to a fortune teller in this city for occult information—and others, I am informed, travelled some twenty-five miles to consult a famous witch doctor on the subject! Nor is this weakness confined to believers in a divine revelation from God, and multitudes of infernal revelations from the devil. Byron and others have been believers in the same folly of sooth-saying and fortune telling, and Abner Kneeland is said to have paid dearly for the information a little girl gave respecting Captain Kidd's hidden treasures, which she derived by looking into a glass of water! Of course, no injunction could be too strong—no precautions too great, to save the Jews, then barbarous and illiterate, from a debasing superstition in which even moderns indulge occasionally.

But before I close, permit me to name one more Mosaic prohibition, which has been beautifully applied by the great Magician of the North. In two different passages—Exod. xxiii: 19, and Deut. xiv: 21—Moses expressly declares "thou shalt not seethe [i. e., thou shalt not boil] a kid in its mother's milk." It was needless for Moses to assign a reason for this injunction; for it was well known that many idolatrous nations around them, practiced this very ceremony. When they had gathered all their fruits, they boiled a kid in its mother's milk, and with magical rites sprinkled the milk over their fields, orchards and gardens, in order to propitiate the gods, and make their grounds fruitful. The practice is worthy of reprobation on moral, as well as on religious grounds. There are certain proprieties in life, which can not be violated without injury to the intellect, affections or moral feelings.

The boy that can take delight in impaling flies, worrying animals, or hearing the cries of birds for their broken eggs, destroyed nests, or murdered young, may have his fiendish passions so cultivated as to become fitted for a public executioner, or the familiar of an Inquisition. It is the law of God in nature, that by a continual perversion and twisting of any faculty, it will at last remain in the unnatural state, and ardently crave no other than the horrid employment, to which, at first it was forced to incline. Parents and instructors of youth would do well to study this law of God; and, if they would have their tender charges grow up humane and benevolent, take care early to wean them from acts of cruelty and malice.

The injunction of Moses in relation to the kid and its mother, as well as several others I might name, comes under the law here spoken of. It is one of the aggravations of cruelty, to turn the streams of life into the cause of death—to make the mother the murderer of its offspring—to seethe the playful kid in the warm fluid which it should have drawn from its parent for nourishment. And the frequent commission of such an act, could not but blunt moral sensibility, dry up the fountains of natural affection, and render its perpetrators unfeeling and unnatural in other respects. Instead, therefore, of blaming, in our ignorance, the peculiar institutions of Moses—instead of scoffing at their apparent superstition or folly, or bowing in shame at their coarseness or indelicacy, let us, in humility, ascribe these appearances to our ignorance of the reasons that led him to adopt them; and adore the manifested wisdom of God in those we can thus satisfactorily explain and justify.

I will close with the illustration of the last quoted passage, by Sir Walter Scott, already referred to.

The readers of Kenilworth will remember the tragical murder of the Countess of Leicester, in Cumnor place, by Tony Foster, and his associate Sir Richard Varney. The Countess was placed in a room, as if under restraint, before which was a trap-door opening into a profound abyss, having for its bottom the lowest vault of the ancient building. This trap-door was so fixed, that when the Countess attempted to escape, (as they hoped she would,) it would sink under her weight and precipitate her to destruction.

But they waited in vain. The unhappy woman made no effort to leave her prison. At length Varney rushed out, mounted a horse, and riding into the Court-yard, imitated the peculiar whistle by which the Earl of Leicester intimated his approach to visit his adoring wife. The lure was successful. The Countess imagined it was her husband—rushed forth to meet him—"the trap-door gave way—there was a rushing sound—a heavy fall—a faint groan—and all was over. At the same instant, Varney called in at the window, in an accent and tone which was an indescribable mixture between horror and raillery, 'is the bird caught?—is the deed done?'

"Oh God forgive us," said Anthony Foster.

"Why thou fool," said Varney, thy toil is ended I dreamed not I could have mimicked the Earl's call so well."

"Oh, if there be judgment in heaven, thou hast deserved it," said Foster, "and wilt meet it!—Thou hast destroyed her by means of her best affections—it is a seething of the kid in the mother's milk!" A. B. G.

RELIGIOUS INGRATITUDE.

"There are not found that returned to give glory to God, save this stranger."—Luke xvii: 18.

Novelty—novelty—is the prevailing cry of that insatiate thirst of curiosity common to our race. It is always being satiated, but never satisfied—for "it grows with what it feeds upon." The advocate at the bar concludes his train of legal argument with a burst of thrilling eloquence—and his admiring hearers but turn with a whetted appetite to hear what his opposer will reply. The preacher discloses the morality and doctrines of the Gospel to his believing auditory, and scarcely has he done urging them upon their reflection and practice, before they are ready to hear what next he will offer for their consideration. The fashionable gentleman or lady has scarcely been encased in a new dress made after the very latest fashion, before the wonder arises, of what form will be the next fashion that comes from London or Paris.

Nor is the novelty sought for, always of the same kind, as that which has just been presented for the gratification of curiosity. A deliverance from pain is frequently followed by a mad pursuit of so called pleasures—from sickness, by an indulgence in pursuits that must soon injure health—and from poverty, by the most needless, profuse waste of wealth. Sick-bed resolutions vanish with the first breath of fresh air that fans the pallid cheek—and every anticipated emotion of gratitude and thankfulness—anticipated while deliverance was yet anticipated with it—vanishes with the enjoyment that only increases it. Novelty—novelty glitters ahead of us in the roseate pathway of life, and with our eyes fixed on its glitter, we observe not the beauties of our journey, nor the charms of the contrast we have but so lately—so deeply experienced. Such is man—such is poor human nature.

Nor is it only in the affairs of earth that this thirst for something new, hurries its possessor forward in its pursuit to the neglect of the pleasure brimmed present. Religion, too, experiences the neglect it produces in the world—the best and holiest feelings of which our nature is capable, are trampled under our hasty footsteps in the weary, wasteful pursuit of novelty.

Religion with her holiest hopes and purest joys, calls to the merchant behind his counter—but it is the old tale of spiritual joys that long since has become homely to his ear—and a new mine of wealth—a grand speculation is just in sight—he cannot waste his time in hearing her voice. She points the farmer or mechanic to the handy work of God, brimming full of his wisdom and goodness to man, and holds high her lamp of peaceful light that he may examine it and grow happy as he grows wise. But she holds until her patience is exhausted and her arm tired—for he, good man, is just now engaged in thinking of some new root or grass—some new patent or discovery—by which a fortune may be made—perhaps contemplating with rapture the prospect of purchasing a new farm or house—a new horse or instrument of workmanship.

She turns to the poor victim of disease, just beginning to crawl away from the brink of a grave that has been yawning before him. What speaking volumes of thought are in her beaming looks! But he reads them not. A few days ago, and he had no companion to cheer—no support to uphold—no physician to heal him but religion. Darkness, dismay and fearful apprehensions were before him—bitter retrospection presented errors to regret, vices to mourn, and wasted opportunities to sigh over. The present was filled with pain, languishing and debility—around him weeping relatives and friends to bid the long—the last farewell. Religion came to his aid. Her lamp lit up the darkness of the grave, and dissipated the glooms of eternity with the radiance of faith, and dispelled the dawning of the shrinking spirit with the cheering consolations and assurances of hope. She pointed to the past—but it was only to hallow his repinings into that repentance which while it probes the wound, furnishes also strength to the pain-weared sufferer by with drawing the cause of the malady. And the present—oh, the mingling joys and griefs—pain and bliss of the sanctified sick chamber! The long is but a short—the last, but an occasional farewell. The weeping friends but greet his passage to their common home, with the assurance that soon they also will take up the same journey, and then all will be holy, happy and united for ever and ever.

Such are the scenes which religion would bring into the mind of the slowly recovering penitent—but he reads not her language with a greedy eye—his ears no longer open to drink in the silver sounds of her overflowing consolations. These were things belonging to his sick-chamber—but he is now well. These were themes for one descending into the grave, but he is now crawling from its damp and darksome brink. Though once so overpowering in joy and full of peace—his mind is on gayer themes and filled with brighter dreams. And dreams they are—yes, dreams he will find them to be when again sickness and penitence, anguish and sorrow wind around his heart, and call his wandering thoughts from abroad, to fix them on himself.

Thus, like the subjects of our text, how few are found that return to give glory to God! What a melancholy commentary on human ingratitude—human instability—human heedlessness!

As our Saviour was travelling to Jerusalem through Samaria and Galilee, he entered a certain village on his way. And ten men who were afflicted with leprosy, stood afar off and cried unto him, "Jesus—Master—have mercy on us." And when he saw their deplorable condition—that benevolence which was his distinguishing characteristic, moved within him for relief. And he said unto them, "Go, show yourselves unto the priests." Full of faith in his divine powers, they departed to obey him, and on their way they were healed, and cleansed.

Wonderful deliverance from a previous disease! And were not these poor, diseased men filled with corresponding gratitude to the great Physician? Hear the words of the historian. "And one of them, when he saw that he was healed, turned back, and with a loud voice glorified God, and fell down on his face" at the feet of Jesus, "giving him thanks." One out of ten returned to thank his deliverer! One out of ten glorified God by praising him for the mercy he had received!

And who was this one! Undoubtedly, you will say, it was one who had been carefully grounded and instructed in the best and purest principles of the Jewish religion—one who carefully observed all the ceremonies of the Law—and one who attended diligently on all the services of the sanctuary waiting for the deliverance of his country Israel. Such a one, you will argue, would feel gratitude as a principle of the understanding and a habit.

ual impulse of the heart—having borne the impress of piety from early youth, it would be his meat and his drink to praise God for all his mercy, and to glorify him for his goodness. How, then, will you be astonished to learn that this man—this only grateful being out of the ten, was a Samaritan—part Heathen part Jew! “He was a Samaritan!” says the Evangelist; “and Jesus answered and said, were there not ten cleansed? but where are the nine? There are not found that returned to give glory to God, save this stranger.” A. B. G.

LUKE XIV: 26.

“If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he can not be my disciple.”

Our text has created much perplexity in some minds, for want of an acquaintance with Hebrew phraseology, or an attention to the light which Scripture itself reflects upon it. What! does a religion whose sum and substance is love, inculcate hatred? When it is said that “he who loveth not his brother, whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen”; shall we be told that we must not love our brethren, if we would love God, or, in other words, be Christ’s disciples? Can love, and hatred also, be the fulfilling of the law? And must we violate the second commandment, to love our brother as ourselves, before we can obey the great commandment, to love God with all our powers? Can Scripture so contradict itself—can such be the meaning of the passage before us?

No—No—such is not its meaning. The negative expression of love, is a Hebraism, meaning a minor, or lesser degree of affection, which is here required. This is rendered further evident by what follows our text.—“And whosoever doth not bear his cross and come after me, can not be my disciple.” And, also, verse 33.—“Whosoever he be, of you, that forsaketh not all that he hath, he can not be my disciple.” Here, observe, taking up the cross is used as a climax—as a higher degree of sacrifice in the Saviour’s behalf—and in the last quoted verse, the whole is summed up to mean, that a man should “forsake all that he hath.”

Now when we remember that Jesus invariably enjoined by precept and recommended by practice, universal love to our fellow men—expressly forbade hatred even of our enemies—and that Paul expressly declares, “For no man ever yet hated his own flesh, but nourisheth and cherisheth it,” and recommends the husband so to love his wife—I say when we remember all this, we see how impossible it was that Jesus should mean, literally, what we mean by saying that a man must hate his parents, and children, and relatives, and wife, and even his own life, before he could be a disciple. And that he did mean only a lesser degree of affection, is evident from the language in which Matthew gives this discourse. “He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter more than me, is not worthy of me; and he that taketh not his cross and followeth after me, is not worthy of me.”

That the term hatred is sometimes used to express only a lesser degree of love, is evident from the passage, where God speaking of the two nations which were to descend from Jacob and Esau, says, “Jacob have I loved, and Esau have I hated.” It is evident that here only a preference of the one over the other, is intended—and the blessing of their father shows how far that preference extended; and that both were actually loved, but Jacob more than Esau. Other proofs and arguments might be adduced; but these may be sufficient.

Now, notice.—Among the various faculties of the mind, there are some superior to others. These should have the government of all the rest. Of these, we place in the first order, or class, the moral and religious sentiments. These embrace the first and great commandment—“Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength.” Or, as I would familiarly explain the passage, thy love to God should regulate all your affections, direct all your reasoning faculties, and control all the energies of your frame.

Then, next in order comes general benevolence. This includes the second commandment, which is like unto the first, “Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.”—And “on these two commandments,” depend all that the Law enjoins, and all the prophets have revealed.—This gives you the injunction, so to consider yourself as connected and identified with your fellow-beings universally, as to regard them in the same manner as you do yourself, to consider their rights and truest, best interests equal to your own—as, indeed, they truly are.

Next in order, and necessary only for this state of being, are the animal passions and propensities, the exercise of which under the government of the foregoing, are necessary for the existence of man as an individual being, for the perpetuation of our race, and for its existence in the social form of families, communities and nations.—Such, in my humble opinion, is the form of government God has established for the constitutional feelings of mankind. To enlighten them, that they may perceive their relation to, and dependence on each other—their relation to external objects and circumstances—and to guide and direct them in their operation, is given us the intellectual faculties.

Here, then, we have the government of the human mind, as established by its Author. First, the centre of the circle, and the standard of affection to our race, we have self—then the immediate objects in whose happiness self is bound up in the silken bands of natural and social affection—then the vast family of which self and those objects, are but individual members, and with whose interest and welfare each is indissolubly bound by the natural and social affections of kindred and friends, and the ties of a common nature, a common origin, and a common destiny—and last, not least, but greatest and most imperative of all, all these concentric obligations are bound together and everlastingly surrounded, by the universal presence of God, the immutable laws of his rectitude, and the endless interests of a boundless eternity of bliss and glory.

We are now prepared fully to understand the meaning, and perceive the propriety of the injunction contained in our text. “If any man come unto me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he can not be my disciple.” That is, any man will allow his love for relatives and friends, and his regard for his own life and welfare, to be superior to his love for God, for truth, for righteousness, he can not be my disciple.—And this was eminently correct in that age and country. The Gospel was bitterly, severely opposed. Imprisonment, scourging, death in every form, and amid every cruel and terrible accompaniment, dogged the footsteps of its preachers—hovered around the couch of hospitality—hid its dagger in the hand, and its poison in the kiss of friendship, and treacherously lurked even in a parent’s, child’s, or brother’s bosom.—Mothers were against their daughters—fathers against their sons—wives had unbelieving husbands—and brethren and sisters bowed at different altars, and viewed each other as the enemies of Heaven. It followed as a necessary consequence, that he who regarded relatives, or friends, or life, as the best and dearest object of his existence, would be unfit to proclaim, defend, and urge to the last extremity, the Gospel of Jesus. He could not do it—he would not do it. The father’s command would cause him to restrain the truth—the mother’s entreaty would hush his lips in silent acquiescence to error—the brother’s, or sister’s, or friend’s endearments would cause his footsteps to linger on his errand—to save the feelings, if not the lives of wife and child, he would bow in idolatry of false worship, and to save his own life he would deny the Lord that bought him.

Stern and terrible seemed the sacrifice required of the disciples of Jesus—but it was asked in kindness to them, and in mercy to our race. A period was at hand in which all Jews not enrolled under the banner of the crucified Jesus, would perish miserably by intestine war, famine and disease combined. Yea, all who did not regard the doctrine and precepts and admonitions of Jesus, would then go into that gehenna of temporal destruction emphatically called the everlasting and unquenchable fire prepared for the devil and his angels—a place that had for ages been one of loathsomeness, filth and stench—the place of late execution and of former idolatry and shame, and now the emblem of their national destruction. To save their kinsmen, friends and countrymen from these horrors—to bring as many beloved ones as possible, into the life, and light, and joy of salvation—to secure to after ages the knowledge of life and immortality through the Gospel—the disciples of Jesus were to regard above every thing else their supreme love to God, regard for his truth, and their universal love to their kindred race.

APOLOGY.

To our friends at Fly Creek and vicinity.—The sickness of my family prevented my attendance at Fly Creek, on the first Sabbath, of which Br. Smith was seasonably informed, but depending on the exchange, his business prevented his attendance also. In consequence, we regret to learn an unusually large congregation were disappointed—we hope not disaffected. We shall try again ere long. Will our friends in that region trust us once more?

The Allegany Association of Universalists will meet on the first Wednesday and Thursday (5th and 6th) of July, (instead of the last Wednesday and Thursday in June,) in Ellicottville, Cattaraugus county.

The reason of this alteration is, that our friends depend upon procuring the court-house to meet in, and can not procure it on the first appointed days in June, because the circuit court will be held there at that time—and therefore the meeting of the Association is postponed to the 5th and 6th days of July.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

WHAT IS LOVE?

BY REV. T. J. TENNEY.

Ay, what is love? A glorious theme—
A theme for angel voices,
A changeless, bright and living stream
In which the soul rejoices—
O see it shine, below—above,
And what is bright but love—but love!

A spirit 'tis of light—of life—
Of God an emanation—
'Tis God—'tis heaven—and ever rife
With news of great salvation—
O see it shine, below—above,
And what is bright but love—but love!

The flower that opens to the wind
In gaudy glowing colors,
Reads love to each attentive mind,
Reads love to Nature's lovers—
O see it shine, below—above,
And what is bright but love—but love!

'Tis here, 'tis there, 'tis all around,
'Tis in the depths of ocean,
And may it in our hearts abound,
And quicken our devotion—
For see it shine, below—above,
And what is bright but love—but love!

INHUMANITY.

"Man's inhumanity to man Makes countless thousands mourn."

But it is his inhumanity to inferior creatures that I am now about to remark upon. As I was riding along the other day, I saw a boy, who had a little bird tied by the leg, which he every now and then let fly, and the poor little prisoner would imagine itself free till it had reached the length of the string, when it would fall fluttering to the ground; the father of the lad sat within sight amusing himself with the spectacle!—"and why, you little rascal," I inquired, "are you tormenting that bird in such a manner?" "I want to kill it, Sir."—"Want to kill it! and can you not then kill it at once, instead of murdering it by inches! But why kill it? perhaps it has a mate, and little ones, and they may be near by, witnessing its sufferings. Come, my little fellow, set it free; it will be one step towards making a man of you." The little fellow did so accordingly; but alas! it was maimed, and could not escape; and the only service I could render it, therefore, was to have it despatched at once, to terminate its sufferings. The hard-hearted father had wounded it with a shot gun, and then given it to his son to murder at his leisure! "Be assured my lad," said I—to the son, but the lesson was more especially meant for the father—"Be assured that he who can be cruel to a bird ought not to be entrusted with negroes—no, nor with a wife and children; for he will be likely to treat them cruelly too. So think of it my little fellow, and be merciful, and God will smile upon you."

It is certainly true, as the poet has said, that of all our propensities, when unrestrained by culture and discipline,

"None sooner shoots into luxuriant growth, Than cruelty—most devilish of them all."

and how little care, alas! is taken by parents to repress this disposition: or, more truly, what pains they are at apparently to cherish it in most cases! The darling must have the kitten to maul, and choke, and murder; or a whip with which to chase the dog about the room.—The latter will sometimes growl when too hard pressed, and the former when badly hurt, will sometimes scratch. Mamma will then fall to belaboring the one or the other, for not submitting passively to be tortured by the young master or mistress. It is by such a process that children become depraved; they are not conscious at first of any wrong in the act; and their parents neglect the duty of making them know it; the evil practices ripen into fixed habits or prevailing propensities—and parents seek to shift the burden from their consciences by charging the blame upon Adam and the devil! The doctrine of native inherent depravity solves the whole mystery. "It's a pity—a wondrous pity—that little creatures so fascinating, and to outward appearance so innocent, should be so wholly and radically corrupted from the very birth! but hey day! so it is and we can't help it!"

But you can help it, though. Teach them lessons of mercy, early, both by precept and example; never allow them to inflict suffering upon others for their own amusement; let them even not harm a fly unnecessarily; nor a worm, nor any other creature. You are more cruel than they, in permitting them to be cruel; for you are conscious of the pain being caused thereby to the subject; they are not: they would weep if they knew it; but you, more hard-hearted, can often laugh. The dogma of native depravity is a wicked libel upon human nature, and, by implication, upon the divine author of that nature:—

"'Tis education forms the common mind,
Just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined."

Man is the lord of creation: but if ever tyrant deserved to be deposed for abuse of his prerogatives to purposes of cruelty, then does man deserve that degradation. Who can recount the wrongs which that noble and servicable animal, the horse, has suffered at his hands? And the ox—the meek and patient ox! Oh! my heart has ached witnessing the treatment of these laborious and uncomplaining servants of man! And the faithful dog! a friend that sticketh closer than a brother; faithful at all times—in weal or woe; through hunger, neglect, abuse of every kind. How oft is the faithful creature repulsed with kicks, when he runs to his master with every demonstration of joy, to greet him on his return home!—and how often when he whines with hunger, and asks, in such language as he can, for bread, does he receive a stone! I have known men to allow their dogs to follow them for miles from home, and never trouble themselves to see them fed when they stopped; nor even to defend them from the larger dogs by which they were assailed on the way. When the time comes to return, the poor brute follows, hungry, and panting with fatigue:—arrived at home, the master revels in the delights of rest, and refreshment after the journey; and should his half-starved fellow traveller venture in to suplicate a small share of attention, he is repulsed with a kick, and the door shut against him! Poor Tray, or Juba, or Towler, whatever thy name! thou hast a long account of ill to file, against those from whom thou certainly hadst a right to look for better things! But thou art only a sufferer from man's ingratitude and tyranny in common with all animals, that have rendered him service and relied upon his honor and kindness for an equitable return. It is a pitiable sight to see the live stock which are brought from the country to be sold in market towns; calves, and lambs, with their legs tied together, denied food the whole twenty-four hours, poor things, and drink—they are thrown out of the waggon on to the ground very unceremoniously—where they are subject to be trodden on—and preyed upon by flies, without the means of self-protection—it is truly affecting to hear their baying and bleating: could not some of this misery be avoided? Is it essential that they suffer hours of hunger and thirst, and confinement in one painful posture, with other incidental injuries, previous to their being killed? Surely, since their lives must be sacrificed to our convenience, it behooves us to do it in a manner compatible with humanity. If the groans of a fellow man were to greet our ears as we walked the streets, and we found him thus bound—a hungered—athirst, and in bodily pain, would it not awaken our sympathies? would not every sensibility within us be enlisted on behalf of the sufferer? By what rule of right then, do we deny all sympathy to the poor brute, merely because he can not articulate his tale of wrongs?

I have often thought the practice of forcing peculiarly cruel. What creatures of God seem to enjoy their brief being with so high a zest as birds? How eloquently do their various notes of praise roll from their little throats up to the throne of their Creator! And yet a score of their joyous lives are unfeelingly sacrificed, to supply sovereign man with one dainty meal! Nor is this the worst; for who can sum up the misery endured by the wounded, which the sportsman (hard sport for the poor little birds) leaves to die by slow degrees in thickets and morasses which his dogs can not penetrate; and the misery too endured by bereaved mates and little ones; for birds have their attachments and sympathies as well as we? There seems plausible ground enough for sacrificing the huge ox to man's necessities; for in that case many lives are maintained at the expense of one, and that one of inferior consequence: but think of destroying a little bird, when it is revelling in the warm sunshine, amongst the budding trees and opening flowers; and from the bottom of its little heart pouring forth a song of welcome to the spring, and of invitation to less susceptible man to walk forth and enjoy its glories—think of sacrificing such a life for mere sport—or to procure one dainty mouthful!

Some three years since, while I sat conversing with a respectable couple in Orange county, N. Y., one of their sons—an urchin of about 8 years old—came in from the garden with a dead bird in his hand; its plumage was exceedingly beautiful; (I am no ornithologist, and can not name the species) the mother immediately recognized it as one of a pair which had their summer nest on a tree in the garden, and which had for several successive Summers resorted thither and maintained their house-keeping till the cold season came on, and now one of them was dead; the urchin had wantonly killed it with a stone; how I longed to have the little wretch by the ears; and the poor little mate was left behind, to mourn in widowed solitude, and to pursue alone, when the season arrived, its journey to their wonted winter quarters. Gracious heavens! how I have suffered from that event! At the time I stifled my feelings, until, like Joseph, I had "sought a place to weep in," and I then eased my laboring heart by a flood of tears; and often—often since, has my heart been saddened by reflecting back upon the affecting incident.

I know not what to think of the fact—it is one of the greatest puzzles in the economy of nature—of God's having entrusted to man so absolute a power over the inferior animals, so prone, as he knew man to be, to abuse the trust to the most tyrannic purposes! I confess this puzzles me greatly; and were it not that the benevolence of the Deity is proven by so many millions of facts, this would beget a doubt of the doctrine—it really would.—But with Bulwer in the "Student," I am inclined to think that a future being awaits these animals, as well as man; in which they will experience a reparation for their present miseries. Oh! I find great consolation in hoping so! Meantime it is our duty to now use mercifully the sovereignty over them with which we are invested; and, as parents and guardians, to teach our children so to do; for as the sparrow falls not to the ground unnoticed of Heaven, we may be assured that all cruelty, whether towards man or brute, will be avenged on the perpetrator by him to whom vengeance belongeth; for nothing will justify cruelty; the most odious and destructive animal is as nature hath made it, our safety or happiness may require its destruction; but neither require that we should be cruel; and oh! let us beware lest if we show not mercy to others, we also "may seek it and not find it in our turn." DEATHS.

In East Martinsburgh, April 24th, of dropsy on the brain, SHARIL, daughter of I. H. Ives, aged 1 year and 6 months. May faith in him who took little children in his arms and blessed them, support the bereaved parents in their afflictions, and teach them to feel that their loss is her gain. Funeral the 26th—Sermon by J. A. A.

In West Leyden, April 26th, of cancer on the breast, Mrs. HANNAH HIGBY, wife of Mr. Benjamin Higby, aged 38 years.

By this dispensation of Providence, a husband has lost an affectionate companion; 5 children a tender mother; and society an ornament. Mrs. H. never attached herself to any denomination, nor made a profession of any particular religious sentiment; yet was a practitioner of the principles of Christianity. She endured her protracted and severe sickness with much patience, looked upon her approaching dissolution with calmness and frequently expressed her resignation to the will of God, and her willingness to go at his bidding. The funeral was attended the 28th and a discourse delivered by J. A. A.

Drowned, in East Martinsburgh, May 12th, BELA ALPHONZO, only son of Bela and Eliza Kenfield, aged 3 years and 10 months.

Thus the bud before its bloom,
Is nipped and hastened to the tomb;
But faith bids us to hope this truth—
'Twill blossom yet in fadeless youth.

Funeral the 14th—Sermon by J. A. A.

In Independence, February 27th, Mr. LEVI STEVENS GEORRIDGE, aged 21. He was an intelligent and amiable young man, a Universalist in sentiment. The death of a promising youth seems a proper occasion of regret; and in such case it is certainly not unbecoming to weep. Yet when Jesus has "prepared a place" for any individual should it not be filled? J. L.

"O, how I love thy law! it is my meditation all the day."—
Ps. cxix: 17.

Thus writes Israel's royal Psalmist, concerning the law of God. Now, Christian reader, can you from the heart respond to the sentiment of the text? do you really love the Divine law, and find in it a delightful subject for constant meditation?

I suppose your answer must necessarily depend on the views you entertain of this law. Are they such as have been derived from partial creeds and popular schools of Theology? Then you will find it hard—extremely hard, if not impossible, to reply in the affirmative. But if the Psalmist had substituted the word Gospel for law, there would have been no difficulty in the case.

The obvious reason is this, that human creeds and systems of Theology have, for ages, presented the law of God as the instrument through which the destiny of man is sealed—by which all the human race are doomed to endure all the miseries of this life, the agonies of death, and the pains of an endless hell. Whereas the Gospel is supposed to reverse this unalterable decree, so far, at least, as a part of mankind are concerned: and it is notorious that so constantly has this view of the law been kept up in the Christian world, that in the minds of most Christians, with the very sound of the phrase, "law of God," are immediately associated all the thunders of Sinai's smoking summit and the horrors of hell's rolling volcanoes. We cannot say but the framers of those creeds, which have been the cause of so much mental anguish, may have meditated on the law through the day; but judging by the fruit of such meditations, we should be much more inclined to think that they must have occurred during the long night of mental and moral darkness. I wish to avoid any appearance of misrepresentation, and I am aware that all are agreed in saying, that the law is good, and that if it had been universally obeyed, the happiness of all its subjects would have been the result; but since it has been violated, its penalty is the endless wretchedness of the transgressor, and as all have transgressed, so all stand exposed to the awful doom. But more of this hereafter.

For the sake of illustrating our subject, let us turn to the consideration of some of the Creator's physical laws. He who reads the book of nature aright, perceives Divine truth written by the finger of God on every page. We have not the vanity to think that we can, Newton-like, "unfold all nature's law;" but will merely introduce a few specimens, believing the reader will like the meditation, and find no difficulty in saying in relation to each, "O, how love I thy law."

The first law, then, to which we invite attention, is the great law of gravitation, by which all solid bodies within our atmosphere, are drawn directly towards the earth's centre—by which, and the counterbalancing power of the law of projectile force, the planets are kept in their orbit, and the order and harmony of unnumbered worlds preserved—and by which man enjoys a thousand blessings in the every day occurrences of life. Do you love this law? But notice its universality, imperiously demanding obedience of all its subjects.—It is the tie that binds the physical universe together. But have none of the subjects of this law ever transgressed its demands?—Behold the stone, by counteracting power, soaring aloft in direct violation of its dictates. The stripling with his sling has set it at defiance, as really as did the serpent, with his tongue, the law of Eden. But what is the penalty for transgressing the law of gravitation? Does it now demand that the rebel stone shall continue its flight through the boundless space, farther and farther from the earth, and never, no, never return to obedience? As soon would I believe this, as to believe that the law given by our heavenly Father for the guidance of his rational offspring, demands that the transgressor shall continue in endless transgression!

It is said, all allow, that the law of God requires that the transgressor return to obedience? Be it so, but the penalty of endless misery must for ever prevent such return; for none suppose that the obedient and holy will be perpetuated in misery for crimes they once committed.

2. Another law of nature, or rather another operation of the same law, requires that all the waters of the earth shall flow to their level—return to the ocean from whence they came; nor is it within the power of man to prevent the safe return of even the smallest particle. Will you take a drop of water, and burn it in the fire, to prevent its return? It will rise in vapor, then embosomed in some cloud it is wafted by the winds o'er the ocean's bed, and falls in rain—so that instead of preventing, you have hastened its return; or, if on hill or dale it chance to fall, conducted through rills, brooks and rivers, its passage is no less sure.

Now, has the Creator, in his wisdom, taken such care to secure the safe return of every particle of the material waters to the mother ocean, and has he taken less care of the spiritual waters—even his own rational offspring—that he should not have provided for their sure return to the vast ocean of everlasting love—to the embraces of their Father and their God? Do you say that many poor wretches in human shape, are so entirely estranged from good, so deep-engulfed in sin and moral pollution, that it is impossible they should ever return to the path of holiness and the enjoyments of Divine love? Go then, faithless mortal, and view some stagnant pool, where the waters, in their far off remove from the pure ocean, have become so polluted as to offend your senses and impair your health—now take notice that this filthy water is water still, and still possesses the inclination to return to the pure fountain. It has only become mingled with impurities, while detained by some obstruction from pursuing its journey thither. Remove, then, the obstructions—open the channel, and see how soon it will take its departure; and observe, also, the change that is now wrought in its condition—see how the filth and pollution are left behind, and it becomes pure as it arrives at the fountain of pure water—nor will the ocean refuse to receive it, because it was once defiled!

"As river's meander along,
Their beautiful margins display;
And in their confluence grow strong,
Receiving new strength on the way.

So the honey of love in the mind
Makes it spread in desires far abroad;
Till to others in love it is joined,
In its journey of faith to its God."

But is said that there are sinners so vile, that the love of God can exert no purifying influence on their hearts; for they are seen to sink deeper and deeper in sin, amidst the sunshine of Divine mercy! And who has not observed that stagnant waters are rendered more impure by the mellowing beams of the warm Summer's sun? But suppose we wait a few weeks, or months if need be, and return again to the spot where we saw these filthy waters. What, now, has been the effect of that sunshine which was supposed to be doing them so much harm? Where now are these waters? The impurities that were mingled in them may still be found, but the waters have by the warming beams of the sun, been drawn in purity to the clouds of Heaven. So saith the wise man "the dust shall return to the earth as it was, but the spirit to God who gave it"

3d. It is by another of the laws of nature that the material universe is preserved in being, so that not a single particle thereof can, by any process known to man, be annihilated; and shall we for one moment indulge the thought, that the all-wise Creator has taken such care effectually to secure the preservation of every, even the most minute particle of unconscious matter; and yet that he will neglect to take care of his intelligent offspring?—the beings on whom he has enstamped his own image, and for whose sake he has spread out the material universe? While on this subject, we shall do well to call to our aid the teachings of him "who spake as never man spake," and inquire, what saith the merciful Saviour of men, about this matter? Hear, then, his gracious words. "Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father. But the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Fear ye not, therefore; ye are of more value than many sparrows."—(Matt. x: 29-31.)

Is it said that this language was addressed by the Saviour to his disciples, and is therefore inapplicable to the unconverted? Show us the man, then, whose never-ending happiness or misery is of less importance than the life of a sparrow, and whose soul is not as well worth the Creator's care as one hair on the head of a disciple, and we will give the matter up, and allow that our Saviour exposed himself to persecution and to death, to save that which was good for nothing, or, to say the most, not worth a hair!—For the unconverted are lost sinners, and he came to call sinners to repentance, and to save the lost. O, reader, never let thy heart indulge the fearful thought that thy God will forget thee, or neglect to provide for and effectually to secure thy final wellbeing! Surely the law of preservation is lovely, and our meditations thereon have been sweet!

4th. The wise and benevolent Creator has established a law which confers happiness on every sentient being, while in its own proper element—that element which has been fitted for its use, and which is in harmony with its nature. Behold the eagle soaring aloft amid the ethereal blue, rejoicing in his proud flight, while in that element in which his Maker destined him to live!—Now take the eagle, and plunge him in the deep, and where are his joys? They are gone in a moment.—See the fish cut with joy the limpid stream—happy amidst the rolling wave! take it from its native waters, and put it on the land, and it is wretched at once. So we might go through with all that fly and all that swim, all that walk and all that creep; and we shall find that God has provided happiness for all, while in their native element—in which he designed them to live. Surely, then, if sin makes men happy, it is their proper element, and they ought to continue in it. And it is no less plain, that if God has designed the sulphurous flames of an endless hell, as the dwelling place of any portion of the human family, there they will rejoice and be happy;—or if not, it is plain that God governs the human race by laws, far less merciful than those by which he rules the brute creation. And it must be allowed that he loves the eagle, the fish and the sparrow, better than he does his creature man, on whom he saw fit to enstamp his own image. With these illustrations, drawn from the Creator's physical laws, in our minds let us proceed—5thly. To the consideration of the moral law, or that law which our heavenly Father has given for the guidance of his rational offspring—that law whose penalty is supposed to be the temporal, spiritual and endless death of the transgressor, and which, it is believed, would have plunged the whole race of man in hopeless misery, had not the wrath of the Lawgiver been appeased by the suffering of an innocent being!

Now, if there exists a law having such demands, one thing is clear, and that is, that no benevolent being can love it—of course, such could not have been the character of the law mentioned in our text. But as we are not left without a star to guide our way on this subject, we hasten to present the law under consideration, believing that it will tell us, for itself, what are its demands. But where shall we go to find this law? We go not to human creeds, but to our Master Jesus, who tells us that the first and great commandment is that we should love God with all our heart, mind and strength; and the second, that we love our neighbor as ourselves, and that on these two commandments hang all the law, and the prophets. So here we have the foundation of the whole, and we suppose that none will deny that the superstructure must be of the same material.

Now, what does this law demand? The answer is love. What will fulfil this law? The Apostle says, "love is the fulfilling of the law." But what is the penalty for transgression? Why, what is the penalty for a violation of the law of gravitation? Answer. The transgressor shall have no resting place till it returns to obedience. So the worshippers of the beast "have no rest day nor night," and "the wicked are like the troubled sea that can not rest," "there is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked." Such is the penalty, if penalty, it can be called. Such, at least, is the direct and unavoidable consequence of transgression. But the law has been broken and dishonored. What must the Saviour do to magnify it and make it honorable? He must "finish sin and make an end of transgression," bring all the rebels back to willing obedience, and thereby gain their united testimony that it is good. Has the law of gravitation been injured, because it has often been transgressed, and has as often proved the amplitude of its power to restore obedience? But what must the Saviour do to cause all sinners to return to obedience? He must "destroy the face of the covering cast over all people, and take off the veil that is spread over all nations"—the covering of mental darkness, and the veil of error through which men see their God clad in the habiliments of wrath and vengeance—and give them to see, in their clear light of Heaven-born truth, that "God is love!" Then will all sinners be heard to say, "we love him, because he first loved us." Then will it be seen that the law of love, like that of gravitation, can exert an all-conquering power over the long lost spiritual waters, and restore them in purity to be embosomed in the boundless ocean of Divine benevolence. Then shall it be known full well, that God has forbidden that his law should oppose the accomplishment of the gracious promises of the Gospel.

Reader, can you not say, O, how love I this law? If so, let it be the theme of your meditation all the day, and let it beguile the wakeful hours of your nights, and by living in obedience to its dictates, may you bear constant testimony that it is HONORABLE and GOOD.—Amen.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

Man, as has been truly said, is the noblest work of Omnipotence. His nature, which allies him to angels, proclaims him to be such. The master piece of the great Architect—a being created in the image of the invisible God and stamped with the impress of his great Author and Original; he was, by him, made lord over the "lower works" of his hands.

Man, considered merely as an animal, is superior to every other being that walks the earth.—Besure, his body was derived from the dust; but its nature, its formation, and the mechanism of its various and multiplied parts—that nice arrangement, design and order which pervade the whole—its powers and faculties, and every thing pertaining to it as a well organized system, proclaim it to be mysterious and wonderful; and with perfect propriety might every one, take up the exclamation—"I am fearfully, and wonderfully made!"

But the mind—the immortal mind, is what renders man infinitely superior, and exalts him high above every earthly thing. The powers and faculties of the body are noble, but how incalculably more so, are those of the soul! The mind of man—"it is this, which emphatically gives him his pre-eminence over other beings, by which he is surrounded; and entitles him to be considered as the 'lord of the creation.'" To the faculties of the body, there is a determined sphere of action—there are bounds set, which they may not pass—but to the immortal mind, there are no limits prescribed—to that, God has never said—"Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther." It is left free to "stretch its wings in space"—to rise from one degree of glory to another, and to be continually approximating toward perfection. "Much as man knows, in any stage of his progress, he may know still more; and may become still more exalted and lovely. Not confined to the present system as are other animals, he is destined to an existence, which, in point of duration, will run parallel with that of his Maker!"

In the formation of the human body—in the nice and perfect adaptation of every part to the whole, we have a striking manifestation of the benevolence of Deity—but the mind—the immortal mind—the image of God! There is seen a majestic—a strikingly grand display—a display, which words can not express, nor language describe, of the infinite wisdom and goodness of our Creator! But, notwithstanding man possesses that, by reason of which he can claim affinity to, or with a higher order of intelligences, he is slumbering in perfect ignorance of himself—unacquainted with those high and heaven-born powers and faculties with which he is endowed. What a being man might be, were he to assert the true dignity of his nature! To do this, he must first know himself, and knowledge of this kind is gained only by investigation.

"UNIVERSALISM IS TOO GOOD TO BE TRUE."

BY REV. C. HAMMOND.

This saying is among the many which we hear uttered against the salvation of the world. "It is too good to be true." Indeed; will not our cautious friends inform us, how much good and how much evil it takes to make a truth? Will they not tell us, how far the salvation of all men exceeds the infinite goodness of God? how much better it is, than the object of our Saviour's mission into the world? and what quantity of misery will satisfy us, and make us perfectly happy, in earth or heaven? If it is too good to be true, we hope those who pay this compliment to the doctrine, will never again declare, that it is "the devil's doctrine"—that it is the most licentious and wicked faith mankind ever believed, and that it leads thousands down to hell. Surely, if such are the fruits of the sentiments, it must, according to the opinion under consideration, possess a sufficient quantity of evil to recommend it to their acceptance. But, for one, I beg to be excused from censuring a doctrine because it is good, or from believing in a sentiment because it is evil. That Universalism is too good to be true, is impossible. Though it is the best religion man ever possessed—best, because it yields the best fruits and the most enjoyment—yet, it is no better than its divine Author. The goodness of Universalism is an internal evidence of its truth. And as God is acknowledged to be infinitely good, so no doctrine can, possibly be too good to be true, nor can any sentiment be true, that does not recognize the infinite goodness of the Deity. Therefore, that doctrine which limits the benevolence of God, and excludes no more than one soul from the everlasting enjoyment of heaven, is too bad to be true—too bad to agree with the unlimited kindness and promises of Jehovah—and too bad to produce a wholesome moral influence on society.

2. Another mistake, into which some people have fallen, is, that the faith of Universalists is nothing more or less than desire—that they believe in universal salvation, not because there is evidence to support it, but because they wish to have it true, and that mankind are naturally disposed to credit that which is the most favorable to their desires. The exact reverse of this is established by observation and Scripture. If our faith consists simply in a desire, our opposers need not congratulate themselves with the hope of showing the immoral tendency of Universalism; for, unless they show a difference of desire between us, they will not be able to show any difference in the tendencies of our desires.

That mankind are naturally inclined to believe the most joyous faith, independent of evidence, does not agree with the history of the early martyrs to this cause, and the weight of evidence they advanced, which has, in all ages, been resisted with an obstinacy bordering upon madness. Men are naturally ambitious for preference, superiority, and distinction in the world. They prefer ruling as tyrants to serving as slaves. Hence, every system of religion, that proposes to equalize and to elevate the whole to one common standard of virtue, intelligence and happiness, will meet with a cold reception from the proud, the vain, the ambitious and the self-righteous. But any system that proposes distinction, eminence, superiority and happiness to its devotees, is so gratifying to the pride and vain glorying of men—so congenial to a depraved mind, and so agreeable to a vitiated understanding, that little difficulty attends the promulgation of any form of Partialism. But not so with Universalism. No one is inclined to believe it, only by the weight of evidence. And often the most clear and unequivocal testimony is set aside and rejected, for no other reason than it is too good to be true. Instances of this kind are on sacred record.

When our Lord made his appearance to his disciples after his resurrection, we are informed, that "they yet believed not for joy." Luke xxiv: 41. This appearance of Jesus was demonstrative proof of his Messiahship—of his mission to save the whole world, and of the resurrection of all mankind to endless felicity. The disciples were so overpowered with joy—the tidings were so good, the riches so great, so free and so durable, that they, at first, doubted. And such, I verily believe, is the case in temporal things.

Suppose a parent, possessing a large fortune and having a son residing in a distant country, should die, leaving the whole estate to his child. A messenger announces to the son the unwelcome tidings of his father's death, and the rich bequest he has left him, at the same moment; which circumstance would the son be most likely to doubt, or believe first? The bad news, most certainly.—Thus we find the human mind more ready to believe, and anticipate evil, than good—more ready to doubt than to trust in the mercy and grace of God. The infinite goodness of God involves so great an amount of good, to each and all of Adam's posterity, filling eternity with immeasurable delight, and each soul with overflowing satisfaction, that the vastness of such love and such joy induce distrust rather than confidence.

In conclusion, I would adopt the sentiment and language of Dr. Paley, in his "view of the evidences of Christianity." "If it be farther said, that men easily believe what they anxiously desire; I again answer that, in my opinion, the very contrary of this is nearer to the truth. Anxiety of desire, earnestness of expectation, the vastness of an event, rather causes men to disbelieve, to doubt, dread a fallacy, to distrust, and to examine. When our Lord's resurrection was first reported to the Apostles, they did not believe, we are told, for joy. This was natural, and is agreeable to experience."

A SKETCH.

AN EXPRESSION.

It was a solemn day for the worshippers. All of the professed children of God—the favorite fraternity, met in their fond Quarterly meeting, and their beloved presiding Elder attended to give an additional-expression to the harmony and happiness of the love-feast; and to give additional holiness to the solemnity of the occasion.

A happy throng of souls! Those who had passports, repaired to and sat within the pale of the happy band of guests in love-feast; and the ordeal was passed by the recipients of God's special ministrations, with joy and shouting. Verily, thought the silent beholder, there is a divine reality in religion. These expressions of spiritual felicity are more than earthly. O! that I were one to enjoy the spiritual favor of the God of heaven, and see life in death, and prospective bliss in heaven, as a new-born child of God tasting, by anticipation, celestial happiness.

Thus deeply mused the unconverted. The favored ones of faith conferred. They exchanged their views of peaceful reconciliation, and united their hearts into one grand union of fraternal love, and told their deep-toned affection by tears. They sang hymns and spiritual songs. They felt as if upon the wing to heaven, freely emancipated from this lower world and all evil attachments.

The holy ministers of the word of revelation arose in successive order, and with solemnity deeply engraven on their fronts, warned sinners to flee from the "wrath of the Lamb," and take refuge in the ark of safety. Yea, the men of holy orders bade loud and long, the "unconverted impenitents" to repent of their evil ways, arise above the temptations, sin and the devil—put the world with all its shining allurements under their feet, and join the church of God and go to heaven with them—the humble followers of Jesus Christ.—"Amen—amen"—responded the brotherhood.

Heart joined with heart—spirit associated with spirit—song succeeded song and response succeeded response among the favored souls; and the acknowledged expression of the united throng of the fraternity, was—reconciliation to God—victory over the world, and triumph over death.

"Away with the vanities of this world—away with all its glittering joys—my Jesus is my all—my God is all my joy—on him are all my affections placed, Allelujah—Allelujah—amen—amen;" the temple echoed; and the humble worshippers seemed 'swallowed up in charity and peace.

Smile sat on smile upon their faces, and as if eager in ecstasy, they sung as followers of Christ—

"See the happy spirits waiting,
On the banks beyond the stream;
Sweet responses, still repeating,
Jesus, Jesus, is their theme."

The wordling, ignorant of the inculcations of divine revelations, was moved, to half persuasion to join the sinless throng as a follower of him who "went about doing good."

The devotions closed.

An angel assumed the poor, ragged infirm mendicant, with crutch in hand, and placed himself at the portals of the sacred temple. The multitude advanced, and the trembling beggar reached forth his age-worn hat, and petitioned the passing throng to administer to his painful wants. But the holy men of God passed silently along, and scarcely gave a look at the suffering monument of wretched poverty.

Perhaps it was because it was the Sabbath day—for certainly such loud professions could hardly be considered empty.

The multitude passed by, and the mendicant stood leaning on his crutch, with his hat in hand, without a mite administered, and eyed the professed children of the God of love with deeply searching look, until they were far away. But a lingering individual—a sinner—an unbeliever too, touched by a sense of the sufferings of his fellow-being, after all were out of sight advanced and made a gift.

At this the angel arose in the dignity of his heavenly character, and returned the gift with an hundred fold reward of peace—with his finger wrote over the temple door—"HYPOCRISY"—and took his heavenward flight.

NO CHANGE AFTER DEATH.

A DIALOGUE.

Limitarian. Universalism appears to me but a poor representation of the justice of God, teaching, as it does, that those who live and die in sin will finally fare as well as the most pious and godly.

Universalist. I presume the elder brother in the parable of the Prodigal Son would have made the same objection to the doctrine.

L. I would not have you understand me as having any objection to the vilest of sinners being saved, if they repent before they die; but as there is no change after death it can not be possible for God to save those who die in a state of impenitence.

U. Be careful how you limit the "Holy One of Israel." Your assertion that there is no change after death needs proof.

L. Needs proof! well you shall have it. "As the tree falls so it shall lie, and as death leaves us so judgment will find us." Is not this proof positive enough?

U. Not without citing the authority. "I should think Limitarians had been told often enough that this is but home-made Scripture; but I find it is necessary to remind them of it often."

L. Well, whether the precise language is in the Bible or not, the doctrine is true, and I challenge you to prove to the contrary.

U. Why, even your own system can not be supported by it. Heaven itself would be but one continual scene of mourning.

L. I would like to know how you will make that appear.

U. What do you understand by no change after death?

L. I mean by it, that the individual will retain, through eternity, the same dispositions and feelings, with which he left this world.

U. I will now relate an instance which is in point. It is but a few weeks since, a house was destroyed near Rochester, by fire. A girl of some eight or nine years of age, through fright, rushed into the flames. Here was a scene which called up all the love of a father—he sees the devouring flames encircling the tender form of his own beloved daughter—he knows that it is almost certain destruction to attempt a rescue, but he hears the smothering groan of the victim, as she writhes in the devouring flames. He can contain himself no longer—headlong he rushes forward to rescue his daughter or die in the attempt, he bounds into the flames but perishes with his daughter.

We will now suppose the scene re-enacted in another state of being. We will suppose the father in a state of bliss at the right hand of God, but that the daughter, who perhaps might have left the world in a state of impenitence, is brought to the judgment seat and there receives the sentence to depart; to dwell forever with devils and damned spirits in flames more painful than those which devoured her mortal body. Think you, that the father can witness all this, and still enjoy the happiness of heaven, and at the same time see his dear child writhing in unceasing tortures?—No! Heaven would be to him the worst hell that could have been invented under such circumstances.

L. O, 'twas nothing but sympathy—a weakness of our nature, that actuated the father to perish in attempting to save the life of his child; but in the other world Christians will be freed from all these weaknesses of human nature, and learn to look with holy resignation on the sufferings of the damned, though ever so nearly related to us in this life.

U. Ah! It appears, then, that you do admit a change after death; if it is only a change for the worse! O, how long will mortals persist in supporting a creed which wars against all the finer feelings of our natures! Adieu.

O. H.

EVENING MEDITATIONS.

How sweet to muse in twilight's hour,
And gaze upon the scenes above—
To view the wondrous works of power,
That there proclaim unbounded love.

In the pensive hour of twilight, as the gentle moon, the queen of night, accompanied by the starry host, shed their silver rays of light over the wide spread face of nature, with what emotions of inexpressible gratitude, and pleasure, does the reflecting mind gaze upon the wide spread canopy above. In such an hour as this, when the orb of day has retired from his wonted course and sunk, to rest, when the verdure of the fields and the trees of the forest, all seem to fold their leaves in the peaceful slumbers of the night, how delightful to roam through some retired avenue, there to view with wonder and reverence, the sublime and never-fading works of the Father of the universe. 'Tis here, while we behold the blue firmament on high, interspersed with the numerous host of jeweled lamps, burning in one eternal blaze—the moon as she gently pursues her onward course intercepted now and then by the misty cloud; that we are constrained to feel our own extreme littleness. 'Tis here, while we contemplate, we adore. With what a thrill of ecstasy, what a glow of reverence does the heart beat with the strongest emotions of gratitude towards the Author of its existence. O, who can behold the magnificent glories of creation, lavished in such unbounded profusion around them, without feeling the heart swell with gratitude, love and confidence, towards the kind and beneficent Author of the glorious scene before them, who has arranged the laws of nature with such perfect harmony and unerring wisdom! In this season of stillness and meditation, interrupted only by the notes of the evening songster, while the finer feelings of our nature are awakened, and the noblest principles of the soul aroused—with what fondness does memory recur to other times—to the by-gone scenes of youth, when perhaps, we with some loved companions of childhood, with feelings of youthful innocence, traversed the same ground and witnessed the same scenes which now surround us. But alas! Affection calls in vain. Their spirits have fled.—And as we look above, they seem to gaze down upon us from yonder bright stars with the smile of purity. In the transporting joy of the moment we almost forget the imperfect, the transient, and ever changing pleasures of earth. Hark! the bell tolls in measured notes, the hour of rest.—The blest tear of sympathy refreshes the memory of departed worth. In prayerful accents we exclaim, when we too shall repose in the narrow house appointed for all living, may the purest tear of affection moisten the green sod that shall cover us.

ANECDOTE.

I once knew a certain man who had been excommunicated from a Limitarian church, for intemperance.—(This was not done, however, till his property was squandered.) He did not back-slide from the faith, after his dismissal; but continued a firm believer in the great essential of Limitarianism, and a zealous opposer of Universalism, especially when in liquor.

It came to pass, on a certain time, that a neighbor of his, a Universalist, passed along and found him intoxicated, and lying beside the fence. He raised him up, assisted him home, and remarked to him, "it is singular that so orthodox a man should get so drunk." "Yes, yes," replied our hero, "but if I was a Universalist, I would get a d—n sight drunker!"

PEACE.

BY REV. J. WHITNEY.

What is meant by following "peace with all men?"

It is not probable that Christians are required to follow peace with all men, so far as not to contend with them regarding matters of religion. There are many examples in Scripture, which warrant and enforce the duty of contending with others on important subjects; and this appears to have been the case with all the true Prophets of God. They disputed much against the popular religion of the times, for which they were obliged to suffer the reproach of their enemies, and to flee into deserts and solitary mountains. "Woe is me, my mother," says Jeremiah, "that thou hast borne me a man of strife, and a man of contention to the whole earth." And we read of many "who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the violence of fires, escaped the edge of the sword, out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, and turned to flight the armies of the aliens." These characters "of whom the world was not worthy," were sometimes wandering about in the mountains and caves of the earth, in order to escape the violence of their religious opposers. On the other hand, all those who were not valiant for the truth were censured as enemies of the faith and false Prophets.

A continuation of this great controversy may be found in the New Testament. Near the commencement of his public ministry, our Saviour said, "think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword." Likewise, when he came before Pontius Pilate, "to this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth." And in bearing this witness, he condemned boldly, and declared the works of the world were evil. He disputed fearlessly with the Scribes and Pharisees, telling them, that though they were "highly esteemed among men, they were an abomination in the sight of God." And again, "ye devour widow's houses, and for a pretence make long prayers; therefore ye shall receive the greater damnation." To his beloved disciples, he said, "blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and shall say all manner of evil against you for my sake, rejoice and be exceeding glad, for so persecuted they the Prophets which were before you."

In the Acts of the Apostles, it is said, "there arose certain of the Synagogue of Cyrenians and Alexandrians, and them of Cilicia and Asia, disputing with Stephen; and they were not able to resist the wisdom and the spirit by which he spake." In the same book we are told of Paul's disputing boldly with the Jews and Gentiles, for which they sought to kill him. To refute the arguments of these champions, no other expedient could be found than to present false witnesses and excite the people to persecution. And certain it is, if we would follow the example of our Saviour, or would obey his commands, we must not shun religious controversies with such as have embraced opinions that are corrupt and erroneous.

But while we are called upon to contend earnestly for the truths of the Gospel, we are also required to be of a peaceable disposition towards all men. Whenever we engage in a religious, or in fact, any other discussion, we should be careful to govern our angry passions, and exercise meekness and brotherly love. One who has no rule over his own spirit, appears to a great disadvantage, and is in danger of giving offence to others about him. Solomon informs us that "a wrathful man stirreth up strife; but he that is slow to anger, appeaseth strife."

In order to maintain a good disposition, it is necessary to mortify pride and put on humility. This admonition was given by Paul to his Roman brethren; "I say through the grace given unto me, to every one that is among you, not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think—be kindly affectionate one to another, with brotherly love preferring one another." We should endeavor to guard against selfishness, which is a radical source of envying and strife, working all manner of evil. The Apostle Paul has forewarned us of the passions and practices growing out of this habit. "This know, that in the last days perilous times shall come, for men shall be lovers of their own selves." Whenever self love is not balanced or restrained by general benevolence, it is easy to see that much will spring up which is calculated to impair the happiness of mankind; and indeed our own happiness, which must be quite limited without a peaceable disposition, should always constitute an incentive to action. There is no possibility of enjoying peace and quietude while we are consuming one another by our mutual animosities and domestic wars. A deep concern for the good of ourselves and others, should induce us to preserve peace with all men; and in order to accomplish this, we must avoid such quarrels as are apt to wound each other's feelings, for when persons think themselves ill-treated, they not only become unhappy, but will say and do many things which are offensive and hurtful.

Following peace with all men, has been strikingly illustrated in the temper and conduct of our divine Master, who was called the Prince of peace. In all things he acted up to the character and design of his mission. He came to restore peace on earth, and to proclaim the good will of Heaven to sinful man. By the exhibition of every Christian grace, he constantly unfolded the character of that God whose nature is love, and for this he was sensible the world would hate him. But he remained firm in the execution of his purpose, though as far as was consistent with the truth and his mediatorial office, he was filled with mildness even towards his most bitter enemies. He endured the contradiction of sinners with meekness, and when he was reviled he reviled not again. Zealous indeed was he, and valiant for the truth, yet gentleness marked his whole career; and even while on the cross, he prayed fervently for his murderers, though they wagged their heads in mockery of his dying pangs.

Following peace with others is necessary, not only for our present enjoyment, but also to a well grounded hope of future life and happiness; for unto them that are contentious, and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, God will render indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish. And while under the painful gnawings of self-condemnation, we have not the enjoyment of that hope which leads to purification of heart.

It is not unfrequently the case that we have animosities and divisions among us. We are sometimes involved in perilous difficulties with our nearest neighbors. May it not be said of us as it was of the ancient Jews? "They looked for peace, but no good came, and for a time of health, but behold trouble." In this land of civil and religious liberty, may not the language of God's chosen people be adopted,

"Without are fightings, and within are fears."

THEMES OF THOUGHT.

OR SELECT SENTENCES FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

1. "It is of great importance that we understand the Scriptures rightly; for if we do not, they will do us a world of harm. For they are the greatest Engine to do us hurt of any in the world, the children of men place so much confidence and faith in them."—E. HICKS. Let every reader of this fitly saying of old Hicks make it an exercise to himself, to select one instance at least, of an injurious influence or result which has arisen from some erroneous interpretation of the Scriptures. If all the instances were collected, there would be what might be very appropriately called "a world of harm."

2. "The reason that people are talking of an angry God, is, because they are themselves of an angry disposition and nature; for nothing else could induce them to consider their Creator an angry God, a revengeful God." E. HICKS.—If on taking a survey of our acquaintances, we find the doctrine of God's justice, as it is wrongfully called, or of his disposition to blame and punish unmercifully; most acceptable to those who, in their judgments and actions shew the least disposition to charity, kindness, or candor towards their brethren; and, on the other hand, that the doctrine of God's great mercy and paternal love is most grateful to, and most readily embraced by, those who are the most characterized by their benevolent and warm-hearted natures, we will have good occasion to agree in sentiment with the author quoted.

3. "The guardianship of human laws and the eye of man, the laugh of the world and the world's frown, to which we are such slaves, lose their power in proportion as conscience, which is the eye of the mind, comes to take the oversight of our affairs. A liberty, a self-mastery, an independence upon the opinions of others, and a mind ever conscious of a right intention, come instead of artifice, and cunning, and plodding adherence to customary rules." Those who have tried it, have found it so. Let those who are weary of such slavery, with its unsatisfying sequences, try a change of masters. Let conscience be resolutely and habitually obeyed. Then will they grow greatly in their own esteem, and advance likewise in the estimation of the wise and good, and rise into influence over the better part of men.—Then will they feel as when a slave escapes from his stripes and weary toils: then will they feel as men should; they will feel and rejoice in their new condition; they will enjoy a health and strength; a peace which passeth all understanding, and a joy which the world can neither give nor take away.

4. "An occasional effort will not form a habit; and it is habits alone that makes those things pleasant and agreeable, which, in the first instance, oppose our love of self-indulgence. To break an old habit, and to form a new one, is never easy nor pleasant; and a certain probationary state must be endured, before success and the satisfaction which accompanies it, can be enjoyed."—MRS. PARKES.

5. "The manner in which I have seen some families pass their evenings at home, when they were not engaged with company, has often appeared to me to be dull, uninteresting and frivolous.—I have beheld the father, mother and children, scarcely keeping up a languid conversation; one lounging in an easy chair; another turning over lifelessly the leaves of a Magazine; and all yawning responsively, until the wished for hour of bed arrived. If these people were to be seen only at such times, they would be ranked in a very low scale of existence, appearing rather to vegetate than to live. But see them again, the next evening in company, and you can hardly credit your senses, which show you the reverse of the family picture you had before contemplated. The father is now, all intelligence and animation; the mother brilliant, and the daughters all smiles and good humor. Is there not something wrong in the habits of individuals who require such excitation to rouse into exertion their talents, social qualities, and apparently, their powers of enjoyment?"—MRS. PARKES.—Assuredly there is in the habits, principles, or motives of such people, (too frequently to be met with,) something seriously wrong. Would they rouse themselves to interest and edify those of their own family, they would have a purer, sweeter pleasure than their present habits yield them.

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER.

" The closing part of your letter where you write of your religious feelings, and express a "fear" that we are "cherishing a delusion instead of a reality," has particularly engaged our attention, and elicited some conversation between myself and your sister in relation to your situation, views and feelings. You will, therefore, attribute it to the best of motives, if I indulge in a professional way of making a few remarks.

That you should regard the "old evangelical doctrines of our forefathers," as nearer the religion of the Bible than our present views, is not singular. You are well aware that we too have occupied similar ground; and it was not until after we had given the subject considerable attention, that we gave up our early prepossessions, and this, also, you are well aware, at the sacrifice of feeling in regard to the opinion of our friends. "But, after all, dear brother," we are in no way disheartened; the more we reflect and examine, the more thoroughly convinced are we, that a Being powerful, wise and good governs all, and that under his divine administration "all is well;" that is we are fully persuaded that "He has no end in view, and will permit no event to take place, incompatible with the highest good and best happiness of every intelligent creature, He has called into existence."

It is possible and even probable that you have imbibed some erroneous opinions in regard to what we cherish as truth. We claim that the doctrines we believe are as old and as evangelical as those entertained by our forefathers. Truth is immutable. The truth in relation to the final destiny of each individual of the human family, is coeval with the divine determination to call into being the race of man. And did God then design to make the existence of all a blessing? I am confident you will not assert a contrary opinion. The Lord Almighty designed in the beginning to bless all, and he will bless. This truth was revealed to Abraham, (Gen. xii: 3,) and has been proclaimed "by all the holy prophets since the world began." Acts iii: 21. This, then, is not a new doctrine. And that it is quite as evangelical as the doctrines of our forefathers, will appear evident when the signification of this term is considered.

You say you can not to your satisfaction, understand the texts of Scripture to which we referred, as we understand them. But can you satisfactorily explain them on any other ground, than that of universal blessing in Christ and reconciliation to God?

And now let me inquire, are you satisfied with the belief of the doctrine of endless misery? Are you satisfied with those views of the heavenly state, hereafter, which you entertain? Accompanying this I send you a few papers in one of which, (Magazine and Advocate, vol. v, No. 17,) you will find a sermon by Rev. H. Ballou, 2d, and I would particularly call your attention to the closing part, where the author speaks of the common views of heaven. What is heaven? We are accustomed to conceive of it as a state of perfect felicity. It must, then, necessarily include all. Should one individual be excluded, it would not be heaven. "It is not enough for us, that we are to be happy, unless our families, our friends, even our enemies, if we are Christians; yes, and the whole world shall share in the great salvation." It must be so, not one can be excluded, much less millions, and all the rest be happy. * * * * * J. B. Jr.

UNIVERSALISM IN CHENANGO COUNTY.

Br. GROSH—Now for a brief sketch of the situation of our cause in this county. It is about two years since I was solicited by a few spirited and worthy friends to remove to this place. Accordingly with prospects no ways flattering, yet strong in faith and hope, we came on, and, encouraged by the zealous co-operation of a few names who considered their religious rights worth a struggle, we commenced our labors. We have had a trying scene of difficulties to pass through. Many has been the time, when our soul was about to die within us, and we were tempted to give up all as lost. All that a determined opposition could effect, has been done to prevent the permanent establishment of our cause in this village. Still, we have fought the battle and gained the victory. But on a retrospective view, we must say it is the Lord's doings—and marvellous in our eyes. The hundreds that assembled at the annual meeting of our Association, and at the dedication of our house, and the joyful and interesting services on those occasions, served to strengthen the hands and encourage the hearts of our friends, and to awe into respect our opposers. Br. Smith's sermon on the latter occasion was sound, practical, clear and forcible, and pronounced in a style peculiar to its able author.

By a unanimous vote of the Society, our house was opened for stated worship on the 26th of March—in the mean time our congregation has been steadily increasing, and our prospects at present are cheering.

NORTH NORWICH.—It is not a year since the society in this place was organized. In the mean time, two worthy and valuable members have been called from their earthly labors, whose loss is sensibly felt and feelingly deplored. But these afflictive events have not discouraged our friends, and it may be truly said that they are deserving all praise for their zeal, patience and perseverance in the good work.

We have labored with this society one fourth of the time, for the year past. We have moved forward heart and hand in the good cause, together. The blessing of the Lord has been upon us. The Trustees of said society have recently contracted for the erection and completion of a house for public worship, the ensuing season. The house is to be built of wood, thirty-seven by forty-five feet, with a gallery on three sides, and a steeple of suitable proportion. The work is begun, and is to be completed in the month of November next.

MACDONOUGH.—Here is a good society in a prosperous condition, with an excellent and well organized choir. Owing to the Christian feeling and liberality of the Methodists in this place, the society have the privilege of occupying their house one fourth part of the time. If our friends persevere in their labors of love, and steadfastly continue to adhere to the glorious cause which they have espoused, they will ere long be able to build a house of their own.

SMITHVILLE AND GREENE.—The united society of these two places, have no stated ministration of the word at present. They are not lacking in numbers, wealth, talents and influence. Brethren, it is high time you were up and doing; remember, while men slept the enemy sowed tares. Every thing you should hold dear and sacred, may be lost by supineness and neglect. Awake—awake, then, out of sleep, and let your faith be manifest by your works. Now is the accepted time—now is the day of salvation.

PITCHER AND PHARSALIA.—Our worthy Br. C. S. Brown, whose zeal, faithfulness and arduous labors in the vineyard of the Lord are well known in this part of the heritage, has labored with these societies a portion of the time, for the past year; I understand they are in a prosperous condition.

BAINBRIDGE.—This is the field of the judicious and successful labors of Br. G. Messinger; whose faith, patience, talents and untiring zeal are well known. The society and church in this place, are the largest in this county. They own one half of a good house, and are favored with the labors of Br. Messinger one half of the time. This society forms an impenetrable phalanx in the cause of truth and righteousness. They present a front to principalities, and powers, and spiritual wickedness in high places, which cannot be shaken. May they go on and prosper, and long continue to sit together in heavenly places, and enjoy the unity of the spirit in the bonds of love. We pray that their candlestick may never be removed out of its place, but that they and their children, and their children's children, may enjoy the happy inheritance of the saints in light for ever.

SOUTH NEW BERLIN.—There are a few names here that are precious—their garments have been kept free from the stains of error and moral pollution. Their moral worth is above all price.—Clouds and darkness have obscured the prospects of this society in past days, but for a year past they have been vanishing. If our friends there continue to run with patience the race that is set before them, in the way of the Divine commands, they will soon find that their days of mourning are ended. They at present enjoy the labors of Br. Messinger one fourth of the time.

COLUMBUS.—Our excellent Br. Wm. Delong has labored with this society during the past year, and I believe his labors have proved successful in the up-building of Zion and the spread of the truth. I am informed that our cause is gaining ground there. There are a few who, on account of their intelligence and moral worth, are an honor to the cause—one of whom can chase a thousand in the ranks of error; and two put ten thousand to flight. May the Lord strengthen and build them up in the most holy faith, and establish them upon the rock of eternal truth.

NORWICH.—It is well known that the society in this beautiful and growing village, made exertions years since, to build a house of worship, but failed not for the lack of ability or means, but for the want of perseverance. This failure produced sorrow and deep regret in the hearts of our friends throughout the county. If the society in this place have erred concerning their duty, it must have been against light and knowledge; for in by gone days, they have had the great truths and principles of the Gospel of God's impartial grace world's salvation, clearly and powerfully set before them by some of our ablest and most talented preachers in the moral vineyard. But I trust the day is not far distant, when they will rise again in their moral strength and go forward in the majesty of truth, and build up the walls of Zion in that place, and erect a house for the worship and praise of the most High, where they and their children, and the passing pilgrim and the stranger that sojourns within their gates, may assemble and pay their vows and present their offering before the Lord of the whole earth. So mote it be.

Thus you see, Br. Grosh, that our cause in this county was never more prosperous than at the present. Have we not abundant reason to thank God and take courage? N. DOOLITTLE.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JUNE 2, 1837.

PUNISHMENT.

There are four words of the same general meaning, connected with the infliction of pain for the violation of a duty, which differ slightly in shades of meaning from each other—punishment, chastisement, correction, and discipline.—Mr. Crabb thus defines three of them—"As correction and discipline have commonly required punishment to render them efficacious, custom has affixed to them a strong resemblance in their application, although they are distinguished from each other by obvious marks of difference. The prominent idea in correction (v. to correct), is that of making right what has been wrong. In discipline, from the Latin disciplina and disco, to learn, the leading idea is that of instructing or regulating. In punishment, from the Latin punio, and the Greek peinè, pain, the leading idea is that of inflicting pain." Of Chastise and chasten, the same author says—"chasten and chastise, both come from the French châtier, from the Latin castigo, which is compounded of castus and ago, to make pure." And every Dictionary I have consulted, interchanges these words and their primitives as the meaning of each other—as synonymous terms.

That the leading idea of punishment—i. e. the infliction of pain—is not the only idea, is evident by reflecting that there is a considerable difference in the meaning of these three words, all associated with this leading idea—suffering, punishment, revenge. Suffering may be inflicted on an innocent, holy person—is not accompanied by guilt in him who bears it, nor arises in a sentiment of mere justice in him who inflicts it. Consequently suffering is not, in itself, a visitation of punishment, except when visited on the guilty. Punishment has already been defined.

"Revenge, (says Mr. Crabb,) is the basest of all actions, and the spirit of revenge the most diametrically opposed to the Christian principle of forgiving injuries, and returning good for evil; it is gratified only with inflicting pain without any prospect of advantage"—While, according to the same writer, "The act of avenging though attended with the infliction of pain, is oftentimes an act of humanity." Thus, often God avenges the wrongs of the oppressed; but he never *revenge*s himself on those who insult his majesty. Vengeance is the Lord's as he manifests it in his punishments of evil doers; but revenge he neither practices himself, nor allows us to practice it.

From these definitions, taken from the best human authorities in our language, we are led to see that punishment is perfectly consistent with correction, discipline, and chastisement—that suffering is not always punishment—and that revenge is inconsistent with either just and proper punishment, or any of its synonymous terms.—Revenge is the infliction of "pain without any prospect of advantage." Punishment is the infliction of pain for an offence, with the design to correct what is wrong; or to instruct in well doing, as a discipline; or to chasten, or render the offender pure.—Such is clearly the difference between these two terms, Revenge and Punishment.

A LETTER AND ANSWER ON PRAYER.

MR. SKINNER—I am a stranger to you, but having recently taken up my abode in this place, I last Sunday attended your church.—It would be no flattery for me to say that I was pleased with your discourse, and that I hold some sentiments in common with yourself. But in your address to the Deity you made use of some expressions, which called to mind a subject upon which I have frequently been compelled to reflect with pain and disgust.—I allude to the inconsistent language and insulting requests which characterise nine-tenths of the petitions which we hear from the orthodox pulpits of the day. They speak of God, as though he were an ignorant, but cruel tyrant, and of themselves as his slaves. Their petitions are insults, and their thanks, reproach!

But I would not have you think that I discovered in your address any thing to which such harsh language would apply. The words were simply (in my opinion) inconsistent with what I suppose your principles to be. They were in substance these—You thanked God "that we were placed in a land where the power of the rack, the stake and the dungeon were never felt"—the fair implication of which language appears to me to be, that he has placed some of our fellow-men in situations where they are felt.—Now, to thank God that he has placed us in better circumstances than our neighbors, is to thank him for being partial; and seems to me about as consistent, as it would be for me to say to a man, Sir, I believe you to be a very great rascal, and I do not care what you do to my neighbor; but I feel very grateful for the protection which you have extended to me!

I met the other day with a brief little outline of a prayer, which comes so near my views of what a prayer ought to be that I shall take the liberty of transcribing it for your criticism.

"Oh God! Thy creature who now in the midst of his brethren is about to lift up his voice unto thee, feels that from the abundance of his heart, his lips can utter nothing but gratitude and praise.

He can not, Oh God! address thee in the character of a petitioner—for what has he to ask for?—Thy bounty has supplied him, together with all thy intelligent creation, with every thing—and thy tender mercies are over all thy works.

He dare not even ask thee for a continuation of thy goodness and mercy; for it would be an insult to thy character, which is made up of those attributes, the benign influence of which has been with us all our life long.

Neither would he attempt to lay before thee our sinful—our fallen condition; for thou art God!

and what can man tell thee? Thou art infinite in knowledge; and what is there in our nature or our conduct that thou art ignorant of? We feel grateful that we are in thy hands.—And from the kind dispensation of thy providence in providing for the comfort and sustenance of our perishing bodies, we feel the most implicit confidence that, that portion of THYSELF which now animates our bosoms will, when freed from the clogs of mortality and the imperfections consequent on animal existence, return again to THYSELF, to expand in the sunshine of eternal blessedness and peace!

Indulgent Lord God! When we reflect upon thy majesty, thy power and thy wisdom, we can not but feel our own comparative nothingness: but when we take into consideration our connexion with thee—our high privileges and immortal immunities; we feel an HONEST pride which prompts us to pay—not the servile homage of a cringing slave to a haughty tyrant, but the tribute of a grateful heart.

And now, Oh Lord! with no petition to make—with nothing to ask for; grateful for what thou hast already done for us; and entertaining the most lively confidence as to what thou wilt still do, we go to our respective homes full of peace in believing that we, together with the whole family of man, shall, when we have done with time, and all that is mortal of us shall be dissolved, return again to thee, to stay in thy presence forever. AMEN."

I have no doubt that many of the inconsistencies which we hear in prayer, grow out of carelessness? for I have heard many prayers that the mind evidently had but little to do with; being an exercise of the mere organs of speech.

I address this letter to you, my dear Sir, with sentiments of the sincerest regard—and I should be happy to make it the basis of a more permanent acquaintance, for I esteem the intercourse of mind with mind as almost the highest happiness of life.

I anticipate a treat from A. C. Thomas, whose writings I have perused, though I never saw the man.

Yours, etc.,

MR. D. SKINNER.

ANSWER.

DEAR SIR—With the spirit of your letter I am well pleased. I am not only pleased with its tone, and general sentiments in regard to the impartiality and boundless benevolence of the divine Being, but especially with the open frankness and untrammelled freedom and independence with which you express yourself. For implicit confidence and acquiescence in the dictum of a clergyman, merely because he occupies that station, and fawning sycophancy towards him on account of his calling and profession, forms no part of the sentiment with which I desire to inspire those who may be pleased to listen to my public labors.

I fully agree with you that many prayers which are publicly offered to the divine Being from orthodox pulpits are strangely inconsistent with enlightened views of his character, and which, (did the petitioners understand the proper import of their own language,) can be regarded in no other light than insults and mockery.—Yet they evidently are not intended as such. In regard, however, to the language used last Sunday in one of my prayers, to which you take exceptions, I must beg leave to dissent from the opinion you express as to its impropriety. You object to our thanking God "that we are placed in a land where the power of the rack, the stake and the dungeon are never felt," because you say the language implies, that God has placed some of our fellow-men in situations where these evils are felt; and hence, implies that he is partial, etc. The last conclusion I think does not necessarily follow from the admission of the first.

Now let us inquire, are we not, as a people and nation, exempt from the evils mentioned, viz. the rack, the stake, etc.? The answer must be Yes. Well, are not some of our fellow-men the victims and sufferers of these evils? Answer. Yes. The fact then exists. Is it wrong then or irrelevant to God, to recognize this fact, in our addresses to him, as it truly exists? If to speak of it as it really exists, is virtually to accuse God, of partiality, then the existence of it proves him to be partial? And which is the worst—that Providence that ordains the existence of the fact? or that language which merely recognizes it as it is?

Now I do not deem the fact that we are exempt from those evils, while some nations are subject to them, sufficient to prove God partial; any more than the facts that we enjoy a republican government while many nations are subject to a monarchy or a tyranny—that we are free from the superstitious belief in witchcraft, though our ancestors were the victims of it—that the moderns are enjoying the benefits of the Newtonian philosophy, though the ancients knew nothing of it—prove that God is partial in these things. The Newtonian philosophy was discovered and introduced at the right time. Our country was delivered from monarchy and from witchcraft at the right time—the very time which Deity saw was best. And other nations will be delivered, when he sees it best they should. We as individuals are sometimes sick and sometimes well. But these changes and differences in the condition of individuals, or of nations, do not prove God to be partial.

In all conditions wherein men are placed, I believe they have reasons for gratitude to God. In health and prosperity that we are so; in sickness and adversity, that they are no worse; and not unfrequently have men occasions of gratitude to God for the very adversities and afflictions with which they are visited. So far as the temporary evils to which mankind are subject, are understood and their ultimate tendency and final results are discovered, the ways of God to men are abundantly vindicated, and all things are seen to "work together for good." So that we may well thank God either for general or particular blessings showered upon us, without in the least implying his partiality.

The form of a prayer with which you are so well pleased, and which you copied in your letter, is a very beautiful specimen of chaste composition, and a fervent breathing forth of grateful adoration, devout gratitude, and entire confidence in the Divine goodness, and well adapted to a satisfied and happy frame of mind—such a frame as that in which good old Simeon found himself after his eyes had seen and his arms had clasped the long expected Messiah; or as good old Jacob felt when he had found his long-lost Joseph, and exclaimed "it is enough." But all can not feel at all times that happy and satisfied state of mind, especially in seasons of sorrow and trouble. And that it is right in such cases to petition God for things that we need, or think we need, (with a humble resignation to his will, however,) is evidenced by the numerous petitions recorded in the Scriptures, particularly the strong supplications of Jesus just before his agonizing death, and the beautiful form of petition he gave to his disciples which is commonly called the Lord's Prayer.

Reciprocating all the friendship and good feelings expressed in your letter, and hoping with yourself for further opportunities of longer and more intimate acquaintance, I subscribe myself, Dear Sir,

Yours in Christian friendship and fervent charity,

D. SKINNER.

FREE AGENCY.

"If Mr. Grosh would answer the following question, he would oblige the writer, and also a number of readers.—How can the agency of man be reconciled with the foreknowledge of God. J. S., Jr."

"I will try, Sir," was the answer of a gallant officer during the late war, and preceded the accomplishment of an action which for bravery and difficulty, has seldom had its parallel.

The term agency has two meanings,—one in commercial, the other in theological use. In the first, it means one empowered to act in lieu or stead of another. In the latter it simply means the ability to act. Were I inclined to obey the foregoing request simply to the letter, my task would be an easy one, construe the term agency in either sense. But I presume our correspondent wishes me to reconcile man's freedom of will or action, with the foreknowledge of God. The difficulty of doing this, rests more in the preconceived opinions of men, than in the thing itself. They suppose freedom of action implies uncertainty, while God's foreknowledge is certainty; and that, therefore, there must be a contradiction between the two. Is this necessarily the case? I think not. In my opinion the results of a freedom of action may be as certainly foreknown, as the results of a compulsory state of action. I will illustrate the case.

No inducement could induce the prodigal son to return to his father's house while he lived wantonly and riotously. He acted freely in staying away. The results of that action could have been certainly foreseen by any being possessing prescience. It ended in ruin, shame, degradation, starvation. The effects of starvation on his mind were to set him to thinking of his father's house where there was bread enough and to spare, and to resolve that he would feast his hungry soul on that food if he could obtain it, even as an hired servant. He acted freely in returning to, as he had done in departing from, his father's house, and willingly fulfilled the foreknowledge of the results of his actions. No outward force or violence was offered to compel him to act in either case—yet the results were as certain as if the whole force of the material universe had been used to force him from home, to force him into dissipation, to force him to feed swine, and to force him home again.

Dr. Reid compares foreknowledge to memory. He says foreknowledge is no more wonderful to us, than our memory of past events would be to a being deprived of that faculty. Yet to remember a past event, it must have actually existed. So to foreknow a future event, it must actually take place. Remembrance of an event does not cause that event to have existed; for it has existed whether remembered or not. So foreknowledge of a future event does not cause that event to come to pass; for it must exist in the future, before it can be foreknown. That which is not, can not be known at all—either fore or after known.

But it is also certain, that that which is foreseen by me, as the result of a certain course of conduct I intend pursuing, I am responsible for, so far as I intend that result. God either intended that man should be finally holy or unholy—happy or unhappy. He foresaw what would be the result of man's creation. He possessed power sufficient to frame events so as to produce (even by human agency) the very results he intended should flow from them. Consequently—if any man is endlessly damned it will be because God intended that result in creating him.

THE PRIMITIVE CHRISTIAN.

Since my return from the South I have been privileged with seeing my good brother Shepard's April No. of the above named paper, in which he notices what I said concerning him and his paper in the Magazine and Advocate of March 17th. He now accuses me of making "another malevolent thrust" at him (in the article of March 17th) with my "usual ventrosity and egotism!"—of using "torrents of abuse"—"having a morbid conscience or a superficial mind"—"recovering from the paroxysms of mortified pride"—being guilty of "an outrageous profanation of an institution of the Lord Jesus Christ," etc., etc., etc., and what appears strangely inconsistent and entirely unaccountable (on the supposition of these charges being true) he seems almost inconsolable because I will not consent to enter into a labored discussion with him relative to his views of a certain ceremony! Why really, if I am guilty of all, or one-half that he accuses me of, I should expect that no man, of any character or standing in the religious world, would ever consent to enter the lists of theological discussion with me;—for the very touch would be pollution, and contact with me would tarnish the fairest reputation.

But, candidly, my dear Br. S., let me query, What language did I use in the article of March 17th that had the least appearance of "a malevolent thrust," "torrents of abuse," or that gave the slightest indication of a "morbid conscience," or "paroxysms of mortified pride," etc.? I request you, and our readers, to take that article and read it over again carefully, and see if it is not couched in the most mild and kind language; and ask thy conscience friend S., whether there is not a bare possibility of something being morbid there. I do not say there is. For I am no judge of other men's consciences.

One more request. Will my good brother Shepard please explain the word "ventrosity"?—he being a critic and I so ignorant as not to know its meaning. If he can not give us the true lexicographical meaning of the word, I would further query, whether he had not better set himself up as a teacher of unknown tongues than attempt further to win laurels of honor in the field of English criticism?

PLAGIARISM.

I know not why it is, but there are few things I more heartily detest than literary pilfering. I have no patience with it. A man may borrow ideas—for all ideas are common stock, and we have few, if any, that are not derived from others—and arranging and dressing them up in our own manner, we may send them forth to the world as original. A writer may even unconsciously write a sentiment in nearly the precise words in which he first read it, and not knowing that he has drawn it from the stores of memory rather than from imagination, he may be excused for presenting it to the world as his own—for he thinks no deception—intends none, and is guiltless though erring. But every one should be careful to mark borrowed articles. A phrase of peculiar beauty or merit, though containing but two words, should be marked as quoted, if it really is quoted. Every line of poetry—every sentence of prose that is borrowed, should certainly be marked as quoted. If many verses, or several sentences are borrowed to decorate the pages of an Album, a periodical, or even a private letter, the author's name, if known, should be named, and at all events, the article should be marked with quotation marks, or designated as a selection. These remarks are intended for the young and careless. They know not with what indignation and hearty abhorrence their neglect of these things may be visited by those who deem a man to be as low and base and paltry a thief for stealing the labors of others, as if he had stolen the property of others. And literary men, generally, do thus detest plagiarism. Plagiarists are not only thieves, but impostors. They wear others' laurels, and attempt to win the approbation of the public for efforts they never made. It is a combination of theft and swindling, in the literary line.

"I. C. B.," of Hamilton, (we could give his full name, but not knowing him personally, we can not judge whether so severe a punishment is necessary,) has been guilty of this doubly detestable vice, if the following note from a respectable ministering brother, of Boston, Mass., may be believed—and that it may, I am fully satisfied. It is accompanied with a printed copy of the stolen article, which agrees nearly word for word with the one we published as the composition of "I. C. B." We have some more of his articles on hand, but shall not publish them, unless assured they are what they profess to be—original. The following is the note referred to. Our brother has our thanks for his kindness in undeceiving us and our readers, and in learning the detected plagiarist the truth of Holy Writ, "Besure your sin will find you out."

"Br. Grosh—Compare the enclosed with an original piece in your Magazine for May 5th. This was published ten or twelve years ago as a selected article in one of our Boston papers—it is probably much older than that."

If "I. C. B." has any remarks to make, either publicly or privately, there is room.

APOLOGY.

We have been obliged to draw largely on the patience and charity of readers and correspondents, by a partial neglect and delay of duties owing to them. Our mailer left us in April, and we procured a new one—before he became fully acquainted and versed in his duties, one after another of persons connected with the establishment became unwell, so that for several weeks past we have not had our full complement of hands in the office, and could not procure those who were able to fill their places. The brief, but painful and (at last) fatal illness of Mr. Powers, whose obituary will be found on our last page, at once drew all the care and attention of the writer to him, and withdrew it from the paper. For one week, during his illness, I wrote nothing—done nothing—thought nothing for the paper. I could not; for what with anxiety for my friend, who had been a member of my family for three years, and exertions to render him comfortable, I was unfitted for all other business. Letters, communications, orders, business for the firm, not depending on my partner, and my own individual business, all wait my attention—an attention which will be paid them as fast and as soon as circumstances will permit. I shall be prevented from attending the Black River and St. Lawrence Associations this year, in consequence; and hope, as I have reason to fear, my absence will not be noticed.

Sincerely—painfully do I regret that I have had occasion to make this apology, and feel assured it will excuse any seeming neglect, and secure us the sympathy of the charitable and benevolent.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.
I LOVE THE WEST.

BY D. K. LEE.

I love the West! I love the West!
This fever'd brow—this fluttering heart,
That pine in Eastern climes, attest
Salvation from affliction's dart.
The gales from off the spicy plains,
And music of each river's voice,
With soothing rapture swell my veins,
And bid my waking soul rejoice!

I love the West—here Nature sits,
Attired in all the hues of morn—
The wild deer plays—the wild bird flits,
Unmindful of the hunstman's horn.
The fragrance of the prairie rose,
And odors of the forest flow'r,
Perfume the lungs where keenest throes
Of fell disease, fain would devour.

I love the West,—'tis teeming full,
With richest meats, prepared for man,—
The rustlings of her vintage lull,
The while her dancing breezes fan:
And as each sylvan orchestra,
Pours out the warblers' mellow note,
Then, then methinks, 'tis sweet to stray
Among her beauties though "remote."

I love the West—her balmy soil,
Beneath the sun's replendent ray,
The wary cotter for his toil,
In fruitage fur, will richly pay.—
Her flow'ry ARBORS, freshly spring,
And crown the land with living green,
And all her bow'rs combine to fling
A pure delight o'er every scene.

I love the West! I love the West!
This flushing brow—this swelling heart,
In this fair Eden, 'mong the rest,
Find where RELIGION dared to start
Her vine of sweet, celestial fruit,
Where its soft tendrils can't be riven,
To meet the pilgrim's fond pursuit,
And point his wand'ring eyes to Heaven.

"WE SHALL ALL BE CHANGED."

I love to mark the falling leaf,
To watch the waning moon;
I love to cherish the belief
That all will change so soon.

I love to see the beauteous flowers
In bright succession pass,
As they would deck life's fleeting hours
And hide time's ebbing glass.

I love the rushing wind to hear
Through the dismantled trees,
And shed the sad but soothing tear,
O'er joy's that pass like these.

I love to think this glorious earth
Is but a splendid tomb,
Whence man to an immortal birth
Shall rise in deathless bloom—

That nothing on its bosom dies,
But all in deathless change
Shall in some brighter form arise,
Some purer regions range.

On this fair arch, then, rest thy head
In peace, thou child of sorrow,
For know, the God of truth hath said
Thou "shalt be changed to-morrow."

Changed as the saints and angels are
To glories ever new,
Corrupt shall incorruption wear,
And death shall life renew.

Death is considered by the United Brethren (Moravians) in Germany, in a cheerful view, as a deliverance and return of the person to his country. Their graveyards resemble smiling gardens. No other monuments are seen than simple stones, pointing out the days of the birth and death of the deceased. None wear mourning.

A wag rejected by a lady to whom he offered "his heart and hand," says that she is afflicted with a species of mo-no-man-ia.

From the Baptist Register.
ELDER LELAND.

Berlin, N. Y., April 1837.

MR. EDITOR—The following article, written by the celebrated John Leland, and handed to me, contains matter, the publication of which would, in my opinion, be attended with many beneficial results. Elder Leland has been long and favorably known as a Baptist preacher, in various parts of the United States. He is peculiarly endeared to the church in this town. He has preached here occasionally from our earliest recollections. Between him and our late and lamented pastor, Rev. Justus Hull, an ardent friendship existed for more than forty years. They were, it is believed, as much attached to each other as were Damon and Pythias, or David and Jonathan. When, a few years since, those strong and silken cords were broken by the death of Elder Hull, Elder Leland preached the funeral sermon.

Elder Leland is not entirely free from faults; but he is certainly an extraordinary man. His earthly career will soon be terminated; but his memory will long live in the hearts of his brethren—for virtue and truth are immortal. His sun will go down full-orbed to rise in brighter heavens. He can say in the last moments of his life, "Now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace."

As a subscriber to your valuable paper, and as a friend to Elder Leland and the cause, for the promotion of which he has done so much, I ask you to permit this article to appear in the Baptist Register.

Your friend and brother,

H. S.

"The old weather-worn sailor yet on deck. Not at the helm, steering the ship; but before the masts, sounding the deep with a very short line, watching the winds and waves, and looking out for the breakers. When on fishing shoals, casting angle, using the net, and throwing the harpoon to catch fish: hoping soon to enter port with a flying jib."

I am now more than eighty-two years old; have been preaching upwards of sixty-two years; have travelled distances that would more than girdle the globe four times; have preached in 479 meeting-houses, 64 school-houses, 37 court houses, 31 barns, and in dwelling-houses, stores, and other buildings, and on stages in the open fields,—altogether, making 12,000 times. Some of the sermons, however, hardly deserve the name, and none of them were perfect. In the course of my ministry I have baptized 1525; and I will now add, I have living 9 children, 62 grand-children, and 80 great grand-children. I have had some grand-children die at their respective homes, but I have never had a death at my house!

I have sustained some hardships and assaults in the line of my ministry. Huge mountains, dreary swamps, pinching winds, and boisterous storms; lodging on the ground, and in negro quarters; have been threatened by mob, the cow-skin, gun, and drawn sword; but have not resisted unto blood, or received any corporeal punishment.

I have been advertised in political and religious newspapers as a heretic, a rum-drinker, and an outcast; but all these together are light afflictions when compared with what I constantly feel; this: that my spirit is below the subject which I preach—that I do not feel the importance of the eternal realities I am handling. To preach a distant Jesus by an unfelt Gospel, with an unhallowed tongue, is more painful than all I meet with from men.

Now in the decline of life, my mind is abundantly employed in reflecting on past events. My life from childhood unto this day, affords but little to commend, much to condemn, and nothing on which to ground a hope of heaven. The best actions and exercises of my life have contained so large an alloy of pollution that they would sink without the intercession of Christ, as my soul will without his atoning blood. My labor in the ministry has been considerable; but, on the most impartial scrutiny of action and motive, it preponderates in my mind that I have preached myself more than I have Christ—Jesus the Lord; that I have labored more to gain the applause of men than I have to be approved of God—(Painful confession.) But God knew what I was, and what I should be, when he sent me to preach his word.—And it strikes my mind that I am under as great obligation to obey as I should be were I as pure as Gabriel.—Should I therefore neglect on account of my own infirmity, I should add rebellion to corruption.

I am here reminded of an instance that occurred in Groton, Conn., in the year 1791. After I had been preaching, one of the natives, an Indian woman who belonged to the church, was very lavish in extolling the preacher. A good deacon gently said to her, "Sister beware of your fire, for the preacher is all covered with tow!" After a moment's pause, she replied, "It is a good God that made the preacher preach so!" "Ah," said the deacon, "that will do."

I have known 1050 Baptist preachers, 364 of whom I have heard preach; and have heard of the death of 446 of them. "The fathers where are they? and the prophets, do they live forever?"

My labors have been of the travelling kind, without any aid from missionary funds. To preach and baptize has appeared to be my work; but in ruling the church, or leading a party, I have but little skill, and no desire.

In looking over what I have written, I see abundance of egotism, (quite unfashionable in these days;) but the man after God's own heart uses the pronominal I, more than 140 times in the alphabetical 119th psalm. And the chief apostle of the Gentiles uses it likewise 35 times in 1 Cor. 9th chapter, and 34 times in the 7th of Romans; 5 of which are in the 15th verse which has but 23 words in it.

DEATHS.

At the residence of the writer, in this city, on Saturday, May 27th, Mr. NEVILLE J. POWERS, for several years the pressman in this office. Thus, in the 27th year of his age, is suddenly cut off a most worthy and promising young man, leaving a widowed mother and a brother, (in South Hadley, Mass.) to mourn his departure. They have the heart felt sympathies of his numerous friends in this section, to whom his many virtues strongly endeared him. His disease was bilious remittant fever, and he died in the collapse in eight days after being confined. Able medical aid, and every attention the warmest friendship could bestow, were paid him during his illness, and after death his remains were as affectionately honored as those of a well beloved brother. The poetry, "We shall all be changed," found on this page, was selected by him for our columns a few days before his illness. It breathes his hope in life and death—his, will also be its fruition. A. B. GROSH.

In Upper Lisle, April 2d, JOHN BAKER, aged 45 years. What I say of Mr. Baker, is the voice of friends and foes—although he had but few, if any, of the latter. Mr. B. was much beloved by all who knew him as a worthy and honest man. In some portions of his life, I have understood that he was driven almost to skepticism by the extravagances of those who professed the Christian name; but in the last part of his life, he became more fully convinced of the necessity of a revelation from God to guide man to the future world, which enabled him to meet the king of terrors with composure, so far as the future was concerned. He left behind, nine children and an affectionate wife to mourn his sudden departure, being sick only about one week. His funeral was attended by the writer. Text, Lam. iii: 31-33. C. S. B.

In Lyme, April 25th, after an illness of one week, CHESTER D. HALLOWAY, aged 18 years, 5 months and 11 days. He was called away suddenly, at a moment when expectations were entertained of his immediate recovery. He was beloved as a son and brother. By his amiable deportment and many virtues, he enjoyed the affectionate regard of a large circle of relatives and friends.

His funeral was attended on the Monday following his death, in Hounsfield, where a numerous congregation of his youthful associates and acquaintances assembled to pay the last tribute of respect to the departed. He has gone to his everlasting home. His afflicted parents mourn not as those without hope, having embraced the doctrine of a happy immortality for all.

J. BRITTON.

In Canton, St. Lawrence county, on the 24th of March last, WESLEY C. PALMER, aged, 17 years. He was a virtuous and promising young man, beloved and respected throughout the circle of his acquaintances.—His funeral was attended on the 26th, when a discourse was delivered by Br. F. J. Briggs, from John xi: 4.

At the residence of her son, Stephen M. Frisbie, in Canadice, CLARISSA FRISBIE, wife of Stephen Frisbie, deceased, in the 59th year of her age. She has left five children to mourn her loss, but they mourn not as those who have no hope. S. M. F.

A Journey from Infancy to Old Age.

BY SAMUEL JENKINS, OF QUEENSEBURY, N. Y.

Elnathan was born in the little village of Infancy, where he resided for several years, until he took his leave of it, and journeyed to the town of Manhood. It is seldom that we see a more strict observer of all the duties incumbent upon him, than Elnathan. Being taught, as he was from childhood, that to be happy, he must be good; and this instilled into his mind with all the care and attention which characterizes parents desirous of promoting the welfare of their offspring; it was not easy for him to wander far from the path of rectitude, with all their admonitions constantly before him.

One day, after sitting for some time apparently in a deep study, he inquired of his mother, if she could give him a rule by which to regulate his conduct through life—one to which he could at any time refer, and which would not lead him astray. She informed him that our characters were formed by imitation, and that though we sometimes looked up to men for a pattern; yet it was the case, with very few exceptions, that mankind looked upon their Maker as a pattern, by which to form their characters. She told him that God was the Father of all, and that he looked upon all as his children, and therefore, mankind should consider one another as brethren of the same family, and love one another; for it would be very wrong in him to hate his brethren and sisters, when they were as good as himself. She told him that God regarded all with an eye of mercy, and we had no reason to believe that he intended that one should, finally, be better off than another; and this, said she, is another reason, why we should love our neighbors as ourselves. She told him, that when our Saviour was upon earth, he referred his followers to the impartial display of the goodness of his Father, in sending rain upon the just and the unjust, and his causing the sun to shine on the evil and the good, as a reason why they should love their enemies. Then he exhorts them to be "perfect, even as their Father which is in heaven is perfect."

Elnathan, hearing his mother thus describe the character of his heavenly Father and urging his perfections as reasons why he should love his fellow beings—and the impartial displays of his goodness, as reasons why he should love his enemies, even as he did himself, and his kind paternal care, as a reason why he should look upon all mankind as brethren, determined in his mind, to follow, as near as possible, the directions she had given him. When he looked around upon his fellow beings, he beheld the image of his Maker in them, and he would reflect back on himself, and say, "this, my brother, is as good as myself; he bears the image of his Maker as well as I, and is equally a subject of his care and protection."

In a few years, Elnathan took his leave of Infancy, his native town, and journeyed towards Manhood. He had travelled but a short time, when he arrived at the village of Consistency, where he determined to tarry for a short time. He had been there but a few days, when he witnessed something entirely new to him. Ungodliness had been guilty of some misdemeanor—was arrested, and that day was to have his trial. Justice, Mercy and Love, presided at the trial. Some inhabitants of the neighboring villages, when they heard that Ungodliness was to be tried before Justice, Mercy and Love, were afraid that he would not be dealt by as he ought; for, said they, "Justice, we know, would punish him for his crimes; but Mercy and Love, being so affectionate in their natures, will let him go unpunished, and restore him to his former standing, without requiring him to make any amends for his past offences; and they, being a majority will overrule justice."

This coming to the ears of the judges, they determined to adopt some plan by which they could satisfy their neighbors, and each at the same time, have a voice in the decision. They finally concluded that each should write his decision, and his reasons for it. When the trial came on, Ungodliness was proved guilty, and the judges retired in conformity to their resolution, and soon returning, each read what he had written, which was as follows:

JUSTICE.—"He has been proved guilty of gross immorality, and ought to be punished; for it is not possible for him to be happy, or to make others happy while he indulges himself in such heinous offences. It is just and right that he should become good; and if we suffer him to go unpunished, he may go on in greater sin, to greater misery."

MERCY.—"The evidence appears conclusive against Ungodliness. It has been a maxim with me, that the guilty should not go unpunished.—My design in punishing, is to reclaim the offender, and believing that proper punishment will do it, and thus save him from all the miseries of sin and final ruin, I wish him punished until he is willing to do right, and no longer."

Then LOVE, whose eyes beamed with tender affection, read as follows. "Some brethren in the neighboring villages, thought I would by some means, clear the guilty, and suffer Ungodliness to go unpunished; and in that way, he would be encouraged to go on in iniquity; but, though it grieves me to the heart to see any one go counter to what is for their best good, yet, it is my opinion, that Ungodliness must be punished, to reclaim him from the error of his ways. Misery should always be so connected with vice, that he who indulges in it, may see and feel that there is no pleasure therein."

The perfect agreement between them, rendered it a very easy matter to come to a conclusion.—They condemned the prisoner, and poor Ungodliness learned by experience, that "the way of the transgressor is hard."

There was in this, something that appeared to Elnathan, passing strange. He remembered that Justice, Mercy and Love, were attributes of the Deity, and therefore must harmonize in their natures. His surprise was heightened still more, when he learned from the inhabitants of the village, that the Judges were thus named, because of the peculiar virtues which their names designate.

"These principles," said he, "must be the same in all; and admitting, as many believe, that Justice and Mercy differ in their requirements, then if the scanty portion which is possessed by us frail mortals, is productive of such schisms as we daily witness, how great must it be in him, by whom they are possessed to an infinite degree! Yet how absurd the thought! Can a fountain send forth, at the same time, both sweet water and bitter? No—all God's attributes agree in their requirements, as these Judges have proved."

Elnathan soon left this little village, and pursuing his journey, arrived in a short time, at the town of Manhood. He did not tarry long here, but travelled on slowly towards his destined, and long expected home, in the town of Old Age.

While on his journey from Manhood to Old Age, Elnathan's mind was occupied with a variety of subjects, which presented themselves to his view. Never, before, was he so fully sensible of the situation of mankind. By his former habits of life, he was, in a measure, unable to become fully acquainted with the manners of men, and the principles which governed their actions.—What most drew his attention, was the religious world. The great number of religious denominations, all professing to receive one book for their guide and rule of faith, and all differing one from another—at first, beclouded his mind with darkness, and almost led him to doubt its divine authenticity. He had long looked upon the Bible as teaching but one doctrine; and he knew not how so many could go to that book, with even the least shadow of sincerity, to find proof of their different theories. He did not, however, as many have done, reject it without any farther evidence; but resolved to give it a more thorough examination than he ever had done before, to see if "these things were so."

When he had finished his examination, he was better satisfied than ever, that it taught but one doctrine. The same unchanging goodness, which he before believed was exercised by the great Parent of the universe, he now felt sure was revealed in the Scriptures; and when he, for a moment, gazed upon the wonders of nature; contemplated there, the almost numberless blessings, contrived by our Creator, for the comfort and happiness of his intelligent offspring; the changing seasons, rain and sunshine, cold and heat, Summer and Winter, seed time and harvest, day and night, and the almost endless variety of objects, calculated to soften and ameliorate our condition; he mentally exclaimed, "the evidences of his unchanging goodness are equally prevalent here! the Lord is my God, still!" His joy seemed complete. He could drop a tear over frail humanity, and "rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory," that we were created to enjoy a more perfect state of existence, and more exalted pleasures.

Elnathan soon began to feel that the time was approaching, that would try his faith. He began to feel that death was at work at his vitals, and he must "set his house in order," for the grave already yawned to receive him.

When he took a retrospective view of his life, I shall not undertake to describe what his feelings were—the reader can judge for himself.

But the trying hour soon came. When one of his friends asked him, if he still held to his former belief of the restitution of all things, he replied, that he did. "My belief in the final restitution," said he, "has always served to console my mind under the dispensations of Providence. Believing them to be the chastisements of a merciful and benevolent Parent, I could say, 'It is the Lord; let him do what seemeth him good.' Believing them to be means in the hands of my Creator, for working out 'a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory,' the clouds of darkness broke away, and a gleam of light from the celestial courts of the great I AM, shone upon me. I could always look up to my Maker as my Father, and upon all mankind as my brethren; and why should not a faith which is thus calculated to promote my happiness in life, be found equally efficacious in the hour of death?"

"During my life, it has been a source of happiness to me to reflect that I should meet my neighbors and friends in a heaven of purity and bliss; and in the hour of death, when I am about to leave all things below, why—O, why is it not a source of pleasure to me, to believe that I shall, in the glorious morning of the resurrection, meet them around the throne of Jehovah, there to sing the praises of Emmanuel!"

But every minute brought him nearer to his end. When he was fully sensible that his time was come, his countenance bespoke the joy of his heart.

He calmly fell asleep in the arms of his Saviour, and his peaceful spirit sped its way to the bosom of its Father and God, "May my last end be like his!"

BRIEF EXTRACT,

FROM AN EXTEMPORANEOUS DISCOURSE.

BY P. P. FOWLER.

"And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven." Matthew xvi: 19.

Men who have advanced high claims to infallibility, have assumed that this point of the testimony referred to a particular church—that it was the prerogative of that body to bind and loose, admit into, or shut out of the kingdom of heaven, such individuals as they esteemed fit, or otherwise, for its purity and enjoyment. And they have as confidently proceeded upon this ground, as though their claims to exemption from error, had been established by the most positive proofs—have assumed a control over the mercy, and justice, and salvation of God, and too often exercised it for the gratification of the worst passions.

It was understood that the sentence of excommunication, which was their interpretation of "binding," by its own intrinsic authority, condemned to endless punishment; and that it was not possible for the individual thus condemned, to be released from his doom, unless the church gave him absolution by his performance of certain prescribed acts;—and as in the progress of corruption, the power of the church was supposed to be lodged in the Pope, there flowed from him, at his pleasure, indulgences and remissions of a part of the sentence, absolutions and pardons, the possession of which were believed, by Christians, to be essential to salvation, and the sale of which formed a most painful traffic. Thus were the souls of men virtually converted into merchandise. Remember—the text does not say "I will give unto the church the keys of the kingdom of heaven;" but "I will give unto thee," etc. By the kingdom of heaven, I understand a dispensation of righteousness, peace and joy in the holy spirit,—even the kingdom which Christ came to establish in the earth,—which shall never be destroyed,—which he appointed to his disciples,—and over which he must reign till he hath put down all rule, all authority and power—destroyed sin, death and hell, and brought all to the obedience of righteousness and the bliss of heaven. See Romans xiv: 17; Daniel vii: 14, 18, 27; 1 John iii: 8; Luke xxii: 29; 1 Corinthians xv: 24, 25, 52-58.

It will be seen by a reference to Isaiah xxii: 22; and ix: 6; and Rev. i: 18; that a "key" is a symbol of power and government. Christ has the keys of—or the power and authority over death and hell.

The use for which these keys were given, demands our serious regard. Peter's custody of them was a temporary, not a perpetual authority; his object was not individuals, but the whole human race—and the use to which he applied them is very appositely and obviously explained, by the fact that he was the first preacher of the Gospel dispensation in its perfected form, both to the Jews, on the day of Pentecost, and subsequently to the Gentiles, in the instance of Cornelius and his household, Acts ii: 3, 10. He saw by the vision which converted him, and enabled him to strengthen his brethren, what many are enabled to see, or are unwilling to announce—that God was no respecter of persons. He was taught, by this, not to call any man common or unclean—that all distinctions of one nation from another were at an end—that to be admitted into the kingdom of God, it no longer became necessary that a man should be an Israelite by birth, or by legal incorporation—and by virtue of that vision which taught him, and authorized him to teach others these things, did the great Apostle apply his keys for the opening of those gates which had formally excluded the entrance of aliens, to the end that the Gentiles should be no longer strangers and foreigners to the favor of God—but that they might be fellow citizens with the saints—that they might be redeemed from their vices and vain conversation, received by tradition from their fathers, to worship the living God, in the beauty of holiness, who is the Saviour of all men—that they might walk and worship in the brightness and bliss of that heavenly dispensation of light and perfection, where the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are its temple, its beauty and glory—where "the inhabitants shall not say I am sick," but where they shall be satisfied with God's goodness, and in all the thrilling eloquence of heartfelt devotion—and in all the ecstasy of an overwhelming affection, shall pour out their ascriptions of praise, to God's holy name.

GRAND-FATHER'S LETTERS TO HIS GRAND-CHILDREN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

LETTER SIXTH.

In my last letter to you, I stated that the opinion of those who maintain that Matthew wrote his narrative originally in the Hebrew language, seems much more probable than the contrary or any other opinion about the matter. It is a point of some importance to ascertain the truth relative to this question; and having weighed the evidence on both sides, what would you think of the man who should shrink from maintaining the opinion which he had adopted? There is one argument which you may hear employed against my opinion, which I will tell you how to answer very easily. Some may say that Scott, the Commentator, affirms that learned men have satisfactorily shewn that the above-stated opinion is a mistake, and that the Apostle wrote his Gospel in Greek, as we now have it. Be not alarmed lest ye have yielded credit to an erroneous opinion on Grand-pa's authority; for, recollect, this is only an assertion, like my own, without the proofs subjoined; and as a set-off to it you may quote to any such objectors the opinion and assertion of one a little better qualified to judge in questions of philology and ancient literature—Dr. Adam Clarke. He asserts that the balance is clearly in favor of a Hebrew original, and who the translator into Greek was, can not, at this distance of time, be determined. Assertion against mere assertion I hold to be good enough logic.

Has it ever occurred to you, in your former readings of the New Testament or since my last letter to you, that though Matthew must have made a considerable sacrifice in leaving what must have been a pretty lucrative profession, yet that he never hints at this sacrifice, much less makes any boast of it? I think this, along with the very modest way in which he mentions the great feast he made for Jesus (compare his own account, ix: 10, with that of Mark ii: 15, and of Luke v: 28, 29), a very beautiful trait in the character of Matthew. From being a collector of the public revenue, he became a follower of one who "had not where to lay his head." How many within the circle of your acquaintanceship, do you suppose, would be willing to make so great a sacrifice for the sake of religion? Or having made even a much less sacrifice, how many could refrain from displaying the merits of their sacrifice in such a light as might secure to themselves the applause of the world? I merely ask the question: I care not about a reply. I know almost, what it must be.

I will now proceed to tell you something about those for whose use this narrative of Matthew was compiled. That it was written primarily for the use of the Jewish nation, is generally inferred from the testimony of ancient writers, and from the following circumstances: Every circumstance that might tend to satisfy them that Jesus was the Messiah, is pointed out; all unnecessary opposition to their prejudices is avoided; the objections raised against Jesus by the Scribes and Pharisees are related, with his decisive answers and refutations of their errors; as the fulfilment of prophecy was considered by the Jews strong evidence, several circumstances of Christ's history are mentioned as being foretold by the prophets; Matthew has particularly selected such parts of the discourses and history of Jesus, as were best suited to arouse the Jews to a sense of their errors and coming miseries—to remove their erroneous expectations of an earthly kingdom,—to abate their bigotry and self-conceit—to impress upon them the spiritual nature of the Messiah's kingdom—and to prepare them for the admission of Gentiles to equal privileges with themselves.—From these peculiarities of Matthew's narrative, it has been inferred that he compiled it for the use of Jews. Again, it has been inferred from some other peculiarities of the history of Matthew, that the people for whose use it was intended were, partly, a persecuted, and partly, a persecuting people. Such was the state of the Jews at the time this Gospel is supposed to have been written. The following have been considered obvious references to an existing state of persecution, with apposite addresses both to the injured and the injurious party. Matthew introduces such passages as tended to remind the injured and persecuted Christians, that their afflictions were no more than they had been taught to expect, and had promised to bear when they made a profession of Christianity (x: 21, 22, 34-36; xxvi: 24); that, though unreasonable as the effect of the malice of their enemies, their sufferings were yet useful as trials of their fidelity (v: 11; xxiv: 9-13); that though they were grievous to be borne at present, yet they operated powerfully to their future joy (v: 4, 10-12); that a pusillanimous desertion of their faith and profession, so far from bettering their condition, would expose them to greater calamities, and cut them off from the hopes of their reward (x: 28, 32, 33, 39); that they were not, however, forbidden to use lawful means of preservation, but even enjoined to put them in practice whenever they could do so with innocence (x: 16, 17, 23); that the due observance of the Christian precepts was an excellent way to appease the wrath and fury of their enemies, and therefore a matter of prudence as well as of duty (v: 39; vii: 12, 24-27; v: 13-20) and, that it was better to suffer than, by base compliance, to incur the displeasure of their Father (xvi: 25-27; x: 28).—On the other hand such passages as the following have been supposed to have been introduced by Matthew, to calm the passions of the enraged Jews, and to win them also to a profession of Christianity, by abating their prejudices (ix: 13); by eulogizing a benevolent disposition (v: 43-48; xviii: 23-35); stating the consequences of such a disposition here and hereafter (v: 5, 7, 9; x: 40-42; xviii: 23-35; v: 21-26; xxv: 31-46); and also the punishments of a disposition to cruelty and persecution (xxiii: 27-39; x: 14, 15; xxiv: 2, etc.)

The persecution to which it is supposed these passages have a reference, was that which was commenced by the Sanhedrin, and in which Saul took such a prominent part, against all who professed a belief in Jesus as the Messiah. During this persecution, which lasted in the whole about six years, the persecuted party stood in need, certainly of all the comfort, support, consolation and assistance, that could be administered to them.—To do this, Matthew is supposed, during this persecution, or about the year 38, to have set before them the above considerations, together with the example of their suffering Master, and the promises he had made to his faithful followers.

The scope of this book may be deduced from the above-mentioned circumstances of the first converts to Christianity. It naturally must have been to confirm those who already believed, and convert those who believed not. Every circumstance is pointed out which was fitted to conciliate the faith of the Jewish nation.

Let these remarks be held in remembrance and they will throw considerable clearness and distinctness of meaning over many portions of Matthew's history. May they be a guide to your feet, and lamp to your path!

I. JOHN I: 5, 6.

BY MRS. BROUGHTON.

"This, then, is the message we have heard of him, and declare unto you, that God is light, and in him is no darkness at all. If we say that we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness, we lie and do not the truth."

It seems to me that our Partialist brethren, notwithstanding their sagacity in discovering things that have no existence; have overlooked this passage, with many others that might have made them wise unto salvation. We are here informed that God is light, and that those who walk in darkness are not in fellowship with him. Now, is it possible that our Partialist friends walk wholly in the light? Have they no dark hours, no misgivings as to their own destiny, no fearful forebodings in regard to the final state of those who are bound to them by the silken cords of affection? If they do not see the way of salvation, clear for themselves and others, they can not be said to walk in the light. Is there not a veil of mystery, dark, fearful and appalling, spread over the future? Does the glory of the God of Israel enlighten their path, and do they bask in the smiles of infinite benevolence? They will tell you so; but listen for a moment to their prayers, that frequently come moaning on the evening breeze, and you will find that their tones evince anything rather than happiness. Tears, groans and bitter anguish prevail in the assemblies of those who would fain persuade us to forsake the broad sun of salvation, for the rush light of partial grace.

"BE NOT DECEIVED." Paul.

Mankind are a singular race of beings. All are seeking for happiness, seemingly, with the utmost caution—for none would willingly be wretched; they are therefore very fearful of being deceived, and even suspicious of being misled by their nearest and best friends, especially in those things which are of secondary importance with regard to happiness. If a man is to make a bargain, in which a little of the "filthy lucre" is depending, he is very cautious of deception, frequently calling to mind the saying of Paul, "Be not deceived"; and takes special care to examine the commodities of traffic—their qualities and usefulness, of which he would be his own judge; and although he frequently asks the opinion of others, yet he feels the safest to abide by his own judgment.

Yet, upon subjects of a primary consequence, (I mean in religious matters,) in which every man should "be fully persuaded in his own mind", how many there are who suffer others to think for them!—and their minds to be controlled by the "Doctors of the Laws!" while all are crying out "Be not deceived!"—and yet thousands deceive not only themselves, but by their "sad countenances and disfigured faces", lead others astray, and thus multitudes are deprived of happiness, even while they would be the most cautious of deception!

In religious matters, however, people are the more easily deceived from several considerations. The Scriptures of truth were written in past ages, in different languages, in "old fashioned style", and have been translated into our own language with (in some instances,) different meanings attached to the same word, etc., etc., and the most learned are considered the most likely to understand these differences, and the most capable of forming correct opinions of them; therefore, they are looked up to for ideas, by those who do not feel themselves qualified to explain those difficulties, which some suppose exist in the sacred writtings; and as learned men disagree on these subjects, the most popular will be credited, and the rest passed by.

Well, who are considered the most popular?—Ans. Those who are the most religious—those who make the greatest pretensions, generally.—And those are the most likely to deceive. And as that counterfeit which bears the nearest resemblance to the genuine, passes the most readily, so that species of false religion which approximates the nearest to that which is pure, is the most likely to be palmed off upon community for that which is "pure and undefiled." And as it is with false coin, the most sure of detection after the honest peasant has received it; so with false religion.

When she makes her appearance, or is introduced to the ignorant and the unwary, she appears fair, she makes her suit in an humble manner—she woos and entreats, she persuades and invites—manifests the sincerest love, and great concern for "precious and immortal souls"—prays "in the synagogues" long and loud; and if entreaties, invitations and persuasions will not do, she calls upon God with great solemnity, to "uncap the fiery pit to their view, and make them behold themselves hair-bung and breeze-shaken over a never-ending hell." She fails not to speak of her popularity, and the great numbers who have lately flocked around her standard—the honorable men who have embraced her, and the great exploits she has done in the conversion of heretics. She is received with shouts and acclamations—many voices join to laud her fame, and she speeds her flight to some neighboring town. Her votaries are very zealous and active in her cause—visiting from house to house, not failing to ask for money for "charitable purposes," such as, "for the Bible, Tract, Missionary societies," etc. They visit the sick and dying, and fail not to speak of "an angry God," and an "endless hell to which they are fast approaching," if they do not comply with such and such conditions; which has an effect to fill the mind of the distressed with more anguish, and a slavish fear of their Creator. They visit the widows and fatherless in their affliction, and frequently take from them, "for the Lord's treasury," their last shilling, with which the widowed mother would have replenished her tea canister, or purchased necessities for her suffering orphans. Although when she is present, such are her pretensions that it is difficult to distinguish her from pure religion; yet, after she has passed, her character is clearly seen in her footsteps, which are marked by blackness and darkness, desolation and despair: and the greater the "out-pouring" of her "spirit," the more fatal are the consequences, and the more do her votaries mingle with the vices, follies and crimes of the world.

Not so with pure religion. She appears in the shining garments of love to God and good will to man; she seeks out the vicious and profligate, the abandoned, wretched, miserable and despondent; she speaks to them in the most feeling and tender, lovely and melting strains of pity and compassion, telling them that "the way of the transgressor is hard," appealing to their senses, while she brings them to acknowledge that "there is no peace to the wicked."

Knowing that "the goodness of God leadeth to repentance," she speaks of the immense condemnation of Heaven towards fallen man—of the "great love wherewith he loved us, even while we were yet sinners, and sent his Son to die for us," and to "call sinners to repentance," and bring us to God by the blood of the Lamb. She points them to the garden of Gethsemane, by faith to hear the plaintive, submissive prayer, and behold their Saviour sweating great drops of blood, falling down to the ground. She calls upon them by all the groans of a dying Saviour—by every drop of blood which fell from the hands, and feet, and side of "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world," and bids them hear him pleading their cause, even in the solemn hour of death; saying, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!"

Thus she invites, entreats and persuades, but threatens not, for she "clothes her priests with salvation, and her saints shout aloud for joy," and her principal theme is love, mercy and compassion. With her soft hand of charity and love, she wipes the scalding tear of repentance from their weeping eyes, and brings them to realize that "there is peace in believing, and joy in the Holy Ghost." Wherever she is received, she converts the most inveterate foes into friends. She visits the bed of sickness and languishing, and if she does not cool the feverish brow, or the parched tongue, she binds up the mental wounds by pouring in the oil of grace and wine of consolation, and brings them to see that "there is balm in Gilead and a Physician there," who is able to cure all their mental maladies, and make them "rejoice in the hope of the glory of God." If her enemy hunger, she feeds him with "the bread of God which cometh down from heaven and giveth life to the world." If he is thirsty, she leads him peaceably to those streams which "make glad the city of our God," and gives him to drink deep draughts of salvation. She visits the widows and fatherless in their afflictions, to bestow favors upon them; to administer to their necessities and alleviate their cares. She becomes a husband to the widow; a father to the orphan, and keeps herself "unspotted from the world." She visits at the bedside of the dying, and points the victim of death to "the Saviour of the world," who will guide him safely "through the dark valley and shadow of death" to a life of immortality and blessedness beyond the grave; where love, peace and union are the portion of a ransomed universe—where "every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, shall be heard saying, 'Blessing and honor, and glory and power be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever.'"

She seeks to ameliorate the condition of the suffering sons and daughters of fallen man—she is a never-failing friend—faithful in adversity—delightful in prosperity—the loving companion of every age and sex—worthy the attention of all ranks and conditions of men. She never forsakes her votaries to take her flight to a neighboring town, or a distant country, but still remains the same faithful friend and benefactress of our race. She leaves them not in six troubles, nor forsakes them in seven. If they forsake her, and thrust her from them, she threatens not; for she knows they will find "trouble and sorrow," for they "who hate wisdom, love death." She weeps over their miseries in the days of their frowardness, and flies to their relief when she beholds the falling tears of repentance—and delights to dwell in the hearts of the humble, "to revive those of a broken heart and a contrite spirit."

Who, then would not willingly espouse so lovely a nymph as pure religion? Who could bar his heart against her, when she makes her suit in so humble a manner, and for so glorious a purpose?

Make haste, then, fellow sinner, to embrace her; for she seeks thy best good—"her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace—she will bring thee to honor when thou dost embrace her," for she is "from above, and is first pure, then peaceable, gentle and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy"—and "her price is far above rubies."—"Be not deceived," then, nor turn a deaf ear to her admonitions, nor reject her humble suit, because thou hast been imposed upon by her enemy. May God grant you grace, mercy and peace for ever, and enable you to espouse the cause of pure religion.

JOHN.

Caneadea, March, 1837.

CONTENTMENT.—"A contented mind is the greatest blessing a man can enjoy in this world; and if in the present life his happiness arises from the subduing of his desires, it will arise in the next, from the gratification of them,—when "mortal shall put on immortality, and the corruptible in corruption."

RELIGION, A NECESSARY PART OF EDUCATION.

Education, is the forming of the mind of youth; moulding the disposition of a new generation; and the reformation, or debasement of mankind, for a certain period, is the certain result of a proper, or improper system of instruction to young minds. It is the confirmation or destruction, of all our ancestors have done of good, or wise, or virtuous.

What care and expense is employed and expended in teaching the sciences, and classics—how numerous are the publications to assist, expedite, and perfect their attainment. But how few of those treatises are written with a professed design to facilitate the more important art of attaining “our beings’ end and aim,” the object of our existence—that is, to acquire happiness, and promote that of others; to avoid evil ourselves, and to prevent evil in others. On these points do the virtue and prosperity of the world depend, individually, and collectively.

It seems to be a law of our nature, that the passions take possession of the mind, and lay the foundation of habits, before reason is awake, or sufficiently matured to stem the tide, or to regulate the deposits. Yet philosophers of yore, and many of the present day, extol the mighty influence of reason, to quell, if not subdue the passions; to direct at least, their impetuous surges, if it can not calm the tumultuous heavings. But that reason, alone, will not control the passions, is apparent, although so highly recommended as an antidote. Passion, when suffered to take the lead with “slackened rein,” quickly becomes a despot in possession of power, deaf to the claims of justice, and blind to the splendor of truth: or, as possessing the means of corruption but too abundant, and arts of perversion but too insidious; it converts into an auxiliary, its most formidable rival and opponent. General and speculative motives are not, of themselves, sufficiently strong to balance the counter impulse of the passions, which act individually, and immediately. They require the assistance of religion—of prospects and sanctions extended to futurity; as remote effects, the causes of which are at our present disposal and control, and which invariably carry in their portentous train, future happiness or misery.

It has been urged as being extremely improper for parents, or teachers, to sow the seeds of sectarianism in the infant mind, and thus plant prejudices, which, like weeds, are ranker when they enjoy the invigorating influences of Spring. But the objectors do not reflect, that youth is the period when the mind is flexible, and needs support, and when the passions are most violent, and most difficult to counteract by mere reason. Must we pass our lives without that support; or must each individual, in order to choose his religion, at mature age involve himself in the abstruse questions of original sin, or social order? Must he wade through the various systems of religion, which now divide the Christian community, to choose one for himself? Neither the time, the inclinations, nor the abilities of the majority will admit of this: half a life would be consumed in inquiring and deciding on their merit, or demerit, and old age would have extinguished the passions, before the necessity of controlling them, or directing their energies would be determined on.

If religion is of any use—if it is designed to regulate the passions, it must have its foundations fixed before the passions rise to an impetuous phalanx to resist its approach. It very rarely happens that men who have attained manhood, unacquainted with religion, stoop voluntarily to impose on themselves its restraints; or take pains to investigate what, perhaps, their early habits had taught them to despise, and their present propensities urge them to reject.

The necessity of imbuing the young mind with religion, may be granted; but the difficulty arises in the mode—how to teach its all-invigorating influences to practical virtue, without, at the same time, scattering the seeds of sectarian prejudice, and misanthropy?

The sciences are taught, or rather a foundation for their acquirement is laid, in the strict inculcation of certain fundamental truths, or principles, which are firmly impressed on the mind by constant repetition, and occasional application, until they are said to be learnt; that is, until the recurrence of them becomes natural and easy, fit for immediate use when called for, and which are the first series in that scale of improvement which so many have cultivated with such success in mature years, and which is a germ of knowledge, only requiring cultivation to yield an abundant harvest.

The first rules of arithmetic, for example, contain those elements of mathematical knowledge, by which a Newton measured the heavens, and by the knowledge of which the day laborer computes his wages due, and the merchant calculates his profit and losses. How easy it is, by a thorough knowledge of these cardinal rules, to acquire facility in abstruse Algebraical calculations, or Geometrical demonstrations. Yet how few walk those sequestered paths! and how many, without any other knowledge, regulate the affairs of the counting-house, with honor and certainty; or follow mechanical operations, with ease and regularity! And has not their high interest been acknowledged, by their becoming (with reading and writing) the almost only things constantly taught in our common schools, as sufficient for all the purposes of common life?

And does not religion, as well as science, possess those first principles, the learning of which is never forgotten! and which will answer for all the purposes of life, as a sure means of virtue, without the necessity of following them up, in order to comprehend all the wild theories of sectarianism? The outlines of all Christian sects are the same. There are certain first principles, which form the basis of all their theories, and which secure to all a virtuous practice—the only good thing so eagerly sought after by all. The first principles of religion are plain as the first rules of arithmetic, and as easily learned, and will as certainly lead to virtue, as the other, to correct calculation and demonstration.

The knowledge of a First Cause, in creation, or a being called God, is perhaps the first essential truth or axiom to be advanced, and from that teach his wisdom, power, and goodness, then his omnipotence and omnipresence necessarily follow; and those principles may be as easily taught, and as easily learned, as the first rules of arithmetic. But it is objected, they require proofs, their demonstrations are not to be mastered by the youthful mind. It is replied, the learning, the being taught these great principles, is only contended for; not the demonstration. What schoolmaster ever pretends to demonstrate the first rules of arithmetic? He teaches them, the child learns them, and all his life-time enjoys the benefit. He learns them as truths taught by a parent, or tutor, which is to him reason for believing them, on the same principles that many men of great minds believe a mathematical truth, on the authority of Sir Isaac Newton, without seeking for farther evidence, or blushing for their faith.

These great truths are not only the ground work of all theology, but the basis of all practical virtues. When learned (by frequent repetitions and occasional practice)—when thoroughly learned, until the recurrence of them becomes natural and easy, they are the greatest auxiliaries to a virtuous, religious course, by controlling the passions, which naturally domineer before reason, slow and tardy can come to aid. When the idea becomes habitual, as it may become, (as easily as the performing of arithmetical rules,) that our actions, and thoughts, and even motives of action, are constantly exposed to the knowledge of a superior Being, whom we cannot deceive, or from whom we cannot hide or escape; how it promotes caution, and circumspection in all our actions! When we have learnt that that Being is supreme—ly good, constantly watching over, and promoting our welfare; how natural are the emotions of joy, of gratitude and confidence excited! What youth of either sex, would act meanly, or commit baseness under the immediate eye of a parent whom he venerated? He might be said to be incapable of it, but not more incapable than he who had learned that he was always exposed to the view of an invisible Being.

These are natural truths, for the reception of which our minds are naturally formed, and which taught like scholastic learning, as a thing to be practised in after life, not as a theory, would as certainly direct to virtuous habits, as science does to the regulation of our business affairs. If it should be thought, and perhaps justly, that natural religion is not sufficient for advancing age; teach that the great Being who is so constantly attentive to our welfare, has given additional proof of his love to us, in communicating his will, and our duty, to men like ourselves, and sent them to communicate those truths to mankind; and the proof, if required, may be given, in the exact adaptation of those truths to supply our defect of knowledge; and the foundation of a revelation, simple in its idea, but true in its import, is laid securely.

These truths thoroughly learned, and practised, will answer for all purposes in subduing early our inordinate passions, for securing a happy, virtuous course, and honorable old age, as assuredly as the principles of arithmetic will answer for the common business of life. If any one has leisure and abilities, to pursue his principles to the height of the mathematics, he may, and be perhaps not the better citizen. And if the other has leisure, and chooses to extend his principles in the investigation of the different tenets and dogmas of sectaries, and the dreams of enthusiasts he may do so, and perhaps not be the better man, or Christian; at any rate, he will have to recur perpetually to the first principles which he imbibed in his youth, to direct him in his researches and investigations, and from which he will, after all, draw his rules of conduct through life, and his consolations at death.

Nearly connected with a sense of religion, are the virtues of courage and chastity; and why should they not be taught? And nothing can serve like the promises of religion, to inspire conscious rectitude with due confidence. It is in the confidence of conscious rectitude, that courage consists. Religion is the guide. Religion, alone, can provide a steady and certain standard.

Prudence, it has been urged, is a sufficient safeguard to chastity; that is, the dread of public censure. But prudence is of two kinds—there may be prudence to conceal, as well as to avoid. By prudence, a person may indulge in the sin, and escape the shame. Early religious instruction will sow the seeds of virtue in the ductile mind of youth. The plant that arises will be a much more effectual preservative against licentiousness, than any penal statute against adultery—than any society for the purpose of “Moral Reform.”

If parents or tutors could but be brought to conceive the vast bearing a religious education has on the future man, it would be as regularly taught schools as any thing else, and from the same motives—namely, for the future use of the pupils, when arrived at manhood. It is to that point, as a focus, all education is directed; and why, in the name of common sense, should not the great principles of religion be included?

What attention and expense, and experience required, to provide the best means, and most useful rules for scientific attainments. And in an object of infinitely greater moment, so little provision made, so few books published, (setting aside the catechism of sectaries,) on what may be called a science, and should be taught such, which would serve as the polar star in the voyage of life, and which points to the haven of eternal rest!

In a case where truth is but one, (and however our ignorance may be prone to mistakes, there is no room for variety of fancies; for every deviation must be error, greater or less,) how deplorably is religious instruction neglected or the mind left in the dark, until it becomes old enough to decide for itself, when passions have had the predominacy, and habit partly confirmed?

The man who has talents to point out the necessity, and courage to practice, the teaching of religious truth in common or high schools, on scientific principles, and who can compose elementary books for that purpose, would be a great benefactor to his species, and win and deserve laurels of unfading lustre to bind his brows.

has been generally borne by themselves alone, therefore

Resolved, That this Convention recommend the following plan to general adoption, by our order throughout the State—viz. That each society take up a collection on some Sabbath shortly preceding the annual meeting of the Association to which it belongs, and send the amount of said collection to the Standing Clerk of said Association—that said clerk shall defray the expenses of the delegates to the Association so far as necessary, not exceeding one-third of the whole amount received—that the delegates to the State Convention, appointed by the said Association, carry the remainder of said funds to the Standing Clerk of the State Convention at its next session, to be equitably expended by him in defraying the expenses of the delegates attending the next session of the United States Convention, having regard to the distances travelled and the expenses incurred by each.

Resolved, That the Standing Clerk of this Convention be required to keep a correct account and vouchers of all expenditures, and to report them annually to this Convention—and that each Association be requested to require a similar proceeding from its Standing Clerk for the information of the societies contributing to such funds.

Resolved, That it be recommended to each pastor of one or more societies, to mention and urge the taking up of said collections for the purposes above named.

IMMODESTY OF THE BIBLE.

The inquiry is frequently, and sneeringly made by opposers of the Bible—and some times in shame and sorrow by Christians. Why are so many indelicate terms used in the Mosaic laws—so many impure and abominable deeds forbidden?

Delicacy requires caution in answering the question, and forbids minuteness. I remark then, briefly, that many of the expressions exist more in our common version, than in the original Scriptures.

When our present translation was made, customs, and manners, and phraseology were somewhat different from those of the present day. Or, to explain more clearly, the polite and delicate phrases then in use, have now become common and vulgar—just as the phrases we now use without scruple in polite circles, by being rudely mouthed by the low-bred and the profane, may in their turn be discarded from the decent circle of a future generation. We have known catch words within a few years, which were quite fashionable—used by the lips of modest beauty and grace—become the language of the street and the grocery, and sink into utter disrepute.—But a few years ago, the common expression "that's a fact," closed every sentence—it is now fast sinking into contempt. From the same causes, and by the same process, the fashionable phraseology on more delicate subjects, used when the Scriptures were translated, has sunk into disuse by the modest and delicate, and is now considered improper and obscene in conversation, or in common literature. In a few years more the now graceful innuendo, and fashionable double allusion, deemed so witty and delicate in our day, will also be considered highly improper and offensive to modesty and decency.

So far, then, as the mere phraseology is concerned, the English translators, and not Moses, or the other sacred writers, are responsible. But so far as ideas are concerned, the following remarks will suffice.

Anciently, the priest and the physician united in the same person—theology and medicine were as one science. Many of the passages censured, had relation to cleanliness, health, and the preservation of the species in physical strength, and unmingled with foreign blood. They are, therefore, of national importance, and could not be omitted in the law and theology of the nation—for the priests were to teach them to the people, and to see that they were observed. Compare them with our medical works in most common use; and they differ not from our own day in delicacy or propriety—and are not one whit more deserving of censure or ridicule, or disgraceful to the author.

All expressions not included in the foregoing classes, are embraced in the moral and civil laws of the nation, and are absolutely necessary to warn against the crimes in them expressly forbidden. Compare them with our own laws, and they will bear the scrutiny. The same things are named—the same things are forbidden in our statute books—plead in our courts—and published in our newspapers. And if there is, now, a necessity for naming these things—much greater was the necessity, then. For now these crimes are every where forbidden and discountenanced, and are but seldom committed—then, every nation around Judea allowed their commission—yea, commended them as solemn religious acts! How could Moses secure the Jews from the contamination of abhorrent examples every where around them, but by naming briefly, and plainly, what was every day openly, shamelessly, and religiously even, practised around them? He named them to forbid them—other nations minutely described them to recommend and enjoin them. Such is the almost incalculable difference between the moral purity of Moses, and of nearly every other legislator from his day down to the Christian era. And yet we hear skeptics sneer at the indelicacies of the Bible!

Without those indelicacies, what would have been the moral condition of the world at the present day? Nothing but one vast sink of pollution and unnatural abomination!

But it is supposed, the commandments on these subjects, need not have been interwoven with others—but should have been embraced in other books. So they are, as far as public morals and safety would permit.—The Bible is a collection of various books, and the portions here considered are placed in such connexions as would best enable the priesthood to enforce them on the minds of the people, and as would best induce the people sacredly and religiously to learn and obey them.

It may be urged that they should now be wholly omitted. But this I do think would be an unwise measure. The grossness of expression, which is owing wholly to the changes of language since our English version has been made, might be conformed to the language of the present age—but all else should be retained. We need the knowledge of the improvements effected by revelation. It is necessary that we should have the history of our race in past ages, as beacons to warn and instruct us in the pathway of future improvement. And I would as soon think of erasing from our country's annals, the descriptions of battles fought in our Revolutionary struggle, for fear that our children might imbibe a sanguinary spirit, as I would think of blotting from the Bible descriptions of the immoralities of darker ages, for fear our children might become immoral. Let both be judiciously used for the purposes for which they are recorded, and good will be the result. And if used otherwise—if perverted and abused—surely the Bible is not to blame, but he who perverts it.

A. B. G.

THE GOODNESS OF HUMAN NATURE.

It is now an acknowledged principle, in the best and latest system of mental philosophy—as it soon will be in every Christian system of theology—that man has no passions or propensities, no faculties of mind or body, which are evil in themselves, or the natural and proper exercises of which are sinful. Now, as in the beginning of his intellectual creation, it may be said of the human mind in its primitive condition—"And God saw every thing that he had made, and, behold, it was very good." The horrid chimera of natural depravity, which so long has been a leaden nightmare on the noblest energies of the soul, is being rapidly dispelled by an increasing knowledge of God and his works, as disclosed in nature and revelation.

As every faculty of the human body, properly and naturally exercised, is calculated only to promote happiness and health, so the natural and legitimate exercise of every moral power of man, is calculated to strengthen his virtues and promote his enjoyment.

Take even self-love—that regard for our own happiness, dignity and improvement, which, in the dark ages of the church, has been branded as the height and depth, and length and breadth of human depravity and sin—and even it is now generally acknowledged to be a virtue. For few now require a willingness to be endlessly sinful and miserable, as a first condition of salvation, and the highest evidence of a love to God. While nearly all are beginning to see and acknowledge, and all do certainly practice self-preservation as the first of duties. And, certainly, without love for myself, I can not love my neighbor as I do myself—without nourishing and cherishing his own flesh, the husband can not love his wife as his own body—and without affection for himself, the Christian is not likely to feel the full force of his obligation to love God, because God first loved him. To which it may be added, that if each of us was not worthy of his own regard and esteem, God would scarcely have so loved each one of us, as to send his well beloved Son to taste death for every man, nor have required us to love one another. Self-love, then, can be no crime in itself—and when it becomes a sin, it must be so, because of other circumstances connected with it.

Love of relatives, and friends, and of the whole human race can surely be no transgression of the law of God, which requires us to love even our enemies, and gives us the example of the Spotless One, who laid down his life for us all.

Love of offspring can surely be no violation of God's commandments, since he has laid its foundations so deep in our nature, and honored it, by declaring his love for us to be like that of the mother for her babe; or of the father, who pitieth his child even while he corrects it with stripes for its iniquities.

Among the many disgusting, revolting enormities of the Heathen nations, committed in their idolatry and degradation, St. Paul places in a conspicuous station, their want of natural affection—a failing into which too many dogmas of professed Christians have also hurried them. Hence, if to be "without natural affection," is a sin, to indulge in natural affection can not be less than a virtue—a compliance with the law of God. Nor the law of God in nature, only, but in revelation, also, requires us to cherish these affections—to honor our parents that our days may be prolonged.

Or take the love of country. No one that has felt the glow of patriotism in his bosom, can doubt that it hath the smile and blessing of Heaven upon it.

The love of acquiring property—so necessary to the preservation of our own lives and the lives of those dependent upon us—the means by which we may clothe the naked, feed the hungry, succor the helpless, minister to the sick, and furnish industry with employment—surely this propensity of our nature can not be a crime in itself—or when rightly and naturally exercised by its possessor.

Those faculties which enable us to appreciate, size, form, weight, number, order, color, and all else that relates to external objects—that enable us to enjoy all the loveliness with which God has invested every piece of his workmanship—surely their exercise is not sinful, for they were given us for that very purpose, and by every outward allurements has their Giver called them into activity. And when properly exercised, each and all these various faculties—animal though they are—lead us through nature up to nature's God—minister to our higher moral and religious sentiments—until every power of the soul, kindles with adoration to God, as it delights in, and admires with highest pleasure, his work, around, above, beneath and within us!

The proper and legitimate exercise, then, of all these faculties of the mind, is a virtue instead of a sin—obedience to God, instead of the workings of native, inborn depravity. For how often do the Scriptures call upon us to observe the glittering blazonry of the heavens—to mark the returns of the seasons—to notice the lillies of the valley, the birds of the air, and the beasts of the field—to learn of the knowledge day showeth unto day, and the wisdom night utters unto night, and, surely, to obey these injunctions is, and can be no sin, but the reverse.

I might proceed with every other mental faculty bestowed on man—all, or nearly all, consist in love to some object, place or circumstance of God's own workmanship or designing—and all, without exception, are expressly designed to be used in accordance with their nature, and the nature of the objects to which they are related.

Wherein then, you may ask—wherein consists their sinfulness?

Sin consists in an irregular, unequal action of any of the faculties. No one is bad in itself—but every one is evil in its improper exercise—its undue use—its perversion or abuse.—I will explain.

To exercise self-love, to the exclusion of love to others, is selfishness—a mean, narrow-minded vice, and a fruitful source of so much evil, that I do not wonder that many have forbidden self-love entirely, and made it the very concentration and essence of total depravity itself.

Love of parents, or of children—of partners, relatives or friends—if confined to them—if exercised at the expense or exclusion of love for our race, generally—or even of the brute creation—becomes sinful. The sin, however, consists not in its exercise; but in its restriction—in its undue, irregular or unequal exercise, compared with that of the other affections and faculties.

The love of enemies becomes sinful, when we allow our affection for them to lead us to neglect measures for their reformation, or for our own preservation, or that of community, from their malice.

And when the love of our country leads us to transgress the rights of other nations—to injure our fellow-beings in other countries, for the aggrandizement of our own nation, it certainly becomes a crime of great magnitude against the laws of God in revelation and in nature.

And when our love of acquiring property, for whatever use, leads us to violate the laws of honor, honesty and truth—to infringe on the rights of others, its exercise being inordinate, is a sin.

I care not to what use the wealth thus procured, is applied—whether to build up a nation, to endow hospitals or colleges, to erect churches, or send forth missionaries—the acquisitiveness becomes sinful—the end can not, does not justify the means—we may not do evil that good may come of it, for thus to act is doubly sinful.

And when we employ the perceptive and intellectual faculties—yes, and with them, even the moral and religious sentiments, and general benevolence—to the neglect of the other faculties of mind and body—to the injury of our own persons and families, by the violation of right—their exercise becomes sinful. Not that they are exercised, but that the others are not exercised in due proportion with these. In the language of Holy Writ—These things thou oughtest to have done, and not left the others undone.

Oh, may we ever remember, then that our greatest duty is to God and his truth—our second greatest to the dearest, highest, best interests of our race universally—and that all else is to be sought only in accordance with these two great commandments—love to God supremely, and to our neighbor as to ourselves.

RELIGIOUS INGRATITUDE.

Hard pressed to find time to write editorial, or subjects on which to write, I have been once or twice compelled to publish what I believe to be judicious extracts from a few sermons. One under the above head, on Luke xvii: 18, again quoted in the following, was published a few weeks since. It has probably spoiled the whole sermon for future use, and yet as there are left a few remarks on the importance of an early attention to an accurate acquaintance with religious doctrines and practice, which I believe worthy of notice, I give below the remainder of all that will bear publishing from the sermon. I give the same heading to this, as to the former extracts, that they may be connected together, because of the text—and also, because the preliminary remarks allow the title. Here is the extract.

Were you fainting on the arid sands of the Arabian desert, after the last drop of water in the possession of the caravan, had rolled over the dried tongue and down the thirsty throat—parched with the hot, descending rays of the sun, and withered with the scorching reflections of heat from the sands around you—oh, how would your heart bound with joy and swell in transport, to be led to a green spot of shaded coolness in that desert waste—to a bubbling fountain, overflowing with a rich, an inexhaustible treasure of cool, sparkling water!

And as you were just about to enter its coolness, and slake your thirst with its joyous tribute of refreshing waters, with what contempt would you look upon yourself, were you persuaded that, in after life, you could drink many and many a draught without thinking of, and praising and blessing the benefactor who led you to the grove and pointed out to you the fountain! Oh, there would be agony in the thought, turning all your joy to bitterness of sorrow.

Yet, let us look around. God has placed us here in a most delightful country—a land overflowing with blessings so innumerable, that tongue can not enumerate them—fountains of water rise up to meet our lips with refreshing coolness on every hand—and they are but a part—a very small part of his bounties. Yet how often—how commonly do we enjoy and partake of these bounties with hearts, not only heedless of their great worth—not only cold to their Giver—but actually filled with repining and murmurings that they are not better, or more abundant, or attended with other and less valuable blessings! Surely, this is not improving the blessings of God as we should do—surely, this is not using his blessings to happy ourselves and each other, as he intended them to be used when he bestowed them upon us.

God suffers not by this ungrateful conduct—but deeply are we injured by it. Repining and discontent are benumbing to the soul—they fill it with coldness and death. They throw a mantle of gloom over the fair face of creation, and turn all its light into darkness—its peace to strife. And not all the treasures of earth, can compensate for the joys that are lost by the absence of a happy feeling of contentment and gratitude for the commonest, but greatest blessings of life around us.

But this is not all. Our comparison reaches yet further and higher. As you were thus fainting with intolerable weariness and heat, and perishing with thirst—could wealth, or fame, or honors—could the trifling pursuits of earth, with all their empty pleasures, have diverted your attention from the cooling shades and refreshing waters before you? No—diamonds might have been strowed in your path, you would have trampled them under foot—orders and dignities might have been hung on either hand, you would have passed them unheedingly, to attain what was more needed—more desirable—a shady spot of verdure to cool and rest your weary frame—a draught of water to refresh your dying body! That obtained, and wealth and honors might then have been sought. But, how careful would you have been, in seeking them, not to forget where the waters might again be found when needed—or to carry with you a full supply to last you in your travels through the weary waste. How consistently and prudently men will act in the trifling affairs of this world! Truly, are the children of earth wiser in their generation, than the children of light!

All men are mortal. Of this, we are fully persuaded. All must therefore die. Not one of us expects to escape this common lot of mankind. The narrow grave must be the final resting place of us all—the slimy earth-worm must riot in the chambers of the brain, and feed on these corruptible bodies. One by one, we are travelling forward to that last home of our mortal frames. One by one, kindred and friends most dear, are ripening for the tomb, and bidding us farewell by the waning light of the lamps of life. At last, each of us must follow in our turn, and be no more on earth! Speak of it as we may—it is an event we could wish to escape. No riches or honors of earthly origin, can prepare us to meet it with joy—scarcely with resignation. Oh, how do we thirst for the waters of life in the valley of death! How eagerly do we look for the sparkling fountain of immortal refreshment, as we approach to or think of its dusky gloom!

Well—God, gracious, kind and benevolent, has given us this great blessing also. His Son brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel. How it sparkles with peace and life for the troubled and the dying! It overflows with the holiest and purest consolation for the mourner's thirsty lips. And are we not all mourners? Have none of us needed the cooling waters of immortal consolation, as we passed through the desert of life? Do none of us need them even now?

Oh, it is a painful question! We have seen the fair and the lovely—the kind and the affectionate—the good and the great—perhaps the vile, but yet fondly, dearly loved of our kindred and friends—we have seen all these enter the dark valley, and we mourned—mourned with hearts heavy and sad. Then—yes, THEN our only, our last refuge was the cooling, verdant grove of Religion—the sparkling, living waters of immortal life. We entered, and found rest—we drank, and were filled with consolation—even with joy. And yet, how few were found afterwards to return to that fountain—to abide there—or to supply themselves of its fulness—and to give glory to God? “There were not found that returned to give glory to God, save this stranger”—said Jesus of the lepers. The riches of earth glittered in the desert, and we returned again to its barrenness and heats. The honors of men were held up to our view, and we rushed forth to the simoon and the rolling billows of sands. The vanities of life promised enjoyment and mirth, and we plunged again to weariness and parching thirst!

But this was not the worst. We not only rushed forth, but we took with us no supply for the journey—we left the fountain behind us, heedless of its benefits, careless of its joys, forgetful of its consolations, if not ungrateful to its Provider. Is this our prudence—this our wisdom? Oh! how differently do we act in the trifling things of earth!

Go, if you would see the folly of such heedless conduct—go to the chamber of sickness and death—and there, when the powers are weakened, when the body is full of pain and the mind crowded with sickness of thought—there begin anew your search for the consolations of the Gospel, and ask yourself, should this great and important work have been deferred till now? Or place yourself there as a mourner—yet called upon to comfort others—and as you feel your insufficiency to give comfort to yourself, not to say to administer hope to the dying—as you feel that there is an abundance of consolation if you only had it to use and to give—ask yourself, is this a time to begin the work of inquiry, examination and reflection—a time to acquire the habits of a pious, believing heart? I am sure you will see the necessity of devoting a portion of your best days—your days of health and strength, and your hours of leisure, to this interesting and happy task. I say happy task—for though I have spoken of religion principally as the soother of dark hours, and the cheerer of gloomy seasons, yet it is equally beneficial in the happy, the prosperous and the cheerful seasons of life. It is food and drink to the soul—a staff of life, without which the soul can no more live, than the body can without nourishment. And though a deficient system of faith, like the ancient Law—or a false, corrupt, or impure system of religion like the modern law of sin and death may keep the soul alive, as the body can live upon improper food, yet a healthy life can only be kept up by a healthy nutriment.

Be careful, then, that you have a religion which is pure and undefiled, to be the food of your soul. Starve it not on husks of the worldly and vain, for they may fill, but will not nourish. Do not content yourself with dieting on a partial salvation, for your appetite will gnaw the soul to agony—but “eat ye that which is good, and let your soul delight itself in fatness.” Drink freely—drink always from the inexhaustible fountain of living waters, and leave to utter neglect the hewn-out, broken cisterns of men, from which the scanty supply of the waters of life leak out faster than your lips can follow to drink them. And drink always with gratitude to the Giver. Drink with gratitude for the past, for the present, for the more glorious future. Drink with gratitude for your own enjoyment of God's bounties—for the enjoyment your friends derive therefrom—and for the prospective enjoyment of them which will ultimately bless the whole human race. “Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money; come ye, buy, and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price. Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread? and your labor for that which satisfieth not? hearken diligently unto me, and eat ye that which is good, and let your soul delight itself in fatness. Incline your ear, and come unto me: hear, and your soul shall live; and I will make an everlasting covenant with you, even the sure mercies of David. Behold, I have given him for a witness to the people, a leader and commander to the people.”

LETTERS OF A GRANDFATHER, ETC.

The biblical student—the clergyman—and our readers generally, whatever their age and knowledge, must not let the professed objects of these letters prevent their careful perusal of them. They will find, if I am not much mistaken, a rich fund of biblical knowledge in them—a valuable mine of ore, which they may dig, and melt in the furnace of meditation, and work up in a variety of forms for future use and edification. Their being addressed to “grand-children,” does not prevent their author from filling them with profound and able disquisitions suitable for maturer minds. Read them, by all means.

PRIZE TALE.

The quaint and instructive (and, may I not mention as among its merits? brief) tale in this days paper, is that which obtained the premium of a free subscription for two years, to our paper. It would not have appeared so early—or, rather, one of the others would have appeared in its stead—had we had room for a longer one.

"REJOICE EVERMORE."—THRES. v: 16.

BY D. K. LEE.

Oh! weep not though penury sendeth
Her vapors to darken us o'er,
Nor grieve at distress, though be bleudeth
His wormwood and gall with our store—
Nor wail, 'till our pilgrimage endeth,
When 'tis ours to "rejoice evermore."

Oh! seek not for fame, 'tis a treasure
That makes its recipients poor,
Though plaudits they meet without measure,
They still pant with thirst, as before!
But if heaven bequeath us a pleasure,
In that, we'll "rejoice evermore."

Oh! shrink not though stern persecution
Revile us, and scourge us, and pour
Her arrows of death and pollution;
For if we confide in that lore,
Whose motto is "MAN'S RESTITUTION,"
In our faith we'll "rejoice evermore."

Oh! mourn not for friends who are sleeping
In death, and whose spirits did soar,
(While o'er the pale course we were weeping,)
On pinions of Love to that shore,
Where the glorified cherubs are leaping
With joy, to "rejoice evermore."

THE CHEERING.

The following lines were addressed by their fair author to Br. T. B. Robbins, on his commencing his labors in the ministry of universal reconciliation. It is a cheering which may be grateful to many others who are buckling on the Gospel armor, and preparing to wield the sword of the spirit in the great war against bigotry, superstition and error.

Yes, go young herald, in thy Saviour's name,
The everlasting Gospel to proclaim;
Thy Master's mandate hasten to obey,
Whose Love shall be the sun that lights thy way.

Yes, go; and may'st thou prove a shining light,
To many sitting in the shades of night;
Where superstition broods o'er all her fears,
And bigotry her gloomy temple rears.

Too long has been employed, each subtle art,
To blind the vision, and deceive the heart;
Too long ambitious priests essayed to blind,
In superstition's chains the human mind.

Young man, 'tis thine to expose their impious fraud—
False expositions of the word of God;
Thine to unmask their vile hypocrisy,
Their creeds consign to dead oblivion's sea.

Far as the sound of ceaseless woe has rung,
And the old song of endless death been sung,
Thus far the Gospel's joyful sound proclaim,
That limits death and hell's relentless reign.

Transporting hope! by faith's prophetic eye,
We view the age of terror passing by:
E'en now, her fabric in decay appears,
And in its stead fair Truth, her temple rears.

Then, onward in the glorious cause, brave youth,
'Twill surely prosper—'tis the cause of truth:
Point each inquiring wand'rer to his Lord,
And self approving conscience shall reward.

DEATH.

We had a little boy that was advancing toward his fourth year. He was our only son; he had nothing of the boisterous happiness of childhood about him; but seemed to live in a tranquil enjoyment of the delights that nature had scattered at his feet, and he grew in the breeze and the sunshine, a creature of pure and gentle elements. He had few affections, but they were usually strong. Two beings he loved with an intense passion; his mother, and a kind and single-hearted man, who delighted to have my little boy by his side, when he weeded his garden, who culled for him the brightest rosebuds, and who would hold him for hours in his arms, to look upon the swallows as they dipped their rapid wings into the clear and silent stream that flowed by my cottage. If ever human beings were entirely happy, it was this honest man and my poor child; as they wandered about from the rising to the setting sun, exchanging those most innocent thoughts which the rough touch of worldly feelings will in a moment destroy; but which rests upon the untainting soul, like bloom upon the ripening fruit.

The boy gradually sickened; there was languor in his eyes which told of growing disease; there was a torpor in his movements which spoke of feebleness and pain. The Spring came, but he did not float upon its gales like the butterfly. While the crocuses leaped out of the earth to proclaim the approaching hours of renovation, the work of decay was begun in the sapling whose blossoms and fruit shone so richly in my day-dreams. I saw him once more enjoy the sunshine—but it was in his nurse's arms.

The crisis quickly approached. I sat by his bed for two days and nights, regardless of any thing in the world but my sick boy. The wrestlings with death of a firm mind and mature body must be fearful; but who can gaze without shuddering upon the agonies of infancy? Who can see the burning fever pass over the trembling lips of childhood, like the hurricane sweeping the lily, without shrinking from the sight of this contest between weakness and power? I looked out for a moment from the chamber of suffering, upon the face of the bright and tranquil world—when I turned again to my boy, the hand of love was closing his eyes.

I now know for the first time, what it is to have death about our hearths. The excitement of hope and fear in a moment passes away; and the contest between feeling and reason begins with its alternations of passions and listlessness. It is some time before the image of death gets possession of the mind. We sleep, perchance, amidst a feverish dream of gloomy and indistinct remembrances; the object of our grief, it may be, has seemed to us present, in health and animation—we wake in a struggle between the shadowy and the real world—and we require an effort of the intellect, to believe that the earthly part of the being we have loved, is no more than a clod of the valley.

I followed my boy to the grave. I looked down into the deep, deep resting-place they had prepared for my child. At that moment a gleam of sunshine suddenly burst upon the scene. I thought of the dim morning of death, and the "day spring" of immortality; and I turned for comfort unto Him who said, "suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not."

COMMUNION WITH GOD.

What more conducive to our happiness, and what greater source of pleasure and instruction, than to hold communion with the Father of our spirits! To turn our backs for a time, upon the engrossing cares of the noisy world, and bring our thoughts and our devotions to the calm and grand repose of nature's instructions, and through them to nature's Author. Who does not love to steal away from the excitements and passions, of the world, and quench the fever of assiduous devotions to its interests, in the contemplation of the loveliness, peace, in the harmony displayed in the works of the Creator? And thus to hold intercourse with the Spirit of our spirits—to commune with nobler things than earth affords. It is through the medium of his works that the Creator delights to hold converse with his creatures.—The voice of inspiration is heard all around us—in the most solitary and desolate places of earth, we hear the inviting sounds of our Father's instruction—we read the solemn and important lessons of wisdom, and truth, and love. Especially does the returning energies of nature, in this vernal season, remind us that the glorious and extensive volume of the Divine goodness, is again opened for our admiration and profit. Who does not delight to hold communion with the spirit of the seasons, and let the heart and the affections go out in gratitude and love to the Author of all things? Welcome again the spirit and inspiration of Summer! Welcome this season of grateful communion with our Father above, and our kindred on earth. May devotion inspire our hearts, and pleasure crown our exertions in the cause of truth.—Watchman.

DEFINITIONS.

We marvel, that in this book-producing age, some learned professor of divinity has not put forth a new theological defining dictionary, which would give the true and exact distinction between orthodoxy and heresy. It would not be at all difficult to prepare such a work, taking popular opinion as the standard,—and in this country it is well known that public opinion is the law of all things, especially in the republic of letters.—Let us take a few examples.

Orthodoxy. God from all eternity elected some to everlasting life, and reprobated all the rest to eternal sufferings in hell.

Heresy. "God will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth." 1 Tim. ii: 4. "Having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure which he purposed in himself, that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth, even in him."

Orthodoxy. God's anger will burn forever against a portion of the souls he has made, and he will visit upon them a storm of unmitigated vengeance throughout the wasteless ages of eternity.

Heresy. "He will not retain anger forever because he delighteth in mercy." Micah vii: 18. "For I will not contend forever, neither will I be always wroth; for the spirit would fail before me, and the souls which I have made." Isa. lvii: 16.

Orthodoxy. God never had any design to destroy the devil or his works: on the contrary, it is his will that the devil exist forever, and that the monument of his evil works should stand eternally in the empire of hell.

Heresy. "Forasmuch then, as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he (Christ) also himself likewise took part of the same; that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil." Heb. ii: 14. "For this purpose the Son of God was manifested,—that he might destroy the works of the devil." 1 John iii: 8.

Orthodoxy. Religion consists in a radical change from nature to grace, which change shows itself in long prayers, fasts often and paying tithes of cummin, mint and anise.

Heresy. "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father, is this—to visit the fatherless and widows in their afflictions, and to keep himself unspotted from the world."

These are but a few examples of popular opinion versus the Bible; in other words, of orthodoxy as distinguished from heresy. The definition might be easily extended, to make a respectable and highly useful volume, which we doubt not would prove of incalculable service and convenience to the students of Theological Seminaries. From it, they could learn their true latitude and longitude, and by a few appropriate references which might be made, to the catechism, the students as they went forth to preach, could readily recur to all the requisite proofs against the doctrine of God's universal and unchanging goodness. Banner.

NUMBER 24.

OCCASIONAL SERMON,

Delivered before the New-York Convention of Universalists, held in Albany, May 31, 1837.

BY A. B. GROSH.

"The kingdom of God is not in word, but in power." 1 Cor. iv: 20.

"When the Master speaks," said the pious and eloquent Massillon, as a peal of thunder rolling over his head, partially drowned the rich, mellow tones of his voice, and filled the hearts of his congregation with solemn awe—and he paused as burst after burst came crashing on, until an interval of death-like silence succeeded, when, closing slowly the Sacred volume, he spoke again:—"When the Master speaks, it becomes the servant to be silent!"

Imagine the heavy rolling thunder, the fullest, deepest sound in nature's harmonies—then contrast it with the reverential and almost whispered sounds of the preacher's voice, swelling up out of the succeeding stillness, and the emotions of purest veneration will uplift your souls to the throne of God, humble them at its footstool, and constrain them to exclaim in mingling admiration and love—"What is man, that Omnipotence should be mindful of him! or the children of men, that Infinity should deign to visit them!" Yet sublime and awful as are our sensations, produced by "the voice of God" speaking aloud in the heavens, the meanest sounds in nature are equally powerful to affect and subdue the mind. "As Dr. Good has very justly observed—"the rumbling of a cart over a pavement, or on hard ground, is not unfrequently believed to be a thunder-clap in the heavens; and, under the influence of this deception, we immediately transfer all the awfulness and magnificence of the celestial meteor to this clumsy machinery, and are as alarmed as if the fiery bolt were about to descend upon us."

This proves—excuse me for thus applying the text—that the kingdom, or dominion of electricity is not in word—not in the thunder—but in power—in its other influences. In word, the cart and electricity may be equal—but in power, how different!

The rattling peals of its artillery in the skies, is the least of the effects produced by this universal agent of God. In its varied yet invisible forms, it probably turns the magnet's point unvarying to the North—gives to light its beauty and to life its warmth—curdles the nervous fluid in its conduits, and writhes the strongest muscles as parchment is shrivelled in fire;—pervading all things, it gives energy to their essence, and action and cohesion to their atoms—wakes the earth to fruitfulness, heaves old Ocean's tides, rolls the planets along their orbitary paths, and feeds the thousand suns of universal solar systems, with undying heat and everlasting light! When its call is heard in the heavens, the dark war eagles of the sky assemble for commingling battle, and from their ruffled plumes they shake the rain-drops to water the thirsty ground beneath—the winds go forth to cool, and the fires to purify the air—beauty and fertility awake from their feverish slumbers, and go forth, shaking fragrance from their downy pinions, and clothing the earth in a verdant mantle—while all animated nature again breathes with rapture, the refreshing coolness and healthful purity of the renovated atmosphere.

But the cart (the comparison is truly odious!) is drawn along the pavement, or highway, by the mere muscular force of an animal; which, however noble and useful, must, in a few years, become meat for the ravenous beasts of the field, and food for the unclean birds of the air! And although its sounds may momentarily fill the mind with the most awful sensations of sublimity and awe grossly misapplied—yet when it approaches nearer, we smile at the delusion—or blush at our weakness and folly—or, indignant at the imposition, we go our way, resolved to be deaf even to the thunder's roar!

I have not introduced this comparison for nought. You can not fail to perceive its applicability to those numerous, short-lived, animal excitements, termed "revivals of religion," compared with the steady, constant and healthful power of spiritual influence in our own ranks.

It is equally applicable to the circumstances connected with our text. The Corinthian church, gathered in a refined, but extremely dissolute Pagan city, did not at once assume all the purity, energy and stability required by the Christian faith. False teachers soon arose among them, who, by the splendor of their eloquence and winning persuasion of their manners, led these unstable and foolish people astray from the practice of godliness, and the truth of the Gospel. Paul well knew that if he entered into a contest of professions with these false teachers, before a people so alive to outward show, the hypocritical knave, not being confined to facts, nor controlled by truth, could easily excel him—could pretend to possess more than Paul had received. Hence he declares his purpose to come unto the Corinthians shortly, and to ascertain, not the speech, but the power of these false teachers. He would test them by acts, not by the sound of eloquence. He knew, to recur to our illustration, that a rumbling cart might make a noise like thunder, but the powers it possessed, would, on trial, fall far short of that which rolled a hollow peal across the sky.

The comparison I have introduced, is also strictly applicable to the subject of our text—"The kingdom of God is not in word, but in power." That we may more clearly perceive this application, let us consider

I. The nature and objects of "the kingdom of God."

Dr. George Campbell, of the Scottish church, (to whose fifth Preliminary Dissertation I refer you for a full explanation of the meaning and usage of this phrase,) says it has "a manifest allusion to the predictions in which this economy was revealed by the prophets in the Old Testament, particularly by the prophet Daniel, who mentions it in one place as 'a kingdom which the God of heaven would set up, and which should never be destroyed:' in another, as a kingdom to be given, with glory and dominion over all people, nations and languages, to one like a son of man. (Daniel ii: 44 and vii: 13, 14.) And the Prophet Micah, speaking of the same era, represents it as a time when Jehovah, having removed all the afflictions of his people, would reign over them in Mount Zion, thenceforth, even for ever. (Micah iv: 6, 7.) To the same purpose, though not so explicit, are the declarations of other prophets. To these predictions there is a manifest reference in the title, the kingdom of God, or of heaven, or simply the kingdom, given in the New Testament, to the religious constitution which would obtain under the Messiah."

Dr. Campbell further informs us, that the original word rendered kingdom, "relates to the time or duration of the sovereignty," as well as "to the place or country over which it extends." Also, that it sometimes means "administration or method of governing," and even "royalty, or royal authority." Hence, we read of its coming, approaching, being at hand, increasing and the like.

It appears to me that the word dominion, which in common usage embraces all these variations, is a better term by which to express the original word, than either reign or kingdom. I shall so use it.

In treating of the nature and objects of this dominion, I feel the want of a knowledge of the class of subjects to which it belongs—and even of language, in which clearly to express my ideas of it. It is described in the vision of Nebuchadnezzar, explained by Daniel, as a stone cut out without hands, which smote the incongruous image of earthly dominions, and ground it to powder.—"Then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver and the gold" of which the image was composed, "broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer threshing floors; and the wind carried them away that no place was found for them: and the stone that smote the image, became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth." (Dan. ii: 35). To this intimation, that the dominion of Jesus is totally opposed to all the earthly dominions there represented, we are enabled to add his own declaration—"My kingdom is not of this world. If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews: but now is my kingdom not from hence." (John xviii: 36).

Contrary to this declaration, was the opinion of nearly all the Jews—even the disciples of Jesus during his earthly sojourn—and in part of many Christians at the present day. Their error consists in construing literally, those comparisons of it to earthly dominions, wherein it is spoken of as having thrones, and crowns, and titular dignities—as spreading its conquests by wars and slaughter—subjugating its enemies, by causing them to bow their foreheads in the dust, while their conqueror puts his feet on their prostrate necks, and makes them footstools by which to mount the throne of his glory. Such were—such yet are the customs of Eastern nations; but is it not evident that the prophets merely used them as figures, which would best convey to Oriental minds a faint idea of the majesty and glory of the heavenly dominion—of its irresistible power, and its complete triumph in the spiritual universe?—Why condemn the error of the ancient Jews, in looking for an earthly, political kingdom of the Messiah, if we construe literally these representations of Christ's spiritual dominion! Let us, at least, be consistent. If the dominion of Jesus has in it nothing of this world, but is wholly a moral or spiritual dominion, let us suppose its objects, thrones, crowns, dignities and conquests, to be spiritual, also.

We have at least Scripture warrant for this belief. "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation. Neither shall they say, Lo, here! or Lo there! for, behold, the kingdom of God is within you." (Luke xvii: 20, 21). As Cruden comments on this passage—"it will not become conspicuous and remarkable by any outward splendor, or worldly pomp: but by its inward power and efficacy upon the hearts and minds of men."—(Vide, word OBSERVATION). "The kingdom of God is not meat and drink; but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost"—i. e. it consists not in outward rituals and observances; but in inward motives to virtue and its enjoyments.—(Rom. xiv: 17). Hence "flesh and blood can not inherit the kingdom of God," for its possession belongs to the inner, or spiritual man, only. And the reason is evident. It "is not of this world"—it does not—it can not resemble earthly kingdoms in any thing pertaining merely to time or sense. Its nature is wholly spiritual, and its objects are consequently so. It is destined to rule over spiritual subjects—the souls—the minds of men.

Earthly dominion relates to the subjugation of the body and its actions,—there it ends—there it terminates; for mind being intangible, physical power can not act upon it, save through the body. But Christ's spiritual dominion relates to the government of the mind and its motives—that is its ultimate end and aim; and so far as it is intended to control matter, it will do it by pervading and influencing the mind to act upon the body; and through it, on matter generally.

If I am correct in these positions—and after many repeated, careful examinations, my conviction of their truth is greatly increased—then, all the imagery derived from earthly dominions, to predict the glories and conquests of the heavenly dominion, must be spiritually construed;—for if the kingdom itself is wholly spiritual; its subjects, spiritual, and its objects, end and aim spiritual—is it not evident, that its conquests must be spiritual, also? and the subjection of its enemies, as a matter of course, must be, not an outward, physical subjection, merely; but an inward, spiritual subjection?

II. Let us consider the means which will be used to accomplish these objects—or, in other words, the “power” of the heavenly dominion.

God ever has had, and now has a dominion, total and absolute, over and in the physical or material universe. By it, the lightnings are collected and led along their fiery track—by it, he holds the winds in his closed hand, lets them loose on their errands, and directs them amid the storm—by it, he wheels the planets in their appointed courses, and bids their suns warm and enlighten them;—and the laws of gravitation and repulsion, of composition and decomposition, of growth and decay, are merely laws of that dominion. The power that reigns over, and in, and through this dominion, is similar to its nature and objects—a physical power—a power capable of operating on material subjects only;—it is, if I may use the term, God's physical omnipotence. Great, awful and incomprehensibly glorious as is this species of power, when operating on things material and visible—when creating, or changing, or preserving, or destroying the worlds of matter—it is inoperative when applied to spiritual existence.—Effects cannot govern causes—neither is the greater ruled by the lesser. Moral power is superior to physical, and spiritual existence is greater than material—unless the cheerless visions of the atheist and pantheist are true. Consequently, all things else being equal, physical power can not govern spiritual existence.

So obvious is this position, that no reflecting mind, in our day, retains the anciently popular belief that material fire is used to torment damned spirits in hell. All enlightened Christians now admit, that spiritual, only, can act on the purely spiritual; and those who contend for the endless misery of a portion of our race, deny that material instruments are used to inflict it. The material fires of the whole universe, concentrated to one mighty focus, could not burn a single thought, or give a pang to an immortal spiritual existence.—The ponderosity of a universe of matter may crush the body into a mass so solidified as to be invisible to a mortal eye; but it would not confine an angel's thoughts beneath its pressure, or prevent an immortalized human spirit from freely removing from beneath its mighty weight. These are strong expressions—yet they are but faint figures with which to shadow forth the great reality, that no physical power can govern spiritual existence.

It follows, then, as a necessary consequence, that if the dominion given to Jesus is a purely spiritual dominion—designed to reign over spiritual subjects, (or over the minds, instead of the bodies of men)—and if its end and aim is wholly spiritual—its power must be of a nature entirely different from that just treated of. And is it not also reasonable to suppose, that a moral dominion requires a moral power, (and that, only,) to advance and sustain it—a power in accordance with its own nature and objects?

Surely God does not govern mind as he does matter. Our Partialist brethren have long sneered at the idea of forcing people into heaven; and well they may, for the idea of governing the soul with physical force, is absurd enough. But be it known, that we no more believe in compelling souls to obedience than they do—nor as much; for they speak of forcing souls to go to hell—of forcing them to acknowledge the justice of their endless doom, and of compelling them to acknowledge that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father!—Tyrants have been execrated for compelling their subjects thus outwardly to reverence and acknowledge their majesty and glory—and can it be that God resembles them? No, my friends—Christians have been led into this grievous error, by not reflecting that God possesses an other than physical power—or rather, by confounding his moral omnipotence—the spiritual power of the Eternal Mind—with mere physical power. But look at this subject candidly. Here is a moral government, over moral beings, having moral laws, requiring duties consisting wholly in the right state of the mind and affections. Is its power, alone, physical? consisting of outward, material force?

You, who have ever been led, though but for a moment, to become subjects of this dominion—to yield it obedience—were you forced to love God? Were you compelled, by outward pressure or compulsion, to love your fellow men? No, you indignantly and truly answer. By sweetest, gentlest influence, you were constrained to do so, and you did it willingly—joyfully—gladly. Persuasion inclined your mind to conviction of duty—conviction led to inclination to obey—until your moral powers, quickened by the truth, and your affections, warmed into life by the experience of God's love, earnestly impelled you to obey the commands of the Gospel, and you felt it to be your meat and your drink to do the will of your Father who is in heaven! “Not by [physical] might, nor by [outward] power, but by my spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts.” (Zech. iv: 6). “For it pleased the Father that in Jesus should all fulness dwell, and, having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile all things to himself; by him, I say, whether they be things in heaven or things on earth.” (Col. i: 20).

That the dominion given to Jesus, is not governed by physical power, is also evident from the fact, that God does now physically govern all things; whereas the spiritual kingdom is not yet universal—for, as Paul says of Jesus, “we see not yet all things put under him.” (Heb. ii: 8, 9). Every man is, now, in God's material, or physical kingdom—but no drunkard, murderer, unclean or profane person shall enter the kingdom given to Jesus. As, “except a man be born of God, he can not see the kingdom of heaven”—and as “every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God,” (whom to know is life eternal),—so love, universal and divine, is the condition of salvation; or, in other words, the means of entrance into the privileges and enjoyments of this spiritual dominion. And as the Gospel is “the perfect law of liberty,” and “the truth” that maketh “free, indeed”—a knowledge of that truth—of the love of God to sinners, and his design to bless all the kindreds of the earth in Christ, the promised seed—is the form in which the power of the heavenly dominion sways the soul into obedience to the condition of salvation. For “herein is love, not that we love God, but that he loved us”—and “we love God, because he first loved us”—and “if God so loved us, we should also love one another.”

There is more truth in the common saying, “Great is the truth, and it will prevail,” than is generally realized. Truth—the truth Jesus came into the world to bear witness unto—the Gospel God preached to Abraham, and made known to the world by his Son—that endless, changeless truth is the “power” of “the kingdom of God”—the all-prevailing means for effecting its objects. This truth—this Gospel, is that “word of God,” which is “the sword of the Spirit”—it is “quick, and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart”—it “is the power of God unto salvation, to every one that believeth.” (Eph. vi: 17; Heb. iv: 12; and Rom. i: 16). They who receive it, are “born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible.” (1 Pet. i: 23). They believe in the record of God, that he has given them eternal life, and that that life is in his Son. (1 John v: 11).

It follows, as a necessary consequence, that the dominion of Jesus rules the understanding by truth, and the affections by love—that all subjected to it, or subjects in it, possess “righteousness, peace and joy in a holy spirit;” and that it requires, yields and secures, to every subject, perfect liberty in all that is truly desirable, good and great—in all that is happying to the subject, and glorious and honorable to the Ruler.

III. We will now consider the duration and extent of this dominion.

And here permit me to remind you that, as I have already shown, the “kingdom and reign of God” is not a physical or material dominion, but spiritual—having spiritual subjects, objects and means. Its reign is in the empire of mind and affection—its subjection is the subjection by truth and love—and therefore, its “weapons are not carnal, but mighty, through God, to the pulling down of strong holds”—and all its conquests are bloodless and spiritual. Its conquered enemies can no more be spiritually opposed to it, than the submissive body of a political rebel, can oppose a government to whose laws it has been subdued.—And all who are not fully reconciled and completely conformed to the heavenly dominion, can no more be in it, than the same person can be in America and Europe at one and the same time.

But in considering its extent, let us not forget that a spiritual dominion can possess no linear or visible boundaries—it “is not of this world”—it “cometh not with observation”—it “is not in word, but in power.” And in considering its duration, we can have no respect to mere time—for, though its administration may be changed, it is not temporal, but eternal.

The prophet Daniel, in speaking of it, uses not only the word “eternal,” which expresses indefinite continuity, but explains that continuity to be endless.—“His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away; and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed.” (Dan. vii: 14.) The New Testament writers, also, explain its everlastingness by the words “endless,” “immortal,” “incorruptible,” “unfading,” and describe it as “a far more than exceeding an eternal weight of glory”—words never used in connexion with sin, death or suffering, and never used to express limited duration, as are the words everlasting, eternal, for ever and ever, etc. It is to continue through time, beyond death, and in the resurrection state, when all things earthly and temporal will have ceased to be, and spiritual existence and endless duration, only, will remain. Then, only, will its increase cease, and having arrived at its fulness and completion, Jesus will then cease to administer it, and become himself, one of its subjects, under its administration by his and our Father and God, who will thenceforth reign in, and through, and over it, without termination.

Thus far many of our enlightened Partialist brethren will generally agree with your speaker—but now comes the all-important, all-interesting question—who will be excluded from participating in the benefits, privileges and glories of this heavenly, happy, and endless dominion? Are not the teachings of the Bible as unlimited in proclaiming the extent, as they are in declaring the duration of this kingdom? Daniel, speaking of the kingdom given to Jesus, says it was given him “that all people, nations and languages should serve him.” The Psalmist declares that “all the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before him." (Ps. xxii: 27 and lxxxvi: 9). And God, himself, when he preached the Gospel to Abraham, declared that in Jesus, the promised seed, he would bless all the nations, families and kindreds of the earth. (Gen. xii: 3, and xxii: 18; Gal. iii: 8, 16). That a spiritual, and not merely a temporal blessing is here meant, is evident from Acts iii: 25, 26, where the blessing is declared to consist "in turning away every one from his iniquities"—and Gal. iii: 8, where it is declared to consist in making the Heathen just, through faith in Jesus.

Jesus in his parables and more express declarations, confirms the absolute universality of these prophetic and promissory declarations. Small in its beginning as a grain mustard seed, his dominion is to become as the greatest of all plants, in which all find repose and shelter. Trifling as a single measure of leaven, it is to create a fermentation in the universe of mind wherein it is placed, until the whole lump becomes assimilated to its own nature, and all is leavened by it. Insignificant even in its earthly progress, as a small stone cut out of a mountain, it is to spread and enlarge itself by its own inherent energies and influence, until it destroys every opposing power, and fills the whole earth. Like the few faint murmurs of the hidden earthquake, it is to spread its shakings among the opposing powers and principalities of earth, and topple down all adverse ecclesiastical policies, and will overturn, and overturn and overturn, until all the kingdoms of this world shall be dissolved by its might, and merged forever into the one, supreme, universal kingdom of our God and his Anointed.

Isaiah informs us, that in the mountain which the small stone shall become, the Lord of Hosts will make a glorious feast unto all people—destroy the face of the covering cast over all people, and the vail which is spread over all nations—that He will swallow up death in victory, and wipe the tears from all faces. (Isa. xxv: 6-9). By referring to Paul's treatise on the general resurrection, (1 Cor. xv: 22, 54,) we learn that this will take place when all that die in Adam are made alive in Christ, thus becoming new creatures—and, consequently, that its complete fulfilment belongs to the eternal, and not to a temporal state. The same prophet declares, that as surely as the rain and snow come down from heaven and return not thither without watering the earth that it may give seed to the sower and bread to the eater, so surely the word of God—the Gospel of salvation, that goeth forth out of His mouth, shall not return unto him empty, but shall accomplish that which he pleases and prosper in that whereto he sent it.—(Isa. lv: 10, 11).

Not one of these, and many other declarations that might be quoted, allows the least conception of any other kingdom existing, finally, beside this dominion—of any thing being left out, capable of being incorporated with it—or of any thing remaining undestroyed, which is opposed to it.

Progressive in its nature, it was first proclaimed to Abraham and his descendants—or as Peter declared (Acts ii: 39) "the promise is to you and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call." But if this does not prove that others than the Jews are embraced in the call, read the language of Jehovah himself—"Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God and there is none else. I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, that unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear, surely shall say, In the Lord have I righteousness and strength." (Isa. xlv: 23, 24).

And, finally, that all intelligent beings, with but one solitary exception, will be embraced and included in the final, heavenly dominion of Jesus, is conclusively proved by 1 Cor. xv: 24-27, where God, only, is excepted from the universal subjection—of course, all others must be included in it.—Hear the passage:—"Then cometh the end, when Jesus shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule, and all authority and power. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy, death, shall be destroyed. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith, all things are put under him, it is manifest that He is excepted which did put all things under him." Notice, God is the only being who is not put under the feet of Jesus—and death, the last remaining enemy, after all others are subjected, is destroyed—and there will be NO MORE DEATH. We have already proved that as this dominion, its end and aim, its subjects and power, are all spiritual, so its subjection can not be merely forced and outward, but a real, inward, willing, spiritual subjection. All, then, will be subjected in love and obedience—their understandings convinced by the truth, their affections subdued by the love of the Gospel, and their wills conformed to the holy requirements of God. In short, the subjection of every soul to Jesus, will precisely resemble the subjection of Jesus to God. For "when all things shall be subdued unto Jesus, then shall the Son, also, himself, be subject unto Him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all." (1 Cor. xv: 28.) If God is all that is in any one, there can be nothing but God in that being; and when God is all that is in all, there can be neither sin, nor suffering, nor want, nor death in any being in the universe of God. Every soul will be God's—every soul will be filled with the fulness of God—and every soul will joyfully say, In the Lord have I righteousness and strength.

"Here stop, my soul, no further seek to go,
What God reveals is quite enough to know."

I well know, by sad experience, the resisting power of prejudice to the arguments of truth, permit me, therefore, to notice one objection, which else I had deemed sufficiently refuted. It is argued that Paul's treatise on the resurrection, in 1 Cor. xv, relates only to the resurrection of the saints, when its universal expressions of glory and immortality in Christ are adduced. But who has not noticed that the sinners and ungodly, and the deniers of the resurrection are specially addressed in its 12th and 34th verses? When this fact is urged home, then it is contended that the phrase (25th verse), "For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet," implies that the wicked of the earth—the enemies of Jesus, will be dishonorably, and ingloriously, and therefore miserably subjected to Christ. But the careful reader of the chapter will notice that the phrase "all enemies," in the 25th verse, is only a convertible term for the phrase "all things," in the 27th verse.—There is no distinction made between the subjection of "all things," and that of "all enemies"—both are put under the feet of Jesus—God, indeed, is the only being that is not said to be put under his feet. Even the angels of God in heaven, are put under him in like condition (Phil. ii: 9-11 and Heb. i), being made his footstools. The apostle Paul, who has used this language, was the enemy of Jesus, he was subjected to Jesus, put under his feet, and became his footstool by elevating higher and raising to greater dominion over men, the very Messiah he had so bitterly opposed! What he had experienced, he declares all enemies will experience, and that thus, and thus only, will every sinner be willingly subjected to Jesus, and gladly aid in swelling his praises as the Lord of all, to the glory of God the Father. For God has "put all things in subjection under his feet." For in that he put all in subjection under him, he left nothing that is not put under him. And although "now, we see not yet all things put under him," yet "we see Jesus (who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death) crowned with glory and honor, that he, by the grace of God, might taste death for every man," (Heb. ii: 8, 9)—and believing in the divine testimony, we "rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory," in anticipation of Christ's triumph, God's glory, and the world's salvation in immortality.

In conclusion, permit a few words of gratulation and exhortation. I have proved that the dominion given to Jesus, is a spiritual dominion—that its objects and subjects are also spiritual—that its power is not an outward and material, but an inward and spiritual omnipotence—and that spreading itself by its inherent energy, it must, ultimately, not only fill the whole earth, but the whole universe of soul, with its bloodless conquests and sorrowless rule.

Earthly rulers, when ablest and best, can not wholly prevent the sorrows, soothe the woes, supply the wants, nor reform the vices of the earth—and when weak or evil, they fearfully increase them. But the Prince of Peace will not only abolish for ever, throughout his infinite dominions, all these evils, but will plant universal good in their stead, and crown that good with immortality.

The victories of earthly conquerors, when most beneficial, only free the body, and confer partial blessings at the expense of wasted heritages, ruined families, widowed wives, childless mothers, and bereaved orphans. But in the conquests of the heavenly dominion, no blood is shed—no clangor of trumpets, or clash of arms, or thunder of artillery is heard—for it "is not in word, but in power." It destroys only what is opposed to the happiness and peace of its subjects, and—oh, joy—joy!—it for ever frees all souls with perfect liberty, and fills them with the fulness of universal blessings—and restores peace to all the kindreds of the earth, by re-uniting all whom death has separated, in holiness and bliss.

Oh, ye who languish and groan under the bondage of ignorance and sin; seeking bliss, but finding all your pursuits full of bitterness and ashes—here behold the Deliverer that cometh out Zion to destroy your tyrants—to correct you with his chastisements, enlighten you with his truth, make you willing and obedient in the day of his power, and fill your souls with permanent peace in the experience of his love, which frees from all bondage and fear.

Oh, ye who mourn over the wickedness of relatives and friends, (living and departed,) and find in the thought of their endless wo a mortal poison to wither every hope and joy, come ye to a knowledge of this dominion, in which all punishment is for the profit of the punished, and will render them partakers of the holiness of our God. (Heb. xii: 5-12; Lam. iii: 31-33; Isa. lvii: 16.)

Believers in this great salvation—has it come to you in word, only, or in POWER? Oh, let your lives answer this question, to the approbation of your consciences; for, under God, on you depends the speedy advancement of this kingdom and its bliss among the children of our Father. No great deeds—no mighty works are required of you in this warfare with error and vice. At the judgment which commenced the purity of this kingdom, eighteen centuries ago (Matt. xxv: 31-46), feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and ministering to the needy and unfortunate were absolutely required; while forms, and ceremonies, and faith even, were not so much as named as requisites to admission into it. The babe, whose infantile smile pours the oil of its innocent influence over the turbulent waves of ruffian feeling, does more to advance this kingdom, than the congregated hosts of worshipping multitudes, whose lips and not whose hearts are in the work. And the widow, whose tear of sympathy relieves the bursting heart of despairing grief, has given it a mightier impulse than the warrior's mailed might, on the blood-drenched plains of Palestine—or the nabob's thousands, inscribed high on the roll of public charities.

Prayers, and sermons, and hymns, and public charities, are all good in their season—but the most religious—the most holy and blessed duties you can perform, are the common, every day duties of domestic and social life. "For the kingdom of God is not in word, but in power." The influence of eye on eye—mind on mind—heart on heart, faithfully exerted, is better and more efficacious in converting the soul, and in moulding it into entire conformity to the will of God and the spirit of his kingdom, than burnt offerings and sacrifices. These things, therefore, ye ought to do, and yet not leave the others undone.

Brethren Evangelists—It also becomes us especially to remember, that “the kingdom of God is not in word but in power”—and that, therefore, its advancement requires means in accordance with its nature and objects. They who believed that Jesus would subdue his enemies by a merely outward and physical force—conquer the body while he left the soul rebellious—may be excused for resorting to means in accordance with their opinions, and wielding the deadly thunderbolt of endless wrath, to subdue by terror the unconverted soul. But we—we know that that power is but faint which spreads destruction from the embosoming cloud, compared with that noiseless and gentle influence which wakes all creation to beauty and to life. An infant—an insect even, may destroy life, for destruction is a low exhibition of power—but God, only, can create, or continue, or renew existence. And though God destroys as well as creates in his physical universe, yet morally speaking, you remember “a great and strong wind rent the mountains, and brake in pieces the rocks:” “but the Lord was not in the wind; and after the wind, an earthquake; but the Lord was not in the earthquake: and after the earthquake, a fire; but the Lord was not in the fire: and after the fire, a still, small voice;” and the Lord was in the faint voice, even the Lord God Omnipotent. Remember this, brethren, and by a good life, as well as by your public labors, demonstrate to the world that the kingdom you proclaim is the kingdom of heaven—that its power works by love to the purifying of the heart, and by truth, to the enlightening of the understanding, and the subjection of the soul in holiness and bliss. AMEN.

A VOICE TO YOUNG MEN.....CHAPTER I.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

INTRODUCTION—SELECTION OF ASSOCIATES.

The station in society occupied by young men, is one of commanding importance and deep responsibility. In the course of nature and by the usages of mankind, to those who are now young men, must soon be committed in trust, under Providence, all the important interests of community. If the institutions of our country—its civil and religious freedom—the numerous advantages and facilities which it affords for the improvement of mankind in useful knowledge—are to be preserved and perpetuated, it must be mainly through their exertions. Upon their arm the nation depends to repel the foreign foe, and to quell the spirit of domestic discord. They will soon compose our legislative and other deliberative councils. It will speedily devolve upon them to enact laws and to execute them. In fine, ere long, they must give tone to our national voice and national character. When the infamous Cataline conspired to wrest from Rome her liberties, his first effort was to corrupt the young men; well knowing that when they became ripe for misrule, the work of desecrating the altar of Liberty, could easily be accomplished. And true it is, that as the young men of a nation are enlightened and virtuous, or corrupt and ignorant, so are the prospects of its future prosperity, or of its speedy overthrow and ruin. How necessary that young men should become aware of the important responsibilities resting upon them, and of the necessity of qualifying themselves to discharge them faithfully!

The condition of young men, in regard to their future character, is much more perilous than that of the other sex. Being brought by their occupations, in frequent contact with the unprincipled and profligate, they are subject to influences extremely deleterious, and to temptations of a seducing and dangerous character. Absorbed in the pursuits of pleasure, or in the strife for wealth or fame, they are liable to be led into a carelessness as to the means employed to secure their ends. Blindfolded by passion, interest or a thirst for enjoyment, thousands rush headlong into those vicious practices that plunge their votaries into the deep vortex of wretchedness. And yet there is a safe path, open for all to pursue, which will most certainly lead to respectability, enjoyment and peace—a path which none ever yet followed, without escaping many of the evils of life, and experiencing a prosperity, and an amount of happiness which are wanting to all who pursue a contrary course.

Young men, will you listen, while I endeavor to point out that path, and lay before you some of the inducements which call upon you to walk therein? While I may not have time or space to go over the whole ground pertaining to your duty and interests, still I will engage to bring forward motives sufficiently powerful to induce every wise and discreet young man, to be cautious and watchful, as to the measures he adopts to secure prosperity and enjoyment. Your attention is first solicited to—

THE SELECTION OF COMPANIONS.

Man is by nature a social being. He delights to mingle with his race, and to interchange sentiments and offices of friendship and kindness.—This disposition is peculiarly evinced by the young. Every young man selects some one or more of those of his rank and condition, to become his companions or associates. At every opportunity, he seeks their company, to find that enjoyment which he supposes he would fail to obtain by mingling with others.

The influence exercised by the companions with whom you intimately associate, will be powerful and enduring. “Show me your company, and I will show you your character,” is an old adage and true. The character of the associates with whom you mingle, will evince to a good degree, your inclinations, habits and principles.—Young men, often are not aware, how sensibly their reputation is influenced by their companions. Do you associate with the vicious, the profligate, the intemperate? You must not be surprised if community attribute to you, propensities of the like character. What other conclusion can they draw? You never prefer the company of one man to that of another, without there is something more pleasing to you in his habits or principles. If you prefer the society of the ignorant and corrupt, to that of the enlightened and virtuous, there is no indication more certain, that your inclinations and tastes tend more powerfully to the characteristics of the former, than to those of the latter. However dissimilar, at first, may be your tastes, habits and principles, by mingling constantly in the company of certain individuals, you insensibly, yet unavoidably, lose your distinctive characteristics, and absorb theirs.—As the stream always partakes of the qualities of the soil through which it runs, so the principles and habits of youth, become invariably tinged by the character of the company in which they mingle.

Great caution, therefore, is necessary in regard to your associates. You should not view this as a subject unworthy a thought or an exertion.—From among your acquaintance, you should select those with whom you would associate. And in this choice, let wisdom and discretion be your guides. Remember that you are creatures of imitation, and that the force of example, is immense, in forming your characters. If you err in your selections—or if, from choice, you associate with the profligate and debased,—your condition is truly critical. Allowing that your character at the commencement of the intimacy, is much better than theirs, how long can it remain so? It is next to impossible for you to raise them to your elevation in worth, were you disposed so to do.—But the effect of your intercourse with them, will be the reverse. You will be debased to their level—you will become saturated with their evil propensities—you will imitate their vicious practices—you will be wedded to their corruptions, and finally, will be led into the degradation and ruin which is the certain result of dissipation and crime.

By associating with the vicious, you assume their character, are weighed by their worth, and esteemed by their value, in the eyes of community. You probably recollect the story of the dog Tray, and of the difficulties that befel him, though innocent, from mingling in bad company. That fable is more frequently enacted in real life, than many would suppose. But young men do not often become rid of evil companions, at as cheap a rate as poor Tray. At the expense of one flogging he abandoned the gang forever.—But although youth experience many evil consequences from their corrupt associates, yet it too frequently happens, that they become so tinctured with the love of low and vicious company, and their sinful practices, that again and again do they return smarting to their embrace. Strong and more strong grow the chains that bind them to the servitude of evil desires. Vices upon which they first looked with horror, gradually become less repulsive in their appearance, until they finally fall helpless and entirely into the slavery of their grasp.

When once you embrace the company of the profligate, it will be difficult to dis sever the connexion. They will exert every effort to induce you to continue in bondage with them. All exertion on your part to reform, will be met by their combined ridicule and opposition. This, added to the strong chains of sinful habits, will render your return to virtue, a work of extreme difficulty. Thus by selecting vicious companions, there will be an hundred chances to one, against your reformation, your success in business, or your obtaining a respectable character—but the great probability is, that you will experience the fate predicted by the wise man—“the companion of fools shall be destroyed.” You should believe it as an immutable truth, that by becoming the companion of the foolish and corrupt, you will eventually lose your virtuous and upright principles, and with them will be destroyed health, reputation, peace and happiness!

With these dangers visibly before them, young men of discretion and forethought, will perceive the necessity of selecting such associates only, as are virtuous and intelligent. In making your choice, you should not be influenced by outward show, or circumstance; by pride, or fashion, or popularity—you should not be influenced so much by condition, as by the qualification. The real difference in the value of men, arises not from their circumstances, but in superiority of mind, purity of morals, and amiability of disposition.—All are worthy to become your associates who are virtuous, amiable and intelligent. Such choose, and none others.

By mingling and associating with people of these qualifications, you can not fail of being highly benefited. Your natural propensity of imitation—the influence of their conversation, habits, manners and general demeanor—all become powerful causes operating upon your character and forming it to virtue and usefulness. In the presence of such individuals, all incentives to vice will be wanting—virtue, religion and useful knowledge will appear in their true and lovely forms—and trains of thought, action and habit, will be laid, that will lead to the most valuable results. An intimacy with people of good character, will elevate you in the estimation of society. Their virtues, to a considerable extent, will be considered yours. Confidence will be reposed in you—assistance rendered you—and the good wishes of your fellow-beings will rest upon you. In fine, the benefits flowing from the choice of virtuous and enlightened associates, are all the reverse of the evils growing out of a selection of those who are vicious.

Be cautious to avoid deception in this matter. Gay, sociable, pleasant manners, are not always the indication of a pure heart, or of virtuous principles. Beneath an agreeable exterior, often lurk low, vulgar tastes, vicious propensities and profligate habits. Become the associate of no one with whose character you are not fully acquainted.—

Form no intimacies, and allow none, until your are perfectly satisfied upon this point. This is the only safe course you can adopt.

Listen cheerfully to the advice of parents and guardians, in regard to your associates. By their superior experience and wisdom, they possess a clearer insight into human character than you can have obtained; and they are enabled to look beyond the exterior appearance and accomplishments, and comprehend to a good degree, the real character of youth. Their counsel will be of essential benefit in aiding you to avoid the companionship of the vicious, and in selecting for your intimacies, those whose example will be of a virtuous and salutary character.

The weather being showery, and the season one of business for the farmers, the house was filled, but not to overflowing—every seat was occupied by grateful worshippers of our common Father. The services were interesting, devotional, rational, and well timed. The business of the Council was transacted without a dissenting voice. The Society for the relief of widows and orphans of deceased Universalist clergymen, received a small accession of supporters, and it is hoped will find in every society a number more, ready to unite in promoting its objects. The kindness of our friends in Bridgewater, and the joy of their visitors in meeting together under the roof of hospitality, altogether formed a scene on which memory will long delight to linger. It is an exemplification of the efficacy and blessed effects of a faith that works by love to all, and purifies the heart.

CIRCULAR

OF THE NEW YORK STATE CONVENTION.

Dear beloved brethren in the faith of a world's salvation—The season has again rolled round that brings us together in annual convocation, to confer upon those things that concern the prosperity of Zion; and the pleasurable task has devolved on me to address you, as the organ of the Convention.

Our business in council was, as usual, transacted with general unanimity; and a spirit of fraternal good feeling pervaded our deliberations.—We realized “how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity.” This is especially the case in the meetings of Universalists, where there is no doubt of our fraternal relationship, and no jealousies or envy, arising from a supposed partiality in our common Parent.

Among the resolutions taken by the Council, that in relation to the organization of societies for the relief of the families of deceased and indigent clergymen, particularly commends itself to your consideration. There are many in the ministry to whom this measure is due, as a matter both of justice and gratitude. They entered the field of labor when it yielded but small pecuniary compensation. They have families which are unprovided for. They must soon go down to the grave and leave these families dependent on the charities of the public. And past experience has demonstrated that the charity of the unorganized religious public, is only theoretical. Besides, our pecuniary condition, as a denomination, in this State, is such at the present time, that a brother who enters the ministry destitute of means, and gives it his whole attention, can scarcely hope to secure a competency for the maintenance of a family, in case of his decease. This circumstance presents an obstacle to the increase of our ministry, which this measure is adapted to remove.

Another important measure of the Convention, is the plan proposed for defraying the expenses of the delegates to our State and General Conventions. I trust the only arguments necessary to impress the propriety of this measure, are these: The expense of attending the meetings of these bodies is considerable—the delegates, particularly the clerical portion, are not, in general affluent—the business to be transacted is important—and the presence of those appointed to transact it, indispensable.

Our Council, you will perceive by the minutes, was not full; and in the lay department, unusually deficient. This may be attributed, in some measure to the peculiar state of the community in a commercial point of view. Yet our meeting was a pleasant one. The all-engrossing topic of “the currency” was forgotten in mutual intelligence and congratulation upon the general and local prosperity of our common cause. The religious services were enlightened, devotional and thrilling, and were listened to with eagerness and joy. The aching cares of business seemed removed, for a season, from the mind, and it lightened up to the hallowing touch of devotion's holy power. In short, the only unpleasant occurrence, was the close. It was sad for so many friends to part.

A word in relation to the utility of religious association. These meetings bring together many minds from various portions of the heritage—each increases his stock of statistical information, in regard to the condition of our cause—the public derives the advantage of much collected wisdom, in our official deliberations—many new acquaintances are formed that last through life—the social powers are developed and improved, rendering the clergy better fitted for the duties of pastoral visitation—the more experienced and gifted in the ministry are generally called upon to preach, and we who are unpracticed in the work, gather ideas, catch inspiration, and carry home materials for the formation of a style, based upon the blended models of many masters. One of the principal causes of the recent, visible improvement in the mental and social character of our ministry, may be traced in the extension of our public bodies. Minds are thus brought together, and brightened and sharpened by the contact—intellectual resources are accumulated, for sermonizing and conversation—attachments are formed and correspondencies elicited that tend to bind us together, and strengthen and confirm our zeal.

May these meetings continue to gain interest and accelerate the spread of truth, till there shall be a Convention in every State, an Association in every county, and a society in every village. On your continued and increased exertions, brethren, it depends, in a great degree, to bring about this happy consummation. May the God of impartial grace be with, and bless, and strengthen you; and may the reports that shall greet us, at our next annual convocation, prove that our wishes, herein expressed, shall not have been in vain. Per Order,

UTICA, FRIDAY, JUNE 16, 1837.

CERTAINTY OF PUNISHMENT.

“Be sure your sin will find you out.” Numbers xxxii: 23.

Follow sin and its effects, from the first transgression down to the present moment, and you will find it unchanged, and its results the same. The feelings, the weakness, the guilt and misery of our first parents, have all been experienced—and experienced in precisely the same manner—by every one of their descendants that has attained the age of maturity, with soundness of mind, and freedom of action.

First comes the voice of Heaven declaring to us the knowledge of good and evil, and commanding us to abstain from wrong doing, for in the day of transgression we shall surely die. The soul is possessed with a determination to obey. But after a time, the crafty, subtle insinuations of that carnal mind which is enmity to the law of God, enter the heart left open by false security. The wily tempter begins by insinuations against the kindness of God, in debaring us from that enjoyment—represents it as very essential to happiness, sweet to the taste and fair to the eye—denies the certainty of the punishment, and represents it so far distant as to promise a probable prospect of escaping the penalty altogether—holds out the certainty of deriving much benefit, certainly much knowledge, from the act, plucks at last the luscious looking fruit and holds it to our eager grasp—we eat and die. All our hopes of happiness vanish at the touch—bitter to the palate and revolting to the sated eye, is the delusive splendor that lured us to misery and shame!

And where is our boasted knowledge? It consists in knowing our own folly and nakedness of soul—in knowing the truth of God's declaration "in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die!"—and in seeing that God was most strangely kind when we deemed him most cruelly rigid and severe.

But alas for the folly of man! one lesson is not sufficient. Madly credulous to falsehood, blind to experience and deaf to truth—the tempter whispers again and again in our ears—and again and again we are the victims of its artful delusions and our own head-strong folly!

If Adam and Eve sinned, they sinned without previous experience—but we, their descendants, having their experience and our own, we wander on the shores of the sluggish waveless lake of moral death, time and again we pluck the beautiful apples of transgression, and bite the tempting fruit to fill our mouths with bitterness and ashes! Oh how consummately foolish is our conduct—how hopeless and vain our pursuit after happiness in the ways of transgression and death!

But it must also be admitted on behalf of many of our race, that they have inducements to believe the tempter, greater than were held forth to our primeval parents.—To Adam and Eve the serpent came as the creature of their heavenly Parent, and by wily insinuations against God's goodness, induced them to credit his denial of the Lord's veracity. But to many of our fellow beings the tempter comes as the delegated messenger of the Highest—his wily deceits he represents to be the voice of divine revelation—and while he thunders anathemas against vice, as a hoard of delicious enjoyment most dangerous to the soul, he opens the gateways of faith and repentance through which the sinner, after a life of keenest enjoyment in sin, may make good his escape from all its shame, anguish and ruin. And when the carnal mind thus makes even religion her seemingly and partner, who may hope to escape undeluded and unharmed from her temptations and snares?

While, therefore, I deeply regret this most licentious and demoralizing sentiment in the popular theology of the present day, and regret most sincerely that many of our minds and feelings have been polluted with it in the days of our darkness, I rejoice that a purer, brighter day has dawned upon us in the doctrine of Universalism. And I rejoice for our children and our children's children, that their tender minds will be early fortified to resist vice, by having imparted to them a knowledge and practice of the truth—"Be sure your sin will find you out." Look at the lover of ardent spirits, seeking the delirious effects it produces upon him, and hoping to conceal his transgressions from the eyes of his neighbors, and to escape the consequences. Poor man! he is the silliest slave that ever was led captive at the will of the devil. "Some men's sins go beforehand to judgment, and some they follow after." Such is his transgression. Long before his transgressions have been witnessed by the public eye, the consequences of them are plainly seen. The bloated countenance—the unsteady step—the blunted sensibility—the clouded intellect—the mismanaged frame, store or workshop, or neglected business—the mourning wife, the shame-faced wondering children—the pitying shake of the head from the intimate and familiar friend—and a hundred other fore-runners of public disgrace and open shame precede the frequent visit to the drunkard-haunted grocery—the drunken riot and shameful brawl—the public swaggering—the wallowing in the streets—the abuse of the family—the creditor's visit and seizure of goods, and total ruin, infamy and shame. Though there is probably no sin which promises greater and longer escape from detection than drunkenness—which apparently, can better be committed in secret and recovered from privately—yet there is none which is more certain to be detected, and that, too, right early, by the most common or casual observer.

And surely there are few sins more sure, however slow in their operation, to find out its perpetrator. Seductive, because social in its nature, and enlivening in its first stages, it leads its victim along by a flowery band—but let him attempt to draw back, and he will find it a strong one. Yet it is better to break it at once, however beauteous and however strong, for the further it drags him along, the more hideous will be its appearance, and the more formidable its power, until the flowery wreath becomes a rope of scorpions, and its power increases into the grasp of a giant. A. B. G.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Independently of every consideration arising from the doctrine of Universalism—apart even from the influences of theoretical Christianity, in a general point of view, I must ever be opposed to the infliction of capital punishment under our present circumstances and government. As a mere citizen of the United States—as a man and a lover of my fellow-beings (and not only as the teacher or professor of a particular system of religious faith,) I would oppose it on grounds of expediency, policy, moral influence—as calculated to increase crime, by perpetuating and cherishing the principles that lead to it. On these grounds I was always opposed to it—even before I became a believer in God's impartial goodness—and therefore consider my repugnance to this relic of barbarism to be a something which, though it may be and is increased by my present views of God and man, is wholly distinct from and independent of them. I feel, therefore, that I have a claim on the candor of my fellow-citizens of other denominations, when addressing arguments to them upon this subject—a candor which should not prevent them from considering and adopting what I offer, because it comes from a Universalist.

Whatever may be the conduct of God to his enemies, it is certain, and acknowledged by all Christians, that the Bible commands us to love ours. And whatever may be the tendency and design of God's punishments here or hereafter, it is certain that reason, humanity, and the Scriptures of the New Testament, unite in recommending us to mingle mercy in our judgments—to love sinners—to do good, and not evil, to all men, as we have opportunity. And however Christians may be divided in opinion with regard to the final destiny of a portion of our race, all agree that the spirit of Jesus while on earth, is to be the spirit after which his followers should strive, and that he has in no case uttered a single sentiment, or performed a single action which will warrant us to take away the life of any being, provided we could secure community from his future injuries, and while we have the least probability that he might be reformed in his practices and saved from his sins.

These are opinions in which all are agreed, whatever may be their faith or name. What bearing have they on the practice of taking life, as a punishment for crime?

Let us fairly consider this question, without sectarianism or prejudice—as men—as citizens of a free government, the laws of which are formed, directly or indirectly by us—and for which laws we are therefore, more or less responsible!

The criminal is the enemy of community, of which we are members. Is it love for that enemy which leads us to deprive him of life? I know that love for others, may lead us to destroy him; but that is not the question. We have no more right to hate the enemy of another, than we have to hate our own enemy; and it is not only others whom we are to love, but our enemies also. Is it love for the criminal—a desire to benefit him, that leads us to decree his death? Certainly not.

Is there mercy in that judgment, which has not love to the condemned for its basis? There may be mercy to others—but that, also, is not the question. We are as merciful to community if we save them from the wickedness of the criminal in any other mode—and will you say that no other mode than inflicting death will save community—will manifest mercy to the criminal? Certainly not. I might proceed thus on the acknowledged duty to do the criminal good, and not evil—but the above can be easily applied thus by the reader, and I therefore forbear.

Will any one point to an action or declaration of Christ, which, when fairly construed, will allow us to punish a criminal out of hatred to him—without mercy—without designing his good? No such requisite to sustain capital punishments, can be produced. It is not in the Book.

I call, then, on every citizen of New-York to read the following petition furnished by a correspondent, and, laying aside every feeling but those of a patriot and a man, to act respecting it as reason and conscience shall dictate. "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might."

A. B. G.

Livingston, Columbia county, June 4th, 1837.

Several of the towns of this county are circulating petitions for the next Legislature to abolish capital punishments, and the people seem generally agreed upon the propriety thereof. About nine-tenths of the people of this town, including all men of education and good standing, have subscribed the petition of this town of which the following is a copy—and should any of your Western towns or counties choose to co-operate with us in the object, we would be glad to be found to agree with them in sentiment as well as in action.

(COPY.)

To the Hon. the Legislature of the State of New York, in Assembly met.

The petition of sundry inhabitants of the town of L—, in the county of C—, humbly prayeth,

That such a law may be enacted by the Representatives of the people of the State of New York, as to them may seem expedient and just, enacting that the punishment of imprisonment during life shall be inflicted upon every such prisoner, as shall hereafter, by due process of law, be convicted of the crime of murder, except in those cases in which the Governor of the State shall deem any such prisoner not guilty, and in such excepted cases the said Governor shall have power to pardon any such prisoner or convict.

And further, that that part of the law enacting that the punishment of death shall be inflicted upon such convicts, be repealed.

A memorial accompanies the petition, of sixteen closely written pages, containing some of the reasons why, in the opinion of the petitioners, the prayer of the foregoing petition ought to be granted.

PLAGUE CURERS.

I hope Br. Balfour will excuse me for giving to our readers the following extract from a letter lately received from him. The concluding remarks on the duty of Universalists who have been Partialists, are too good to be confined to a private letter—and Br. Balfour has too ably illustrated his advice by his practice, to have occasion for regret that I have made it public.

He is speaking of the necessity he has found for making the present prices of his books so high—the losses and difficulties he has encountered in pecuniary matters connected with their production and sale, when he concludes as follows.

A. B. G.

"Had I foreseen, at the commencement of my labors, all my labor and perplexity, no sum could have tempted me to have undertaken the task I have had on my hands. But I do not grudge it now, for the satisfaction and peace of mind which my present views give me, is a rich reward for all my labor. If no one else ever reaps any good from my books, they have at least done me good, in setting my mind at rest as to a future life, giving me glorious views of God's character, and the endless happiness of our race." I sometimes step in to hear my old orthodox friends preach endless misery, and bless God I now know better. It is worth the labor of a life-time, to set one mind free from the slavery such a dogma subjects it to.—Those never fully initiated in youth into the doctrines of endless hell torments, are hardly proper judges of its miseries, the difficulties of emancipation, or the happiness which results from it.

"When the plague raged in Sodom, those who had it, and got cured of it, became plague curers. So ought it to be with most Universalists; for most of them have once been believers in endless misery, and ought to count no labor too great to cure others who are yet laboring under this worst of all mental plagues. May we be honored in our day to do much good to others in turning them from this error to the truth.

"Believe me to be yours affectionately, although I have never had the pleasure of seeing you, W. BALFOUR."

UNIVERSALISM IN CANADA.

Sometime since we received a letter from Br. John Buchanan, Clerk of a Universalist society in Ramsay, Upper Canada, which interested my feelings very much. He says "We are a small society of Universalists, to whom may well be applied the words of our Saviour, 'Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom.' We are, indeed, as a few wandering sheep, having no common shepherd to lead us into the fat pastures to feed, or by the still waters." They are surrounded by many opposers, who have been ably met by a lay brother, that occasionally ministers to the society in word and doctrine, named William Houston. In their various contests with Methodists, Presbyterians and others, they speak of deriving much aid from our papers—"they are so full of strong reasoning, and well substantiated by the word of God"—also, "we had good helps—Petitpierre on Divine Goodness, Winchester's Dialogues, and the Rev. Neil Douglass' works (of Glasgow, Scotland—the Father of the Universalist church there, the same as the Rev. John Murray with you. We are mostly from the stock of Mr. Douglass here.) We have also received the Gospel Communicator from Glasgow, and Streeter's Dialogues from you. The sermons in your paper do honor to our brethren with you, their authors as men, and as preacher's of God's word. They also give us much pleasure as well as satisfaction to read them in our meetings one to another."

"As a small society we send you our best respects and good wishes, desiring that you, and our brethren with you, may remember us in your prayers to the living God, as we do you in ours."

Br. Skinner having been absent at the South when the letter was received, will account for any delay in attention to our Scottish Canadian brethren who are the writers of it.

ERRATA.

There are few things more disagreeable to all parties than typographical errors—yet they will occur sometimes, especially when business or absence prevents a close and careful examination of the proof-sheet. The following is an important error.

In our last number, page 181, column 2, line 18 from the top, after "attending" insert "the State Convention, and the delegates attending"—so as to make the resolution read, "to be equitably expended by him in defraying the expenses of the delegates attending the State Convention, and of the delegates attending the next session of the United States Convention," etc. This is the form in which the vote passed the Convention. Br. Price's copy has it in words slightly different, but the meaning is the same, I believe.

And while my hand is in, I will remark that on the same page, column 3, line 9 from the bottom, I have been made to fill our law books with the works of the sculptor instead of the legislator, by the omission of a t. For "statue books" read "statute books."

BLACK RIVER AND ST. LAWRENCE ASSOCIATIONS.

As neither Br. Skinner nor myself will be able to attend these Associations, we are obliged to depute Brs. Morse and S. R. Smith, as our agents to attend to business connected with this establishment, in connexion with other agents that may be present. The arrears due to Br. Skinner, should have been settled up long ago; and as for ourselves, we feel the pressure of the times so sensibly, that we must earnestly solicit all who can, to forward us what they owe us by the earliest safe opportunity. Agents having money for us in their hands, will oblige us by forwarding it to us as early as convenient.

Brs. Morse and Smith—the former particularly, as Br. S. R. S. has another agency to attend to besides ours—will please aid us in this matter.

Br. Lemuel Buck, our agent at Canton, will doubtless aid them in their duties at that place, as will our agent at Champion at the Black River Association.

THE RECORD.

Among the disadvantages of the plan I have adopted in recording the ecclesiastical news relating to our order in the United States, is that of delaying all notice of interesting events in consequence of business, sickness and (in this case) death in my family. But on the other hand, is the certainty of missing no important event, and the saving much room for other matters. After a longer delay than usual for the causes above stated, I have again spent a day in overhauling a large pile of papers, and collecting the items of interest which will be found below. The proceedings of various Associations will be given in our next.

NEW PREACHERS.—Br. J. W. Bailey, formerly of Unity, N. H., now residing with Br. Bugbee, of Philipstown, Mass., has commenced preaching the everlasting Gospel. This, with Br. Hulinger, of Lockport, named a few weeks since, and of Br. Hayward, of Columbus, fellowshipped by the Central Association last week, makes three new laborers announced since our last.

ORDINATIONS.—Br. E. Capron was ordained pastor over the First Restorationist society in Millville, Mass., May 3d. Sermon by Br. Adin Ballou. Ordination was conferred on Brs. H. Chaffee and W. Lyon, by the Union Association of Mass., at its session in Dudley, on May 3d. Br. T. J. Smith was ordained last week by the Central Association of this State, at Bridgewater.

INSTALLATIONS.—Br. W. M. Fernald, late of Nashua, was installed in Cabotville, Mass., on May 11th. Sermon by Br. M. H. Smith. Sermons were also preached in the afternoon and evening, by Brs. Our friends in Rochester city have purchased a Presbyterian meeting-house, of brick, 42 by 92 feet, and Br. Bingham furnishes it with an organ gratuitously. Our friends in Weymouth, Mass., are also preparing to erect a house. In Dudley, Mass., the Methodists having failed to fulfil their contract, their share in the Union meeting-house has been sold to our friends, who thus become entire owners of the same. It is a neat brick building.

DEDICATIONS.—The new house in West Amesbury, Mass., was dedicated May 24th—sermon by Br. Hosea Ballou. Sermons were also delivered by Brs. O. A. Skinner and M. H. Smith. The house lately erected in Ludlow, Vt., was dedicated May 3d—sermon by Br. W. Skinner. This society was organized but two years since.

Br. A. L. Balch has been united with Br. J. Moore as Editor of that department of the Universalist Watchman.

TO OUR PATRONS AND AGENTS.

Subscribers in other States who have New-York safety fund bills of any denomination—or New-England, Michigan, Ohio, Canada, or Pennsylvania bills on solvent banks, can easily get rid of them by sending them in payment for subscriptions to this paper. The most of these latter can be passed at a discount of a few cents on the dollar—many of them at par. The Eastern and New-York safety fund bills are current—of any denomination.

Those having remittances to make to the Trumpet or the Union, may send what they owe us along with their remittances to either of those offices, as we have accounts there. Or, we presume, money owing to the Union or the Trumpet, may be remitted along with dues to this office, when it is most convenient to do so. In this manner, small and unremittable sums due to each of us, may be made into a remittable sum, by uniting them, and forwarding all to one office. We want money so badly, we are willing to get it by any medium, rather than not get it for a long time.

POETRY.

I KNOW THOU HAST GONE.

BY T. K. HERVEY.

I know thou hast gone to the house of thy rest;
Then why should my soul be so sad!
I know thou hast gone where the weary are blest,
And the mourner looks up and is glad!
Where love has put off in the land of its birth,
The stain it had gathered in this:
And hope, the sweet singer that gladdened the earth,
Lies asleep on the bosom of bliss!

I know thou hast gone where thy forehead is starred
With the beauty that dwelt in thy soul,
Where the light of thy loveliness can not be marred,
Nor thy heart be flung back from its goal:
I know thou hast drank of the Lethe that flows
Through a land where they do not forget—
That sheds over memory only repose,
And takes from it only regret.

In thy far away dwelling wherever it be,
I believe thou hast visions of mine,
And the love that made all things a music to me
I have not yet learned to resign:
In the hush of the night, on the waste of the sea,
Or alone with the breeze on the hill,
I have ever a presence that whispers of thee,
And my spirit lies down and is still!

Mine eye must be dark, that so long has been dim,
Ere again it may gaze upon thine,
But my heart has revelations of thee and thy home,
In many a token and sign.
I never look up with a vow to the sky,
But a light like thy beauty is there—
And I hear a low murmur like thine in reply
When I pour out my spirit in prayer.

And though like a mourner that sits by a tomb,
I am wrapped in a mantle of care—
Yet the grief of my bosom—oh, call it not gloom,
Is not the black grief of despair:
By sorrow reveal'd as the stars are by night,
Far off a bright vision appears,
And hope, like the rainbow, a being of light,
Is born—like the rainbow—in tears.

A GOOD DAUGHTER.

BY J. G. PALFREY.

A good daughter!—there are other ministries of love more conspicuous than hers, but none in which a gentler, lovelier spirit dwells, and none to which the heart's warm requitals more joyfully respond. There is no such thing as a comparative estimate of a parent's affection for one or another child. There is little which he needs to covet, to whom the treasure of a good child has been given. But a son's occupations and pleasures carry him more abroad, and he lives more among temptations, which hardly permit the affection, that is following him perhaps over half the globe, to be wholly unmingled with anxiety, till the time when he comes to relinquish the shelter of his father's roof for one of his own; while a good daughter is the steady light of her parent's house. Her idea is indissolubly connected with that of his happy fireside. She is his morning sunlight and his evening star. The grace, and vivacity, and tenderness of her sex, have their place in the mighty sway which she holds over his spirit. The lessons of recorded wisdom which he reads with her eyes, come to his mind with a new charm as they blend with the beloved melody of her voice. He scarcely knows weariness which her song does not make him forget, or gloom which is proof against the brightness of her smile. She is the pride and ornament of his hospitality, and the gentle nurse of his sickness, and the constant agent in those nameless, numberless acts of kindness, which one chiefly cares to have rendered because they are all unpretending, but all expressive proofs of love. And then what a cheerful sharer is she, and what an able lightener of a mother's care!—what an ever present delight and triumph to a mother's affection! Oh, how little do those daughters know of the power which God hath committed to them, and the happiness God would have them to enjoy, who do not, every time that a parent's eye rests on them, bring raptures to a parent's heart. A true love will almost certainly always greet their approaching steps. That they will hardly alienate. But their ambition should be not to have it a love merely, which feelings implanted by nature excite, but one made intense, and overflowing by approbation of worthy conduct; and she is strangely blind to her own happiness, as well as unfaithful to them to whom she owes the most, in whom the perpetual appeals of parental disinterestedness do not call forth the prompt and full echo of filial devotion.—Schenectady Re-ctor.

DANCING.

Dancing is an amusement which has been discouraged in our country by many of the best people, and not without reason. Dancing is associated in their minds with balls; and this is one of the worst forms of social pleasure. The time consumed in preparation for a ball, the waste of thought upon it, the extravagance of dress, the late hours, the exhaustion of strength, the exposure of health, and the languor of the succeeding day—these and other evils, connected with this amusement, are strong reasons for banishing it from the community. But dancing ought not therefore to be proscribed. On the contrary, balls should be discouraged for this among other reasons, that dancing, instead of being a rare pleasure, requiring elaborate preparation, may become an every-day amusement, and may mix with our common intercourse. This exercise is among the most healthful. The body as well as the mind feels its gladdening influence. No amusement seems more to have a foundation in our nature. The animation of youth naturally overflows in harmonious movements. The true idea of dancing entitles it to favor. Its end is, to realize perfect grace in motion; and who does not know that a sense of the graceful is one of the higher faculties of our nature? It is to be desired that dancing should become too common among us to be made the object of special preparation, as in the ball; that members of the same family, when confined by unfavorable weather, should recur to it for exercise and exhilaration; that branches of the same family should enliven in this way their occasional meetings; that it should fill up an hour in all the assemblages for relaxation, in which the young form a part. It is to be desired that this accomplishment should be extended to the laboring classes of society, not only as an innocent pleasure, but as a means of improving the manners.—Why shall not gracefulness be spread through the whole community? From the French nation we learn that a degree of grace and refinement of manners may pervade all classes. The philanthropist and Christian must desire to break down the partition walls between human beings in different conditions, and one means of doing this is to remove the conscious awkwardness which confinement to laborious occupations is apt to induce. An accomplishment, giving free and graceful movement, though a far weaker bond than intellectual or moral culture, still does something to bring those who partake it near each other.—Dr. Channing.

MUSIC.

It is now proposed that this shall be made a regular branch in our schools, and every friend of the people must wish success to the experiment. I am not now called to speak of all the good influences of music, particularly of the strength which it may and ought to give to the religious sentiment and to all pure and generous emotions. Regarded merely as a refined pleasure, it has a favorable bearing on public morals. Let taste and skill in this beautiful art be spread among us, and every family will have a new resource; home will gain a new attraction; social intercourse will be more cheerful; and an innocent public amusement will be furnished to the community. Public amusements, bringing multitudes together to kindle with one emotion, to share the same innocent joy, have a humanizing influence; and among these bonds of society, perhaps no one produces so much unmingled good as music. What a fulness of enjoyment has our Creator placed within our reach, by surrounding us with an atmosphere which may be shaped into sweet sounds. And yet this goodness is almost lost upon us, through want of culture of the organ by which this provision is to be enjoyed.—Ibid.

Dr. CHANNING, of Boston, in a recent discourse before the Massachusetts Temperance Society, said among other excellent things, "A people should be guarded against temptation to unlawful pleasures by furnishing the means of innocent ones. There is an amusement having an affinity with the drama, which might be usefully introduced among us—I mean recitation. A work of genius, recited by a man of fine taste, enthusiasm, and power of elocution, is a very pure and high gratification. Were this art cultivated and encouraged, great numbers, now insensible to the most beautiful compositions, might be waked up to their excellence and power. It is not easy to conceive of a more effectual way of spreading a refined taste through a community. The drama undoubtedly appeals more strongly to the passions than recitation; but the latter brings out the meaning of the author more. Shakespeare, worthily recited, would be better understood than on the stage. Then, in recitation, we escape the weariness of listening to poor performers, who, after all, fill up most of the time at the theatre. Recitation, sufficiently varied, so as to include pieces of chaste wit, as well as of pathos, beauty and sublimity, is adapted to our present intellectual progress as much as the drama falls below it. Should this exhibition be introduced among us successfully, the result would be, that the power of recitation would be extensively called forth, and this would be added to our social and domestic pleasures." Utica Observer.

DEATHS.

At the residence of his son-in-law, Mr. L. Parsons, in New-Hartford, May 24th, Mr. ABNER HOWE, aged 74 years.

Mr. H. was educated in the school of Calvinism, but some twenty-five years since, became a convert to the doctrine, and a member of the Unitarian church in Trenton, N. Y. He never relinquished the belief in endless punishment, though he selected a Universalist to perform the usual services at his funeral. He sustained a respectable moral character, and was emphatically a liberal Christian. Com.

At his residence, in Springfield, Otsego county, June 2d, Mr. EZRA STETSON aged 71 years. He was one of the oldest Universalists in the country, having professed that doctrine more than 35 years. He was also ardently attached to the society of Free-Masons, and was desirous that a Universalist clergyman who was a mason, should deliver the discourse at his funeral. In this his prayer was answered, and the sermon preached by Rev. S. Jones of Ellisburg. Mr. Stetson lived a worthy professor, and died in full faith of the salvation of all men.—Com.

While they were daily expecting her, they received the sad intelligence of her death. Miss P. was a worthy female, and respected by those who were acquainted with her. In early years, she became the subject of a religious excitement, but in maturer years she became more liberal in her religious opinions and attended the meetings of liberal Christians (Universalists.) She has left a numerous circle of friends to mourn her loss.

NUMBER 25.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

From the Millennial Harbinger.

No. 8.—Mr. Campbell to Mr. Skinner.

Dear Sir—Your favor reached me only per mail of yesterday, and to-day, the 30th of May, I hand my reply to the compositor. Having delayed the June number more than one week, in constant expectation of your reply, we are much behind our regular date, and are now hasting to send you a proof of my letter by the mail of the first of June. We hope not to be again detained by your ill health during the pending discussion.—You need not have "seriously regretted my not sending you a copy of my letter to Virginia agreeable [agreeably] to your request," till you knew what we had done and what letters we had received from you. Mr. Army, my faithful clerk and deputy post-master, had mailed for you no less than three numbers of the M. H.; besides one proof-sheet of my letter. All your directions were strictly obeyed. Your last letter received, requests, if before such a date it should arrive here, that a copy be sent you to Richmond: but your letter arrived not within the date prescribed—and therefore there was no fault, unless in obeying your instructions not to send after said date. So much for sincere regrets!

I have risen from the perusal of your epistle [No. 7.] with a higher esteem for your understanding, if not for your courteousness. Your compliance with my requests in stating the propositions to be discussed; your acceding to the evidence to be relied on; and in the main, your yielding to the rules to be observed, etc., shows that in your own good sense these preliminary arrangements are both necessary and proper. True, indeed, you comply not the most gracefully with those most reasonable requisitions. If you sincerely regarded these matters which are as universal as religious controversy, as "little quibbles and stratagems, those bandying of words about challenges, new and multiform questions for debate, unnecessary laws of evidence, rules of discussion," etc., etc., why did you finally come up to all these "little quibbles," etc., and show that you felt that they were not what your words represent them! I cannot, then, sincerely thank you for your very courteous apology for me in making my demand "an exception to my general character" of being "an honorable and high-minded Christian controversialist." I should sincerely regret for my reputation of being "an honorable and high-minded Christian controversialist" before the American community, if these demands were to constitute "an exception to my general character." No, indeed, I have never undertaken, and, I think, shall never undertake, a formal discussion without form, without the propositions in writing—the rules of discussion, and the evidence to be relied on.

Of a piece with your querulous notes about quibbles, etc., are your third, fourth, and fifth paragraphs about challenges. You admit that I did not give any challenge in this case, and that Mr. Montgomery REQUESTED a discussion! and that you have accepted his place; and therefore I do not care whether you call it invitation, suggestion, request, demand or challenge, so long as we understand whence it came and whither it aims. I choose to call it a challenge, and you may, as you are somewhat squeamish, call it "a modest request" on the part of Mr. Montgomery.

I received the other day a letter from Mr. Spencer, stating that I rightly viewed and represented his communication in my April letter to you; so that the challenge, or modest inquiry for a discussion, lies with Mr. Montgomery and the Universalists.

Your attempt at humor and wit in your strictures upon my gentle reprimand of Mr. Montgomery's "modest inquiry," is unworthy of a grave notice; for you evidently feel that it was uncalled for, and out of place. To such matters I will not reply. The pages of the past volumes of the Harbinger and the Christian Baptist will show how the Universalists have sought in years that are past to drag me into a controversy on their terms.

You are still more unfortunate and unsuccessful in your attempt to apologize for your having begun to write before I returned from the Cincinnati discussion, or had time to respond to your letter of December 23d. You were informed that I left home in December, and in all courtesy I expected you would wait till you heard from me, or of my return from the Roman Catholic discussion, before you began the controversy. Equally impertinent to the case is your question, Why did I not propose all the preliminaries to Mr. Montgomery? with whom I had never concluded to have a discussion, only on an alternative never anticipated. In all these shiftings and writhings and subsequent concession of all that I demanded, you only the more emphatically impress upon every man of sense your evident mortification in having so informally, illogically, and lawlessly rushed into the arena. And yet you would do yourself the injustice to appear as vaingloriously attributing my demand for rules of discussion to the "horror-smiting" efficacy of your letter of February 10th.

If, indeed, my good friend, your letter had any thing to do with these propositions, I do most sincerely assure you that its impotency, rather than its potency—its headless, pointless, wide-spreading declamation, rather than its logic or authority, would have suggested to me the necessity of an attempt to control your wanderings by putting into your mouth the bits of logic, and by throwing around your neck the reins of reason. For, Sir, I trust that I will yet (if you are candid) convince even yourself that there is not in said letter a single scripture quoted in its true meaning; or a single argument that will bear the line and plummet of sound sense and logical discretion. I know, Sir, how Universalists have generally managed their cause: but, if the Lord will, it shall not be so done with me on the present occasion. There must be something more solid than declamation, something more forcible than assertion, something more convincing than ad captandum appeals to the passions and sinister bias of ungodly men.—But, Sir, to conclude this point, all my discussions on important subjects are appealed to in disproof of all your excuses for yourself and your insinuations. My published debates are ample proof that I never engage in a debate without some propositions and rules of discussion. This fact alone dissipates all you have said on the "horror-smiting" impetus of your first epistle according to your esteem of it.

You say, "the discussion is opened:" certainly not by me! I therefore can not conceive on what fair principle you object to my closing it. Do you expect to open and close it too! But, no, you ingeniously say, neither shall close it! and you offer two choices to prevent either of us from closing it. One is to let it flicker out, like the expiring wick, till it comes to half a page of the Harbinger!—a monosyllable a-piece! The last words on each side, Victory is mine!! Do, then, let some other person shout it for you.

But, no, you will have each to write a finale, etc., to prevent—what? The bringing forth new arguments in the last speech. I will remove the reason for your alternatives, and of course you will not insist on such an unprecedented course. The rule is usual—it was observed by Bishop Purcell, Romish though he were, [was,] and without any demand on my part, save the reminding of him in my last speech of the oracle of reason and custom in such cases, which is that in the final address the respondent is not authorized to introduce new arguments or new topics. I trust, then, this will be satisfactory to you, and that you will not claim first the choice of a written rather than an oral discussion—then the choice of the propositions, and the choice of leading the way and of closing too!!! This is very honorable to Universalism, truly! You have made me respondent in the two first propositions, and yourself in the two last. I shall then expect that you conform to universal usage in all such cases, and allow me to respond to the close of the two last propositions.

I will split the difference with you as to the number of letters—say not less than twelve nor more than sixteen; and that he that wishes to extend it to sixteen, shall intimate it at the close of the eleventh. We shall call yours now before me the first, or if you will have it, yours of the 10th of February shall be first. These important preliminaries being adjusted, and, as I hope, satisfactorily, may I not add, with them shall terminate all those trifles, which indeed are mere quibbles or manoeuvres to save appearances, alike unmanly and undignified, and endeavor to interest our readers with matters more worthy of our pages and more deserving of their attention. I shall, with these wishes and expectations, proceed to the two propositions which you have sketched for me to affirm:

1st. You ask, "Are sheol, hades, and gehenna, (separately or together) ever used in the Scriptures to express a place or state of endless misery?"—Without the imputation of any sinister design on your part to inveigle me by the verbiage of your first thesis, I must beg leave to object to it as not fairly expressing any point at issue: for three reasons:

1st. You ask, "Are these three words, separately or together, used in Scripture to express a state of endless misery." I answer, They are never used together at all for any purpose whatever.

2d. They are noun-substantives, and if fairly rendered, can not express both the adjective endless and the substantive misery.

3d. In the third place, if the mere substantives sheol, hades, and gehenna, without any adjunct, did mean endless misery, or eternal wo, they would be insusceptible of the prefix aionios or any other adjective signifying eternal: for surely aionios hades or aionios gehenna, everlasting endless misery, would be too pleonastic for either Hebrew or Greek prose!

But if I may be allowed to construct out of your materials a proposition which I can logically and scripturally affirm, and on which, if you please, a fair issue can be formed, I submit the following thesis:—Sheol, hades, and gehenna are sometimes used in sacred Scripture to express a state of misery or punishment.

I shall not fatigue you or my readers with unnecessary proofs or long displays on any point. Neither reason nor logic demands it. A few instances, well selected and well sustained, is all that I shall, in ordinary cases, allege.

The proof in the case of sheol and hades.—Psalm ix: 17. "The wicked shall be turned into hell (sheol) and all the nations that forget God." The Septuagint of this passage is, "The wicked shall be turned into hell (hades) and all the nations that forget God." Mr. Balfour, who gives his sixty-four sheols from the Old Testament, says it is rendered by our translators three times pit, twenty-nine times grave, and thirty-two times hell. Grant it all: he also admits that hades is the fair and full Greek representative of sheol. Of course whatever the one signifies the other also signifies. This is as generally true in this case, as perhaps in any other. Well, then, in Psalm ix: 17, both hades and sheol represent not simply the grave, but hell or punishment. Can any one of an unbiased judgment imagine that here it simply means the grave? Then what is the difference between saying, "The wicked," etc., and the righteous shall be turned into hell and all the nations who remember God! This, on his hypothesis, is as true as what David said!

Prov. xxiii: 13, 14. "Withhold not correction from thy child: for if thou beatest him with the rod he shall not die. Thou shalt beat him with the rod, and shall deliver his soul from hell," (sheol), destruction or punishment, not simply the grave: for as dieth the worthless youth so dieth the virtuous.

Luke xvi: 23. "The rich man died, and in hell (hades) he lifted up his eyes being in torment."—Surely this is unequivocal proof that sheol, and hades its Greek representative, sometimes indicate a state of misery or punishment, which is all that I affirm.

It would indeed be supremely absurd, and no scholar ever did affirm, that either sheol or hades did necessarily signify endless misery; because sheol or hades is to be destroyed. Thus speaks John: "Death and hell (hades) were cast into the lake of fire: this is the second death." Rev. xx.

You ought, my dear sir, to have added to these two the word tartarus translated hell by the King's authority, and have left out gehenna for another category. It occurs but once; but it is in such a context as stereotypes its meaning. "If," says Peter, (2d epis. ii: 4.) "God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, (tartarus) and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment." Tartarus, then, represents that prison in hades in which Dives was tormented, and into which the wicked dead are "turned" when they are confined to the judgment of the great day.

But gehenna is a part of the subject of your proposition, and of course included in the predicate. Gehenna is a purely Hebrew word, compounded of Ge and Hinnom, the valley of Hinnom, a place near Jerusalem, sometimes called Tophet, and fully described Jer. 19th chap. and 7th v. 29th to the end. All intelligent Christians, long before the days of Universalism, knew that this valley was in the immediate vicinity of Jerusalem; that here the children of Israel greatly sinned in the cruel and abominable sacrifices offered to the idol god Moloch; that a constant fire was kept up in this place; and therefore no place could convey to a Jew a more lively view of misery and wretchedness than the valley of Hinnom. The torments inflicted in the valley of Hinnom, until the days of the Spanish Inquisition, were the most cruel in the annals of time. Hence it was first conspicuous as a place of temporal misery. Now if the future punishment of evil-doers should be set forth in human language, there was not, in all its wealth and fulness, any one term more fit to express it than the term gehenna. That it literally denoted a place of punishment, will not be controverted by you, Sir, any more than by Mr. Balfour: but that, like heaven, paradise, and many other important words, it began to be used figuratively as the doctrine of a future life was opened to the human understanding. That in the Scriptures it denotes future punishment, a punishment very different from that in the valley of Hinnom, is, I think, very evident from every place in which it is found in the New Testament: for in no case does it refer to the valley of Hinnom only as an illustration of a severer sentence, and this but once. But it is only necessary to my purpose that I prove that it sometimes denotes a state of misery or of punishment other than the literal flames of the valley of Hinnom. Of the twelve places in which it is found in the New Testament, every one might be appealed to; but, as my method is, I will cite one or two. Scribes and Pharisees, "how can you escape the damnation of hell?" (gehenna)—certainly not the fire of Tophet, or of the literal gehenna. Matt. xxiii: 33. Again—"Fear not them," says the Great Teacher, "fear not them who kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do: but fear him who when he has killed the body, has power to destroy both soul and body in hell," (gehenna.) Matt. x: 28, also, Luke xii: 5. Does not this unquestionably denote future punishment?—Hell, a Saxon word, be it observed, was once as rich in meaning, as sheol, hades, tartarus, and gehenna; for all these words have been translated by it. Hence hell signified once—the grave, the separate state, or the invisible world, and future punishment. Since the conflicts about purgatory, it has, for nearly two centuries, by the Protestant world, been exclusively appropriated to the place or state of future punishment of wicked men.—This being generally admitted by Universalists, I need not dwell upon it. The context alone is therefore the sovereign arbiter of the precise import of sheol, hades, and hell, in any given place. Gehenna and tartarus are never used but to denote punishment. They were two thousand years ago as firmly fixed to that sense, as the word hell is now amongst the Christians of the present day. If I mistake not Universalists admit this; consequently sheol and its representative hades never did, in the estimation of learned Christians, include more than that portion of the future state lying between the last breath and the first blast of the archangel's trumpet—the interval between death and judgment, or the state bounded by these two events. Therefore, they include both tartarus and paradise, the righteous and the wicked dead; and consequently only sometimes can they represent punishment; and for one great reason assigned, never can signify eternal or endless punishment. It is the province and the power of other words, adjuncts, and phrases to teach punishment without end. And when we shall have disposed of your three verbal propositions, this will, we have little doubt, be apparent to our most candid readers.

It avails nothing for you or your party to reply that Gehenna was the name of a place which once denoted temporal punishment or any inferior punishment, and for that reason can not represent misery of the most exquisite kind. This, I am aware, is a very fashionable species of logic amongst Universalists; but it wants alike the authority of the Bible and the laws of language. The Hebrew Shemim, the Greek Ouranos, and their English representative heavens, have all a literal and local meaning. They denote the regions of air, the expanse sometimes called firmament. Shall we thence affirm that in the universe, there is no other heaven than the air, or the sky, the azure vault, because the word heaven first of all had this sense and no other! Is not this the pith of the ten thousand columns written by your brethren upon the word Gehenna? I will not, however, anticipate you: but to save our paper and time, as well as the property of our readers, I will remind you and them, in confirmation of the above important fact that speaks volumes, that the Persian word paradise, once the name of that garden of Eden planted by God for the home of our first parents, (and also the name of the Persian Elysium,) continued not to be literally appropriated to that spot, any more than Gehenna to the vale of Hinnom. In the beautiful and bold imagery of Eastern style, it was soon transferred to the blissful abodes of happy spirits in the future world. So that Jesus promised the penitent thief a visit with him to Paradise; and Paul, caught away into Paradise, was so entranced that he never could tell whether he was in the body or out of the body till the day of his death. But this he remembered, that in Paradise he saw and heard things unspeakable in all the tongues of earth. Query—Were the penitent thief and the entranced Paul carried into the Persian Paradise, or to Adam's garden in Eden! Why, then, circumscribe the word Gehenna to the valley of Hinnom!!

Gehenna, then, like the words heaven and paradise, and many others, became at length according to the universal law of language, the instituted sign and name of a state of future punishment of the most terrific and appalling character—just as heaven and paradise in process of time became the instituted names and signs of future and eternal bliss. Mr. Balfour has in one volume given 254 pages on Gehenna. I can take his own logic and criticism, and in half the number prove there is no heaven.

From the proof already offered, may I not then conclude that sheol and hades, sometimes, and Gehenna and Tartarus generally, if not always in the same style, denote future punishment or misery, which is all that was proposed to be demonstrated in my first proposition.

The 2d proposition which you allege for me you have thus expressed: "Do the words olem aion, aionios, etc. when applied to the punishment of the wicked, mean duration without end?"

Even here you are too loose and illogical for my taste. I value my veracity at a higher rate than to affirm the truth of any proposition that ends with and so forth, etc. I have indeed heard of a person under oath, finishing his testimony with etc., etc., "and so forth, and so forth;" but then he was not a Limitarian, and of course his example could not be obligatory upon me in this case. From the verbiage of your proposition I infer that you admit, first, that the wicked are punished, and that this punishment is future; for in this proposition you only deny that the words, olem aion, aionios, etc., "when applied to the punishment of the wicked," mean that their punishment shall endure without end. You admit, moreover, and I am glad to observe it, that there are other words which denote the punishment of the wicked besides sheol, hades, gehenna; for you can no where find olem aion or aionios [aionios] applied to sheol, hades or gehenna!! You must then, on your own showing, affirm my first proposition, or you must admit that there are other words than Tartarus and Gehenna, which express the punishment of the wicked; for in the name of reason why deny that olem aion, and aionios, [aionios], "when applied to the punishment of the wicked," mean endless duration, if they are never so applied! Now, Sir, before I affirm or deny the second proposition, I request of you a list of those passages where olem aion, and aionios, [aionios], are applied to the punishment of the wicked, and then I will undertake to show that in such places olem aion, and aionios, [aionios] do mean duration without end. You certainly must be well acquainted with those passages where the punishment of the wicked is defined by such words, as you inform the public that you are prepared to show that in none of these passages do these words signify duration without end; or, that the punishment of the wicked shall be endless.—You will please be very precise in your enumeration of all those passages in which the punishment of the wicked is set forth in other terms than sheol, hades, tartarus, gehenna, and especially those places where olem aion, and aionios, [aionios], are applied to these words, or those other words which express the punishment of the wicked. Should you fail here, yourself and friends will appear in rather an unenviable attitude in the two propositions which you have agreed to negate and annul.

The concluding paragraphs of your epistle are reserved for another occasion. The sequel will, perhaps, furnish the best comment upon them.—Confidence in one's self, or in the goodness of one's cause, and the swaggering style of gasconade, are weak logic and easily rebutted. But, my good Sir, the dignity of the cause which I espouse commands a dignified defence, and therefore I can not descend to the playfulness or frivolity of every smart and piquant expression, which, in the exuberance of your fancy, you may deem amusing to your readers.

Since you have demanded the discussion of three propositions about words, and only one upon the thing itself, I will aim at the utmost brevity in the support of those two propositions which I affirm; so that we may be detained for as short time as possible in the portico of the discussion. I already perceive that your own scheme will comprehend all the points suggested in my April letter.

This communication exceeds 6 pages bourgeois, because we are still on the preliminaries, and because you yet occupy in the Harbinger some pages in advance of me. When we are equal in words or in space, and when the preliminaries (as I trust they will be in your next) are approbated by you and finally concluded, we shall be circumscribed to the six pages proposed; for reasons already suggested. With all due respect etc.,

A. CAMPBELL.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

No. 9.—Mr. Skinner to Mr. Campbell.

DEAR SIR—Your June letter has this day come to hand; and for the promptness with which you have furnished me with the proof you will please accept my thanks. By your first paragraph it appears that you were not in fault that I did not receive your April letter while in Virginia; but the whole is to be charged to the extreme tardiness of the mails.

In your second paragraph you seem to think me wanting in courteousness and grace in my manner of acceding to your requisitions relative to the propositions to be discussed, the evidence and rules to be regarded in the discussion, etc., and you think such compliance on my part evidence that I considered such preliminaries "both necessary and proper." In answer to this, my dear Sir, I will simply remark that, as nearly one-half of your letter was occupied with an unsuccessful attempt to show that you had been challenged, and with expressions of astonishment or reproach that I had so hastily rushed into the arena of combat, it did appear to me very much like quibbling and stratagem to evade the real subject of controversy, and bandying of words about challenges, altogether unbecoming the honorable and high-minded Christian controversialist. The requisition for the propositions for discussion appeared to me both puerile and captious, for the reason that they had already been on the carpet of investigation for months, nay, more than a year. And the rules of evidence, and rules for the discussion, (excepting those proposed for fixing the length and manner of closing it,) being in general unexceptionable, and such as all honorable Christian controversialists would be likely to regard just as well without as with a written agreement, I considered entirely unnecessary to be obtruded into what ought to have been a part of the discussion itself. And because I acceded to these, you consider it evidence that I regarded all you had said on those topics as "necessary and proper." Your logic here must be peculiar to yourself.

We will not quarrel about any "attempts at humor and wit" nor about your "gentle reprimand of Mr. Montgomery's 'modest inquiry.'" If you had thought such things "unworthy of a grave notice" at an earlier day, or before the public had witnessed the boastful pretensions on your part, it would have saved you from the mortification you now evidently feel.

One can not but smile at your sixth paragraph, in which you speak of my "unsuccessful attempt to apologize" and my "evident mortification in having so informally, illogically and lawlessly rushed into the arena." Apologize? Sir, I apologize! for what? Why, for having promptly fulfilled my promise, my positive engagement, and published, as I told you I would in February, 1837, my reply to yours in the Harbinger just one year before that, viz. in February, 1836.—Wonderful precipitancy! Do you think you will ever be guilty of such an act—the prompt fulfilling of an engagement with Universalists? I begin seriously to doubt it, unless the "bits" of truth can be put "into your mouth," "the reins" of constraint "around your neck," and the spurs of compulsion applied to your sides. No, Sir, I have no apology to make for promptly meeting my engagements. I informed you in November last, that I would commence the publication of the discussion as soon as your convenience would allow you to attend to it. You answered in the same month that you would probably be absent from home from the first of January to the first of February, but said nothing about any preliminaries being necessary, other than the articles already before the public. I then informed you when I would commence, and have kept my word; and not a syllable did I receive from you notifying me that you would not be ready to respond immediately after the first of February, though my February letter probably did not reach your place of residence till past the middle of that month.

Your affected sneers at the "impotency" of my February letter, your calling it "headless, pointless, wide-spreading declamation," saying "there is not in said letter a single scripture quoted in its true meaning, or a single argument that will bear the line and plummet of sound sense and logical discretion," may pass with our readers for what they are worth—bare unsupported assertions. I suppose, however, you think them very "gracefully" made, and with the climax of "courteousness." It is however, much more convenient for some men to make assertions than to prove them. But, Sir, "there must be something more solid than declamation, more forcible than assertion, more convincing than ad captandum appeals to the passions and sinister bias of ungodly men," or, I may add, the prejudices of the followers of a professed reformer to whom and to whose opinions many of them are as closely wedded as a Romanist ever was to the Pope. You promise hereafter to say something towards convincing the public and even myself of the truth of your assertions. Well, Sir, the sooner the better. I pray you may at least attempt it without further delay.

Your objections to both the alternatives I proposed for closing the discussion clearly evince your unwillingness to meet me on fair and equal grounds, and your apparent intention of evading the discussion unless you can get decidedly the advantage in the arrangements for it. You attempt to ridicule the alternative of gradually reducing the letters in length till they come down to half a page in the Harbinger, and call this but a "monosyllable a-piece." If, Sir, the Harbinger contains but two syllables to the page, it is a smaller concern than I had hitherto regarded it. But why you should object to the other alternative, of closing it by a simultaneous finale from each, I can not conceive, unless it be for the purpose of of getting decidedly the advantage. Why should you object to it any more than you did to Bishop Purcell's proposal for an appendix to the Catholic discussion? Can you not use your six pages to as good advantage as I can mine? Then it must either be from a deficiency of talents, or the badness of your cause. Even this proposal of mine will be more advantageous to you than to me, because it will be allowing you twelve pages to my six, after my last of the controversy proper.

In reply to your sophistical insinuation that I "claim first the choice of a written rather than an oral discussion—then the choice of the propositions, and the choice of leading the way, and of closing too," I will simply remark, that the choice or alternative of an oral discussion was not given me till after the agreement for a written discussion had been entered into; the choice of the propositions was not mine, for they had been already under discussion over a year; as to my "leading the way," after the agreement for my continuing the controversy had been entered into, I think it was very necessary somebody should do it, and I am fully confident you never would have done it; and as to closing it, I allow you quite as large a share in that as I claim myself. You must, I think, mean the reverse of what you say, when you state that I have made you the respondent in the two first propositions and myself in the two last. For I suppose he who has the negative of a given proposition, is respondent to him who has the affirmative. But as each of us has two affirmatives and two negatives, and as I have shown that neither myself nor Mr. Montgomery challenged you to a controversy, and moreover as my proposal still gives you the last letter of the controversy proper, before the finale from each, I do insist that no reasonable man can ask more of another than I concede to you.

I accede to your proposal concerning the number of letters, excepting that I would have them begin and be numbered from the time you shall agree that the preliminaries are settled—the next letter after which shall be called No. 1, or if you make no more demurring, this letter shall be called No. 1. May I not then even hope for this, and that already have terminated, "all those trifles, which indeed are mere quibbles and manœuvres to save appearances, alike unmanly and undignified!" and that henceforth our readers will all be edified "with matters more worthy of our pages and more deserving of their attention!" I most heartily respond your expressed wishes and hopes on this subject.

I now come to notice what you say upon the first two propositions for discussion. But, really Sir, I was not prepared to expect so sudden a relinquishment, or backing out on your part, from the first proposition, and what I had been given to expect you regarded as one of your strongest holds—one of your most inaccessible and invulnerable fastnesses. You now concede even more than I had ever before supposed or claimed that you had conceded, or would concede. True, you do it in such a way as to save appearances all you possibly can. You begin by complaining of my verbiage in wording the first proposition.

You object first to the phrase "separately or together" which I had included in a parenthesis, because you say of sheol, hades and gehenna, "they are never used together at all." Very well, then leave out the parenthesis: I only added it for your benefit to give you the wider scope, and allow you the privilege, if you could not prove your doctrine by one of the words (sheol, hades or gehenna.) in any one passage, of doing it by all those words in a connected view of all the passages where they occur.

Your second objection contains the broad concession before adverted to, viz. That these words (sheol, hades and gehenna.) "are noun-substantives; and if fairly rendered, can not express both the adjective endless and substantive misery." Of course, then, neither word can express endless misery. Why, then, my dear Sir, did you blame me in your April letter for taking your concession to "Spencer" as a frank and bona fide concession, or giving up of these words, "as being in themselves insufficient to teach the doctrine of endless misery?" You seemed to take great umbrage that I took that concession as in earnest, and said it was not so intended, but was only made "to save time and labor." I then gave you the liberty of taking it back, and put the proposition in form for you to defend, what I supposed to be, your view of the words. But behold, you have made the concession a second time, and in still broader terms!—You have driven the nail through, and even clenched it on the other side! You now not only declare that these words, (rendered hell in our version of the Bible,) "if fairly rendered, can not express both the adjective endless and the substantive misery," but in a subsequent part of your letter you say "you can nowhere find olem, aion or aionios, [aionios] applied to sheol, hades or gehenna!" Hear it, O ye heavens! Listen, O earth! Let the world take knowledge of it! Let it be recorded in a book, and never forgotten!—The Rev. Alexander Campbell states, in a set controversy with a Universalist, that sheol, hades and gehenna, if fairly rendered, can not express endless misery of themselves, or without an adjunct;—and that we can nowhere find olem, aion or aionios (his favorite terms for expressing endless) applied to sheol, hades or gehenna!

Our labor, therefore, would seem by this to be concluded so far as these words are concerned.—For you can never hereafter predicate the doctrine of endless misery from the force of any or all of these words. Hence your third objection to my form of the question is altogether gratuitous.

The proposition you are disposed to substitute for the one I proposed, is in all conscience, singular enough for a Partialist gravely to propose for discussion with a Universalist! "Sheol, hades and gehenna, are sometimes used in sacred Scripture to express a state of misery or punishment." Verily, Sir, your courage has risen to a wonderful pitch.—You are not afraid to take the affirmative of, what may almost be denominated a truism, a proposition which no enlightened Universalist or Christian of any denomination, ever questioned or doubted for one moment!

All your labor Sir, in attempting to prove the truth of the above proposition, is entirely the work of supererogation. For I as firmly believe as you do or can, that sheol, hades and gehenna are sometimes used in sacred Scripture to express a state of misery or punishment. It would be infidelity or madness to affect to disbelieve it. And here I might in perfect justice to the subject leave the matter, so far as those words are concerned, and neither notice any of your proof texts, nor allow the subject to be again broached during the pendency of this discussion, for you have conceded all that I ask. But as a matter of courtesy to you and our readers, I will make a few remarks on the words rendered hell, and the passages you quote containing them.

1. The Hebrew sheol and Greek hades, more properly signifies a state or condition than a place. It signifies, first, literally and commonly, the state or condition (or if you please, the place) of the dead in general, irrespective of their goodness or badness, their happiness or misery. Secondly, in a figurative sense, severe judgments, great afflictions, sudden temporal destruction. Thirdly, in a moral and figurative sense, a distressing sense of guilt, remorse of conscience, great mental anguish. In the second or third of the foregoing senses, or perhaps both, does David use the word in Psalm ix: 17,—"The wicked shall be turned into hell and all the nations that forget God." See and read from the 15th to the 20th verses inclusive, which shows this to be his meaning. In a similar sense also is it used in Prov xxiii: 14, and Luke xvi: 23, the other two passages you quote in which the word is found. In the third or last sense the Psalmist uses the word in Ps. lxxxvi: 13, and cxvi: 3. "Thou hast delivered my soul from the lowest hell!"—"The pains of hell gat hold upon me." See also Jonah ii: 2.

You say I ought to have added tartarus to the other two words. I saw no necessity for it, inasmuch as the word occurs but once in the whole Bible, and then in a passage of very doubtful import. (2 Pet. ii: 4.) The case is only a suppositious one, referred to, not for the purpose of giving any new information, but to illustrate an argument of the apostle. He does not inform, nor can we ascertain who or what the "angels" were to whom he refers. Most likely he refers to some Heathen tradition, some apocryphal book, or some fable or story familiar to those whom he addressed, without either affirming or denying its truth, for the sake of illustrating and enforcing the fact that there was a righteous overruling Providence that would equitably reward the righteous and punish the guilty. But, Sir, if there had been an apparent necessity for including tartarus with the other words, that necessity is now removed by your own concessions. For according to your own definition of it, tartarus only represents a part of hades; and you say "hades is to be destroyed." Of course, tartarus will then exist no longer.

With your definition of the origin and primary meaning of gehenna, I fully concur. But I do not agree with you that all intelligent Christians knew where gehenna was "long before the days of Universalism," for the very obvious reason that I consider the days of Universalism coeval with the days of Christianity, and its doctrine identical with the latter.

I agree with you that generally, (though not always,) the word gehenna in the New Testament is used not in its primary and literal, but in a figurative or metaphorical sense. What that figurative sense is, I think has been very clearly shown by Mr. Balfour in his First Inquiry. You are careful, however, not to inform your readers of the sense in which he has shown that our Saviour used the word: but you have set up your own unsupported assumption that it figuratively set forth a place or state of future punishment—i. e. (as you undoubtedly mean, if you use the phrase in its present popular sense) punishment in another state of being. Now, my good friend, although so far as this controversy and its results are concerned, I would not have the least objection to conceding such a doctrine, yet as such a conclusion is not in your premises, and I do not choose to allow assumption, to take the place of argument, nor assertion that of proof, I shall wholly object to that kind of procedure.

If mankind generally were liable to gehenna punishment in another state of being, how will you account for the well known fact that neither Christ nor his apostles ever preached gehenna fire, or gehenna punishment, to any but Jews?—that none of them ever preached or lisped a syllable of it to Gentiles or authorized others to do it?—that no Gentile is ever threatened with it in all the Scriptures? Mr. Balfour has not only admitted that the word gehenna is used figuratively to express the most dreadful punishments, but has actually shown what those punishments were, viz. the woes that were to befall the Jewish nation at the destruction of their city, their temple, their theocracy, etc., etc., when they were to experience such tribulation as there had never been since the beginning of the world, and such as there never should be after that time. Matt. xxiv: 21. Such woes as Moses had predicted should come upon the children of Israel in case of their continued iniquity and disregard of the laws of God. Deut. from ch. xxviii: 15, to xxxii, inclusive. See similar punishments spoken of in Ezek. xxii: 18-22, and other parallel passages. The first proof text you quote, is, in connexion with its context, clearly indicative of this sense and use of gehenna.

"Fill ye up then," (says Christ, verses 31-36,) "the measure of your fathers. Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers! how can ye escape the damnation of hell? Wherefore, behold I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes: and some of them ye shall kill and crucify; and some of them shall ye scourge in your synagogues, and persecute them from city to city: that upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel to the blood of Zecharias son of Barachias whom ye slew between the temple and the altar. Verily I say unto you, all these things shall come upon this generation." Add to the explicitness of the above language, the fact that the very next verse commences the pathetic lamentation of Jesus over the doomed city, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem," etc., and can any sane and enlightened mind doubt for one moment, that by the "damnation of hell" (gehenna), our Saviour here intended to express the approaching temporal woes of the Jews, and the desolation and destruction of their city?

The other passage you cite to prove your views, (Matt. x: 28, with its parallel Luke xii: 5,) is probably one of the most plausible ones for your purpose that you could have found in the whole New Testament. But before it can be allowed as affording any proof of your views, I wish you to answer a few questions concerning it. What is the being or power, the disciples of Christ (for they are the persons addressed) are exhorted to fear? Are you certain it is God? Does not the context indicate a different power? Are not the disciples particularly called "friends," and after being exhorted to "fear him, which, after he hath killed, hath power to cast into hell," are they not immediately exhorted to repose confidence and trust in God instead of being frightened at the thought of his power?—thus, "Are not five sparrows sold for two farthings, and not one of them is forgotten before God? But even the very hairs of your head are all numbered. FEAR NOT THEREFORE: ye are of more value than many sparrows." Might not the Saviour have intended that power (the Roman) that was to be employed in the overthrow and destruction of Jerusalem? What is meant by the word soul in Matthew? Luke does not use the word soul at all. Was he deficient in expressing our Saviour's meaning? Or, is the word soul in Matt. used expletively, as in some other passages? (See Matt. ii: 20; vii: 25; Rom. xiii: 1; 1 Pet. iii: 20; where it is used either expletively, or else simply to express person,) and as is used the word body in various places? (See Rom. vi: 6; vii: 24; Col. ii: 11; and many other texts.)

Again, granting that the power to be feared was that of God himself, and also that the soul was the surviving spirit or immortal part of man, (which you have made no effort to prove,) what follows? Why, not necessarily the conclusion that any one would actually be destroyed in gehenna; but only that God had the power to destroy them, the same as he had the power to raise up children to Abraham from the literal stones of the field. But suppose him not only to possess the power, but actually to exercise it, and literally to destroy both soul and body in the hell that you believe in—What follows? Why not endless misery, surely, not the preserving of the soul to endure ceaseless torment, but the destruction of the soul—of course the cessation of its happiness and misery—and the annihilation or destruction of the material body of flesh and bones in hell! Therefore, the text in this view would disprove, instead of proving endless misery.

You object to the second proposition on account of the suffix "and so forth." Very well, Sir, then leave it off. I have no desire it should be there—it was only added for your benefit, to give you the greater scope; though by it I only meant all the forms and variations, of aion—whether Hebrew, Greek or English, substantive or adjective, singular or plural—and I presume my readers all understood this to be my intention.

But of all the strange requisitions that I ever knew to be made by any reputable theological controversialist, your demand is the strangest, that I should furnish you with "a list of all those passages where olem, aion and aionos [aionios] are applied to the punishment of the wicked," before you can be prepared to "affirm or deny the second proposition," or "undertake to show that in such places olem, aion and aionios do mean duration without end!" Although you have heretofore affirmed it substantially and made an unsuccessful effort to establish it! Verily, Sir, a new era has arrived in theological controversy, when the respondent to a proposition has not only to negative the proposition and arguments of his opponent, but is also called upon to furnish all the materials and weapons in his power to enable his opponent to sustain his side, or the affirmative of the question! Your earnest calls for mercy and help on this subject at the hand of your opponent, may possibly be construed by some into a cry for quarter. I will not, however, so regard it. But, Sir, it is not my business to do your work for you. Yours is the affirmative of this question—yours the labor of proving it. It is not my business to furnish you with a list of passages where those words are found and applied to the punishment of the wicked. If those passages are to your purpose, it is your business to look them up and apply them: and, may I not hope, kind Sir, that you will soon be about it?

Yours, very respectfully, D. SKINNER.

THE CAUSES OF INFIDELITY REMOVED.....NO. V.

BY S. R. SMITH.

INNATE DEPRAVITY.

Among the doctrines which have generally prevailed, and which have been long considered of paramount importance in the Christian church, there are several which have no doubt exerted much influence in forcing men into infidelity. Unfortunately, these have been commonly overlooked by their advocates, in the discussion of the great question respecting the truth of divine revelation. And we are satisfied, that until these doctrines are entirely expunged from the symbols of the church, those who advocate them will never be able to maintain, if a successful, an effectual war with infidelity. They will raise up ten unbelievers for every one whom they convert; and thus continue the unwilling instruments of the infidelity which they vainly endeavor to suppress. For that the unbelief of Hume, Gibbon, Volney, Boulanger, Paine and Palmer, and a host of others, has its foundation in the popular dogmas which have been incorporated with the truths of Christianity, is very evident from their points of attack upon its principles and truths.

Much, therefore, as it stands the unbeliever in hand to examine the premises on which he founds his infidelity, it is no less important that the professor of the popular Christianity, should very carefully review his creed, "lest haply he be found to fight against God." He may be assured, that whatever in his religious opinions, is incompatible with the character of a wise, equitable and benevolent Deity—whatever is inconsistent with the known abilities and moral perceptions of man, so far from exerting a favorable influence upon the truths of Christianity, will most assuredly encourage infidelity. This fact has been long and deeply deplored by Universalists, and they have exerted a respectable influence in staying this moral plague. And they have done this, while their fellow Christians have stigmatized them with every name of reproach—especially with that of being infidels. That denomination has, however, taken its place between the systems of corrupted Christianity, and a cold and deadly skepticism; and has thus far assisted in reclaiming unbelievers, by restoring to the church a more consistent view of the Gospel. This accounts for the course we have adopted in these articles—and will also explain why we continue to notice those particular doctrines which appear to constitute a part, at least, of the causes of modern infidelity.

Among the prevailing doctrines maintained by professing Christians, which have probably led men into skepticism or open infidelity, must be reckoned that of the entire vitiation of man's moral nature. This doctrine is not content with supposing him incompetent to perform any thing good—it considers him "wholly inclined to all that is evil." And thus, the last vestige of the divine likeness, is not only expelled from the moral character and nature of man, but it invests him with dispositions and even habits that are truly diabolical. It is to make man an incarnation of iniquity, fit only "for treasons, stratagems and spoils" while here on earth, and an equally meet associate for infernal spirits in the world to come.

We have had occasion to allude to this terrible view of the human character before, as among the immediate and influential causes of the imperfection of Christian morality. And we yet think that such is its natural and unavoidable tendency. If both parents and teachers agree in calling a child, a fool, no person can doubt that as soon as the child himself believes it, he will act like one. Nor ought we to wonder, that those who are taught from infancy, that they are naturally as wicked as the devils, should, when old enough to believe their teachers, act up to their views of "poor human nature." We would by no means insinuate that those who believe this doctrine are thus wicked—most hearts are too good to be wholly ruined by such a creed; and there is luckily, too much good sense left in the world, to admit of these views being carried into practice. But these are restraining causes, which by no means destroy the actual influence of those opinions.

Let a man divest himself of the predilections which early and habitual views of this subject inspire—and then let him be told, that it is an important item in the Christian revelation that man is "totally averse to all that is good, and wholly inclined to all that is evil;" and depend upon it, he will not believe the statement. But his astonishment will be unutterable, when he is further told, that all this is not in consequence of any act of his own, but results by imputation from the sin of the first father of his race. He must be a very extraordinary man, who thus situated, would not suppose himself trifled with, or abused. Instead of believing, he would think it quite as absurd as any other conjecture of human weakness, and altogether too inconsistent to be ascribed to divine revelation. And he would argue—that a God of benevolence could not inflict such evils upon the unoffending, nor one of wisdom, reveal a system so utterly at variance with human experience.

But the difficulties of this unfortunate system of natural depravity, instead of diminishing, are continually augmented and accumulated by every new examination. And this, whether regarded in the light of reason, or of revelation. If this is sustained, we shall cease to wonder that those who rely more upon their powers of discrimination, than upon the exercise of those powers in the actual investigation of truth, should reject both the doctrine of man's entire corruption, and the Scriptures which are supposed to teach that ungracious dogma. To believe that it is true is probably beyond the ability of any one who carefully examines the grounds of his opinions—to believe that it is a part of the great system of divine revelation, is equally impossible when the Bible shall be examined without the stupefying influence of a cherished and popular creed.

Let reason be asked, whether there is any evidence in the moral world, that the sins of one individual constitute any other person either sinful or guilty? There is—and there can be but one answer—that those who have not actually sinned, are neither guilty of crime, nor deserving of punishment. Every person feels this, acts upon it—and all human institutions recognize its propriety. What people, with any pretensions to a regular system of jurisprudence, punishes the child for the sin of the parent? What civil code, that will permit the punishment of the unoffending for the guilty? None—except, perhaps, where the will of some petty tyrant is the law of the land—nor even there, unless in the moment of unguarded and uncontrolled passion, or under some peculiar provocation. The common sense of mankind—of all who have paid any attention to civil policy and individual right, has long since determined that children are not culpable for the follies and crimes of their parents. The doctrine of original and total moral depravity, consequently stands opposed to the universal practice of mankind—a practice founded upon the dictates of reason and humanity. And he who believes that dogma, is reduced to the necessity of violating the suggestions of reason for the sake of his creed.

And it may surely be asked, how mankind came to make such benevolent arrangements in their social relations, if they were wholly incapable of any thing good—if they could only think and act wrong, and that continually? It surely will not be pretended, that minds purified from this original contamination, have laid the foundation of the civil institutions in every land. So far from this, if their views were acted upon, they would soon erase the marks of benignity impressed upon national policy and laws, and cover the face of the whole earth with the abominations of a system alike foreign to truth, and corrupting to virtue.

If we contemplate man individually, we shall find still clearer evidences of the moral constitution of his race. Admit, if you please, that there is much to deplore, much that is truly and dreadfully evil. But is it now—or has it ever been wholly so? Has there been nothing but crime, and violence, and blood? The answer is, that great and manifold as have been the evils—there is, and always has been much good, and probably more good than evil in the conduct of man.—The social relations—the domestic charities have been universally cherished; and the holy affections and sympathies which bind heart to heart, and that find their office and employment in the "weal or woe" of kindred nature, have watched at the pillow of distress and wiped away the tear of anguish and sorrow—or given new and inspiring impulses to human comfort and joy. The common bonds of society have been sustained—the rights of property, of liberty and life have been commonly respected, and to some extent enjoyed, and truth, justice and benignity have generally marked the intercourse between man and man. All this is notoriously true, and obvious to every mind—bad as the world really is. And the perception of this, has induced many otherwise candid and well-disposed persons, to reject the doctrine of the native depravity of man—and with it, the Bible, from which they presumed it was legitimately drawn.

Let us then inquire, if the Bible teaches the doctrine of the entire and original corruption of human nature? If it does thus teach, then it is of course a subject of divine revelation—if that book does not teach that doctrine, then the popular views of human depravity are as plainly of human invention. Take, then, the history of the first recorded sin, and of its punishment, which may fairly be supposed to involve all the consequences which the Deity intended should result to mankind; and it will be found that not a soul of all the unborn race of Adam, is in any respect implicated, or so much as named. Such is the penalty annexed to the offence—"thou shalt surely die," and the punishment inflicted was—"in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread till thou return unto the ground, for out of it wast thou taken; for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." Now who could infer from this, that the sin of the first man involved the entire corruption and guilt of all his race? We venture to say, that no one can extract such an inference by any process of torture to which he may subject the passage! And the same is true of every other text, quoted with a view to support the doctrine of inherent and total depravity. While on the contrary, there are passages which assert that "every man shall die for his own sins,—the son shall not bear the iniquity of the father, neither shall the father bear the iniquity of the son."—And again, "death passed upon all men," not because the first man transgressed—but, because "all have sinned."

It is not to be denied, that the actions of parents greatly influence the circumstances of their children—a fact that is recognized by the Bible. But who ever supposed, because an ignorant or vicious parent might involve his offspring in ignorance, and perhaps even in vice, that therefore the child was criminal by the mere imputation of his father's iniquity? So far from this, they are rather the objects of pity and commiseration on account of their misfortunes, than of blame for vices over which they could have no control. And who of all the multitudes of sufferers from these causes, ever felt the least guilt or compunction of conscience—however much of shame and mortification he may have endured, for the sins of his predecessors? This also explains one important passage of Scripture, in which it is said that God visits "the iniquities of the fathers upon the children, and upon the children's children, unto the third and to the fourth generation." Here was a fair occasion to have asserted the doctrine of the universal and eternal corruption of the human race by the single act of their primogenitor—had it been true: instead of which, be the consequences less or more, they are limited to some three or four generations.

It has now been shown, that the doctrine of the total moral depravity of mankind is neither agreeable with reason and experience, nor taught in the Bible. What great credit is due the unbeliever, for discovering that it is not one of common sense? He has not yet learned that it is not maintained in that book, which all Christians receive as a record of divine revelation. In this respect, he is truly orthodox—for he believes as firmly as any advocate for the inherent corruption of mankind, that this horrid libel upon moral nature is a part of Scripture instruction. And he believes this, for the very same reason that thousands of Christian professors do—because he has neither the disposition to adopt, nor the patience and industry to pursue, the measures which would insure correct information. Having principally to do with those whose creed compelled them to concede the point—the skeptic turned infidel at once; and took for granted the question at issue, which his own candor should induce him to examine with special care. And it is matter of equal astonishment, that one believes this strange and degrading hypothesis, to be a part of divine truth, and the other rejects the Bible because that book is supposed to teach it; and that all this is believed or disbelieved, while no good evidence exists that either has very carefully examined the subject.

The unbeliever should know, that there are many sincere believers in the truth of divine revelation, who have no evidence that the Bible teaches the doctrine of original and total depravity, and who consequently do not believe that doctrine. And if they are correct—and the writer of this verily believes they are—then that doctrine is not the fault of the Bible, but of some of its interpreters. Hence, the skepticism to which it may have given rise, is not to be charged upon the Bible, but to those who maintain it in opposition to the teachings of that book. That doctrine was unknown to the primitive Christians—it was unknown at the commencement of the Pelagian controversy, near the end of the fourth century, and its rudiments were then first asserted by St. Augustine. That great man, in order to maintain the very different hypothesis, that baptism washed away sins, found himself compelled to assert, that even infants had received an original taint from Adam, and needed purification in order to fit them for heaven. From that time to the reformation, the complete dominion of popery fostered the growth of everything monstrous and absurd in the doctrines of the church; and the labors of the reformers, were very naturally directed to the correction of more tangible corruptions. By their means, the Bible was once more restored to the laity, and an examination of its teachings, irrespective of the canons of papacy, has gradually exploded a number of dogmas held sacred by the church, and which it is found that the word of Scripture does not authorize.

Thus falls another pillar in the temple of infidelity. And if it should happen that the Bible should be found to hold no doctrine at which either reason or humanity revolts, we do not see but every unbeliever must become a convert to its truth, or forever forfeit, even in his own estimation, his claim to the exercise of reason.—And we can not but hope, that his “reasoning pride” may in this case, have some influence upon his proverbial obstinacy,—and induce him to change his ground, when he can no longer consider himself wise by attempting its defence.

REMARKS.

Under the gracious smiles of high Heaven, and the good providence of our God, we met and emphatically enjoyed a season of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. Our delegation we feel gratified in saying was nearly full, and peace and harmony characterized the deliberations of the Council. The only thing unpleasant was, that in the afternoon of the last day, all could not find admittance into our house of worship to hear the profitable sermon and addresses of Br. Skinner, but we learn that such as were deprived of this privilege were highly entertained by an interesting discourse preached by Br. Grosh near the church, at the same time.

Our preachers delivered their messages of truth and grace with power. The tear of thanksgiving and joy started from its secret home, and filled the eye of every auditor, and we solemnly believe that much good was done in the name of Jesus. The kindness and hospitality of our brethren and friends in Newport, are remembered with gratitude, and we pray that the blessing of their Father and God may rest upon them. Per order,

W. H. WAGGONER.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JUNE 23, 1837.

THE IMMUTABLE STANDARD.

I was much struck with the observation of a writer against Mahomedanism, that it granted license, on particular occasions, to do what it condemned in general as highly criminal and wrong. For instance—though it condemned incest, yet did it allow to Mahomet the choice of wives from his nearest connexions—thus granting a license to sin to the very person who, of all others, should have been most harmless and undefiled.

The writer in question argued that this fact alone disproved the divinity of Mahomed's mission and revelations, because it virtually denied the immutable nature of virtue and vice, and their irrecusable opposition to each other. In contrast therewith he was pleased to array Christianity, which allows not of expediency or policy as the test of virtue, nor grants privileges to its teachers in the commission of things forbidden to its followers generally. He further added that, according to Christianity, virtue had an everlasting nature, unalterable as the fountain of all goodness and truth from which it issued.

The substance of his remarks made a powerful impression on my mind. With that ready discernment which often leads us to see the mote in another's eye, even while we overlook the beam in our own, I saw that he had laid down a rule for judging what is true and what is false, which must inevitably and forever shatter every system of Partialism that could be devised by man.

If God is the author of all truth, and the fountain from whence issues all goodness and virtue, and if virtue and vice, good and evil are unalterable in their several natures and differences—then human virtue must be of the same nature as divine virtue, (if I may so speak,) and what God has pronounced wrong in man to do, must forever be wrong in God to perform. Hence the code of morality established in God's revelation for man's obedience, is, in fact, nothing more nor less than a limited code of those laws on which and by which God himself conducts towards his moral universe. Consequently—as it would be utterly wrong in man not to love his enemy, God being the lawgiver and the judge, it follows that God loves his enemies—always did and always will love them. And as God has commanded us to love our enemies by doing them good, and not evil—by benefiting them as we have opportunity, and not by needlessly afflicting them—it follows as a necessary consequence that God did, does, and ever will love his enemies by doing them good, and not evil—by benefiting them as he has opportunity, and not by needlessly afflicting them—for “love worketh no ill to his neighbor.”

Now as endless misery can not benefit those who suffer it, it follows, in conclusion, that God will not endlessly punish any of his enemies. Thus you see that virtue and vice are unalterable in their nature by whomsoever they may be exercised—that they are not convertible—and that while they exist, they will remain the opposites of each other to God, man or angel. They can not so be changed that vice shall cease to be vice, or virtue cease to be virtue—no more than God can be changed from a good being to an evil one, or from benevolence to cruelty.

May we not infer, then, that as vice and virtue are so absolutely unalterable in their very nature, that therefore they are as unalterable in their effects? In other words—if it is the nature of virtue to confer or produce happiness, can it ever produce misery? And if it is the nature of vice to create misery, can it ever create happiness? I know that the same action may be sinful or virtuous, as the motive that prompted it was good or evil—and that an act performed out of evil motives may eventually produce much good—but in asking these questions, I have evil only, and as evil, in view. If you will answer them with the same singleness of vision, I am persuaded you will reply in the negative. For though many cases may be stated where, apparently, virtue may be bad policy, and vice most excellent management, yet we all have seen enough to know that the fairest delusions are but delusions, and that vice, sooner or later eventuates in detection, shame and anguish.

VISITING COMMITTEE.

I notice that in one of our Eastern Associations a committee of ministering brethren is appointed to visit every destitute society in the bounds of the Association, to counsel and encourage them in their difficulties, and aid them in supplying their wants. The expenses of the committee are to be borne by the societies visited, which, in general, will be but a trifling tax to each society, as each member of the committee will take a separate district. In this manner many a dormant society may be aroused—many a dead one, revived—many a languishing one, encouraged—many a destitute one, be supplied with a preacher—many a one in difficulties, be advised that it may free itself from embarrassments—and at all events, much statistical information may be procured in this manner for the use of the Associations, and the destitute be favored with one or more sermons a year from some member of the committee.

The plan seems feasible, and if so, can certainly be made useful. There are many societies that need the visit of such a committee, and the counsel they would thus receive. There are several destitute societies in each Association, and many preachers who have no definite engagements, who would be introduced to each other, by the instrumentality of such a committee. What say the New-York Associations? Is the plan feasible? If so, is it not worth a trial?

For years past one plan after another has been set on foot, only to fall again. Circuits were all popular—but it was only in word, not in power. Then societies were recommended to report their condition and wants to a committee or the standing clerk, who was to send them preachers accordingly. But this plan was asking the dead to restore themselves to a certain degree of life, that they might be wholly revived—and they slumbered on in death. This plan seems more feasible—but unless the living will act for the benefit of the dead and sleeping, it also will fail. And if it is started only to fail, it had better be untouched, untried. That we have failed, is no reason that we should not try again—unless we were trying to effect a useless or unworthy object. For well-doing is only well done when it is persevered in unto its full accomplishment. A. B. G.

CIRCULAR.

Brethren in the Faith—You will not expect that in central Pennsylvania, (a barren wilderness, with regard to the gospel,) we had an overflowing meeting; yet, though at this very busy season our numbers were necessarily few, we trust that our faith was strong, giving glory to God. However, our meetings were well attended, and we enjoyed in the fullest sense of the term, a Universalist Association.

Yours in the Lord,

S. ASHTON.

The Southern Association of Connecticut met in Newtown, May 24th. Brs. S. Glover, Moderator; S. C. Bulkeley, Assistant Moderator; and B. B. Hallock, Clerk. The cause is represented to be highly prosperous within the bounds of the Association.

JOHN MURRAY.

The remains of this distinguished Apostle of religious freedom and universal benevolence were removed from the Sargent tomb in the Granary burying ground, of Boston, to Mount Auburn, on the 8th inst. Sermon by Br. Sebastian Streeter, the successor of the deceased, from Joshua xxiv: 32. Fifty-six preachers of our order were present on the occasion. The procession was upwards of two-thirds of a mile long, and occupied fifty-two hackney coaches, and nearly thirty barouches and chaises. Besides these, many proceeded directly to the grave. Br. H. Ballou, of Boston, addressed the concourse at the grave, estimated at upwards of six hundred persons. The occasion was one of great interest and feeling, and I regret that we have not room this week for further details. A. B. G.

HERETICS—HERETICS.

The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, which held its annual session in Philadelphia, last month, has expelled from its fellowship the Synods of Utica, Genesee, Geneva, and Western Reserve, for errors in doctrine and practice—and also dissolved the third Presbytery of Philadelphia (new school). We extend the right hand of heretical fellowship to our heretical brethren, the heretical Presbyterians of this State and Ohio, and trust that henceforth they will not apply to us the name of heretic as one of reproach, seeing that they divide the blushing honors of heresy with us Universalists, Unitarians, etc. Nor can they demur to the charge, as it is made by their highest ecclesiastical authority—an authority which, by their own Confession of Faith, "has the keys of heaven and of hell"—which can bind on earth, and it is bound in heaven; or can loose on earth and it is loosened in heaven! What measures if any, will be taken by these heretical Presbyterian Synods to be restored to orthodoxy and full fellowship with the faithful, time will show. It is not likely that they will be pleased to be considered heretics at first—it requires some time to become used to it! A. B. G.

A NEW WORK.

Br. George Rogers, of Cincinnati, one of the most quaint and interesting writers in our connexion, proposes "publishing a new original work, in 20 semi-monthly numbers, of 24 duodecimo pages each, designed to compose a neat volume of 480 pages, closely printed," on good paper, at ONE DOLLAR the volume, invariably in advance. It will treat of the proofs of universal salvation, based on the attributes of God, his relations to man, and the decisive voice of inspiration. Supposed Scriptural and popular objections will be clearly stated and refuted. The bearings of Universalism on the morals and happiness of its subjects will be illustrated in a tale occupying 24 pages. Revelations from hell by a damned spirit, will occupy 48 pages, and bring to light some facts of a startling character. The remainder of the work will be filled with fragments—incidents of his travels—conversations, and sketches of sermons.

Being a periodical, the postage will be moderate—the price is low, and all acquainted with Br. R.'s writings will expect the work to be interesting. The prospectus will be given in our next. Subscriptions will be received at this office.

Letters to Br. R. on the subject must be free of postage, unless enclosing five dollars. A. B. G.

The Universalist and Ladies Repository, commenced its sixth volume, on the 15th inst., and the first number is now before us. To those who have seen the work at any time within the past year, it is only necessary to say that the number before us sustains the reputation of the work. Terms—two dollars per annum. It is a monthly of 40 octavo pages—double columns—and is edited by Br. H. Bacon. Abel Tompkins, publisher, Boston, Mass.

The Trumpet, whose spirit-stirring tones have been wakening the echoes of our Zion for nine years past, commences a new volume to-morrow, under the charge of Br. Thomas Whittemore, Proprietor and Editor. He has for assistant Editors, Brs. L. R. Paige, B. Whittemore, and O. A. Skinner—all good men and true, and too well known to the reading Universalists to need our commendations as writers. The terms of the Trumpet are two dollars per annum (payable in advance, of course), and it is published weekly, in folio form, in Boston.

LEWISTON.

A letter from a worthy brother in the vicinity of Lewiston, says—"Our friends in Lewiston have completed their neat and commodious meeting-house—it is an ornament to the village, and a credit to themselves. They will ere long, secure a pastor. With their zeal and his judicious labors, they must prosper. The Lord grant it, for they are truly worthy." To which we heartily respond—Amen. A. B. G.

OUR PAPER.

To make room for Mr. Campbell's letter and Mr. Skinner's reply to the same, we have omitted nearly all the editorial usually furnished, including some promised in our last. A. B. G.

Brs. Fisk, L. F. W. Andrews and Robert Smith, shall be attended to soon. We have no room for all they furnish—nor is it proper, in my opinion, for me to publish some things furnished by the two last named, as they involve others in the matter—but as soon as leisure and room permit, I will endeavor to do what is just and right in a notice of their several letters. A. B. G.

Br. Whittemore's letter to Br. Skinner, in relation to Mr. Campbell's visit to Boston, and conversation with Br. Balfour, together with Br. Skinner's reply to the same, will appear in our next. A. B. G.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.
SONG OF TRIUMPH.

BY MRS. BROUGHTON.

Unfurl the heavenly banner,
Bid the glad trumpet sound;
Proclaim the great salvation,
To earth's remotest bound;
From hill to hill, from shore to shore,
Across the ocean foam,
Let the glad song of triumph swell—
"This world is not our home."

Strike, strike the golden cymbals
'Till the loud echoes ring,
For Jesus is our Helper,
Our Prophet, Priest and King;
From shades of sorrow, sin and death,
He bids the mourner rise,
And view by faith, "the better land,"
That blooms above the skies.

Over the gloomy mountains,
O'er the wild waste of sin,
He comes to open a fountain,
To wash the sinner clean;
From superstition's gloomy mists
To purge the mental ray,
And shed around the sorrowing heart
The light of endless day.

We seek a happier city
Eternal and on high,
Where flowers never wither,
And comforts never die;
Where crystal streams are murmuring on
With melody serene,
And trees of life are bending low,
With fruit of golden sheen.

Arrayed in starry splendor,
The blood-washed armies stand,
Fast by the flowing fountains
Of Canaan's happy land;
While cherub hosts on flaming wing
Sweep o'er the eternal plains,
And seraphs wake their sounding lyres
To sweet melodious strains.

Hark! how the sapphire arches
Ring back the joyful song,
And o'er the golden pavements
What countless millions throng,
As casting low their crowns of gold
Before the emerald throne,
Archangels the loud praises swell
With glory's loftiest tone.

CONSOLATION.

Though numerous and conflicting are the sentiments which agitate the religious world, though many (poisonous and fiery) are the darts and arrows, hurled by man against his brother man; although it may require an exercise of philosophy and religion to be reconciled to the providence that has mingled his cup with the bitterness of grief, although it may be difficult to believe that present evils will result in good, and that it is necessary for man to be afflicted, yet it may be assumed, as a defensible truth, that no believer in Jesus, as the common Saviour of the world, can be placed in any situation where he shall be comfortless—no one can be without comfort, realizing himself under the kind and protecting care of that parent who is ever mindful and regardeth the wants of all his offspring, and believing that he will so continue to exercise his moral government as to result in their highest happiness. Though bereft of his friends, his health, his reputation, he is not without hope of a glorious immortality; though clouds of darkness gather thickly around him, and storms of adversity come upon him, he remains unshaken, the raven wings of despair hover not over him; a firm and unwavering faith and hope based upon the infinite love, the impartial and unchangeable goodness of Jehovah, throws around him a mantle of joy.

Amid his darkest hours, yes, when death cuts the brittle cord and lays prostrate a friend who is entitled to his best affection, and endeared to him by the strongest and sweetest ties of nature—it then points him over beyond the ravages of the tomb, to that blissful and immortal resurrection when friendship shall again be cemented, and all the loveliest ties of earth be again united. This sentiment will not only cheer, light up, and smooth the uneven paths of life, and enable him to encounter all its various trials and afflictions with becoming fortitude, but when the cruel hand of disease shall throw him upon the bed of death, when he finds the vital current ceasing to ebb and flow, then how soothing must be that religion which tells him, he shall live again beyond the tomb; which tells him he is but passing on to mingle with the never-ending society of those he has loved. May this sentiment guide us through life, in the path of duty, and in death may we rejoice in its truth.—Star in the East.

A FRAGMENT FOR THE LADIES.—"Thy Grandmother," says my Uncle Toby, addressing himself to young Arabella, just from London, and who was playing the battle of Marengo on the piano.—"Thy grandmother, child," said he, used to play on an instrument better than thine."

"Indeed," said Arabella "how could it have been better? you know it is a most fashionable instrument, and is used by every body that is any thing."

"Your grandmother was something, yet she never saw a piano forte."

"But what is the name of the instrument? had it strings, or was it played by keys?"

"You must give me time to recollect the name: it was indeed a stringed instrument, but was played by the hand."

"By the hand alone? how vulgar: but I protest I should like to see one, and papa shall buy me one when I return to London. Do you think he can obtain one?"

"No you will not probably find one in London, but doubtless they may be found in some of the country towns."

"How many strings had it?—must one play with both hands? and could one play the double bass?"

"I know not whether it would play double bass, as you call it: it was played by both hands and had two strings."

"Two strings only? surely you are jesting: how could good music be produced by such an instrument, when the piano has one or two hundred?"

"Oh, the strings were very long, one about fourteen feet, and the other might be lengthened at pleasure to even fifty or more."

"What a prodigious deal of room it must take up; but no matter I will have mine in the old hall, and papa may have an addition built to it, for he says I shall never want any thing, and so does mama. Were the strings struck with little mallets like the piano, or were they supported like the harpsichord?"

"Like neither of these instruments as I recollect; but it produced a soft kind of humming music, and was peculiarly agreeable to the husband and relations of the performer."

"Oh, as to pleasing one's husband or relations, that is all Dicky in the haut ton you know, but I am determined to have one at any rate. Was it easy learnt, and was it taught by French and Italian masters?"

"It was easily learnt, but Frenchmen and Italians scarcely dare show their heads in our country in those times."

"Can you possibly recollect the name? How shall we know what to enquire for?"

"Yes, I do now remember the name, and we must inquire for a spinning wheel!"

BEAUTIES OF THE BIBLE.

If Longinus knew anything of the sublime in writing, the Scriptures must be full of it; since his whole work, compared with their several parts, seems but a comment on the beauties; and if there be anything in what has been written by Quintilian of the force of oratory, the power of self-asserting arguments, there we behold it all. No work was ever at once so animated, and so correct; so plain, and so full of elegance. What is said of architecture, is equally true of style; that simplicity is the source of all true beauty, and that a profusion of misplaced ornaments and figures, while they strike the eyes of children and idiots, accuse the structure, to the discerning eye, of barbarism. Different authors have made approaches towards excellence, in the different manners of writing, but it is this work alone, that we are to look for perfection in all: nor is this a wonder, when we recollect that the others are the products of limited and imperfect conceptions, this of unbounded and infallible; that they are human, this divine.

In South Bainbridge, March 31, RICHARD B. CHURCH, of consumption, aged 21 years.

He bore the pains of 9 months illness with the fortitude of a philosopher, and the resignation of a Christian. Sensible that his stay here was short, he bid his parents a final adieu, exhorting his brothers sisters, and young friends to be virtuous, to adorn the society in which they should live, with a well ordered life and godly conversation, requesting Br. Messinger to preach his funeral sermon from these words. "Be ye also ready."

In Coventry, April 3d, LAVINA ELIZABETH, daughter of Dr. E. and Wrexville Cornell, aged 14 months.

"Happy infant, early blest!"

Rest, in peaceful slumber rest;

Early rescued from the cares,

Which increase with growing years."

In Bridgewater, May 18th, of whooping cough, MARY D. infant daughter of Rev. T. J. Smith, aged 20 months and 16 days. The funeral was attended on the 20th, and the consolations of the Gospel were affectionately tendered to the mourning parents and relatives, by Elder A. Smith, of the Baptist church, in an appropriate discourse founded on Job xiv: 2.

In Oriskany, May 28th, of consumption, MERCY SEARS GIBBS, in the 24th year of her age, and in the full belief of a world's salvation. She was patient in life and resigned in death. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the family and a respectable concourse of friends, in the Presbyterian meeting-house, (which was kindly opened for our accommodation,) by the writer, from 2 Tim. i: 10.

SETH JONES.

In Cooperstown, May 23d, Mr. EZRA CHAFFEE, aged 31. In the death of Br. C. we mourn the loss of a worthy, industrious citizen, cut off as it were in the morning of his usefulness, when his path yet glittered with the lustre of promise in the prospect of increasing brightness. He was confined to the house for more than a year, and for most of the time he seems to have been fully impressed with a conviction of the fatal issue; yet he bore it with Christian patience and fortitude. Without a murmur he lived and died, triumphing in the faith of a world's salvation. May God in his mercy sanctify this dispensation to all who mourn. May sister Chaffee enjoy full influence of her faith, remembering that her loss is her husband's gain.

In Pittsford, May 12th, HENRY, only son of John and Aurelia Beers, aged 16 months. The death of this child was occasioned in a very distressing manner, having accidentally fallen into a vessel of boiling water, and suffering for several days the pain of the scald.

The funeral was attended in the Presbyterian meeting-house at Lima, and we are happy in being able to learn that the preacher, Rev. J. Barnard, Presbyterian, gave an appropriate and consolatory discourse from Prov. iii: 11.—Herald of Truth.

THE WILL;

OR, TRUTH AND ERROR CONTRASTED.

"If there is any thing that will remind us of our dependence upon a God of love—if any thing will awaken in our hearts, feelings of gratitude to the Author of all good, and cause us to rely, with unshaken confidence, on the promises of Him who has said, that 'seed-time and harvest, Summer and Winter, shall not fail,' it is a ramble on a morning like this, after having experienced the severities of such a Winter as the past. To behold Spring—cheerful, smiling Spring—bursting upon our delighted vision, in a moment, as it were, with its soft, green carpet under our feet, so richly interwoven with these beautiful buds and flowers; the happy birds and insects coming forth from their secret hiding places—lakes, rivers and mountain streams, released from the glittering fetters which but so lately held them in unwilling captivity, and all nature rejoicing in the smile of universal benevolence—well may we exclaim in the language of the poet,

'The rolling year

Is full of Thee. Forth in the pleasing Spring
Thy beauty walks—thy tenderness and love.
Wide flush the fields—the softening air is balm;
Echo the mountains round: the forest smiles;
And every sense, and every heart is joy.'"

As Henry Enismore gave utterance to the above sentiments, rather venting the feelings of a grateful heart, than addressing any one, he turned to the beautiful girl who was walking by his side. "True," answered Louisa, while her countenance beamed with an expression which told that the sentiments she had just heard, found a response in her bosom; "and when we consider that all, even the most abject and despised, are equally the objects of God's kind care and fatherly protection—subject, like us, to joy and sorrow, tossed about by the blasting winds of adversity, liable to be raised by the propitious gales of prosperity, and to endure disease and death, and destined to the same happy immortality, will it not dispose us to humility, kindness and charity to all mankind; especially those whom for some wise purpose He has seen fit to deprive of comforts which have been so bountifully showered upon us?"

"The question," said Henry, "is often asked—Why, if God is good to all, he has not made a more equal distribution of this world's goods? Why some are subjected to so much more pain, care and disappointment, than others? But because we, weak, erring creatures as we are, who hardly know the motives by which our own actions are governed, are unable to fathom the counsels of the Most High—while we have, daily and hourly, so many proofs of His good will to the children of men—while revelation is full of declarations of His infinite goodness; and ocean, earth and air, proclaim Him a God of love—should we call in question His justice; is it not wrong, is it not sinful? If we had an earthly parent or friend, who from the first moment of our existence until the present, had evinced the most unremitting attention to our wants—who had never failed to fulfil the most trifling promise—one to whom we were bound by the most sacred ties of gratitude, and who had given us the assurance that all he did was for our good, and that he never would relax in his exertions in our behalf—think you we should doubt his goodness, because we were unable to comprehend all his actions? Besides, were we all on an equality, where would be the opportunities we now possess of exercising those feelings of charity and sympathy, those little acts of friendship and benevolence, which constitute the greatest portion of our earthly felicity?"

It was in this morning's conversation, that these two amiable beings formed a better acquaintance with each other's characters and feelings, than they could in weeks passed in the circle where they usually met. Henry had admired Louisa's beauty and accomplished manners; her innocent vivacity had charmed him; and now, when he found her possessed of such true piety, with a mind and heart capable of understanding and appreciating the beauties of that Gospel which bringeth glad tidings to all, he felt an esteem for her, which increased at each succeeding interview, until he found that nothing could afford him pleasure unless shared with her. Nor was the affection he felt for her unreciprocated: she was happy to find one to whom she could express her sentiments without reserve, and on whose superior knowledge and judgment, firmness of principle and unbending integrity, she could confidently rely.

Although Louisa was called a very amiable girl, yet, as she made no pretensions to religion, she was considered by that class of community who estimate the piety of others by the high tone of their professions, "without hope, and without God in the world." Her parents having died when Louisa was quite young, a lady of fashion, who was a friend of her mother, took a fancy to the child, and brought her up as her own. Mrs. Moore was naturally a kind-hearted, benevolent woman; but her principal aim through life was to be what, in fashionable parlance, is termed a fine lady. She gave her adopted daughter a good education, dressed her well, and introduced her into good society, and thought she had performed her duty; but a continual round of amusements and the routine of fashionable life, did not satisfy Louisa; there was something wanting, and as she could not subscribe to the opinions of any with whom she was acquainted, she determined to examine the Scriptures for herself. She did so, and came to the conclusion, that what was "preached by all God's holy prophets since the world began," viz., "the restitution of all things," and the oath of Jehovah himself, that unto Him "every knee shall bow and every tongue swear, surely shall say, In the Lord have I righteousness and strength," must be true. She once ventured to say something on the subject to her mother, (as she always called her guardian,) but she would not listen to her a moment, telling Louisa that she was too young to think for herself on such subjects, adding, that for her own part, she did not trouble her mind about religion yet—saying, "there is time enough to think on such gloomy subjects when I am too old to enjoy the world; not that I do not intend to repent before I die, but there's time enough." Louisa would have told her that her views of religion were quite different, but Mrs. Moore bid her make haste to dress herself for the evening, as she expected company. Finding it useless to remonstrate, Louisa submitted without a murmur, and, miser-like, enjoyed her treasures in secret. I have compared her to the miser, but she was unlike that selfish being, inasmuch as her treasures, though hidden from the public gaze, exerted an influence which was felt, while the source was looked for in vain; it was like the deep, pure fountain, hidden from the sight of the careless and superficial observer, from which flow noiseless streams that fertilize and invigorate all around; and not only water and sustain beautiful flowers and fragrant herbs, which grow along their banks, but render more luxuriant the useful grass and herbage. Henry was destined to be the first to discover the fountain in all its purity.

Spring passed rapidly away. Henry and Louisa together culled the first and last roses of Summer, enjoyed the rich fruits of Autumn, and "stern Winter, with its clouds and storms," was fast approaching, when he received a letter from his step-father, who resided in a distant part of the country, stating that his health was rapidly declining, and unless he made all possible haste, probably they should never meet this side the grave. He expressed the greatest anxiety to see Henry, adding, that he not only wished to converse with him on temporal concerns, but on what was of infinitely more importance, his immortal soul; for he had been informed by a friend, that he had embraced a soul-destroying doctrine. Henry perceived by referring to the date of the letter, that it was written two months previous to the time of its reception; and fearful lest he should lose the opportunity of administering to the wants of his benefactor in his last moments, he took a hasty leave of his beloved Louisa, and flew on the wings of affection to the house of his more than father.

The father of Henry died when he was an infant, and the subsequent ill health of his mother, had reduced the small portion which she received on the death of her husband, until she was left in a state of comparative poverty. After struggling in vain to support herself and child, she yielded to the solicitations of Mr. Casey, who in addition to his wealth, was a sensible, worthy man—to become his wife. She, however, survived her marriage but a few months, leaving her infant son to the care of her husband, who in fulfilling the trust reposed in him, obeyed the dictates of his own feeling and generous heart. But to return.

"O how happy should I be," said Henry to himself, "could I but be instrumental in convincing the guardian and friend of my early years, of the goodness of that God, whom he now views as a partial being! What a source of consolation would it be to me, to be the means of opening his eyes to the beauties of that Gospel which maketh free indeed; which spreads a halo round earth's purest enjoyments, and beams with a still, holy lustre on the couch of the sick and dying." Trembling with hope and anxiety, Henry now ascended the steps of the mansion where he had passed so many hours of happiness. The door was opened by an old servant of the family, whose first look told him that all was over. He had arrived too late!

Overcome by his emotions, he would have fainted, when a "good evening, Mr. Enismore," in a cold, formal tone, roused his sinking faculties, and on looking up, he found the voice proceeded from Mr. Benson, a distant relative of Mr. Casey, whom he had occasionally met with before, but whose dissolute habits and want of principle, had prevented Henry from forming an intimacy with him. Mr. Benson invited him into the parlor, where, after informing him of the death of his nearest earthly relative, and repeating a few common-place words of condolence, he proceeded as follows: "Your father was so highly incensed at what he termed your ungrateful conduct in not coming to him immediately, or if that was impracticable, in neglecting to answer his letter, which he considered a proof that what he had heard respecting your change of sentiments, was not only correct, but that they had caused you to forget the duty you owed your guardian and benefactor, that he made a new will, in which he left you a few hundreds, that you might not be totally penniless, while the bulk of his fortune is in the hands of one who, I trust, will make a proper use of it."

This was too much for Henry's already lacerated feelings; it was a blow he was wholly unprepared for: the loss of the property he had been taught to consider his own, he could have borne with some degree of patience; but that one whom he had loved so fondly, whose slightest wish had been to him a law, from whom he had received a father's protection and care, and to whose comfort he would willingly have sacrificed every earthly good, should have died in the belief of his ingratitude, was more than he felt able to bear—tears, bitter and scalding tears, coursed each other down his manly cheeks—he made no reply, for his heart was too full for utterance. On recovering himself, he arose to depart, refusing the urgent solicitations of Mr. Benson to remain a few days with him; for the charm which had bound him to his home, was broken; the voice that was wont to welcome him, was hushed in the grave.

The first evening Henry passed with Louisa, after the death of his father, he related to her what the reader is already acquainted with. "You now," said he, "see before you one, who instead of having a home to offer you according to your deserts, is not only destitute of fortune, but of the means of acquiring the comforts of life."

"True," answered Louisa, "you are without fortune, but you possess that which is of far greater value, and what no one can deprive you of, a good education; to which is added a character for truth and integrity, and a faith which I trust will support you, not only under this trial, but every other that you may be called to endure, with Christian fortitude and resignation."

"It is four years ago, to-day," said Mrs. Enismore to her husband, as they sat together at an open casement, on a beautiful morning in the month of May, since we first became acquainted with each other. We previously had an introduction, it is true, but it was not until that day that we could say in reality, we had formed an acquaintance. I shall never forget that morning's ramble. Four years seem a great while in prospect, but when past, how short the time appears!"

"And yet," said Henry, "how much has transpired in this short period of time; and how altered are our prospects and condition in life. Then we were passing the greatest portion of our time amid the scenes of fashionable life, surrounded with all the luxuries attendant on wealth and fortune, flattered and caressed by the little circle of thoughtless beings around us, and like the gay butterfly, sipping sweets from every flower, not dreaming but Summer would last forever. Now, we are settled in a retired country village, destitute of the luxuries, and many of what we once deemed the necessities of life, looked upon with contempt by the fashionable, and denounced as heretics by the bigoted."

"Still," continued Louisa, "we are far happier now, than we were then."

"Yes," added her husband, "the idea of being the means, through the mercy of God, of opening the eyes of many who are now groping their way along the path of life in darkness and error, to a view of the Sun of righteousness, is a greater source of happiness to me, than any thing in the power of wealth to bestow."

Henry had become a preacher of that glorious Gospel which is "glad tidings to all," and was at the time we write, located in the little village of S——. The society was small, but the members such as would do honor to any cause—Christian-like and charitable in their feelings, and honest and upright in their dealings with their fellow men. They had never had regular preaching among them before, consequently Henry had many prejudices to encounter, and frequently had his feelings injured; but the mildness and forbearance he always manifested when ill-treated by those who differed from him, the firmness and dignity with which he invariably maintained what he regarded as truth, and his uniform piety and blameless conduct, won the respect of many, even among those who differed from him in sentiment.

One evening, as Henry sat reading aloud, while his wife was plying the needle with her usual industry, some one knocked at the door. Mr. E. laid aside his book, and arose to receive his visitor, whom, to his surprise, he immediately recognised as Mr. Benson, although he appeared somewhat paler than when he saw him last, and his countenance bore traces of recent suffering. After the usual salutations were over, Mr. Benson commenced in a low, tremulous tone as follows:—"I have come to solicit your forgiveness, and to make all possible reparation for the wrong you have suffered—the injury done to your feelings, I can never repay; but the property I have in my possession, and which is rightfully yours, I most cheerfully restore."

"Property of mine!" said Henry, "I was not conscious of your possessing any thing belonging to me; to what do you refer?"

"The fortune that once belonged to your step-father, and of which you have been unlawfully deprived," answered Mr. Benson, in a voice almost choked with emotion.

"But," said Henry, "was it not my father's will that you should inherit his estate?"

"Yes," returned Mr. B., "but under the false impression that you were unworthy his love. You probably are not aware that the friend who gave him the information he received respecting your change of sentiments, and who caused the delay of his letter, is now before you. I blush when I acknowledge such baseness, but it is a duty I owe you, and a penance I have imposed upon myself. But, strange as it may appear, I even attempted to justify the course I was pursuing, to my conscience, by a sentiment as false as it is pernicious: that the end justifies the means. I had led (as you are aware) a dissolute and unprincipled life; the small portion left me by my parents, was nearly exhausted, when one evening, in company with some boon companions, I attended a revival meeting, for the purpose of making merry with the proceedings. I will not weary you with a description of these meetings, with the manner of conducting which, you must be familiar—suffice it to say, my fears were wrought upon by the vivid description there set forth, of a future state of unending misery for the impenitent, and I resolved to escape the impending danger, which, I was told, was a very easy matter, if I would submit myself to the guidance of my spiritual advisers. I accordingly came out a bright and shining Christian, regenerated from all sin and iniquity, caressed and flattered, until really believing myself to be of a superior order of beings, I looked down with contempt upon those who manifested less zeal for the conversion of souls, and with feelings of hatred to those who believed that God was equally good to all. It was while in this state of mind, I heard you had become a believer in God's impartial grace. I resolved on visiting your step-father, and informing him of what I had heard. I found him quite ill. He had commenced writing to you, requesting your immediate presence. I told him all I had learned respecting you, representing the doctrine you had embraced, as you may imagine, in no very favorable light, in the hope of inducing him to cast you off, without affording you an opportunity of defending yourself. If I could succeed in accomplishing this, and securing his good opinion, I thought in all probability I should gain possession of his estate. He, however, felt so firmly persuaded, that if he could only see, and converse with you on the subject, that he could convince you of your error, that he concluded his letter and gave it to me, under the strongest injunctions to have it forwarded immediately. I dared not destroy the letter, but I determined to keep it in my possession until it was too late to be of any avail. O how I trembled at every knock at the door, and at the sound of every strange footstep, lest you should chance to return before my plan was completed. Surely 'conscience doth make cowards of us all.' After a short pause, Mr. B. resumed. "When Mr. Casey expressed his anxiety and astonishment at not seeing you, I was ever ready with some insinuation relative to the tendency of the doctrine you professed, to destroy all moral obligation; until I succeeded in persuading him that he would be committing sin, in bestowing his fortune on one so unworthy. The result was a will in my favor. But I feel persuaded that the distress of his mind, in consequence of the idea he entertained of your dereliction from the paths of virtue and religion, hastened his death; for the last words he uttered, were in prayer for your return to virtue."

Here the agitation of the narrator prevented his proceeding. After a pause, he added, "The idea of having wronged you, has caused me many bitter tears, and in my hours of remorse, I have more than half resolved to seek you, and restore your rights; but pride and avarice prevailed over my better feelings. But the recollection of the anguish of that old man, has deprived me of peace by day and rest by night—his earnest and beseeching prayer, that 'God would snatch you as a brand from the burning,' was ever ringing in my ears. In order to divert my mind, if possible, from such tormenting recollections, I resolved to travel. This served for a season; but when the novelty was passed, my misery became more intense than ever. On passing through the town of —, I recollected it to be the residence of one of my early associates, and concluded to visit him. I did so, and was received by him with a warmth of feeling for which I was unprepared. We had not been in company long, before the conversation turned on the subject of religion; when I discovered that he no longer held in derision the volume of divine Revelation, but looked upon it as containing the only sure guide to virtue and happiness. I congratulated him on the change I perceived had been wrought in his feelings, and his prospect of escape from the torments of a state of unending retribution, when I was horror-struck on his assuring me that the Scriptures taught him no such sentiment, but that he was a believer in the final restoration of all mankind to a state of happiness; offering, at the same time, to give me some of the reasons for the hope that was in him. As I had a curiosity to know the grounds of a belief, which I had always imagined without any foundation, except in the mind of unregenerated man, whom I considered totally corrupt and depraved by nature, I consented to listen to them. Suffice it to say, I was so well pleased with this (to me) new view of religion, that I resolved to search for myself, and see if these things were so. After a careful and thorough examination of the subject, in which I was assisted by my friend, I became firmly convinced of the truth of that doctrine, 'which is every where spoken against.' It was not until then, that the sin of my past conduct, in all the vividness of reality, was opened to my view. I no longer hesitated what course I ought to follow, but proceeded directly to make inquiries respecting your place of residence; and on ascertaining, lost no time in throwing myself on your mercy for forgiveness. I know I do not deserve this at your hands; but if you knew the agony I have suffered from an accusing conscience—the humility I have felt, and still feel, in having acted so base a part, you would at least pity me."

"I do, indeed," said Henry, grasping him warmly by the hand. "I not only freely forgive all, but your ingenuous and noble conduct, in acknowledging past errors, and the readiness you manifest to sacrifice all you possess to make an atonement, will not only make me in future rely with the most implicit confidence on your integrity, and proud to call you by the name of friend, but it adds another to the many proofs I have met with, that a belief in the doctrine of God's impartial grace, is calculated to inspire those feelings of justice which prompt us not only to repent of past sin, but to do all in our power to repair the evil we have done."

"This is too much!" said Mr. Benson, as he returned the pressure of Henry's hand; "I was unprepared for such goodness."

He walked towards the window, to conceal his emotion and brush away the tears, which rushed unbidden to his eyes.

On resuming his seat, Mr. B. continued: "The arguments I made use of, in order to quiet my scruples, when I formed the resolution to act in the manner I have narrated, were these: I felt persuaded that should you inherit the fortune of Mr. Casey, it would add to your influence, and consequently have a tendency to advance those sentiments I had been taught to consider in direct opposition to all religion—whereas, if I could get it into my own possession, by appropriating a portion to some of the various plans in operation for the conversion of sinners, I might be the means of saving many souls from the wrath of an offended God; and the sin I committed in defrauding you, could be repented of at some future time; often quoting to myself those lines of Dr. Watts:

The vilest sinner may return.'"

"Oh," said Henry, "if mankind could but be persuaded that there is no escape from punishment, except in forsaking the cause which is sin—that 'he that doeth wrong, shall receive for the wrong which he hath done,' and that there is 'no peace for the wicked,' how many who are now threading the mazy labyrinths of folly and sin, vainly imagining themselves in the only way of securing pleasure and happiness, would travel in the plain, straight-forward paths of virtue and religion, whose ways are ways of pleasantness, and in whose paths alone are to be found pure and unsullied enjoyment."

Time rolled on. The little village of S—— has since become a thriving town; and the present prosperous state of the once despised cause of God's universal benevolence, is principally owing to the indefatigable exertions of Mr. Benson and his friend Henry Enismore.

One evening, at the close of a conversation relating to the different modes adopted by mankind in the pursuit of happiness, Mr. B. gave utterance to the following sentiments, the influences of which ever characterized his after life.

"I have sought for this treasure in the allurements of sense, but found that it continually eluded my grasp, even when I seemed almost to have gained possession of it. Again I have sought for happiness in the cold cavillings of scepticism; but these afforded no balm for the miseries of life. I have been raised into ecstasy on imagining myself saved from a state of interminable woe, while some of my fellow-creatures were doomed to roll amid the billows of never-ending despair; but never, until in the exercise of the faith I now profess, did I experience true peace. This faith has not only enabled me to bear with patience the vexations and trials of active life, but promises to support my steps down the declivity of time, and land me in safety on those blissful shores, where belief will be exchanged for knowledge—hope, for fruition; and where peace, and love, and joy, flow like a river, around the throne of the Eternal.

A VOICE TO YOUNG MEN.....CHAPTER II.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

TEMPTATIONS.

There are many vicious practices which, arrayed in deceitful garbs, present themselves to young men; and frequently allure them to ruin. These temptations throng around the young in their most alluring forms, and invite them to participate in what they would cause you to believe are their enjoyments. But, young men, beware of them—beware! Although they appear before you in the garb of friendship—although they address you in sweet and fascinating tones—yet, in reality, they are your foes—your most bitter, fatal, deadly enemies! They come to you under the specious pretence of improving your condition, of affording you enjoyment, of leading you into those fair and beautiful fields of pleasure, for which you ardently thirst. But, mark me! all their pretences are false—all their promises are baseless and empty—and those gorgeous pictures which they so vividly paint to your glowing imagination, are as illusory and vain, as the fleeting visions of the midnight dream. In their every attempt to bestow enjoyment upon you, their highest success can be but a fitful excitement, which will inflict a real sting, a real poison, to your true happiness and peace. Were these temptations to present themselves in their true colors—were their real features visible—youth would reject them instantly.

"Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
As, to be hated, needs but to be seen!"

When vice is seen in its real nature and results, it is universally hated. It is only by the disguise which temptations assume, the tinsel trappings with which they conceal their hideous features, that they are enabled to deceive any. When young men see these temptations in the grosser aspects they assume to their confirmed victims, or discover their ulterior and certain results, they start back with disgust and horror. The youth who beholds the drunkard rolling in the mire, and hears his children cry for bread—or sees the profligate bloated with disease, or the thief in prison, or the murderer upon the gallows—has no inclination to be degraded to these conditions; and has no apprehension that such will ever be his circumstances. And such, indeed, would never be his condition, were he but considerably to trace these disastrous results back to their real origin. But herein lies the danger of youth. It is difficult to convince the young man, that harmless temptations, as he imagines them, which are so pleasing and enticing to his imagination, are the cause of so much pain, and wretchedness, and ruin. I beseech all candid young men to be consistent upon this subject. If you would know the real effect of giving way to early, and even trivial temptations, go and question the miserable victims of vice. Amid groans of anguish and unavailing regrets, they will trace to you the history of their career, recorded in the annals of infamy and shame. They will lead you back, step by step, the downward road they pursued. They will assure you, that the vices which eventually plunged them into ruin, presented themselves to their view, in youth, in the same pleasing colors, with the same harmless, inoffensive air, that they now appear to you. They believed these lying, deceitful appearances—they followed the gilded shadows—they plunged deep into the vortex of misnamed pleasure—and, ere long, they awoke involved in the severest anguish and despair!

Young men, will you not take warning by the living records of crime, which are every where scattered around? Will you wisely scrutinize the temptations that beset you, and perceive their ruinous effects, and withstand them? Or will you give way to their fascinations, and recklessly rush onward in the fool-hardy career, run by so many of your race, to awaken to the same degradation and anguish? Be not so vain as to flatter yourself that you can indulge in sinful practices, and avoid those dreadful consequences which they have invariably entailed upon all who have been guilty of them. By what reasonable rule can you calculate that the laws of God, of nature, and of man, will change their mode of operation, and relent in their principles and exactions, in your behalf, when, to all others they are undeviating and rigidly certain? Indulge not, for a moment, these ignorant suppositions. Like causes must produce like effects. If by giving way to early temptations, others have rapidly become involved in wretchedness and ruin, as you well know, the same fate unavoidably awaits you, if you imitate their example.

I will briefly notice a few of the temptations by which young men are liable to be beset.

Gambling is a temptation to which young men are exposed. This practice is unjust. It is unjust to take the property of another, without returning a proper equivalent therefor—it amounts to robbery; this the gamester does. Gambling is unlawful. No just law can sanction or tolerate it. Laws were passed against it, as early as the reign of Queen Anne, of England. And from that period to the present, in all well regulated communities, this practice has been forbidden by law. It is an unprofitable occupation. "It is certain," says Locke, that "gaming leaves no satisfaction behind it, to those who reflect when it is over; and it no way profits either body or mind. As to their estates, if it strike so deep as to concern them, it is a trade, then, and not a recreation, wherein few thrive; and, at best, a thriving gamester has but a poor trade of it, who fills his pockets at the price of his reputation."

Gambling is opposed to industry. Those who occasionally win sums of money by the turn of a card, or the throw of a dice, soon acquire a distaste to the slower routine of acquiring property by industrious occupation. It begets in them a feverish desire to become wealthy in a moment, which spurs a more tardy yet surer process.

Gambling is ruinous in all its tendencies and consequences. It is ruinous to character. The gamester is despised by the virtuous and enlightened, and suspected even by his associates. To be connected with him, or to associate with him, is a disgrace, and his society is shunned by all those who would be considered respectable. He is distrusted by all; for it is consistently deemed probable, that he who will filch from another his lawful property, at the gaming table, will not hesitate to take any other measures, however vicious or unlawful, to accomplish the same object. It is ruinous to morals. Its tendencies are to blunt the sensibilities as to those nice distinctions of right and wrong, so necessary to preserve purity of morals. The gamester soon loses all regard for truth, honesty and candor, and is compelled to resort to falsehood and deception to obtain his object. This pernicious practice is the fruitful source of every conceivable vice and crime. Its natural fruit is theft, robbery, murder, suicide, forgery, perjury, intemperance, and every species of licentiousness and sin. Gambling is ruinous to property. How many are reduced by it from affluence to poverty—how many with the imbecility of idiots, throw away, in a single night, the earnings of years of industry! The gamester can make no safe calculations as to property. He may possess a fortune this year, and the next, be clothed in the beggar's rags. The chances that the latter will be his condition, are vastly the most numerous. Where one gamester dies in affluence, a thousand end their days in poverty.

This vice is probably carried to a greater excess in France than in any other country; and there its true effects are discovered. Its wretched victims are bound in slavery to its fascinations, until stripped of all their possessions; and then, in the phrenzied moment of despair, terminate their existence by suicide, or commit some desperate act which sends them to the prison, and perhaps the guillotine.

I warn young men to avoid this vice as they value life, character and contentment. Of all miserable mortals, the gambler is among the most wretched. His mind is constantly stretched upon the rack of uncertainty, and filled with the most fearful forebodings. Avoid a company of gamblers as you would a den of thieves. Look upon the gaming-table as the door which leads to certain disgrace, poverty and woe!

Intemperance, is another temptation that assails young men. The evils of this vice, are now so frequently and ably elucidated, that a few remarks from me can only be necessary. The fatal effects of intemperance, are written out in pictures horribly true and vivid, in every town and hamlet throughout our country. Broken fortunes, blasted anticipations, ruined health, disgrace, hunger, want, and suffering in every shape, are the prolific fruits of this wretched habit.

Young men, have you any desire to be involved in these miserable circumstances?—do you wish for degradation and want? I anticipate your reply. You start back with horror, and cry “No! God forbid!” And how do you expect to avoid them? By following in precisely the same path that involved others in their toils?—by imitating that sot, who in youth drank whenever occasion offered? Your good sense will dictate the danger of such a course. There is one infallible rule—and but one—by following which, every young man may be certain of avoiding intemperance, and all the long catalogue of evils that invariably follow in its train—and that is, to abstain entirely from all drinks, as a beverage, that possess power to intoxicate, in all places, and under every circumstance. This is your only safe-guard! Observe this rule faithfully, and you are safe—you are entirely beyond the reach of the monster intemperance, and its dreadful consequences. But break over this rule, however slightly, and you are exposed to great danger. If you become what is called “the temperate drinker”—if you indulge occasionally in the intoxicating draught—you have fairly set out on the high road to intemperance; you have overstepped the only line of perfect safety, and have no assurance, no guaranty, that you will not become a miserable, degraded sot! “But cannot I govern and restrain myself within the bounds of moderation?” says the temperate drinker. This is precisely the question asked by every drunkard, while yet drinking but temperately; and the answer can be read in the bloated visage, broken constitution, and ruined character—in the poverty, and want, and rags of their wretched families! Although all temperate drinkers do not become habitual drunkards, yet it is quite certain that no man can become intemperate, without first being a moderate drinker. Intemperance is not the work of a moment. Every drunkard in the land, was first a temperate drinker; and he then felt as certain that he would never become the beastly slave of intoxication, as the most confident youth who reads these lines. But of what avail was his confidence? While he yet felt strong in his own power of restraint and resistance, habit was insidiously winding its massive chains around him, binding all his noble, and manly, and god-like powers in servitude, and, ere long, he sunk the willing slave of one of the most cruel task-masters that ever scourged the human race! Young man, listen to me! and if to any thing in these chapters you give heed, I pray you follow the advice I now enjoin upon you. Adopt it as one of the inflexible principles of your conduct, to avoid partaking the inebriating draught,* under any circumstances whatever! Then you are perfectly secure. But, I repeat, take any other course, and you at once become liable to all the horrors of intemperance. In avoiding an admitted evil of immense magnitude, why not take the safe and certain path, rather than the one that is unsafe and uncertain?

Avoid, also, as far as possible, the haunts of intemperance, and the company of the habitual drinkers of intoxicating liquor, lest you become ensnared by their evil examples. You should give no countenance to the custom of partaking of intoxicating drinks, even moderately; but should bring both your example and influence to bear against a practice so fraught with evil.

Dishonesty is another temptation that besets the pathway of young men. The desire for wealth becomes, in many, so absorbing and uncontrolled, that they violate all justice, honesty and virtue, to gratify it. In your business transactions, many temptations will beset you to defraud your neighbor of that which is honestly his. These temptations you must summon all your energies to withstand. Adopt it as your motto through life, to “render unto all their just dues.” There never was a maxim more true, than that “honesty is the best policy.” It should be engraven deeply upon the heart of every young man. Whenever temptations to be fraudulent arise, let them be repelled by the truth of this saying. Let it accompany and guide you, and it will keep you in the path of rectitude, respectability and peace. In being dishonest, you may, in some cases, obtain more property than you otherwise would. But remember that every farthing you secure in this dishonorable manner, instead of making you more wealthy, detracts just so much from your real riches—from your available means to make yourself happy. Dishonesty, however much it may increase your wealth, will make you poorer in character, poorer in peace, and in every real essential to human enjoyment. True happiness consists in a peaceful and contented mind; and he who possesses these requisites to the highest degree, is, indeed, the wealthiest man! Can ill-gotten riches bestow this enjoyment? As well may you take coals of fire in your bosom, and not be burned. Be cautious to have all your dealings characterized by strict honesty and integrity, and your satisfaction and “peace shall be as a river.”

Another temptation is described in the fifth chapter of Proverbs. Let every young man read that chapter. Its declarations are words of truth and soberness. Let them be believed and adhered to, and never permitted to escape from your memory. So shall you be saved from deep degradation and woe.

These are a few of the many temptations which beset young men. Guard against them as deadly foes to your happiness. Remember that vices assault the young in gangs. Admit one vice, and it will exert all its influence to make way for another, and another—increasing in strength as they multiply in numbers, until you fall a prey to every species of iniquity:

“The first crime pass’d, compels us into more,
And guilt grows fast, that was but choice before.”

“With many persons,” says D’Argonne, “the early age of life is passed in sowing in their minds the vices that are most suitable to their inclinations; and the middle age goes on in nourishing and maturing these vices; and the last age concludes in gathering in pain and anguish, the bitter fruit of these wretched seeds.” The only safe method to prevent reaping this wretched crop in old age, is to avoid sowing the seed in youth. Let the seed you now plant in the moral soil, be temperance, honesty and virtue, and in advanced years, they will afford you a harvest of respectability and ease.

A GRAND-FATHER’S LETTERS TO HIS GRAND-CHILDREN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

LETTER SEVENTH.

As you will find some explanatory observations on the first three chapters of Matthew’s Gospel, in the seventh and current volumes of the paper in the columns of which you find this series of letters, and as you will find some interesting, rational, and illustrative remarks upon the temptation of Jesus narrated in the 4th chapter, in the 3d No. of the current volume, I have yielded to a pressing desire to enter at once upon that most important discourse which is usually styled “the Sermon on the Mount,” and which commences with the 3d verse of the 5th chapter.

I will, first, submit to you a few considerations, by the help of which you will be able to perceive the purpose and scope of the several parts of this discourse, and its adaptation to the state of sentiment existing among those to whom it was addressed, as well as among those for whose use Matthew penned it. You will then endeavor to make out what you suppose to have been the meaning of our divinely commissioned Teacher, each one for himself, in each separate sentence or paragraph, and having let your parents know the results of your unassisted inquiries and reflections, you may proceed to ascertain the views of professed commentators, or consult my remarks, with an interest and a profit which would not exist, without having made the previous reflections and exertions of your own.

I know not by what means I can succeed in enabling you to conceive with what intensity—with what impatience, the Jews, about the time of Jesus, were looking for the revival of their national independence, their freedom from Roman bondage, and the setting up of the kingdom of which Daniel had prophesied (ii: 44). I may say that the expectations of these events which were generally, perhaps universally, entertained, were ardent, all-absorbing and incessant. It led to many false announcements, “Lo! here is Christ (or the King); and lo! there.” The expectation of their kingdom and their Messiah, or anointed King, was uppermost in the thoughts of the Jews of that age. To address them upon these subjects, was to secure a ready hearing. This is one reason why Jesus so frequently addressed to them parables and other discourses relating to “the kingdom of heaven.”

Unfortunately there existed in the minds of the expectants of the new kingdom, very erroneous ideas of its nature. Instead of a dispensation, or system of legislation calculated to advance them in the scale of intelligent and religious beings, to extend their knowledge of God, and facilitate their approximation to his likeness, they expected a governor and a government of their own, by whose means they would throw off the Roman yoke, would become an independent people once more, and perhaps the conquerors and masters of the world. Instead of good news which should be unto all people, they expected only national regency and an increase of God’s favors to themselves. You would be much interested, I think, by a perusal of the latter part of Foster’s Essay on Popular Ignorance, in which these erroneous conceptions current among the Jews, and maintained with the most inveterate and unreasonable obstinacy, are shown to be the cause of their rejection of the true Christ or Messiah, and of their national destruction with all its manifold horrors and disasters.

It appears to have been the object of Jesus, in this discourse, to disabuse the Jews of their errors and prejudices as to this subject. Accordingly he attacks, in the very exordium, some of those misconceptions which we can readily conceive to have been the most prevalent. For instance, in the opening sentence he opposes the common error, that when their new government was established, it would be well with the rich and the great—with those whose wealth or whose rank would promote them to lucrative or exalted stations, and to the notice of their prince; and endeavors to have them understand that those who cared little about rank or wealth,—whom they would be disposed to call poor-spirited,—that those whose pursuit was “clean hands and a pure heart”—that such would be sharers in the new kingdom, its administration and advantages. It will be a profitable exercise for you to endeavor to make out what were the mistaken or erroneous sentiments, against which each one of these eight beatitudes was levelled by our Divine Teacher, and likewise to be sensible of, and be able to show how the happiness which is pronounced as the portion of each individual disposition and description of character, may be said to be, with fitness, the appropriate allotment of each. Undertake this task, and after having thought yourselves “hungry” upon these topics, you may resort with more interest and more profit to the consultation of the opinions of other men. I have, not unfrequently, listened with surprise and profit to the original ideas which have been the product of the reflections of minds as young and as unacquainted with biblical subjects as you are. Be encouraged, therefore; you will never know your own abilities, nor acquire a rational confidence in your own opinions, unless you venture to walk alone—to form judgments without the aid of other men's thoughts—unless you venture to swim without being bolstered and buoyed up by bladders of other men's blowing. My opinions you will have upon the remaining beatitudes, and upon the rest of the discourse, in my next letters.

I hope you will earnestly pursue your studies in Natural Theology. Lord Brougham, long before the publication of his late work, has said, that the pleasure derived from this study is unceasing, and so various, that it never tires the appetite;—it elevates and refines our nature;—it teaches us to look upon all earthly objects as insignificant—except the pursuit of knowledge and the cultivation of virtue, that is to say, the strict performance of our duty in every relation of society;—and it gives a dignity and importance to the enjoyment of life, which the frivolous and the grovelling can not even comprehend. That ye may so find it, is the desire of

A SISTER'S LOVE.

"What is Beauty?" So asked a stranger who was roaming the world over, in search of that ideal perfection of which poets sing.

"There," says the miser, pointing to his yellow heap,—"there is beauty—such as gladdens the heart and makes the pillow softer than the cygnet's down."—"Such as corrodes the heart, taints every fine and generous feeling and plants the thorn of anxiety in every pillow!" says the stranger.

"Here," says the votary of nature's excellence—"see this gentle rose of the valley—how sweet it blushes! and this lilly of the meadow—how carefully it unfolds its delicate petals to the warm sunbeams!"—"Ah," says the stranger, "the lilly fades with the day, and the rose blushes for the thorn it conceals beneath."

"Look then," continues nature's resolute advocate, "see the leaping cataract, the deep rolling ocean, the cragged rocks o'er your head, the lightning's glare and thunder's peal!" "More terrible than beautiful!" says the stranger.

"Here," says the victim of Cupid's archery, "the pearl is found. See the vermillion hues of this gentle angel—the eyes that sparkle with intellectual fire—the lips that lisp a nightingale's melody."—"Friend," says the stranger, "the sweetest serenade lures to the fiercest monster—the ignis fatuus glitters but over the deepest quagmires, and the vermillion hues, a harmless drop of water may show to be but the drug itself."

In despair, the stranger was turning away to commune with his misanthropic self—when his eyes fell upon a prodigal brother leaning on the arm of a tender sister. Despair and repentance were depicted on his haggard countenance, and he would, but dare not meet the fond gaze that beamed from a sister's eye. "Brother, smile again—we forgive you all—smile and speak to me as you used—we love you still—you are yet our brother!" "I am content," says the stranger, "I have found the pearl—the question is answered—What is beauty?" A Sister's Love! A BROTHER.

COMMENDABLE LIBERALITY.

The believers and promoters of the doctrine that "God is the Saviour of all men," have often had just occasion to speak in terms of disapprobation of the course pursued in regard to them by the opposition. There certainly is cause for censure in the undeniable fact, that those to whom the people look for instruction, have frequently misrepresented our faith. Why is it that there is so general a misapprehension of the nature of our views, by the members of other denominations? One principal cause of this, I apprehend, is, that those who preach another doctrine, frequently, in these days, undertake to preach Universalism, or to inform their hearers relative to this sentiment. One evidence that it is not correctly set forth by them is found in the fact, that these persons, when they hear us preach, often distrust our sincerity. Instances are not wanting where they have been known to inquire with an air of doubting—Does that man believe what he preaches? Is this Universalism? It must, also, be acknowledged as true, for it cannot be denied, that it is the almost uniform "policy of the opposition," to exhort their hearers against listening to the preachers of Universalism as no good would accrue therefrom. This they say and do; evincing their consistency by their example.

I have remarked that this was the general course pursued, and this being the case, it is with much pleasure that I communicate the following account, as it is so much in accordance with Christian charity, and withal a compliance, as far as it may be, with the injunction of the Apostle, "Prove all things." The writer of this has occasionally preached at Lockport, Jefferson county, N. Y.—I fulfilled an appointment there, a few weeks since, during the time of a protracted meeting by the Methodists of that place and vicinity. On arriving at the village, I was informed that the preacher in attendance the day previous, had not only given notice of our meeting, but expressed a desire that his hearers might be present. And I am happy to state that by this recommendation, our congregation was somewhat enlarged; among others there were three Methodist clergymen, and all listened with respectful attention to the message of the speaker; and after uniting in a hymn of praise, as we felt that "the spirit of the Lord" was present, liberty was given for farther remark, but no one present improving this privilege, we called on one of the clergymen present, whom we recognized as Rev. Mr. Phelps, to offer the concluding prayer. Having joined with him in devout thanksgiving and fervent prayer to Almighty God, the congregation was dismissed. We humbly trust that the blessing of the Lord was with us in that meeting, and that many hearts felt the heavenly influence of the religion of the Gospel.—And we would fain hope that such instances of Christian courtesy might occur again and again; then, we might confidently expect that all feelings contrary to the spirit of the Gospel, would soon cease to exist among the followers of one common Lord and Master.

I have visited this place once since the foregoing, and was pleased to learn that our friends there still exhibited a laudable zeal, and that a good spirit prevailed generally. On this evening, also, we observed Mr. Phelps in the congregation, but as he was much fatigued with the labors of the day, having attended an appointment at some distance, he declined taking any part in the services. Our meeting was closed by a few of our friends singing that well known hymn, "Come, then, O, my soul."

Some individuals, we have not been informed how many, have been convinced of the necessity and importance of religion to happiness, at the protracted meeting mentioned in this communication. They are affectionately invited to persevere until they find the "pearl of great price." May they diligently search the Scriptures with a becoming independence of mind, remembering that "truth maketh free," and that for the proper improvement of their privileges they are accountable to their own understandings, and to their Maker. And may all strive "to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace."

AFFECTING FACT.

I recently visited a friend—a widow with a family of children, and no other means of support but their industry—yet I found her cheerful, trusting in the Lord, and rejoicing in the full assurance of his pardoning love to all the apostate sons and daughters of Adam—a faith to which, before the death of her husband, she had been a stranger. Her husband was a man of good abilities, and had naturally a kind heart; but, alas! the monster Intemperance had poisoned the current of social affection and connubial love, and when under its blighting influence, he was any thing but a kind husband and a tender father. But death suddenly arrested him in his inebriate course, and he was called out of time in a deranged state of mind, without giving any evidence that he realized his situation or repented of his iniquity.

The solemn and awful manner of his death, powerfully awakened the fears and sensibilities of his wife; when, in the bitterness of her soul, she besought the Lord, to know if there were any hopes of mercy in his case—when (as she related,) it seemed as though a voice had said, "you have been by far the greatest sufferer on earth by his depravity; and now, if in your power, what punishment would you inflict upon him? would it be endless suffering?"

Judge of her reply, when the remembrance of his unkindness was buried with him in the dust, and nought but what was agreeable in his life was present to her imagination. What punishment would I inflict? What would I not endure to release him from suffering? I would even pass through the liquid flames of a burning lake to rescue him from endless woe! Then the question was repeated, "Are you more merciful than God?" She dared not answer in the affirmative, and from that moment she was enabled to "trust in the living God who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe," and to rejoice in that mercy which is not bounded by the narrow space of this short life, but endures forever; and in that love which many waters cannot quench nor the floods of iniquity drown.

That she and many other lone widows who are made desolate by deadly draughts of intoxicating liquors, may long enjoy the life-giving influence of the Gospel of peace, is the unceasing prayer of

BEARING THE CROSS.

"And whosoever doth not bear his cross, and come after me, he can not be my disciple." Luke xiv: 27.

As the phrase bearing the cross is frequently perverted and misunderstood, it may be well to remark, that it is derived from the mode of executing criminals by crucifixion—a capital punishment of that age and country. The criminal bore the cross to the place of execution—so that to say, you must take up your cross, implies that you must go, as if to your public execution—with the prospect of an ignominious death before you—or put your life in jeopardy.

The correspondent phrase with us, is taken from our mode of public execution, and we say, for instance of the signers of the Declaration of our National Independence, they acted with halts around their necks—with their lives in their hands.

Thus we see the meaning of our Saviour to be—not that a man must overcome his diffidence in speaking or praying in public, or his aversion to cold water in being baptized—but that he who was not willing to risk his life to proclaim the Gospel to persecuting Jews and intolerant Heathens, was not fit to be his disciple.

From the Trumpet.

TO REV. DOLPHUS SKINNER.

DEAR BROTHER—I perceive that the impression has been made by some one, I believe by your antagonist Mr. Campbell himself, that his visit to Boston made "no small stir," and that the Universalists here did not any of them see fit to enter into a controversy with him. The facts in the case, I believe, are these. Very little was known or said of Mr. Campbell while he was in Boston. If he came here to make an excitement, he certainly must have gone away disappointed; for with all the advertising his few friends gave him, it was a dead calm all the time he was here, and his congregations in general were small. He preached, principally, I have learned, at the small Christian church at the extremity of the city, and once or twice for the noted O. A. Brownson, at the Temple, and once in Federal street. You have, therefore, been led into an error in supposing that Mr. Campbell "preached in the presence of most" of the Universalist clergy of Boston and vicinity, as you state in your letter to Mr. Campbell of May 26th. I know of only two of our preachers who heard him.

Mr. Campbell did not call upon any of the Universalist clergy of this vicinity, that we have heard of; he did not attend at any of their churches, so far as we can learn; nor have we heard that in any of his public labors here, he ever mentioned the subject of Universalism. We did hear casually once, that he belabored the infidels; but in fact we heard very little about the man while he was in Boston, in any way. We are confident, if he had made an onset on Universalism, even in his small congregations, we should have heard of it in some way, but no such alarming (!) tidings reached our ears. We believe he accidentally met Br. Balfour in the street, or some bookstore, and was introduced to him. After his vamping so much about coming to Boston to attack Universalism, he was obliged, having accidentally fallen into company with one of its defenders, to say something about a discussion. He proposed a discussion, and Br. Balfour accepted his proposal, on the condition that it should be written in a book form. Mr. Campbell promised to begin; and from that time to this, Br. Balfour has been waiting in vain for him.

This is all we have ever heard about the visit to Boston. We are convinced there is no small touch of the braggadocio in this same Alexander Campbell. For his credit's sake, we advise him to advert no more to his visit at Boston.

Very respectfully, your Brother in Christ,
THOMAS WHITTEMORE.

REPLY.

TO REV. THOMAS WHITTEMORE.

DEAR BROTHER—I thank you for the information communicated in the foregoing epistle. In relation to Mr. Campbell's visit to Boston, I know nothing except from his own and others' accounts of it. I was aware that his fame was not as great at the East as at the West. For at the West he is considered the lion of controversialists, the invincible champion in all theological combats. One of our correspondents in Ohio lately wrote us, that he was regarded like Achilles of old, as absolutely invulnerable except in one small spot in the heel. (Whether he had been dipped in the river Styx, or not, our correspondent did not inform us.) And he expected I would succeed in finding that vulnerable spot. I am inclined to the opinion, however, that he has more vulnerable points than one, whether my feeble talents are sufficient to reach them or not. I am at the same time free to acknowledge, that in tact and adroitness in management, I believe he has no superior, and few, if any, equals in this country.

Respecting the error into which you suppose I have fallen concerning the occurrences at Boston, I can only say, if it be one, Mr. C.'s own language led me into it. See his April letter, in which he says, "I learned most of these gentlemen (the constellation of Universalist preachers at Boston) heard me speak while in Boston, and perhaps allude to their dogmas."

Your account of his interview with Mr. Balfour differs materially from his own. In his letter to me published in this paper of March 3d, he says, "While in Boston I took occasion to intimate to Mr. Balfour (to whom I had an introduction, while visiting the book-stores for the purpose of purchasing his books) that I thought the question at issue between him and other Christians had not yet been fully or fairly discussed—that I had just read the discussion between Mr. Thomas of Philadelphia and Dr. E. S. Ely, and was more fully convinced that neither of these gentlemen met the exact question fairly. Mr. Balfour observed, that if I would write something on the subject he would reply to it. I remarked that I would prefer to have a viva voce discussion of the whole matter, and then a publication if necessary. He declined such a discussion, on the ground of his not being in favor of that species of controversy; and so the matter ended."

Now, I would like, as a matter of curiosity, as well as information, to have Mr. Balfour's account of the interview, and the agreement, (if any agreement was made,) in his own language. I am inclined, however, from various circumstances, to the opinion that Mr. C. was not really as anxious to engage in a discussion of Universalism, as he would seem to be, from some of his declarations.

Very respectfully yours in the Gospel,
D. SKINNER.

THE WILL.

This excellent tale, by an excellent female correspondent of this paper, not only ably illustrates the unhappiness caused by dishonesty, and the pleasures of conscious virtue superadded to a firm belief in God's impartial grace; but it also portrays the baneful influences of a principle too commonly acted upon by many religionists of the present day. The old Jesuitical maxim,

"THE END JUSTIFIES THE MEANS," is not confined to the Order of Jesus, in the Roman Catholic Church, but is extensively and perseveringly followed by immense numbers in the Protestant churches in this country. I allude not to the practices of demagogues—unprincipled and corrupted politicians—who hold that "all is fair in politics," with whom our free country is so heavily and extensively cursed—who are the disgrace, and must be the ruin of every honorable political party—but to those who claim almost exclusively the name of religionists, Christians, evangelical (rather damatory) professors, etc.

Gain the confidence, and awaken and bring forth the hidden feelings of almost any intelligent, respectable and honorable Presbyterian of the new-school party—induce him to speak candidly of the proselyting revival measures pursued by his denomination—and he will unhesitatingly condemn and disapprove of the management, trickery, and disgusting buffoonery of such men as Burchard, Littlejohn, Finney, Foote, etc., etc. Ask him why he countenanced such measures—why he did not openly oppose and reprobate them, when they were put in operation in the church of which he was a member, instead of tacitly admitting, succumbing to, and aiding in them; and he will answer you in language like the following: "Oh, the man's labors appeared to be blessed of God in the conversion of souls, and though his measures were disgusting to me, because they savored of impiety, irreverence and low, vulgar buffoonery, yet I knew there were those who could be easier wrought upon thus, than by sober appeals to God's word, and more rational measures, and more decent and reverent means." Now, what is this excuse, but saying, "I believed the end would justify the means?"

Several times I have had opportunities of hearing the above, or precisely similar excuses, given by sensible Partialists, in relation to the scandalous measures of certain revival preachers of their respective sects—and from my own observations, and that of others, I am induced to believe that the cases in which such answers might be obtained in similar conversations, are numerous—very numerous, indeed. I speak it in shame for my fellow Christians, who profess so deep an abhorrence of Romanism, and yet confessedly practice on one of the most pernicious, detestable maxims of the Jesuits, in holy things!

How many Partialist clergymen, too, there are, who, to impress with greater earnestness the doctrines of their creeds, or the practice of religious duties, on the minds of their hearers, will apply passages of Scripture as they know they should not be applied—who will paint hell as a local place, filled with material fires, smoke and tortures, and use such other accordant exaggerations, as they themselves would blush in indignation if charged with seriously believing their own descriptions?—Why, then, do they preach such falsehoods?—for falsehoods they themselves deem them, if they do not themselves believe them true. "Oh," say or reason they, "the vulgar mind can not appreciate refined spiritual descriptions—many believe just as I preach—apply those passages just as I apply them in my sermons, and I think it will have a better effect to preach to them what they believe, rather than what I believe." Is this not virtually declaring, that "the end justifies the means?"

Do not misunderstand me—I am not writing against accommodated uses of Scripture passages—or against a use of this language in a figurative description. No—far from it—my objection extends only to those too common perversions of Scripture, and literal applications of figurative language, by which so many people are kept enslaved in the thick darkness of error and superstition, by their spiritual guides.

But are Universalists wholly free from this Jesuitical policy? Not altogether. I have heard some of our brethren—one or two, only, I admit; but then that was one or two too many—who used arguments to prove Universalism, in whose soundness they themselves did not really rely, when they could have adduced one hundred better ones, had not sheer indolence or carelessness prevented them. In another case, I heard a ministering brother, whose means of knowing better no one can doubt, exalt the character of Universalism by an argument which I can scarcely believe he himself deemed perfectly sound. As it will be a good illustration of what I mean to condemn, and show the errors to which carelessness in speech, or the warmth of extempore speaking, may lead a good man, I will mention the argument.

Speaking of the denial of Jesus, by Peter the apostle, and the charge made against Peter that he was one of Christ's followers, (see Matt. xxvi: 73,) because his speech betrayed him, the preacher said that the early Christians, being so harmless and undefiled in their conduct—so pious and devout in their speech, could readily be known thereby, and that Peter could have pursued no more effectual course to convince the Jews he was not a Christian, than to use profane language. He applied this to Universalists; who, while acting in accordance with their faith, can not curse and swear, and who can never better convince an opposer that they are not Universalists, than by damning to endless wrath their fellow-beings. This was ingenuity—but is it perfectly candid and fair to apply the words "thy speech betrayeth thee," to Peter's freedom from profanity? Certainly not; for Peter had used an oath previously—Matt. xxvi: 72. What, then, is meant by the "speech" of Peter? See Mark xiv: 70, and Luke xxii: 59, and you will perceive that it relates to the Gallilean dialect, or brogue, which distinguished Peter from those around him, and led them to suspect him. And it is doubtful whether his swearing or his not swearing had any weight, whatever, in their minds—or, if it had, whether Peter's profanity would not rather convince the ignorant enemies of Jesus that he was a follower of the Nazarene, than otherwise; seeing that they believed Christ to be a low fellow, and his followers to be vile contemners of the law of Moses, and disturbers of the public peace.

But enough—and ten times more than I intended writing when I commenced the article. The principle of doing evil that good may come of it, is expressly forbidden by Christian religion and morality, and no follower of Jesus has any excuse for believing and acting on the principle, that "the end justifies the means."

DEDICATION AT DUANESBURGH.

On Tuesday, the 20th inst., the new and beautiful church lately erected at Eaton's Corners, in Duaneburg, Schenectada county, by the Universalist society of that town, was solemnly dedicated to the worship of the one, only living and true God. The following was the order of the services on that occasion.

1. Voluntary. 2. Introductory prayer by Br. M. B. Newell. 3. Hymn. 4. Reading select Scriptures by Br. H. Belding. 5. Dedicatory hymn. 6. Sermon by Br. D. Skinner, from Isaiah lv: 2, 3. 7. Dedictory prayer by Br. T. J. Whitcomb. 8. Select piece of music. 9. Benediction.

The day, fortunately or unfortunately, (we are in doubt which to call it,) was exceedingly stormy, the rain falling in one uninterrupted torrent from daylight till the hour appointed for the services to commence. Consequently at the beginning of the service, (though delayed nearly an hour,) the house was not more than about one-third full; but the number kept increasing as the services advanced, and before they closed the house appeared completely filled with the most devout and attentive hearers. So earnest were those who came last, and had heard but a small part of the sermon, to have another discourse, that they might not be sent empty away, that I consented to gratify them, and so preached another sermon to a full house, in the afternoon.

It was the general opinion expressed, that, had the weather and going been pleasant, the house would not have held a fourth part of the number that would have attended; so that many more would have been accommodated for want of seats, than were accommodated by the rain as it was.

The house is very pleasantly situated near a beautiful grove of trees—built of wood, of good quality, and put together in a manner to do honor to the master builder. It is surmounted by a dome or tower calculated to receive a bell which will probably be procured ere long. It is handsomely painted out-side and in; has a gallery on three sides, and will accommodate about four hundred hearers.

Much praise is due to the zeal and fidelity of our brethren composing this society, for their commencement and completion of this beautiful and commodious temple for divine worship. They are now apparently in a very flourishing and prosperous condition, happily united and greatly blessed under the judicious and well-timed labors of Br. H. Belding, who for two or three years past has labored with them in word and doctrine. Long may they continue to be blessed with these distinguished mercies—a commodious house of worship, a faithful pastor to break to them the bread of eternal life, and hearts and dispositions to appreciate and improve the privileges they enjoy—that on each returning Sabbath for generations to come, they may “walk to the house of God in company,” and “take sweet counsel together” in the “unity of the spirit and the bond of peace.” D. ROBERT SMITH.

Our readers may remember an advertisement of this individual, by L. F. W. Andrews, which was published in our columns, during the last Spring—in substance, warning the subscribers to the Southern Pioneer against paying any monies to said Smith. In reply to it, there is now before me a letter from Robert Smith, dated “Albany, May 14th,” and mailed at “Rome, May 24th” (I believe), which states in substance as follows.

He (Robert Smith) sent out the private circulars to the debtors to the Pioneer, calling on them to make payment to him, sending it to his address, alone, while Br. Andrews was absent—while Br. McCune, the other partner, was also absent—at a time when he (R. S.) had expended all his funds on the paper, and was not sufficiently supplied by Br. Andrews to carry on the publication without payments from the subscribers; and gave the singular directions, because he suspected that letters addressed to the firm, or the establishment, were obtained by another person, and their contents withheld from him. He therefore bases the circular on necessity from the circumstances of the case, and on self-defence—disavowing all intentions of using the funds thus obtained, for any other purpose than publishing the paper.

With his recriminations and accusations of other individuals, neither I nor our readers have any thing to do—they add not to his defence, and only tend to keep alive the war now raging among a number of our brethren involved in the concern. I believe I have given his defence truly—and our readers may receive it for what it is worth. The patrons of the Pioneer will perceive that he does not demur to their paying L. S. Everett, or his successor, P. Price, under the present arrangements. A. B. G.

L. F. W. ANDREWS.

Our readers may remember some strictures I made on a circular issued by this individual, calling on the former patrons of the Southern Pioneer to return the “Union” to its publisher, and order the Southern Evangelist in its stead. Br. Andrews, for the purpose of correcting any false impressions those strictures may have made on the public mind, has written a letter, dated “Columbus, Georgia, May 25th,” in which he gives a detailed statement of the reasons which induced him to transfer the subscription list of the Pioneer to Br. L. S. Everett, with the express understanding that it should not be transferred to the Universalist Union. As this is not material to his explanation, and involves another person (who, in his turn might claim liberty to defend himself in our columns,) I pass it by, and insert the following, only.

“Fearing that the Southern subscribers of the Pioneer might censure me for an act with which I had nothing to do. I was induced to send the circular complained of, simply with the view therein stated, that those Pioneer subscribers who felt themselves imposed on by receiving the Union in lieu of the Pioneer, might understand that I was in no way to blame for the substitution—and also to give them an opportunity of supplying themselves with a periodical more in unison with their own feelings and the social institutions by which they are surrounded, than the Union was believed to be.

“I had no other motive in the matter than what has now been stated. I have never sold or transferred the Pioneer list to the proprietor of the Evangelist on any terms. I have no interest whatever in procuring the late Pioneer subscribers to take the Evangelist instead—and if every subscriber to the former were to drop the Union and take the Evangelist it would not benefit my pocket a single penny!—On the contrary it is MY INTEREST that the Pioneer subscribers should take the Union, at least for a season, as thereby those indebted for the six months of the paper received from the late proprietors, will be enabled the more readily to pay up their dues (ordered to be paid to P. Price,) all of which is to be applied to the liquidation of the remaining notes in L. S. Everett's hands! I have therefore about $700 dollars interest in the N. Y. Universalist Union!—a kind of stock I would willingly part with the moment my own paper is given up.

“So much then, Br. Grosh, for my ‘dishonorable attempt to scare, drive and wheedle’ the late patrons of the Pioneer in order to ‘make a few dollars for myself.’ And so much also for your ungenerous thrust that I have been guilty of the ‘despicable thing’ of ‘tampering with a brother publisher's patrons.’”

He then professes himself unconvinced of the falsity of his charges against the Union, as an abolitionist paper—asks not for “pity,” except as an injured person, and demands justice from those who shall know all the facts. In a P. S. he remonstrates against being held accountable for the acts of Robert Smith, having done all he could to express his unqualified reprobation of them.

While I am aware that different persons view the same actions and understand the same language, differently, I still feel unable to justify that circular—especially that part which calls on the receivers of the Union forthwith to abandon it, and take the Evangelist in its stead. This is certainly tampering with the patrons of a brother publisher—whether the motive is to make money by it or to indulge a petty animosity to him, for a supposed difference of opinion on a subject which has never been introduced but once, and then only incidentally, and by a correspondent, into the columns of the paper in question—even admitting as proof, all Brs. Andrews and Fisk can possibly adduce to establish their charge of abolitionism against the Union. But even admit all they charge to be true—still, the circular was a tampering with the fears of the Pioneer subscribers, who in the absence of proof, should at least have been permitted to examine the Union for themselves, and judge it by its contents.

But enough. Our readers have both sides before them and can judge for themselves. A. B. G.

T. FISK.

This individual also calls on me to retract some assertions I made respecting him in my remarks on the Circular by Br. Andrews, addressed to the patrons of the Southern Evangelist. His honied words in commendation of my “proverbial” coolness, candor, and love of justice—on my being “a model of prudence and discretion,” were well nigh turning my poor head with vanity—but then I reflected that if I did not keep cool, candid, just, prudent, and discreet, I would certainly forfeit all these sugar-candy praises—so I set my face straight-forward, and looked at the job before me—and here is the result.

I stated that “I could not have believed Br. Andrews guilty of such conduct, either to make a few dollars for himself, or to injure one whom he deems his enemy.” Here is an alternative in the motives—I still think, from all the circumstances of the case, that one or the other must have been the motive. The only shadow of proof that a love for Southern slavery was the actuating cause, is found in a small part of one of Br. Lefevre's letters from Europe, which was published in the Union. It was copied into this paper, yet no war has been declared against the Magazine and Advocate as an abolitionist paper. It was published in the Watchman—yet no war has been declared against that as an abolitionist paper. Why, then, the war against the Union? Can a single paragraph, written by its proprietor, or either of its Editors, be adduced to prove that the Union is an abolitionist paper? If it can, let it be done, for until it is done, I must believe that all this hue and cry against the Union is based in enmity to its proprietor, or in a hope of profiting by the injury these false charges may do to the Universalist Union.

The professed “disregard of dollars and cents” in Br. Fisk, was also coupled with his professed “romance and honor.” I still hold to one of these alternatives. I do deem it dishonorable to charge the Union with being an engine of abolitionism of the Arthur Tappan stamp, unless some proof can be adduced. I do deem it dishonorable to charge Brs. Sawyer, Price, Williams, Williamson and Thomas with being abolitionists, and then adduce in proof (as Br. Fisk does in the Southern Evangelist, of June 3, page 125, column 2,) an extract from Br. Lefevre's Letters from Europe, in which he incidentally names slavery as a thing he could not defend against the strictures of Europeans on our own country! This is proof, with a vengeance!!!

In conclusion, I admit I was wrong in intimating that Br. Fisk was the proprietor of the Evangelist—it was not done intentionally, however, but in the obliviousness induced by concentrating the mind on a different subject. That part of my strictures, I retract fully and unequivocally, and solicit his forgiveness for the act. But while it exempts him from pecuniary motives in his hostility to the Union, it increases the presumption that other motives, no less disgraceful actuate him. A. B. G.

The Merrimack River Association met in South Weare, N. H., May 31st. Brs F. A. Hodsdon, Moderator; C. S. Hussey, Clerk. Appointed Br. Hodsdon, Standing Clerk—Br. Bartlett and Hussey to visit all the societies in the Association, destitute of the preached word, to counsel and encourage them—Br. Hussey to prepare the minutes—Br. Hodsdon to preach the next occasional sermon—and eight lay brethren as delegates to the State Convention. Restricted the limits of the Association to the counties of Merrimack and Hillsborough, Cheshire county having an association in its limits, by its name. Sermons were delivered by Brs. Ciley, Laws, Balch and Moore. Ordination was conferred on Br. Hussey. Adjourned to meet in Hopkinton, on the last Wednesday and following Thursday in May, 1838.

A new Association was organized at Pittsburgh, Pa. on the 8th inst. as we learn from the Glad Tidings and Ohio Christian Telescope. Br. George N. Cox was chosen Moderator, and Br. S. A. Davis, Clerk. After consultation, it was resolved to form an Association to embrace the societies, circuits and congregations in the western parts of Pennsylvania and Virginia, and the adjacent parts of Ohio, to be governed by such constitution and by-laws as shall hereafter be agreed upon by the Association. Br. Cox was appointed to designate the time and place of the next meeting; and Br. S. A. Davis, M. Hull, and Dr. J. P. Tibbits, were appointed to select a name, and draft a constitution, to be submitted to that meeting. Adjourned to meet at such time and place as shall be designated by the committee as above.

LOOK ALOFT.

BY MISS U. M. FENTON.

"Look Aloft"—were the words to a trembling boy,
On the ship's dizzy height, just ready to fall;
Not used to the ship, he obeyed, and with joy
In safety descended and blest the glad call.

So in "life's sluggish path, where few roses we find,"
And friendship so often deceives us in part,
May these blest words of comfort find the way to our mind,
"Look Aloft"—and be firm, and be faithful of heart!

There no sorrows shall come, all cares have an end,
The hopes we have cherished will not fade away—
There Jesus will reign our blest Shepherd and Friend,
And the heart of the mourner rejoice in his sway.

Then "Look aloft"—"Look aloft"—lift thine eye to the star
That shone on mankind at Immanuel's birth,
Which, though hope has deserted and comfort's afar,
Never ceases to bless the fair children of earth.

WATCH AND PRAY.

How oft the great, th' exalted fall
From honor's towering height,
Lost to themselves, the world, and all
That made their path-way bright.
From reason's rules, mankind will stray,
When they neglect to watch and pray.

Those who are blest with virtue, fame,
And intellectual light—
With all the lustre of a name,
Truth, wisdom, worth, and might—
Their splendid glories fade away,
When o'er they cease to watch and pray.

Ye who ambition's height would gain,
Take heed ye do not fall!
The strongest heads, doth pride make vain
While deaf to wisdom's call,
And those who choose her pleasant way,
Will strictly watch and humbly pray.

Deep, dark, and hidden in the land
Of men—in treacherous mood,
Vice sits. And through their senses, darts
A multifarious brood
Of ills. To crush her tyrant sway,
Weak mortals need to watch and pray.

A thousand forms the syren wears,
A thousand hues partakes—
Decoys frail victims, and ensnares,
In webs, they may not break,
With human passions wont to play,
They are her toys. Then watch, and pray.

LIGHTNING.

We are aware that some people think that "if they were born to be struck by lightning, it is but folly to attempt to avert the blow, yet we believe no such doctrine. The laws of electricity are now pretty well understood, and it is just as reasonable to live in accordance with them, as with other laws of nature. To remove from a strong current of air to escape a stroke of lightning, is just as philosophical as to step aside to shun a precipice; it is equally as wise to insure your building from lightning by a good conductor, as to insure it from our common fires, at a premium of one and a half per cent.—To betray symptoms of fear in any case, is unmanly, but to use one's reason to avert danger is altogether a different thing. The best safeguard against lightning is a good conductor, kept in complete repair, and next to this a group of lofty trees; but where a dwelling is protected by neither, it is highly prudent for its inmates to betake themselves during a heavy thunder storm to the safest places in it. As the air is a very bad conductor of electricity, it always seeks to move in and with the current, and hence it is always dangerous in a thunder storm to sit down between two windows or at the entrance of a door. Had the person killed at Harrisburg last Summer, known this fact, the sad catastrophe had been avoided. Again, the air in a chimney being rarified by the heat below, the electric fluid often enters a house in this direction. Hence, persons should never seat themselves immediately before a fire-place in a dangerous storm. When the electric fluid does not enter the door or chimney of a house, it usually strikes one corner of the roof, and passes along the rafters, timbers, or sides of the building until it enters the hearth. On this account it is unsafe to sit in the corner or to lean against the side of a room, during heavy electric discharges.—It is also dangerous to stand before a mirror; the quicksilver and gilt of which is a good conductor of lightning; indeed the preference of all metallic substances should be avoided on the same principle. The safest position in a house as regards lightning, is in bed, the feathers of which it is composed, being a bad conductor of electricity. It is said that no person has ever been struck by lightning in this position, unless their limbs were in contact with the frames. As a proof of this remark, we once saw a house containing twenty-five persons, literally torn to pieces by lightning without injury to any one.—They were all in bed. Next to a bed, the centre of the room, closed up on the windward side, is the safest position in which we can place ourselves.

MENTAL LABOR.

"With what ease he writes!" said a young lady, as she laid down one of Washington Irving's volumes.—Straightway we made up our mind that the young lady did not know what she was talking about. Had she said "How easy it is to read his works," we could have sympathized with her amazingly. Then finding we could not make a satisfactory reply without compromising our honesty, we felt to making a comparison in silence. The steam-boat glides majestically and gracefully through the waters, but it is no easy power that gives to the water-traveller her steady and rapid motion. It is true she is tastefully painted and gilded; her cabins are pleasant, and her prow decorated with specimens of the sculptor's art. But descend with the engineer to his fiery domain; swelter there in the burning pit; see the heated grease, and listen to the bursting steam; see the tremendous power of fire and water combined until the strained and groaning boiler threatens to burst asunder, and deluge the decks with the heated fluid. You will perceive that ease, although a mild and a pleasant daimsel, has a confounded rough old father. Little dreamed the admirer of Irving how much agonizing toil was required to beget that ease which she so much delighted in. Yet she was not alone in her error. How many a publisher thus lightly estimates the labor of his weary author! How many a tradesman smiles at the trifling employments of the man of genius! We have been mad enough to eat an oyster supper, when we have heard a peasant draw an invidious comparison between himself and the poor wight whose intellect supplied him with bread.—"I get my living by the sweat of my brow," said he "while you are trifling away your time with books and papers."

Yes, see that pale hungry being startled from his task by the sound of the midnight bell. See how his fingers grasp the pen convulsively, as he fears his task will not be done in time—a slave to men whose pockets are better lined than their pericraniums, and who mete out to him his starveling pittance with the unwilling hand of an upper servant dealing out cold pancakes and sausage ends to a beggar. See him place both hands on his snapping brain, as the fires of fancy dart from Appollo's mount upon his withering soul. Yes, "how easy he writes."—Eglantine.

THE COUNTRY.

The country begins to be delightful—like one beloved, it is all smiles, beauty, and good humor: the blossoms are its smiles—the many-tinted green its never-wearying beauty—and the bland breath of Summer imparts to it, and reveals its own felicity. The spirit of enjoyment is abroad—we hear its music in the wood, and the murmuring rivulet: its whispering among the young leaves and the aspiring grass! The whip-poor-will echoes it in his evening lay, and the many songs of the morning proclaim how full of happiness is nature! W.

PROPOSALS

For publishing a new original work—in 20 semi-monthly Nos.—of 24 pages each—duodecimo, designed to compose a neat volume of 480 pages, closely printed, on paper equal to that of the current volume of the Sentinel. It will be afforded to subscribers at one dollar the volume—payable invariably in advance.

The following are the articles of which the proposed work will be composed: 1st—Universal salvation directly and positively proven, from the ATTRIBUTES of God, his RELATIONS to man, and the decisive voice of INSPIRATION, 72 pp. 2d—Scriptural and popular objections to Universalism candidly considered and refuted, 96 pp. 3d—The bearings of the Universalist faith on the morals and the happiness of its subjects, illustrated by a story entitled THE PENNSYLVANIA VALLEY.

4th—4th—REVELATIONS FROM HELL—by a damned spirit. 48 pp. This will be found to bring to light some facts of a startling character. The balance will be made up of fragments;—incidents of travel—conversations—sketches of sermons, &c.

The undersigned has for some considerable time been impressed, that a work of the kind proposed is a desideratum in Universalist literature;—a work at once sufficiently popular in its style and diversified in its contents to secure it a general perusal, and at the same time sufficiently argumentative to afford assured conviction to the candid and sincere inquirer after truth, that our faith is authorized by inspiration, and is in accordance with sound philosophy. He has been prevented hitherto from attempting to supply this desideratum, by a want of leisure—of pecuniary means—and more especially by a desire and an expectation that some one of his more talented brethren would supersede him in the business; but as this has not been done, nor—from all that he can learn—is likely to be, he now at length invokes the patronage of Universalists in behalf of his production.

GOOD FOR EVIL.

BY MISS SARAH C. EDGARTON, OF SHIRLEY VILLAGE, MASS.

"Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you; that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven."—JESUS.

Gracie and Cleffie Alloway were walking upon the banks of one of the most romantic streams in New-England, just after the sunset of a rich day in August. The evening was one of rare beauty in this sultry month, for apart from the unwonted transparency of the atmosphere, there was a freshness and fragrance in the air, like that bestowed by an electric shower, or wafted by a southern sea breeze. And then the sky—what a gorgeous spectacle it presented, with its broad tracts of gold, scarlet, and crimson, rising one above another in waning brilliancy, till the ascendant hue became blended with the soft azure of the zenith. In the south-west shone the silver moon, and the vesper star, both peerless in their beauty; the one just resting its glittering horn upon the brow of the dark forest; the other lingering in the heavens, as though loth to depart from a world of such surpassing radiance.

The Penates could not have sent forth from the household shrines, two purer symbols of the domestic affection they would foster in the homes where they preside, than the sister maidens of our tale. There was a striking contrast between the serious dignity of the elder, as she watched with anxious, almost maternal solicitude, the fanciful and wayward creature at her side, and the sweet confidence and unnatural playfulness of the younger, gazing up into the countenance of her sister, so submissively and beseechingly one moment, and the next, darting away like a wild gazelle, without thought or purpose, and ringing out her voice in the clear, strange shout of a maniac.

The world would never call Gracie beautiful, but she had a surprisingly intellectual face; a broad, fair brow, and an eye that beamed unutterable eloquence; a smile of matchless sweetness, and an expression of wisdom and beneficence, that betrayed the impress of God's own spirit. In moral loveliness no saint ever shone fairer, none ever performed the Christian duties with a meeker grace, or sped on the Gospel mission with a more zealous faithfulness, than Gracie. She was a sister spirit of Mary of Bethany, and like that guileless and pure-hearted creature, far preferred the love of her Saviour, to the applause and admiration of the whole world. She had been trained in a school of sorrow and disappointment, from the very hour of her mother's death, and though their influence had chastened her heart, and cast a shade of pensiveness upon her face, they had brought forth the lofty energies of her mind in a beauty that was marvellous, and almost divine. Unloved by her father, and destitute of a friend to counsel and encourage her, she had turned her soul to the true fountain of its support, whence it inhaled deep draughts of faith and wisdom, that made it strong and vigorous to sustain every trial, and combat every adversary. Such was Gracie Alloway at the age of twenty years, to which period every grief and privation of her life seemed concentrated.

But though Gracie had afflictions, they were not of that desolating kind, that had stricken the young enthusiast at her side. Oh! how withering to Gracie's soul were the erratic wanderings and celestial fantasies of that bewildered creature, who deemed herself, in her sweet unconsciousness of suffering, an angel rambling from her Elysian home—a stray seraph from the bowers of Paradise, seeking assiduously the path that would lead her back to the heritage she had lost.

Cleffie was but seventeen, and fair as a Persian rose, with eyes like the dark gentian of our own forests; as deeply blue, and as delicately shaded by their long silken fringes; tender and melting in their tranquillity, but when touched by the flame of excited fancies, they shone with a clear and unearthly light, that was painful, ay, absolutely appalling, to those they gazed upon. Her mind was imbued with a strong tincture of romance, that had deepened with every added year of life; and though Gracie had resolved a thousand times, to restrain those wayward fancies, a tender word or an appealing look, would as often cause her to forget her resolutions, and to indulge the sweet being in all her poetic visions, and beautiful imaginings. Cleffie's mind had always aspired to Heaven, but had been withheld by the onerous chains that a sectarian education had fastened upon it, till they became too oppressive, too galling for endurance; and then bursting from its fetters with the loss of reason, its highest attribute, it soared through the bright realms of fancy without a guide, searching in vain for the "spirit-land" of its dreams.

Cleffie had always shrunk from the noisy fanaticism, that has too often received the name of religion, and with the instinctive delicacy of heart-felt piety, reserved her orisons for the closet, and the solitary shrine; but dictated by false and derogative ideas of the Deity she worshipped, her devotions were the tearful and trembling pleadings of a criminal, or a suppliant for mercy, rather than the deep and fervent thank-offerings of a faithful and trusting Christian.

A few months previous to the opening scene of our tale, a young and highly gifted Methodist clergyman, whose fame had spread far and wide over the country, and whose name is still cherished with reverence in the hearts of the fraternity, had entered the village of Mr. Alloway's residence, and produced an excitement that had never a parallel within its sphere. He had none of the rant and mad parade of the popular revivalists of later days—but with a strong and soul-stirring eloquence that came from the very depths of his heart, he won upon the feelings and sympathies of his audience, till they lived but in the light of his creations, and could neither move nor breathe, lest they should dispel the fascination that enthralled them.

Methodism was the prevailing faith in L——; and was therefore orthodoxy to Mr. Alloway, who was always so fortunate as to belong to the strongest party, be its principles what they might. He led his daughters to the chapel, where the star of the Wesleyan divinity was dazzling the mental vision of the devotees who sought its sanctuary, always eager to be foremost in what the world calls great, and ambitious that Gracie and Cleffie should be among the earliest proselytes. His hopes of Gracie were vain; she was steadfast in another and a better faith, which, with her characteristic frankness, she had previously avowed to him. But this had only the effect of exasperating him, and commanding her to be silent upon the subject in future, he obtained, by the harshest and most despotic menaces, her promise to use no persuasion to turn Cleffie from the belief in which she had been educated.

Poor Cleffie, ignorant of the bright destiny that awaits every child of Jehovah, listened to the penetrating eloquence of the potent genius, who swayed so irresistibly the imaginations of his auditors, with a deep and all-absorbing interest, that told, truly, how strong a spell intellect can throw upon the minds of its votaries. The preacher portrayed with all the vividness of a master-hand, the glories of the celestial world; seraphim and cherubim, angels and redeemed spirits, were the themes of his first prophecy, and with a glowing cheek, and an eye lit with inspiration, he withdrew the veil from the resplendent Paradise of his ideal creation, and made every heart palpitate with desire, and every soul aspire to its felicity. Then a "change came o'er the spirit of his dream;" the bright throng that the wand of his power had summoned up before the vision of his audience, faded from their view; and his voice was modulated to a deep and ominous tone, that blighted but too cruelly the hopes he had inspired. The theme of his prophecy was changed; it was no longer the mission of an angel, proclaiming glad tidings; but the wail of a mighty spirit in anguish, pleading for mercy, without hope; and in the terrific excitement which his passionate eloquence awakened, Cleffie's mind suffered the wreck of its reason, and almost of its vitality.

She lingered a long time, insensible to every thing in the outward world, yet with an apparent consciousness of some ill-defined, but actual evil that overshadowed her, and which wrung from her many a groan and startling shriek, so unlike the natural sweetness of her voice, as to pierce the hearts of the friends that watched over her, with an anguish as acute and insufferable as her own. Afterward followed a severe and dangerous fever, in which her mind changed its mood of despair, for one of bright visions and exuberant gaiety, which, however, was now and then interrupted by a recollection of some misfortune that had befallen her, or a fancied omen of some dark destiny that awaited her.

The day on which the incidents of our story commence, had been a tranquil one to Cleffie; a calm seemed to have fallen upon her spirit—she was more rational, gentle, and affectionate, than she had been since her illness. Gracie, ever sanguine in her hopes, felt sure that a favorable change was being wrought, and eager to advance her sister's recovery with all the expedition possible, had taken her abroad among the subjects of her love—the wild rocks and dancing waters, the shadowing leaves and bright-eyed flowers. But she soon became aware that this measure was an injudicious one, for the scenes that had an exhilarating influence upon Cleffie's mind in its health, had little power to operate soothingly upon it, in its present state of excitability. Its visions and vagaries became more fantastic and unreal every step she advanced, till Gracie became convinced that some resolute restraint must be imposed, and drew her somewhat irresistibly, beneath a beautiful willow by the brook-side, and seating her upon the bank, endeavored to subdue her excitement by serious words and reproving looks. Cleffie started up, and springing from her grasp, held up her little hand, and shook her head exultingly, and somewhat mischievously, as though defying all the fetters she could impose upon her wildness.

"Cleffie, you are unkind," said Gracie, striving in vain to restrain the hot tears that were bursting from her eyes, at this defeat of her fondest hopes—"you are perversely unkind!"

"I, unkind!" replied the lovely maniac, returning to her sister, and throwing her arms about her neck; "poor Gracie! how sadly you are deceived! But why these tears?" she continued, wiping the bright drops from Gracie's pale cheek; "I might say it is unkind of you to weep, when I am so very, very happy! Gracie, my mission is well nigh ended, and I must prepare to return to my Father. I have heard his summons, and why should I linger?"

She cast her eyes about her, glanced at the water and the flowers, then at Gracie, and paused a moment as though mazed by some mystery. "You are then aware of my destination, and have led me to this pretty boudoir, that I may tire myself for my journey. Well, this was kind of you, certainly, but I thought you were ignorant of my high calling—it was not revealed to me that you were to be my handmaid. How clearly the water glistens in this silent pool, like a mirror of burnished silver; and how profuse this green toilet is laden with bouquets and chaplets, and sweeter than oriental perfumes! Gracie, let me deck your hair," and throwing back her own little gypsy hat, she drew off Gracie's, and unfastening the rich plaits of her hair, let the long glossy braids fall in a heavy mass upon her shoulder.

"A scarlet flower to a raven tress," said Cleffie, and suiting the action to the words, she wove in a redundancy of cardinal flowers, with the inspiration of a French tire-maid. "There, now you will do," she exclaimed, casting an admiring glance at the fantastic grace she had wrought; "and here is a garland for me," she added, plucking a snow-white orchis, and twining it among her soft brown curls. "Not a wreath of orange flowers—they are for the bride—but the pure white flower that the angels wear. Gracie, do you know that I am an angel?"

It would not be very difficult to mistake you for one, thought Gracie. "Yes, Cleffie, I know that you are as good and pure-hearted as an angel," she replied.

"No, no, I did not mean that; there are such things as fallen angels, you know. Do you think it possible for such to regain their seats in Paradise?"

"Yes, Cleffie, with the aid of their Father, I do; with him all things are possible."

"True, and he has proffered me his aid, and—There! there! those are the tones! Follow me, Gracie"—and darting beneath the tall willows that skirted the stream, as fleetly as a glancing sunbeam, she was lost from sight, before her sister could remonstrate upon her impropriety, or check her by a single word. Intent upon one fantasy, she followed the sweet strains to their source, where a gentleman, young and graceful, with an open and highly expressive countenance, stood leaning against a tree, playing upon a flute. He paused in his minstrelsy, somewhat startled at the spiritual beauty of the young creature who stood so unceremoniously in his presence, and scarce knowing what to do, he bowed, and repeated the customary evening salutation. Cleffie was somewhat puzzled at this terrestrial movement in one from whom she was expecting a celestial mission, and glancing at his attire, thought it ill-befitted a habitation of the unsubstantial world—a spirit that flitted wings and basked in sunbeams. But as the most obvious solutions occurred to her mind, she addressed him:

"So you found it necessary to come in disguise; well, I might have expected it, knowing as I do, by sad experience, the dullness and incredulity of the world. Poor things, they have no understandings. Even Gracie, this good girl here, who calls herself my sister, cannot quite comprehend my nature and calling. But we had best not delay unnecessarily—are you ready?" she inquired, extending her beautiful little hand confidently towards him. He took it, and retaining it in his own, turned to Gracie, who stood weeping behind her sister, and asked if they had not best humor her fancy.

"I think not," she replied; "she seems so entirely engrossed by it, I fear it may lead her too far."

Cleffie gazed suspiciously at them a moment, and surmising the subject of their conference, released her hand, and springing upon the rude rail that had been extended across the stream, in lieu of a more substantial passway, darted along the tottering pole as fearlessly as a Swiss chamois-hunter; then stopping when she had reached the opposite bank, she turned toward the astonished companions she had left, while something like scorn flashed from her dark blue eyes, and exclaimed, "Deceivers! you have lost your power over me now!" then flitting "thro' brake and briar," she vanished from their sight.

The gentleman assisted Gracie to cross the brook, and pursuing the sweet fugitive, they soon discovered her standing quietly upon a flat rock that overhung a beautiful little cascade. "Do you think there is any danger to be apprehended from her delirium?" inquired Leslie Erskine, whose name, for convenience, we may as well introduce without further ceremony.

"Not while she is so happy; her disposition is too gentle for any violence, unless frenzied by despair, which, in her present mood, I should not think possible."

"But she may be misled by her enthusiasm," replied Erskine, "and this silvery water, leaping so musically from the rocks, and stealing away in its transparent beauty—forgive me for saying it, but I believe it to be very tempting to a maniac."

"To one weary and sick of life, it might be; but not, I am sure, to my light-hearted and gentle sister. I shall soon persuade her to return with me, I hope."

Erskine perceiving that his services were not thought necessary, by Gracie, and not feeling himself entitled to intrude upon her solitude, without an excuse, wished her a pleasant and a safe walk, and bowing gracefully, left her, and pursued his way back to his original position among the willows.

Cleffie calmly awaited Gracie's approach, till her feet touched the rock upon which she was standing, and then with the agile lightness of a fawn, she leaped upon a tall cliff that rose from the centre of the brook, just below the basin of the cascade, and which presented hardly a foothold for a bird; but Cleffie's little fairy feet balanced securely and tenaciously, and folding her arms across her breast, she stood like the statue of a divinity—grand and motionless. The waters of three successive cascades were embosomed in the basin below her, and the white foam dashing up against the dark lime stone, made her position extremely frightful to a spectator; the shore could not be regained except by passing through the water, which, from its depth and impetuous motion, would have been dangerous to the most expert swimmer; the rock which Cleffie had left, and where Gracie now stood in an attitude of grief and despair indescribable, was several feet higher than the one in the stream, and could not be reached without the agency of chains or ladders; yet there the delirious being stood, as calm, tranquil, and fearless, as though her feet rested upon the green sward of her own garden.

Gracie, pale and trembling as a lily in the hail-knelt upon the rock, and reaching out her arm to its extreme tension, asked Cleffie as calmly as she could, whether she might not be able, by clasping her hand, to spring back to the shore. Cleffie looked at her a moment, curled her ripe lip somewhat scornfully, and waving her hand with the majesty of Melpomene, turned her eyes toward Heaven, and repeated in a clear, sweet voice, the beautiful words of Campbell:

"Hark! as the spirit eyes, with eagle gaze,
The noon of Heaven, undazzled by the blaze,
On heavenly winds that waft her to the sky,
Float the sweet tones of star-born melody."

Then, without thought or effort, as carelessly as a weary child would fall upon its pillow, she sank into the clear current below.

Gracie uttered a wild shriek, and her first impulse was to throw herself into the tide with her sister; but a better thought came into her mind, and springing to her feet, she cast one glance to Heaven, uttered one cry for help, and darted along the bank of the stream, keeping pace with the floating body, and as a casual wave would drift it a little nearer the shore, she would leap to the very verge of the rocks, and reach forth her arms to save her. But in vain—wave after wave swept her farther into the middle of the stream, and but one hope remained to Gracie, which was, to intercept her at the bridge, as the current swept her beneath it.

Quick as thought she snatched up a long maple pole, that some little angler had probably thrown by, and flew to the spot; here she awaited with an impatience tantamount to despair, the progress of that unresisting little form, so distinctly visible in its white garments beneath the blue waves, as it floated by rock and flower, tree and vine, unconscious of them all. The body was now within a few yards of the bridge, and Gracie had planted her pole firmly in the stream, to arrest it in its passage; but just then, a strong eddy that swept round a bluff rock, standing out proudly from the shore, hurled her with a vast power towards its front, and threatened immediate destruction.—"Oh! save—save her!" shrieked Gracie—"she will be killed!" But she was not killed; a dark form battled with the waves, a strong hand grasped her firmly, and lifting her in his arms, Leslie Erskine bore her to the shore. It was not till her companions had bent over her many a weary and anxious moment, not till Gracie had pressed her to her heart, till that heart was faint and heavy with hope deferred, and Erskine had dried the water from her white lips and still whiter brow, and had chafed her temples and her pulses, till the blood flowed freely and warmly through her veins, that she again opened her dark blue eyes to the glad light of theirs. But, oh! how intelligent, how grateful, how rational were those eyes! Their wild light had flown; they were calm, eloquent, and expressive, as though she were conscious of all she had done, and how much they had served her. Then Erskine bore her in his arms to her own home, so secretly that the ear of scandal never heard the tale, and the sensitive Cleffie was spared all the gross remarks and rude inquiries, that such affairs too often elicit.

On the day succeeding this occurrence, Gracie was sitting alone in the elegant drawing-room of her father's house, leaning upon her harp, unmindful of the magnificence that was displayed so gorgeously in the decorations of that apartment, and thoughtless of the rich gifts that wealth and genius were proud to bestow upon her, yet all-absorbed in one engrossing sensation—the intensity of a forbidden love. She covered her face with her handkerchief, and let the tears flow unrestrained. In this situation, the door opened and discovered her to Hermon Campbell.

"Dear Gracie, what is the matter?—is Cleffie ill?—is she worse?" he inquired, taking her hand kindly, and seating himself by her side.

"No, Hermon, she is better, much better; and these tears are selfish: your mother tells me you are to leave us for a long time—can you then wonder that I weep?"

"Dear Gracie! and has my mother told you? then half my trial is already past. I have now only to bid you farewell."

"When do you leave?"

"To-morrow."

"So very soon!"

"Yes, Gracie, but if I go with your blessing and love, the trial, I think, will be but slight. I shall return in a few months, with brighter prospects, I trust, than I now have."

"But why need you leave us at all, Hermon? Your mother will be lonely and distressed without you—I shall be far from contented in your absence; and as you have sufficient labor to afford you a living, and means of assisting your parents, too, I cannot see the necessity of your leaving us at present, to say the least."

"I have higher motives than mere worldly gain—my love for you, Gracie, my hope of obtaining honor to overcome your father's prejudice, my duty to my parents, and my accountability to my Maker, to exercise as I ought, the talents that he has given me; these, Gracie, are the motives that influence my resolution to leave my home, and all that I love, and peril my fortunes upon the wide world. But why need I fear? Have I not a Guardian and a Friend, to care for me in every situation and circumstance in life? Gracie, I never doubt Him!" He continued: "I am a laborer—a stone-cutter, and a poor man's son; yet I have dared to aspire to your love—you, the wealthy, the gifted, the admired! But poor as I am in what the world calls wealth, I am rich in higher gifts—rich in your love, Gracie—rich in that faith that sustains and soothes the heart in all the chances and changes of life—and, forgive me if I speak too proudly, but I cannot lightly appreciate His gifts—rich in learning and talents. Confined through the day to labor and toil, my nights have been devoted to study and deep thought. With a perseverance that has been strengthened by the difficulties to be overcome, I have struggled with poverty, with weariness, oftentimes with sickness, with obstacles that arose from want of suitable books and other apparatus to prosecute my studies successfully—I have struggled with all these difficulties, and, with Heaven's aid, I have mastered them all. Shall I then confine myself to a trade that is distasteful to me—an occupation that furnishes no food for the mind, no range for the imagination, when my aspirations are continually for something high, honorary, eminent, though I trust not unattainable? My hope is, to succeed in the city as an architect; I have some drawings of plans that I think will recommend me to those that have taste and judgment in such matters—sketches that, in the few moments I could spare from labor and study, I have traced from fancy, with the aid of a crayon and a pair of dividers—the most expensive apparatus that I can boast. This hope may be presumptuous; if it should so prove, I can but return at last to the trade of my boyhood, and toil as I have done in former years, for a scanty subsistence, without any of those coveted luxuries that the opulent and gifted can command. But I will not murmur if every earthly blessing forsake me, so long as I have the consolations of my religion secure; they, Gracie, are a gift that we both know how to prize."

"Yes," she replied, "and would that our dear Cleffie could say as much. Hermon, I have resolved to be restricted no longer; my father has bound me by a promise, it is true, but, thank Heaven! I had the firmness to make that promise a conditional one. So long as that awful faith, which has been like a blight and a mildew upon her young life, cast no shadow upon her mind, that her gay temper could not dispel with its sunniness, so long I bound myself to silence. But now, since her heart has been crushed, her reason blighted, and her life endangered by its influence, no threats nor commands, nor bonds nor chains, that human power can resist, shall hinder me from imparting to her, from the abundance of that truth, that Heaven, through your agency, Hermon, hath so richly imparted to me."

"You have the deepest prayers of my soul for your success; and I think you will find a powerful auxiliary in the new physician that attends upon her—Leslie Erskine. He is a Universalist, and report says, that he has immense wealth. This will—forgive me, Gracie, for saying it—but I think this will secure your father's unreserved favor; then he has benevolence as unbounded as his wealth, is generous, kind, and compassionate; meek in his temper, and forgiving in his disposition; in a word, he is a true Christian. The whole object of his profession, which he has engaged in from principles of benevolence, not necessity, has been to ferret out distress of every species and degree—poverty, physical disease, moral maladies, and disorders of the mind; and to every sick-room that he enters, he carries his religion, and instills it into the hearts of his patients, so indirectly, that they are unconscious of it, and yet so powerfully that they cannot resist it. Think you that his sympathies will be less active for our sweet, unfortunate Cleffie?"

gratitude for the service he has rendered her, and places such implicit confidence in his directions for her health, that I am sure, whatever efforts he makes to remove the primitive disease of her mind, will be successful. I trust in God to give him the will to attempt it, and me the strength to aid him."

Hermon had just risen from his seat and taken Gracie's hand, to speak the few last words—the sad farewell—when the door opened, and the tall form of Barton Alloway, Esq., made its appearance. He stopped suddenly as his eye fell upon Hermon Campbell, and a dark cloud gathered upon his brow; he cast a glance of anger upon the unshrinking pair, and pointing significantly to the door, stood awaiting sternly, the effect of this authority upon the person whom, of all others, he most delighted to persecute—Hermon Campbell. But Hermon had no disposition to cower beneath that angry frown; he returned a glance equally haughty, and something like a spirit of rebellion was manifested in his attitude; but a feeling of Christian forgiveness came to his aid, and pressing Gracie's hand to his lips, he murmured a faint farewell; and bowing coolly to the old gentleman, departed.

Harsh were the words that Mr. Alloway bestowed upon his high-minded but gentle daughter; yet they met with no response—nought save the uncomplaining and steadfast affection, the sweet libation of love, that Gracie from her earliest years, had been wont to pour out upon the filial altar. In the exercise of this affection, she adopted the spirit of that celestial precept, the most difficult of all Christian requisitions to an earthly mind—"Love your enemies."

One pleasant morning in October, the parlor was occupied by Mr. Alloway, his daughters, and Leslie Erskine. Campbell's prediction had proved true; Erskine was favored beyond all others that ever entered the mansion of Barton Alloway; and this favor was correctly attributed to his wealth and popularity. Therefore, despite the father's prejudice against Erskine's religious profession, he witnessed with the greatest satisfaction, his devotion to his youngest and favorite daughter. And it was well for Cleffie that he did so, for her heart needed the sunshine of prosperity to make it thrive; it was made for love, and closely did it twine its affections, round those who guarded its helplessness. Deeply and devotedly had she learned to love the preserver of her life and happiness. The dark cloud of superstition had passed away—she lived in the light of the glad faith that he had taught her; and when he saw the sweet joy that beamed from her eye, that had so long been shaded by sadness, and heard the light and irrepressible laugh, that flowed out from a fountain of bliss, and this wrought by his means, too, no wonder that he paid homage to her loveliness.

There was a brighter scene in that apartment, than had graced it for many a month, for he who had ever brooded darkness over his home, was, for once, the sunshine that gladdened the hearts of others. Mr. Alloway was standing behind Cleffie's chair, bestowing upon her the most playful and affectionate caresses. In other circumstances, he would have been angry at her having imbibed what he still continued to regard a plebeian and dangerous heresy. But when he observed the miraculous change it had effected in her mind, which he had feared was wrecked forever, and saw the radiance it had diffused over her beautiful face, that had been paler than a shaded lily, he gloried in the effect, and forgot the cause. He had this morning been unusually kind to Gracie; and the tear that yet glittered in her eye, and the heartfelt smile that rested upon her lips, told how keenly it penetrated her soul. But his good humor was not destined for a long duration; it was a mere bubble that could not support its own weight.

A servant entered and announced a visitor: "a lady wishes to speak with Mr. Alloway."

"What lady?"

"Mrs. Campbell, I believe."

"Humph! a likely lady is Mrs. Campbell. What is her business with me?"

"I don't know, Sir," replied the servant, "she seems much distressed."

"Distressed, no doubt; some beggary, I'll warrant. Tell her I can't attend to her now."

"Oh, father!" exclaimed Gracie, "let me go to her. Her husband and children are sick; she is in need of assistance, I know. Do see her yourself, dear father, or suffer me in your stead."

"You sha'n't go!" exclaimed he, angrily, pushing her rudely back to her seat.

Erskine cast a withering look upon the old man; "I will speak with the lady, Sir," said he, and left the room. Mr. Alloway, as soon as he could recover his speech, fell to cursing the Campbells en masse—declaring them a nuisance to the public, and a disgrace to the town; and ended his declamation, by scolding at Gracie, and fretting at Cleffie, till they were both in tears, and having thus succeeded in overthrowing all the pleasant hopes that his pleasant mood had excited, flung out of the room in a great passion.

He well knew the object of Mrs. Campbell's visit. He was her husband's landlord, and as relentless and exacting as any landlord need be. The term for which he had leased the small house in which they lived, had expired the day previous; and his tenant not being able to meet the last short debt, by a prompt payment, the oppressive lessor had ordered him to quit the premises immediately, or prepare to be ejected from them by lawful force. Mr. Campbell was at this time dangerously ill, and three of the youngest children were severely attacked by a prevailing distemper; therefore, to comply with this savage demand, was next to impossible; and Mrs. Campbell, high-minded and independent as she was, had come to plead with him for the privilege of occupying the house till her husband was past danger, or at least till she could receive some assistance from her son, that would enable her to discharge the debt. Mr. Alloway had determined to give no quarter to the proud beggars, as he termed the Campbells. His strongest wish was to see them far from his neighborhood, where he might have no more to apprehend from their intercourse with his daughters; and it was with the bitterest mortification that he received, on the evening of that day, a letter from Mrs. Campbell, enclosing the full amount of their debt, together with fifty dollars in advance, for the use of the buildings the six months following. Mr. Alloway was not surprised at this; he knew Leslie Erskine's disposition too well, to think that he would suffer such an act of injustice as he would have been glad to have executed; and it was only a fear of offending Erskine that restrained him, even now, from returning the advanced money, and routing them from their habitation.

Mr. Campbell was, as Hermon said, a poor man; he had always been poor, for he had commenced life without a penny, and having no great energy of character, and being burdened with a large family, had barely supported himself and incumbents, without being able to lay by a store for the day of sickness and age. His wife was a very gifted and accomplished woman, the only child of a literary gentleman, long since deceased. She had married Campbell for love, and perhaps, as some people said, for beauty; for George Campbell was an exceedingly handsome man; he was a very good-hearted man, too; but he had little strength of mind, and was dependent upon his wife for advice, and in many cases for action, in matters of business. Hermon had been the staff of his parents, from the time that he could handle his father's tools, and since he had left them, though assisted by frequent remittances from him, they had suffered for even the necessities of life.

Gladly would Gracie and Cleffie have assisted those whom they so highly esteemed, but this, by pecuniary means, was entirely impracticable.—The Campbells themselves were not more destitute of money, than our young friends; for never was a penny confided to their hands, save for the purchase of dress, or some personal adornment; and though an occasional bright coin did, notwithstanding, stray to the purse of their neighbors, its value could not materially enhance their wealth, though it won from them overflowing coffers of love. Gracie and Cleffie would joyfully have nursed the sick children when they were suffering from the epidemic, but this was resolutely forbidden by their father, under plea of their exposing themselves to its influence; and they were obliged, very reluctantly, to submit to his fiat. In this they were comforted, however, by Erskine, who promised to do all in his power to aid their friends; and they knew that his power, so far as wealth, professional skill, and benevolence were concerned, was as limitless as their wishes could have aspired to. Through his efficient zeal, the children were shortly restored to health, and Mr. Campbell was placed beyond immediate danger, though he still lingered upon his bed, unable to resume his labors.

Affairs continued in this position, till the first of January. The new-year was ushered in with sunshine and cold wind, and brought to the Campbells, glad hearts and warm hopes, that diffused more comfort and cheerfulness around their hearthstone, than the brightest hickory blaze could have done. The day brought many blessings. Their scanty morning meal had scarcely satiated their keen appetites, when the door burst open, and in sprang the joyful Cleffie, followed by her more dignified, but not less warm-hearted sister, bearing their burdens of New-Year's gifts. Mrs. Campbell thanked the dear girls with tearful eyes; but the sweet smiles and happy countenances of the children, were the most expressive tokens of the pleasure they afforded.

About noon, a kind little boy that lived near them, entered with a gift that brought fresh blushes to the cheeks of all present.

"I have just returned from the post-office, Mrs. Campbell," said he, "and have brought you a letter; and I think it will be as good a gift as old Santa Claus* ever puts into our stockings;" and bowing with a good-natured smile, he withdrew. The letter was from Hermon, and proved a good gift indeed. He had been successful beyond his highest hopes; and was already employed as an architect by many of the wealthiest companies in the city. The profits of his profession were large, and constantly increasing, so that he was enabled to send a sum to his parents, sufficient, he thought, for the purchase of the house in which they resided, "and," continues the letter, "though I have not been able to procure the requisite means for securing the land that belongs with it, you will, perhaps, my dear parents, find some good genius to aid you; perchance, one who has before rendered you an invaluable service. I have written to Dr. Erskine, requesting the favor of a loan of another five hundred, to be repaid to him, if my health and prosperity continue, early in the Spring."

"God be praised that He hath given us such a son!" exclaimed Mr. Campbell, raising his streaming eyes and pale hands towards Heaven. "This letter has done me more good than all the drugs and potions in the world, even when administered by Dr. Erskine. My muscles feel strong, and my blood flows healthily, and it seems as though the plough and hoe would be but playthings in my hands."

But we will not linger too long upon the fireside scene that a beneficent heart had blest, nor portray too minutely, the fervent thankfulness of the kind-hearted and weary father; nor the deep, trusting, grateful piety—the maternal pride, and stronger than earthly love of the dignified mother; nor can we report the joyful exclamations, ardent curiosity, and unbounded gaiety of the children, in which Cleffie heartily joined; nor betray the deep and ungovernable emotions, that swelled the heart of Gracie almost to bursting. Our readers, however, shall have a peep at the finale of Hermon's letter, which was written for his mother's private perusal.

may possess, and which has awakened anew those dreams of fame, which the 'wise man,' I believe encourages, if that term be, as I think, synonymous with a 'good name'—and which used to be the subject of my dawning hopes—therefore I will relate it. Among the materials that were procured for the erection of a new church, there was a block of white marble, which was ascertained to have a deep fracture, that quite unfitted it for the use for which it was intended. This afforded a tempting subject for an experiment, so tempting that I could not, or rather did not, resist my inclination to procure it for that purpose, which I did without any great pecuniary sacrifice, as it lay useless upon the hands of the contractors; and never was a miser with his sacks of gold, more joyful in their possession, than was I, with my block of marble. I conveyed it to my shop, and concealed it in one corner, behind a curtain that I disposed about it, so as to form a little apartment of itself; for I was as fearful of having my project known to others, as though it were some invention, whose secret I wished to preserve from discovery. Here, when the customary business (not toil) of the day was over, I hastened with my chisel and other graving implements, and wrought unweariedly through the evening hours, upon this shapeless stone, with no guide but fancy, or rather memory, and no encouragement but hope. You would have smiled at my enthusiasm, and perhaps have been a little gratified at my success; for successful I was, in an eminent degree. A hand was gradually developed, so like a living one that I have loved to press within my own, that it seemed its very mate; then an arm, and a bust; then the fine Grecian head, the classic braids of hair, the broad, glorious brow, and the nose slightly defective in symmetry; but I cared not for symmetry; I was intent only upon developing, true to nature, those features that are engraven upon my soul more deeply and vividly than they ever can be upon marble. One evening, when I was concealed in my little curtained shrine, paying homage to my divinity, and giving the finishing touch to the features of her god-like countenance, I was startled by the rise of the curtain, and the appearance of a fine-looking, elderly gentleman, who had entered unnoticed by me, in my earnestness, and attracted by the sound of the chisel, had, as he said, inconsiderately lifted the curtain, to see what mystery was going on behind it. I had at first a mind to be offended at the intrusion, but he apologised so kindly, and indeed humbly, that I easily forgave him, and invited him to examine my work. He expressed his admiration; and that I consider no small triumph, for I have since learned that he is one of the best connoisseurs in the city. 'A Minerva, is it not?' he inquired—'Ah, yes, none other could have that look of wisdom, and deep eloquence. And yet it differs from all the Minervas I have ever seen. That smile is sweet enough for a Hebe. You must have practised long at your art, and yet you seem very young.' I thought it best not to undeceive him; so after bestowing some criticism upon the nose, which he said was not strictly Grecian, and wishing me success, he departed, leaving me one degree higher in my own estimation, than I had faith to be before his entrance. Thus you see, my dear mother, that the Lord has prospered the work of my hands, for which I trust I shall ever be grateful."

Before the New-Year's week had passed, the purchase of Mr. Alloway's farm was effected, though not without considerable demurring on his part, about selling it to the Campbells. All objections, however, were at length overruled by the liberal price that was offered, which had been raised from a thousand to thirteen hundred dollars,—a sum that far exceeded his expectations, at the then low value of real estate; and though this liberality on the part of the Campbells did not overcome his dislike to them, it made them, he thought, much more tolerable than they ever had been before.

He had long been desirous of disposing of this farm, which was the only one he owned, never having a passion for landed property, and looking upon silver and bank notes as the only wealth worth possessing. Not so thought the Campbells; they scarcely dreamed of greater wealth, than what was now their own; and whoever entered their humble apartment, and saw the smiling faces and soft caresses, and listened to the pleasant conversations and merry laughs, that made their fireside blest and beautiful, felt to the soul how richer far, were their treasures of content and domestic love, than all the hoarded heaps and dazzling coins, that shed their cold lustre over the home of Barton Alloway.

But assiduously as he guarded the fruits of his avarice, they were destined to take to themselves wings, and flee away. Many of his winter speculations proved highly disastrous to his purse, making deeper inroads upon it, than could be filled up again by the accumulated interest of his thousands in many years. And those thousands were doomed to vanish, too; the bank in which he had deposited the residue of his current wealth, had, by some indiscretions on the part of its directors, circulated a larger amount of notes than it could possibly redeem; of course, this produced a failure, and as the bank had gone into operation without a solid capital, Mr. Alloway was never able to recover his deposit.

We will not attempt to describe his frenzy at these successive losses. Let those who have suffered the wreck of all their hopes—the defeat of all their anticipations—the deprivation of all that they loved and cherished, imagine his distraction at this last overwhelming disaster. His daughters cared little for the loss of the wealth on their own account; for they knew the emoluments of his trade would procure them a subsistence—but they wept at their father's misery, and strove untiringly to pacify him. Their efforts were unavailing—the dawn of Spring found him as wretched and unconsoled as before.

March "came in like a lion," cold, dreary and tempestuous; the snow was deep as at mid-winter; the hail, sleet, and drizzling rain, filled the atmosphere with their chilliness, and cast their gloom upon the thresholds, and the hearthstones of even those who would dispel it with their smiles. The shades of the ninth night had drawn their dimness, for the first time in the month, over a cloudless sky—and the full moon rose from the East, clear, cold, and beautiful, pouring her impalpable rays, like showers of ethereal diamonds, upon the glassy whiteness of the roofs and hills, and over all the lofty trees, each with its icy regalia, bending like a queen beneath her burden of jewels; and as the cold strong wind swept by, and shook the starry fruit from the leafless boughs, it rang upon the hard ice, like the music of a thousand tiny bells.

It was near midnight, when Mr. Alloway entered his chamber. The coals were half dead upon the grate, but they had diffused a genial warmth through the apartment, that, in its rich decorations, seemed scarcely a fit resting place for the wretched being, who flung himself so hopelessly into the mahogany arm-chair by its hearthstone. Directly before him, hung the portrait of his bride—the artist had sketched her as she stood at the altar, and there she hung yet; with the same sweet smile upon her lips, the same radiance in her eye, the same beautiful brown tresses resting upon her spotless brow—all, all was the same, as at the moment she plighted her vows at the hymeneal altar.

"She was the very prototype of my beautiful Cleffie," he exclaimed, when his eye had rested long upon her image, "just as gay, just as lovely—but oh! I broke her heart!" It was true; he did break her heart by his harshness; and yet he loved her—loved her as well as his heart could love aught but its idol, gold; and the remembrance of his cruelty to one so gentle, added yet another pang to the deep anguish that rent his soul.

At his right hand, stood a little elegantly carved table, upon which rested a large volume; and the dust that had gathered upon its morocco lids and gilt edges, attested the length of time that had passed, since it had been disturbed by a human hand. The chapter that had been hurriedly coned over at the last wakeful hour in former evenings, as a penance to expiate the sins of the day, was now suffered to rest quietly within its pages; for he who had sought by this method, to appease the anger of his God, thought himself forsaken by his Creator, and given up to his insatiable vengeance. Could he but have sought with a penitent heart, the holy consolations that are so abundant within its pages; could he but have bowed his soul before his Maker and searched his revelation for an assurance of forgiveness; could he but have felt that the Maker is indeed the Father of the sinner, and the merciful Guide of those who seek the light, how soon would his miserable head have rested trustingly upon the bosom of his greatest and truest Friend! How soon would his fevered brain, have found a balm more refreshing than that of Gilead, in the waters of eternal life! But no light directed his soul to the one fountain; all was darkness, dearth and torment. He had lost his gold, and with it he had lost his hopes of earth, and his hopes of Heaven.

He sprang from his chair, paced his chamber in the deepest agony, and finally closed the blinds to his windows, to shut out the natural, as he had done the spiritual light of Heaven; then hastily undressing himself, he extinguished his light, and sought to obliterate his memory in the downy luxury of his bed. But it seemed to him, harder than the prisoner's pallet of straw. He turned, and tossed and groaned; but it brought him no sleep—no ease; he listened impatiently for the striking of the clock, but no sound told the hour of one—nought could he hear, but the loud strife of the wind without, and a kind of indistinct murmur, like the roaring of the wind in a chimney, that seemed to come from an adjacent apartment; then he could distinguish shouts and cries, like those of a multitude—he started up—a piercing shriek met his ear—his door burst open—and Gracie's voice called upon him to save himself.

"Oh, father! haste! the house is on fire! you will be lost—in a moment the flames will cover us!"

"Let them cover me—I will perish in them!" he replied, in a tone of energetic despair. "Save yourself—care not for me—I will die!"

"O no! no! you must come!" she cried, grasping him by the arm; and hurling him with a strength, that was nerved by fear and desperation, she plunged with him into the smoke and flames, half-suffocated, but still urging him onward, till they reached the open air, and were past danger.

That night, perished the last remnant of that wealth, so cherished and adored by him who was now unconscious of its loss; and the poor, shelterless maniac, was conveyed beneath the humble roof of those whom he had injured and oppressed, without the slightest provocation; and for many weeks, he was dependent upon the Campbells for the common necessities of life. Leslie Erskine was absent upon a journey of several weeks, and had no knowledge of the last misfortune that had befallen the father of his beloved Cleffie, and could therefore afford them no assistance. Many of their neighbors were willing to furnish a transient home for his destitute daughters, but none, even of his own pious brethren, would admit him beneath their roof, for now that he had no wealth to bestow in pompous gifts upon their altar, he was as heartily despised by those who had fawned upon him in prosperity, as though he had been a loathsome beggar, standing at their gates, craving the crumbs that fell from their tables. The daughters, however, refused to be separated from their father; they knew that they were welcome to a home with the Campbells, so long as they were destitute of another, and though it was an humble one in worldly luxuries, it was rich in Christian benevolence and holiness. Mrs. Campbell bestowed upon the wretched maniac, who lay stretched upon her bed, (given up to him, at the expense of her own comfort and convenience,) every care and blessing that her limited means would allow; and her husband added another hour, to the usual toil of the day, that he might be enabled to support the augmented burden of his household.

But Christian duties were the every day deeds of their lives; and though few were the enemies upon whom they could bestow their unrequited mercies, yet when those demands were made upon their celestial forbearance, they shrunk not from the trial; and never did a creature of God's love, suffer an injury or neglect at their hands. The holy faith that was theirs in profession, was theirs also in practice; and the aim of their whole lives was to be perfect, even as their Father in Heaven is perfect.

About six weeks after Mr. Alloway was removed to their house, he recovered in a considerable degree his reason, so that his hands were released, and he was allowed to leave his bed for several hours at a time. On the evening after Erskine's return to L——, he seemed in a more gentle mood, than was usual to him in health and prosperity. Erskine's presence had a salutary effect upon his mind, and after he had taken his leave for the night, Mr. Alloway called the family to his bedside, and craved their forgiveness.

Gracie and Cleffie remained with him till past midnight, when he requested them to leave him, and take the rest, of which they were much in need. They hesitated some time, and begged that at least one of them might stay with him till morning. He would not consent; but when they bent over him to bestow the affectionate kiss, that had often, in former times, been coldly repulsed, they felt the hot tears upon his cheek, and heard the deep sigh, that betokened a heart softened, at least, if not penitent.

It was nearly the dawn of day, when Gracie awoke from her sleep, and rising, she dressed herself hastily, and descended to the little bed-room which her father occupied. She was alarmed to find the door fastened. She called to him, again and again, but no answer was returned. Her heart sank within her; she roused her friends, and when the door was burst open, they found her worst fears realized. Her father was stretched lifeless upon the floor, weltering in his own blood! The following note was found upon the table, addressed to his daughters.

"My dear children, forgive this last dark crime of your unhappy father. Think of him as suffering the endless tortures of the damned, in punishment for the infinite sins he has committed upon earth, and then, oh! then pity, and weep for him. Hell itself will not be more intolerable, than the anguish that he now endures. My children, I leave you to Erskine's care. May he guard his trust sacredly! Farewell, forever!"

Shall we pause here? Or would the reader like to be informed of the union of the beautiful, gentle, and glad-hearted Cleffie, with the frank, generous, whole-souled Leslie Erskine; of their after usefulness in binding broken hearts, delivering captive minds; of their active benevolence, their tender charities, and their domestic felicities? All these blessings were theirs to bestow, and theirs to receive; but never, in all their prosperity, did they forget to raise their souls in gratitude to Heaven for the mercies and rich indulgences, it had showered in such abundance upon their high walk among the good and gifted. Nor was there a less brilliant destiny, awaiting the lofty and heavenly-minded Gracie, in her somewhat later marriage with Hermon Campbell—the friend of her youth; the all-conquering spirit that rose Phenix-like from every fiery ordeal; that subdued all difficulties that lay in his onward path, and struggling with poverty and its train of evils, vanquished them all, by the strength of its resolutions, and the greatness of its genius; achieving wonders in his profession, that has won him a name among the bright company of those who have honored and benefited their country, by contributing to its advancement in those arts, that next to religion, add the brightest jewel to its diadem. And to its religion, too, he and his peerless bride contributed a lustre, that shone abroad though the extensive circle that their genius and excellence drew around them, like the halo of the imperial orb, that makes the arch of Heaven her throne.

THE GRAVE.

BY MRS. BROUGHTON.

"There the wicked cease from troubling, and there the weary be at rest."

I recollect when I was young, and believed (or thought I did,) that God had from past eternity, appointed a certain part of mankind to felicity and immortal glory; and reprobated the remainder to the dismal shades of wo, darkness and despair;—that I was frequently puzzled with the above plain and simple passage. I could not discover how the wicked were to cease from troubling, for I heard it taught by popular teachers, that sinners in their eternal prison of wo, should be far more wicked than here; that their faculties being expanded and capacities enlarged, they would sin with a higher hand, and that they should not only blasphemize the omnipotent Ruler of the universe, but should torment each other. How, then, could it be that the wicked were to cease from troubling. I thought Job must have been mistaken, or at least, there was some great mystery about it.

Again—"there the weary be at rest." This would have seemed reasonable enough, provided I could ascertain that none but the righteous were weary. But when I looked abroad into the world, I discovered that those who approximated the nearest to a Christian life, were the happiest people; that they had the greatest enjoyment of existence, and consequently were the least liable to be weary of it. On the contrary, those who were the victims of unsubdued passions, who had never regulated their minds by the pure and peaceable principles of religion, were most frequently heard to complain of life, and oftentimes wish themselves rid of it. This seemed to imply that the way of vice was not so pleasant as the paths of virtue; but then, the teachers of the day told us that the pleasures of sin in this world, far exceeded the fruits of well-doing—and here, again, was a mystery. And when I sought an explanation, I was told that I was young, and should understand these things better at a future day.

And I have understood these things better, and not myself alone, but thousands have seen the light of truth, and rejoiced in its glory. Year after year they are flocking in to partake of the glorious feast prepared before the face of all nations. The highways of Zion are thronged with those who are redeemed from superstition's gloomy thrall, and now bathe their weary souls in the renovating beams of the Sun of Righteousness, that is shedding its radiance upon the world. We now believe understandingly that in the state of the dead, and beyond it, "the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest."

INFINITY OF SIN.

Br. GROSH—I observed, in a late number of your paper, an article on the infinity of sin, in which the writer contends that, if sin is infinite because committed against an infinitely great and good Being, on the same principle it would be virtuous to steal from so vile a person as Judas Iscariot. With the correctness of this reasoning I find no fault; but the thought struck me, that this conclusion was so near the principle on which many believers in the infinity of sin, acted, that it was not good policy to reason so as to encourage them in it.

That many believers in the infinity of sin, on the above ground, think it but a small crime, if any, to misrepresent and slander Universalists, is manifest, I think, from their conduct. And that they do really think it quite a virtue to cheat the devil, is evident from their declarations on the subject. "Give the devil his due," is a precept of common honesty which finds no place in their code of morality, or among the precepts of their partial faith. For they frequently declare, that if they "had received their just deserts, they should, ere this, have been in their graves with the dead, and in hell with the damned." That is, if justice had been done them, they would now be enrolled in the service of the devil. This is only saying, in substance, that they owe the devil their entire service—their whole selves! But do they intend to pay him this just debt? By no means. Why not? Because they believe him to be so much meaner than Judas Iscariot, that they expect to be commended of God for cheating him out of the demand—yes, to be rewarded with endless happiness, for wronging the devil out of their service justly due him.

Is it proper, then, to encourage these, our brethren, in slandering and misrepresenting those whom they suppose to be heretics, and in violating the principles of justice and honesty, even though the devil is the sufferer by their dishonesty? I think not. Honesty, we hold to be the best policy—honesty to all—candor and justice to all, is certainly the duty of every one. If so, let us rather unite in showing that even the devil should and will have his due, and that, too, on a short credit. That, therefore, if any owe him any thing—as I do not believe any do, however—they had better settle up with him as soon as may be, and have no more dealing with him.

O. WILCOX.

Fowler, St. Lawrence co., June 8, 1837.

REMARKS.

It is too true, as Br. Wilcox observes, that our Partialist brethren reckon the magnitude of sin by the object against whom it is committed, rather than by their knowledge of its being wrong, and their intention to do evil. It is also true, that the same principle, carried out to its full extent, would convert dishonesty to the wicked into a virtue. But I hope there are but few Partialists who carry out the principles of their creeds into practice. That they speak as if they belonged, in justice, to the devil, is admitted; but it is to be hoped that it is only a habit they have fallen into, and that they do not mean what they say. "All souls are mine, saith the Lord; as the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is mine." Ezek. xviii: 4. Of course, even if there is an eternal personal devil, he does not own, can not rightfully claim, and will not be allowed to retain a single soul. See also, Psalm cxxvii: 3. God has given all these to Jesus, who came and died to make them his in spirit, as they are his in gift—and if the devil gets one from him, Jesus must suffer endless loss, and God's gift be forever set at naught—be incomplete. And will any one say that such things can be, and yet God's purpose stand—his will be accomplished—his word be fulfilled—his pleasure be done—and Jesus see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied? If they can, I envy not their sense of consistency, or their trust in God.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JULY 7, 1837.

HEBREWS XII: 1, 2.

BR. SKINNER—RESPECTED SIR—As I have a high opinion of your scriptural knowledge, and believe that you are willing to impart instruction to those who feel in need, I hope you will excuse my impertinence in addressing you at this time. I lately heard a discourse preached by a deposed Presbyterian minister, from Heb. xii: 1, 2, and my attention was, at that time, drawn particularly to the expression, "the sin that doth so easily beset us." Now, I believe it is a common opinion that every person has a besetting sin—some one sin and some another—but each his peculiar sin. It appears to me, however, that the apostle had in view some particular sin, to which they were, and perhaps all are, particularly exposed.

Will you, Sir, give me your view of this passage, and if it is your opinion that it was a peculiar sin, will you also tell me what that sin was?

If you will condescend to notice this scrap from a stranger, you will much oblige your well-wisher, Sherburne, June 12, 1837.

E. S. LYMAN.

REMARKS.

It may not be an easy matter to determine with confidence, or any thing like certainty, between the opinion above expressed by our respected correspondent, and the commonly received opinion on the subject. The apostle had been speaking, in the preceding chapter, of faith and its power; and had carefully enumerated, and mentioned by name, many of the ancients who had by faith accomplished many wonderful deeds, and died rejoicing in hope of the glory that should afterwards be revealed.

He commences the twelfth chapter with the word "wherefore," referring to what he had said in the preceding chapter. "Wherefore, seeing we are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses." Here an allusion is made to the Olympic games, which were witnessed by vast numbers of spectators, and among them the nobles and principal men, at each celebration. "Let us lay aside every weight"—another allusion to the same games: for the athleti or agonista, the competitors for the prizes, disencumbered the body of every weight or impediment calculated to retard their progress in the race, or encumber or embarrass them in their wrestling and fighting matches.

"The sin which doth so easily beset us," may be explained so as to apply to each individual, and to the particular sin to which he is most inclined—as probably there is some point in the character of each individual at which he is more vulnerable, or liable to sin, than any other, or it may be explained in reference to some particular sin in the mind of the apostle, to which the Hebrews especially were exposed at that time. Either construction is a reasonable one.

Dr. Adam Clarke, in commenting on the passage, says the word euperistatos, (easily besetting), is derived from eu, well; peri, about; and istemi, I stand: the sin that stands well, or is favorably situated, ever surrounding the person and soliciting his acquiescence: that which has every thing in its favor, time, and place, and opportunity. The Dr. applies the text in the usual way; but says, in closing his remarks, that "the easily besetting sin of the Hebrews, was an aptness to be drawn aside from their attachment to the Gospel, for fear of persecution." This appears a rational conclusion, and I am inclined to adopt it as the primary application of the text; or rather to say, as the preceding chapter treats altogether upon faith, that the besetting sin of the Hebrews was unbelief. For in the course of this epistle, the apostle often warns them, as a nation, against unbelief, and as Christians against apostatizing from the faith they had professed.

HOLY FAIRS.

I have now before me a letter from a worthy lay brother, in which he censures pretty severely, the articles on this subject, and us for publishing them. As silence might be misconstrued, I will give the gist of his letter, and briefly reply to it, with the same frankness and goodwill.

Br. S. inquires—"Is it exhibiting the spirit of the meek and lowly Jesus, to ridicule those whom he has commanded us to love and pray for? Or, is it necessary that we should indulge ourselves in vulgarity and ironical expressions in order to portray the illusions of our opposers? But enough—I am too well acquainted with your writings, to suppose that after a moments reflection, you would hesitate in deciding against such articles appearing in a paper devoted to religious subjects.

 Lastly, of Appollos I would say, let us have no more of his dreams—and to Br. Grosh I would say, give us nothing but what we can present to our opposers, without having reason to blush."

In reply, I inquire—Is it necessary to misrepresent an article, in order to rebuke a man for writing it?—Ironical the articles are, but Br. S. will search in vain for any expression in them which will fairly justify the word "vulgarity." This settled I reply to his questions.

Neither of the articles were intended to ridicule persons but practices—and practices, too, which we can not, should not love. The ridicule consists in the reductio ad absurdum—or carrying out false principles to their ultimate, and most ridiculous, yet perfectly legitimate conclusion or consequences. It was used with powerful severity by the prophet Elijah, 1 Kings xviii: 27.—And it was also used by our Saviour in his frequent opposition to the illiberal prejudices of the Scribes and Pharisees. He once used it with his disciples, (See Matt. xv: 21-28,) to compel them to renounce their prejudices against extending the benefits of the Messiah's kingdom to the Gentiles—and succeeded. Br. S. must admit that the language of verses 24 and 26, expresses the real sentiments of Jesus (and thus prove the Saviour as bigoted and intolerant as any of the Jews)—or, he must admit that Jesus used these Jewish objections ironically, and for the purpose of compelling his disciples to see their cruelty and absurdity. The first he will not admit—and the latter will justify irony and sarcasm in particular cases against even our dearest friends.

Of course I dissent from Br. S. in his lastly—and would say to Apollos,

"Eye nature's walks, shoot folly as it flies,
And catch the manners living as they rise."

As to publishing any thing at which our readers will have reason to blush, I will not do it, knowingly—but I certainly will not feel bound to spare the blushes of that false delicacy which dares not rebuke a pernicious folly, because it is fashionable, or because some of our friends may be guilty of the same. Apollos' first article faithfully, but too briefly, described real events as they actually occurred in several holy fairs held in this section—so that if there is any shame, it falls on the actors, not the describers, publishers and readers. The subsequent articles only carry out the premises to a legitimate conclusion—show that gambling is gambling—fortune telling is fortune telling and extortion is extortion—in principle the same whether on a large or a small scale—whether carried on by regular black-legs and vagabonds, or by fashionable ladies and gentlemen—whether to win money for the private purse, or to put it into "the Lord's treasury."—And so far from feeling shame in handing them to an opposer of Universalism, I would God that every getter-up and attendant of "holy fairs" could see, and read, and feel the force of those articles. I desire it for their good—for our credit—and most of all, for the benefit of many poor and needy females who are deprived of a market for their manufactures by these unrighteous vanity fairs, and too frequently, I fear, driven to beggary, prostitution, and utter ruin, in consequence thereof.

But I have said more than I intended—as to length, but not as to matter—and therefore begging forgiveness for my trespass on the patience of our readers, and thanking Br. S. for his frankness and good opinion of me, which I shall ever strive to truly merit, I remain his, fraternally and affectionately, in the Gospel and spirit of our Lord.

REWARDS AND PUNISHMENTS.

Some people must have a very exalted opinion of their own actions, who claim infinite rewards and expect infinite punishments for them! What! a whole eternity of bliss as a reward for the petty actions of a brief life-time—of a life-time, did I say? rather of an occasional moment scattered here and there in the brief intervals devoted to religious duties in a life-time! And not less gifted with an idea of his own consequence is the being who really believes, that what he can do against God, is so important that the Deity will be satisfied with nothing short of his endless suffering therefor! Shame on the inordinate self-importance of man, thus to attach infinite punishments and reward's to his actions, as the just and proper measure of their consequence!

But we are told, that we misrepresent the views of Partialists on this subject. Perhaps we do, for we have taken their own language on the subject, and that is not always to be understood in its most obvious import. If they do not mean that their actions deserve these infinite consequences, why do they speak of justly deserving endless misery? For if their evil deserves this, their good deserves its opposites, of course. Why reproach Universalists for denying future rewards and punishments, (by which they mean endless rewards and punishments,) if they themselves also deny them? Or is it reproachful in us to deny them, and not for others to do so? Why do some of them declare that it would be unjust in God to save all men, if they did not believe it just in God to save them, in preference to all others, because of their works?

The truth is, Calvinism, as well as Universalism, denies the doctrine of infinite merit or demerit in human actions, and places salvation wholly in the grace of God. And Arminianism, whenever it endeavors to evade the elevation of human action to the same merit with divine action, runs into the same denial of infinite rewards and punishments. If we are saved endlessly by the free, unpurchased favor of God, we are not saved for our works—and if our works are not deserving of an endless reward, none of them can be deserving of an endless punishment. On the contrary, if our evil actions are justly deserving of an endless punishment, our good ones must be deserving of an infinite reward. And in this case, we are saved by our own works, through the mere justice of God, and not by God's free grace. Our salvation is then a reward, earned by ourselves, and not the free gift of God to us.

In the view of these dilemmas, conjured up by the confused teachings of Partialism, how clear is the voice of Universalism in the Bible—that not only final salvation, but present salvation, and even the means of salvation, (which are faith, repentance, and love,) and also the fruits of salvation, (righteousness, peace, and joy,) all are the gifts of God to us—even this life, and the immortal life, with all they contain or yield, are his free, unpurchased gift! Let us, then, say, when we have done all we are commanded, "we are unprofitable servants"—to God be all the glory, as ours is all the benefit. Amen.

TO OUR PATRONS.

The times call for much mutual indulgence, forbearance and long suffering—and we are willing—yea, anxious to do our share. But to do it we must be aided, by others. Our remittances, our whole dependence, are far less than last year, while our expenses and liabilities are considerably greater; and with what is due on the last volume, our receipts should be much greater than they were last year. These are facts—now for the purpose we have in view in stating them.

Each subscriber who commenced with the present volume, and has made no payment on the same, is now charged at the rate of two dollars for the year. And each subscriber, who owes in full for the last year and the present, is indebted four dollars and fifty cents.—The enhanced price is not our fault, for we have always urged, and always preferred advance payments—so much so, that the enhanced price does not compensate us for the neglect of subscribers to pay in advance.—Among the subscribers thus indebted to us, there are hundreds who can pay us, and not feel that they have done so, (except in their consciences,) the next day.—We hope they will soon aid us by paying (as they can well afford to do) our small pittance in full. There are also hundreds of others, who can pay us without any great inconvenience, immediately, or within a few weeks at most. To induce them to do it, and thus aid us more than they can well imagine, we make the following offer—all we can possibly afford to make under present circumstances, without a sacrifice greater than any true Universalist will ask at our hands.

1. Any person paying to us (or to a trusty agent) three dollars, shall be credited in full for the present and next volume.

2. Any person indebted for last volume and this, shall be credited in full on both, by paying four dollars within the same period—or as much as will make his credit on the two volumes, four dollars—thus counting in what he has already paid.—Or, if he prefers it, as we do, by paying five dollars, (or what will make his credit on the two years amount to five dollars,) we will credit him in full for the last and the present, and one dollar the next volume. This last offer will hold good to those who are owing Mr. Skinner for the sixth volume—except, that we will credit them only one dollar on the present volume, and in full for the sixth and seventh volumes.

The money to be sent to us free of postage, unless the letter enclose at least a five dollar bill. Notes of any denomination, on any solvent Banks in this or the Eastern States, Michigan, Ohio, New-Jersey, or Pennsylvania—in the order here named will be received in payment.

Brethren and friends who are indebted to us, and able to pay us without great inconvenience—this appeal is to your generosity, justice, and BROTHERLY KINDNESS. Do please bear our request in mind, and act on it as soon as you conveniently can, by remitting the money directly to us in the safest and most convenient mode, or by paying an agent and requesting him to do it for you and us.

Agents having remittable sums on hand will please forward them as soon as convenient, by any safe conveyance, in drafts or cash.

If all who are indebted to us, and can comply easily with this request, will but do so, it will relieve us from difficulty at once, and enable us patiently to wait the leisure and ability of those who are, like ourselves, more in need of assistance than able to bestow it.

A GREAT FLOOD.

The city of Baltimore, Md., has been visited with a most destructive inundation, by the rising of Jones' Falls, a creek running through the city, which swept away dams and bridges, houses and stables, drowning some twenty or twenty-four persons besides much cattle, and ruining many others. The damage is estimated at nearly one million of dollars, and among others, we learn by a letter from Br. Everett, published in the last Union, that the Universalist society has had their new house much injured, the or an ruined, seats torn up, cushions, etc., spoiled. Br. Everett writes in a very desponding strain. Our friends had strained every nerve, and exhausted all their means, before this calamity fell upon them, and are now unable to repair the damage. He ardently entreats and solicits aid from the sister societies in Philadelphia, New-York, Boston, and elsewhere, to enable our friends in Baltimore again to refit their house, and go forward rejoicing. It is to be hoped that those at all able, will also be actively willing to comply with the request of Br. Everett, and the dictates of humanity and brotherly kindness.

RATHER UNCLERICAL.

A ministering brother writing at the Slanderer in the Star in the East, says, "he ought to be kicked, and held up to public disgrace." What ought to be done it is right and proper to do. Suppose, then, Br. F., you set about it, and kick every slanderer you can find! Really, it would be a conical sight to behold your reverend foot rising up rapidly at an angle of forty-five degrees, to come in contact with the body of a fellow-being, who had been duly convicted of the crime of slander! But we New-Yorkers had supposed our New-England brethren to be too stately and dignified to engage in such duties and recreations. The expression here commented on, might pass as a hasty ebullition of indignant feeling, if uttered in the social circle—but it savors rather much of rough-and-tumble-ism to appear in print.

Should any of our agents ascertain the residence of SAMUEL BERGEN, formerly of Dunwich, U. C., they will please collect $3.19 of him for papers which he ordered, but left the place without paying for. We shall probably have occasion to make a few more such calls.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

By the kindness of our esteemed friend, Edwin H. Chapin, the author of the following Independence Hymn, we are enabled to give it to our readers one week earlier, than if we had been obliged to wait to copy it from the Observer, to which it was first sent, or publication. A. B. G.

HYMN FOR THE FOURTH OF JULY.

(AIR, DUKE-STREET.)

God of this People! Thou whose breath
Swell'd the white sail, and wing'd the breeze,
And sped the Exiles' trembling bark,
In safety, through the stormy seas—

To whom our trusting sires look'd up
For strength to rive the Tyrant's chain;
Whose wings were 'round them as a shield,
Amid the thickest battle rain—

From the old Pilgrims' altar-rock,
Far to the sounding Western sea;
A Nation wafts the voice in song,
And pours the heart, in prayer, to THEE!

Hush'd be the peal of booming gun,
Hush'd be the lofty pean now;
While low before each holy shrine
We close the eye and veil the brow.

And, Father, be the prayer we breathe,
Of thanks to Thee for mercies giv'n;
For others' weal; for peace and light;
That tears be dried and fetters riv'n.

And when again the shouts ring loud,
And when they tell of storied glen,
Of haunted stream and hallow'd sod,
Linked with the deeds of mighty men,

When the old Charter meets our sight,
And when our "banner flouts the skies;"
Oh then, may grateful thoughts of THEE
Blend with our purest memories!

Still, Father, be our nation's Guide
By night or day; in darkness bow'd,
Or rais'd to Honor's dazzling height;—
Be Thou our "pillar" and our "cloud."

That when, besides our lowly graves,
Our children's children bend the knee,
They still may praise for blessings giv'n,
And shout the anthem "WE ARE FREE!"

LACONICS.....NO. 1.

Messrs. EDITORS—The following apothegms I have culled from a work, with which, from a slight glance at one of the volumes, I have been much entertained.—It is entitled "Laconics; or the best words of the best authors;" and is indeed "a collection of gems" from the richest Literary Caskets. Although it has been before the public these few years past, yet if its contents prove as pleasing to many of your readers as they have to myself, I am sure they will be gratified by seeing some of them published in your valuable and wide-circulating journal.—To many they may be as "familiar as household words." To others new and original. Be that as it may, to all I trust these friendly and "sage advisers" will prove interesting and instructive. Should you see fit to publish, I will endeavor, from time to time, to continue the selections. E. H. C.

I. The English laws punish vice; the Chinese do more, they reward virtue.—GOLDSMITH.

II. Our greatest glory is not in never falling, but in rising every time we fall.—CONFUCIUS.

III. In a vain man the smallest spark may kindle into the greatest flame; because the materials are always prepared for it.—HUME.

IV. He who tells a lie is not sensible how great a task he undertakes; for he must be forced to invent twenty more to maintain that one.—POPE.

V. He that can not forgive others, breaks the bridge over which he must pass himself; for every man had need to be forgiven.—LORD HERBERT.

VI. Would you taste the tranquil scene?
Be sure your bosom be serene:
Devoid of hate, devoid of strife,
Devoid of all that poisons life;
And much it 'vails you, in their place
To graft the love of human race.—SHENSTONE.

VII. Trust him little who praises all, him less who censures all, and him least who is indifferent about all.—LAVATER.

VIII. Critics must excuse me, if I compare them to certain animals called asses, who, by gnawing vines originally taught the great advantage of pruning them.—SHENSTONE.

IX. Wisdom is the knowledge that springeth from the heart, bloometh on the tongue, and beareth fruit in the actions.—L. GRAYSTONE—1604.

X. Fancy restrained may be compared to a fountain, which plays highest by diminishing the aperture.—GOLDSMITH.

XI. It is impossible that an ill-natured man can have a public spirit; for how should he love ten thousand men, who never loved one?—POPE.

XII. He is happy whose circumstances suit his temper; but he is more excellent, who can suit his temper to any circumstances.—HUME.

CHANNING.

THE FOUR CAUSES OF INTemperance as illustrated by Dr. Channing in his address before the Massachusetts Temperance Society.

One cause of the commonness of intemperance in the present state of things is the heavy burden of care and toil which is laid on a large multitude of men. Multitudes, to earn subsistence for themselves and their families, are often compelled to undergo a degree of labor exhausting to the spirits and injurious to the health.—Of consequence, relief is sought in stimulants. We do not find that civilization lightens men's toils; as yet it has increased them; and in this effect, I see the sign of a deep defect in what we call the progress of society.—It can not be the design of the Creator, that the whole of life should be spent in drudgery for the support of animal wants. That civilization is very imperfect, in which the mass of men can redeem no time from bodily labor for intellectual, moral and social culture. It is melancholy to witness the degradations of multitudes to the condition of beasts of burden. Exhausting toils unfit the mind to withstand temptation. The man, spent with labor, and cut off by his condition from higher pleasures, is impelled to seek a deceitful solace in sensual excess. How the condition of society shall be so changed as to prevent excessive pressure on any class, is undoubtedly a hard question. One thing seems plain, that there is no tendency in our present institutions and habits to bring relief. On the contrary, rich and poor seem to be more and more oppressed with incessant toil, exhausting forethought, anxious struggles, feverish competitions. Some look to legislation to lighten the burden of the laboring class. But civil laws and equal power to remove the shocking contrast of condition which all civilized communities present. Inward spiritual improvement, I believe is the only sure remedy for social evils. What we need is, a new diffusion of Christian, fraternal love, to stir up the powerful and prosperous, to succor liberally and encourage the unfortunate or weak, and a new diffusion of intellectual and moral force, to make the multitude efficient for their own support, to form them to self-control, and to breathe a spirit of independence, which will scorn to ask or receive unnecessary relief.

Another cause, intimately connected with the last, is the intellectual depression and the ignorance to which many are subjected. They who toil from morning to night, without seasons of thought and mental improvement, are of course exceedingly narrowed in their faculties, views and sources of gratification. The present moment, and the body, engross their thoughts. The pleasures of intellect, of imagination, of taste, of reading, of cultivated society, are almost entirely denied them. What pleasures but those of the senses remain? Unused to reflection and forethought, how dim must be their perceptions of religion and duty, and how little fitted are they to cope with temptation. Undoubtedly in this country, this cause of intemperance is less operative than in others. There is less brutal ignorance here than elsewhere; but on the other hand, the facilities of success are incomparably greater, so that for the uneducated, the temptation to vice may be stronger in this than in less enlightened lands. Our outward prosperity, unaccompanied with proportionate moral and mental improvement, becomes a mighty impulse to intemperance, and this impulse the prosperous are bound to withstand.

I proceed to another cause of intemperance among the poor and laboring classes, and that is the general sensuality and earthliness of the community. There is indeed much virtue, much spirituality, in the prosperous classes, but it is generally unseen. There is a vastly greater amount in these classes of worldliness, of devotion to the senses, and this stands out in bold relief. The majority live unduly for the body. Where there is little intemperance in the common acceptance of that term, there is yet a great amount of excess. Thousands, who are never drunk, place their chief happiness in pleasures of the table. How much of the intellect of this community is palsied, how much of the expression of the countenance blotted out, how much of the spirit buried, through unwise indulgence! What is the great lesson, which the more prosperous classes teach to the poorer? Not self-denial, not spirituality, not the great Christian truth, that human happiness lies in the triumphs of the mind over the body, in inward force and life. The poorer are taught by the richer, that the greatest good is ease, indulgence. The voice which descends from the prosperous, contradicts the lessons of Christ and of sound philosophy. It is the sensuality, the earthliness of those who give the tone to public sentiment, which is chargeable with a vast amount of the intemperance of the poor. How is the poor man to resist intemperance? Only by a moral force, an energy of his will, a principle of self-denial in his soul. And where is this taught him? Does a higher morality come from those whose condition makes them his superiors? The great inquiry which he hears among the better educated is, What shall we eat and drink, and wherewithal shall we be clothed? Unceasing struggles for outward, earthly, sensual good, constitute the chief activity, which he sees around him. To suppose that the poorer classes should receive lessons of luxury and self-indulgence from the more prosperous, and should yet resist the most urgent temptations to excess, is to expect from them a moral force, in which we feel ourselves to be sadly wanting. In their hard conflicts how little of life-giving truth, of elevating thought, of heavenly inspiration, do they receive from those above them in worldly condition.

Another cause of intemperance is the want of self-respect which the present state of society induces among the poor and laborious. Just as far as wealth is the object of worship, the measure of men's importance, the badge of distinction, so far there will be a tendency to self-contempt and self-abandonment among those whose lot gives them no chance of its acquisition. Such naturally feel as if the great good of life were denied them. They see themselves neglected: Their condition cuts them off from communication with the improved. They think they have little stake in the general weal. They do not feel as if they had a character to lose. Nothing reminds them of the greatness of their nature. Nothing teaches them that in their obscure lot they may secure the highest good on earth. Catching from the general tone of society that wealth is honor as well as happiness, they see in their narrow lot nothing to inspire self-respect. In this delusion, they are not more degraded than the prosperous; But they echo the voice of society; but to them the delusion brings a deeper, immediate ruin. By sinking them in their own eyes, it robs them of a powerful protection against their vices. It prepares them for coarse manners, for gross pleasures, for descent to brutal degradation. Of all classes of society, the poor should be treated with peculiar deference, as the means of counteracting their chief peril; I mean, the loss of self respect.—But to all their other evils is added peculiar neglect.—Can we then wonder that they fall?

A GOOD WIFE.—There are three things a good wife ought to be like—and yet those three things she ought not to be like.

First.—She ought to be like a town clock, keep time and regularly. She should not be like a town clock; speak so loud that all the town can hear her.

Second.—She should be like a snail: keep within her own doors. She should not be like a snail: carrying all she is worth on her back.

Third.—She should be like an echo: speak when she is spoken to. She should not be like an echo: determined always to have the last word.

THE CAUSES OF INFIDELITY REMOVED.....NO. VI.

BY S. R. SMITH.

THE NATURE OF PUNISHMENT.

Among the immediate causes of infidelity, which have their foundation in certain doctrines held by professing Christians, some are more obvious and influential than others. The reasons of this difference, are sometimes contained in the subjects themselves—some being vastly more important than others, some are more intelligible and tangible, while some obtain a kind of preference and are made to stand out in bold relief, as more worthy of special attention. But notwithstanding this difference, every opinion and sentiment maintained by the Christian, which can not be reconciled with both reason and the Bible, has a pernicious influence. For there will be times and occasions in which these views and doctrines will become the subject of remark—and when the most trifling inconsistency will be made the butt of severe criticism and rude animadversion. It behoves the believing Christian, then, to attend to the correctness, reasonableness and scriptural support of every item of his creed to be "faithful in that which is least," as well as in the great matters of eternal truth.

But the unbeliever should recollect, or learn, that when the more important parts of any system are well sustained, the minutia which might have been overlooked in establishing first principles, may also be settled with equal certainty and in perfect harmony with the general plan. Thus, in the discovery of the laws of gravitation, the fundamental principles which regulate and determine the positions and motions of the planets were fully established. But it remained that the oscillations and apparent anomalies should be satisfactorily explained. This, few doubted could be done—and it was done to the conviction of all. So the unbeliever may rest assured, that though in the discussion and confirmation of the great truth of a divine interposition, some of the minor considerations may not be fully settled, they are yet capable of satisfactory explanation, in perfect accordance with the truth and divine origin of the Bible.

It is not intended therefore to canvass every conceivable aberration from consistency, which the sagacity of unbelievers may discover, or fancy that they discover in the views and sentiments of Christians. If we can prove—and we have great hopes of doing so—that several important doctrines of the Christian church, are not contained in the Bible, and do not therefore furnish any ground of objection to its divine authority and authenticity—and at the same time show that the doctrines of that book are neither unreasonable nor inconsistent, the principle for which we contend, that it is a revelation from God, will be fully established. The unbeliever may then settle the minor difficulties in his way, at his leisure, and as opportunity permits. But if the principal grounds of objection are removed, he must perceive that all others will fail of course, whenever they are made the subject of due investigation.

The prevailing opinion respecting the certainty and the nature of punishment, has probably exerted considerable influence in promoting infidelity. According to this system, the transgressor is not certain to receive any punishment—much less an adequate one for his sins; while those who are punished, are considered neither more guilty nor deserving of chastisement, than those whom grace spares. At the same time, it supposes that the infliction of punishment is for no other purpose, than the vindication of the honor of God and the sanctity of the divine law—the satisfaction of offended justice, and the propriety of chastising incorrigible sinners. This system also supposes, that some of the guilty are permitted to escape from wrath, because they believe that Christ suffered for them, and in their stead; while others whose crimes are no greater, or their guilt no deeper, are made subjects of misery because they do not, or can not also believe. And, as if to encourage the unprincipled and vicious, and to tantalize the sober moral man, it is maintained that the most abandoned in crime are more certain to believe and to be saved in consequence, than the more discreet and upright among mankind. It also supposes that the punishment which is inflicted on the disobedient, comprises no one object in relation to the sufferers themselves—save that of misery—misery, of unimaginable intensity, and exhaustless in its means of aggravation.

All this, many honest men very sincerely and confidently believe; and they as confidently assert and endeavor to maintain, that it is the doctrine of divine revelation. Indeed no pains are spared to convince the world, that this very objectionable hypothesis was actually maintained and taught by our Saviour and the apostles, and recorded in the New Testament for the belief of all future generations. And they seem not to be aware, that it involves in any of its features and bearings, either contradiction to the best exercise of reason, or inconsistency with the Bible—much less do they appear sensible, that it is one of the stepping stones to the very door of infidelity.—That such however is the fact, will probably appear from the following considerations.

1. All the possible influences from the dread of punishment, must depend upon the conviction of its certainty. If, then, it is the object of any system to enforce its requirements by the aid of threatenings, they will cease to operate as inducements to obedience, the moment it is discovered that the penalty denounced is not enforced. Let a parent who threatens to punish his child for disobedience, make the popular theology in relation to this subject, a part of his plan of domestic government, and then if he can, wonder at the insufficiency of his authority. Like the nursery tales, it is soon discovered that they were intended for a purpose, which can no longer be effected than while the deception is believed. The unbeliever will argue precisely in the same way—that the punishment denounced by the Deity against the impenitent, is evidently not feared by the professor who often asserts it, and who is presumed to know whether it is taught in the Bible. And he comes to the conclusion, that if the believer who acknowledges himself a transgressor, can escape—there is no reason why he should despair. Thus he satisfies himself, that there is really nothing to fear. And his infidelity is confirmed if not caused, by the influence of this sentiment.

2. Another consideration which evidently has much weight in promoting skepticism and infidelity, is the want of proper discrimination between faith and morality—between the merely moral man and the professor on one hand, and the man of upright integrity, and the open and notorious transgressor on the other. The mass of mankind are at a loss to discover as great a difference between the moralist and the believer, as they can readily see between the virtuous and vicious man. Unbelievers are therefore, little disposed to credit the Christian, when his creed induces him to rank the good and bad in the same general class, and to denounce them as equally dangerous to society, merely because they do not happen to believe a particular creed. And they can not easily bring themselves to believe that a beneficent Deity has suspended their destiny upon so precarious a foundation, as the belief or disbelief of any one particular, which is not clearly stated and fully explained. Besides, those who have not founded and built their hopes upon a different view of the divine economy, will hence be disposed to reject the Scriptures so long as they are supposed to teach that both good and bad are equally corrupt here, and destined to the same sufferings hereafter.

3. But perhaps the most influential cause of infidelity, contained in this general subject, is the recklessness which it supposes in respect to the consequences of punishment. And it must be confessed, that there are few subjects in the vast range of speculation, more effectually calculated to shock both reason and sympathy, than the total disregard of all useful results in the operations of retributive justice. Neither angels nor men—nor yet the stern administrator of the eternal laws of the moral universe, are supposed to derive any benefit from the miseries produced by the infliction of even endless pains! it is in vain that we seek for an extenuation of such punishment—in vain that we look to the principles of divine or human justice for its propriety—for its illustration in the practice of mankind, or its support in the testimony of the Scriptures. All nature—all experience—all revelation are silent as the grave respecting a punishment whose exclusive object is misery—whose only end, is the infliction of such terrible vengeance. The unbeliever considers this so foreign to all that his judgment, or his feelings can approve, that he bids a kind of defiance to the consequences, and asserts his contempt and abhorrence of the dogma which maintains them, and of the Bible, in which he imagines they are taught.

Suppose that a parent in correcting his child, were to assert that he did so because his justice required it, and that it was impossible to maintain the honor of his law and the dignity of his government in any other way; but that he was indifferent to any consequences upon the child, to his family, or to society. And cared not whether it drove the victim of his displeasure to despair, or wrought an unavailing repentance—for he had long since determined to disinherit him, and had actually done so, before his punishment commenced. What would the advocate of this procedure on the part of the Deity say, were he to see his favorite theory reduced to practice? Let his own example answer for him. It is sufficient to say, that he would think of the practice, as he constrains others to do of his theory—that it is neither founded in reason, justice nor philanthropy. And so long as some believe and maintain that it is a part of the plan of revealed truth, those who do not discover a better and more consistent system taught in the Bible, will probably reject both that and the creed together.

But it is matter of congratulation to the friends of consistency and truth, that so far from inculcating any thing like the doctrine under consideration, the Scriptures throughout, teach in the most unqualified terms, both the certainty of punishment for every offence, and that it is inflicted for the benefit of the individual chastised. To this, infidelity itself, can raise no objection, for it is consistent with justice, reason, humanity and experience. And if this can be made evident, as we think it can—the Christian who maintains a different theory, will find reason to modify his opinions accordingly; and the unbeliever who founds his infidelity on the absurdities of the popular views of punishment, must abandon his position as no longer tenable. And he must also perceive, that as he has one argument less, than on the common hypothesis—so we have of consequence, one argument more for the divine origin of the Bible.

1. Those who are acquainted with the language of the Scriptures, will not doubt that they denounce punishment against all transgressors, in proportion, or, "according to their works." This is often threatened both in the Old and New Testaments, as any one may perceive who will examine the subject. The question which remains to be settled, is, do they also inform us, whether this punishment is inflicted? If they do, we shall find very ample illustrations of that truth—and also find it applied to every transgressor, whether he be considered comparatively righteous or unrighteous. What, then, say the Scriptures?

It was said to Adam—"in the day thou eatest (sinnest) thou shalt surely die." This evidently means a moral death—to die "in trespasses and sins," and is supported by a great number of similar expressions in the Bible. No man can read the account of the first recorded transgression, and the cognizance taken of it by the Deity, and not discover, unless he be blinded by prejudice—that in the guilt, shame and sorrow which immediately followed the sin, the promised punishment was actually inflicted. So again in the case of Cain, though his life was spared, yet for the crime of which he was guilty, his sufferings were so intense that he thought it greater than he could bear. The same is true of the best men, as well as of the worst. Jacob, Moses and David, came in for their full share of punishment for their offences. Nor are the chastisements of the divine hand confined to individuals—nations that sin, are visited with national retribution. The strongest instance of which is recorded, prophetically, in the New Testament, and which actually fell upon the Jews, their city, their temple, and their institutions.

This mass of evidence, which is familiar to those who read the Bible, should satisfy every Christian professor—while the actual experience of every man, should convince the unbeliever, that no man does wrong with impunity. What degradation, and self-reproach—what mental anguish and severe compunction, are felt for disobedience? To these probably no adult person is a stranger—and they should teach every one to regard with more caution and fidelity the admonitions of eternal truth contained in the Bible—"the soul that sinneth shall die." And they should further instruct all offenders, that the day of retribution is near; that the "reward of their hands" comes down with instant and overwhelming power—meets them in the moment of transgression, and holds the soul under condemnation until they "cease to do evil, and learn to do well."

2. But however immediate and tremendous the punishment of the wicked—it is plainly designed for their individual good. It is a sufficient vindication of the honor of God, of his moral government, of his eternal justice, that the penalty for sin is enforced. But the character of the Deity, and the propriety of his laws are seen in a far more amiable and interesting light, when it is perceived that every moral pain we bear—every mental suffering we endure for our follies and our crimes, are the medicines to heal the diseases of the soul. They are the safe and finally effectual prescriptions, which "wound but to heal—which kill but to make alive."

We are at no loss to apprehend the reasons why pain is connected with the application of fire to the flesh, the luxation of a joint, or the fracture of a bone. All this is plainly for the benevolent purpose of rendering us more circumspect and cautious—it is to guard us against the thousand

"ills that flesh is heir to," by the dread of consequences. And notwithstanding the inconvenience and anguish to which it occasionally subjects us, we are no doubt, benefited on the whole, by this arrangement of our physical constitution. It exhibits both design and benevolence—the object being our preservation from the identical evils and sufferings which we are sometimes permitted to experience. Thus it evidently is in the moral constitution of man. He is endowed with a conscience, which when enlightened by the humanizing and purifying genius of the Gospel, is as sensitive to the contaminations of sin, as the nerves to the influence of frost, fire, or laceration. And it is not uncommon to see persons so afflicted by the recollection of some vice, as to form and keep the resolution, never to allow themselves in its repetition. A single indulgence is sometimes sufficient to awaken and fix the determination, to do what is believed to be right in all future time.

On this principle, it will be perceived that independent of any external consideration, public opinion, or personal interest, we have in the very frame and fashion of our moral and intellectual constitution two very strong motives to the practice of virtue—the fear of punishment, and the hope of happiness. For while every man must admit that the recollection of sin never gives him satisfaction, by recurring to his feelings in the consciousness of having performed a good action, he will dwell with peculiar delight on the ineffable peace which he experienced. That mental anguish which sin inspires, is punishment, and its victim is suffering the condemnation which he fears. That peace of soul which accompanies well-doing, is happiness; and imparts the bliss of heaven here below. To punish and to reward, have the same common end in view—to induce the wicked to become good, and to confirm the good in the way of duty, honor, peace.

And this is the doctrine of the Bible—"I will visit their transgressions with the rod, and their iniquity with stripes, nevertheless my lovingkindness will I not utterly take from him, nor suffer my faithfulness to fail." Again—"whom the Lord loveth, he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." And again—"the Lord will not cast off forever; but though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies. For he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men." The number of Scripture proofs that the object of punishment is paternal, is abundant. We here add but one more in support of our position, as further reference will be made to it in a subsequent number. "For they (our earthly fathers) verily for a few days chastened us after their own pleasure, but he (that is, God) for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness."

It is believed that the view here taken of the certainty and emendatory objects of punishment, legitimately authorize the following conclusions—viz. that the doctrine which generally prevails in the Christian church respecting that subject, is not authorized by the Bible. That it gives no countenance to the opinion that some of the wicked will escape—or that the moral man is no better than the vicious—or that punishment is inflicted for no other purpose than that of enhancing and magnifying the glory of God in the misery of man. And consequently, that neither of these, can furnish any ground of objection to the Scriptures, or justify any form of infidelity.—Hence too, unbelievers must perceive, that all the arguments and objections which they may bring against the common opinion, respecting the nature and end of punishment, have no relation to the truth and authority of the Bible. To reject that book, because some men hold sentiments which it does not authorize nor contain, is to reject all truth, because we sometimes hear falsehoods. It has been shown, that the Scripture doctrine of the nature and certainty of punishment, is both reasonable and in accordance with universal experience—and as reasonable men, how can unbelievers object to its truth and propriety? They can not—and when they have duly examined the subject, they will not; but will believe, obey, and rejoice in the truth of divine revelation.

A GRAND-FATHER'S LETTERS TO HIS GRAND-CHILDREN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

LETTER VIII.

MY DEAR CHILDREN—In former days, when we met, your old grand-pa not unfrequently had some little anecdote to tell you. As our former meetings were sometimes begun, so will I commence this letter. I have often, yea, times without number, insisted upon your thinking, judging, deciding for yourselves. To enforce this lesson, I now repeat to you an appropriate story, pretty much as I find it in the "Essays on the Pursuits of Truth." A late writer, in his travels through Mesopotamia, relates, that at Orfah, (the ancient Ur of the Chaldees,) the river and the fish in it, are sacred to Abraham; and that the inhabitants firmly believe, that if any of the fish were caught, no process of cooking could make any impression upon their bodies. Here is a notion which any one might at once put to the test by direct trial—an opinion which they have only to stretch forth their hands to verify or disprove; yet so thoroughly pre-occupied are the minds of the people, by the prejudice instilled in early infancy; such awe do they feel in relation to it, that they have not the slightest suspicion of its absurdity, and would think it profane to submit it to the ordeal of actual experiment. What do you think would be the fate of him who was daring and independent enough to try the experiment, and maintain the falsehood of the universally received or imbibed opinion? Persecution, calumny, lies, malice, and hatred even unto death or extermination, would be his fate. Innovator, blasphemer, heretic, and profane rascal, would be among the titles lavished upon him. To a fortune equally hard and equally unjust, have some of the best friends of the human race been obliged to submit. This story may serve to remind you of an important truth: that men have always been more ready to receive opinions upon the authority of others, "by tradition from their fathers," than to take the trouble, however small, of inquiring, finding out, and deciding for themselves. Perhaps nothing has tended more than this, to keep back the progress of the human race. At all events, your grand-pa thinks that you cannot inflict upon yourselves a greater injury and curse, than to receive, rather than work out, your own opinions.

I am glad that many are beginning to regard education as something more than the mere imparting of knowledge. I am glad that the number is increasing of those who expect more from teachers than the communication of opinions, and what has been hitherto received as truth. Such is not now regarded as the exclusive, or even the chief end of education. A higher and more important object is now pretty generally expected to be aimed at. The faculties of the mind are to be developed, exercised, and invigorated. The intellect is to be exercised and disciplined in the performance of such operations as will enable it to work its own way to any truth, as will prepare it to distinguish the true from the specious—that supported by evidence, from that based only upon the dictum, the ipse dixit, the authority of some blind and worshipped leader of the blind. The task of thinking is not likely, under the improved modes of education, to be henceforth so passively resigned and abandoned to a few. Nor will the rising generation be so likely to embrace and imbibed the opinions of their elders, as were the generations before. I am grateful to God for the prospect; and although my eyes shall never behold the goodly fruits of this new order of things, yet I rejoice in the hope of them. Ye are likely to behold this harvest of good things, and to share in its benefits. Think, reason, inquire, reflect, judge for yourselves, and so help to bring about this much to be desired age. As I made you do with your very first lesson in geography, so do ye with every lesson men would impart to you. I thought it not enough that ye should know that the earth was globular; I considered it of far more importance that ye should be able to understand and make use of the proofs of it.

You will frequently meet with instances and exhibitions of human nature, such as I have lately been a witness to. A gentleman who left this neighborhood for the South, when you were all young, has lately returned to make it the place of his future residence. His circumstances are very much altered, and likewise his habits. The consequence is, that he has given up all intercourse with his old friends, and this seems to arise from his being ashamed of any connexion with those in that rank to which they belong, and in which he himself was born. This conduct has subjected him to contempt and disapprobation, and he is universally, almost, stigmatised as an upstart, a purse-proud, but really low-minded man. Indeed such has been the reception which such characters have usually met with, the spirit of their conduct being universally reprobated wherever it has been manifested. What has most surprised me about this matter, is, that those very persons who have exhibited the same spirit and conduct themselves—who have a beam in their own eye—have been the loudest in condemning Mr. —, and the most quicksighted to detect this speck in the eye of another! When a young man, I joined the multitude in their expression of indignation at a similar instance of monied hauteur. While life lasts, I will never forget the remark of an old and venerable sage: "Are you sure that you, yourself, are superior to the very fault which you are condemning? It arises from an inordinate love and estimation of riches, and to have corrected this erroneous judgment of money, is not very common in so young a man. But from every evil and event of life, some good may be extracted. You will derive some benefit from the present exhibition of "what is in man," on both sides, if you trace each fault to its source, and endeavor to form a more wise estimate of rank and wealth, and to repress the disposition to censure and find fault. Censure not, as you would avoid censure." This admonition, which has so long been engraven on the tablets of your grand-pa's memory, I would wish to have impressed upon yours.

Have you not frequently observed how uninteresting, and even disgusting it is, to be obliged to listen to a tedious narration of one's own complaints, or of those of their children? I hope you are, or will be, superior to the commission of this vulgar and weak-minded practice. That it looks ill in others, may serve as a sufficient proof that it appears no better in us. Another consideration I will suggest to you, which may likewise tend to restrain you from following a silly and bad example. It is this: talking much of our own complaints, is not only an offence against politeness and propriety, but it is also highly detrimental to our intellectual progress and dignity. What aids our intellectual improvement? Full, earnest occupation, and employment on worthy subjects. What hinders intellectual improvement? Nothing so much as a frivolous, loose, aimless mode of allowing our thoughts to float along. And when are our minds more frivolously, more vaguely, more vainly employed, than when relating and dwelling upon trifling feelings of indisposition?

"To daily long on subjects mean and low, Shows a weak mind, or quickly makes it so."

This, I believe, is the expression of an important truth, and if so, how solicitous ought we to be, in avoiding an unprofitable employment of our thoughts, especially upon subjects without rational interest or dignity—subjects "mean and low." A lady once won her way to a very high portion of my esteem and respect, by her marked superiority to this silly practice of complaining. She literally scorned to utter a complaint. For instance, when we are upon a journey, we are apt to become jaded, feverish, and worn out. She has told me that while some of her fellow-travellers were yielding themselves up passively to these feelings, and giving utterance to their tales of distress, she was busily employing herself, in her apartment, in washing face, and hands, and mouth, and otherwise refreshing herself. She would reap her reward in a feeling of dignity and self respect, as well as an increased capacity of enjoying food, sleep, or any other bodily comfort or enjoyment. I would have all of you possessed of the manliness and dignity of this lady. When you mingle in society, observe for yourselves what description of people are most apt to indulge in this kind of conversation, the strong or the weak-minded, the vigorous and sensible, or the imbecile and silly. According to the result of your observations, be guided in forming an estimate of this practice, which appears so frivolous and patience-exhausting to me, but about which I would have you form your own opinion. With which of the two classes of character would you wish to be ranked—with those who are addicted to the practice of treating their friends with a detail of their diseases and distresses, or with those who are superior to such an employment of mind and time?

While attending the death-bed of a friend, lately, an observation of Meikle, in his "Solitude Sweetened," forcibly recurred to my memory. He says to this effect: that he had been present at many a scene of death and dying, and though he had never heard a regret at having made a bad bargain, he had frequently heard bitter lamentations on account of misspent time. The author of "Domestic Duties," says, "I have heard those who have passed the meridian of life, declare, that the chief cause for regret and remorse, which their retrospections afforded them, sprung more from the conviction of having spent the best part of their time in an unprofitable manner, than from any recollections of actual misconduct." Would not you wish to avoid such irritating and corroding retrospections! If ye would, fix, now, at this early stage of your existence, upon objects of pursuit worthy and elevated, and let your pursuit of them be strenuous and persevering. Pleasurable retrospections must be purchased "by the abandonment of every indolent habit and frivolous pursuit. This at first may be irksome to you; but you will, in the end, discover that you have secured the substance, and given up only the shadow of enjoyment. Vapid, joyless, and splenetic, is the close of that life, of which the commencement has been unprofitably employed; while cheerfulness and serenity generally mark the old age of a well-spent youth." In forming your plans to secure for yourselves a cheerful and satisfactory old age, have regard to what you will find in Matt. vi. 33, and vii. 24-27. And may God be the guide of your youth!

DOMINION OF CHRIST.

BY REV. L. KNAPP.

"For none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself. For whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord: whether we live, therefore, or die, we are the Lord's. For to this end Christ both died, and rose, and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and living."

ROMANS XIV. 7-9.

I understand from these words, that Christ has dominion over man, whether dead or alive, and that it was necessary for him to die and rise again, to obtain this dominion. So that he that dieth, dieth to him, as much as that he that liveth, liveth to him. For as he is Lord both of the dead and living, he is a dispenser of blessings to both; universal dominion under God is his, whether they be things of the next state, or this. For all things are put under him, whether they be things in heaven or things in earth, the Father only excepted. And says Peter of Christ, "Who is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of God; angels and authorities, and powers, being made subject unto him."

When Christ suffered upon the cross, he tasted death for every man, and it matters not whether they had had their day before him, and were gone down to the shades of death; or whether they should live after; he was equally the Saviour of both. And he could not, otherwise, have been a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people. The Gentiles that lived before Christ, had not the means of salvation in this life, even allowing that the Jews had; and therefore could not be saved without extending Christ's dominion over the dead, and that, both as king and priest.

The dominion of the devil over the dead, cannot be sustained, and those who assert it, are their own authors—God has not said it. Christ has bruised the serpent's head, and is the destroyer of death, and him that has the power of death, that is the devil; neither is the devil's future reign proved by his resurrection from the dead; we therefore trust that he will be unable to perpetuate his dominion.

Christ's dominion over the dead is necessary to his work. The Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world. The departed dead were as much the world that he came to save, as the living, and he tasted death for them together with the living; for he was the propitiation for the sins of the whole world. It is therefore vain to limit the work of Christ to the earth, and extend the reign of the devil over the spirits of the departed. It is men that have limited Christ's salvation to the earth, and let the devil loose upon the departed dead; not God, for he has asserted the dominion of his Son, and bounds death and the devil by him. Christ affirms that all power in heaven and in earth was given to him, and that the keys of death and hell were in his possession. What, then, can the devil do? and what can his ministers do?—they are but wind and confusion, a vapor, that a brighter sun will remove.

Men have sought to limit the means of grace to the earth, and thus to shorten the hand of Christ, that he cannot save a soul that they have not converted before it leaves the body. They have also limited God's mercy to him, making death a bound beyond which he cannot be propitious. And they have attempted to prove it, and have altered some texts to make it out; but their work is not done; the Scriptures yet speak for themselves. Thus men say: "If ye die in your sins, whither I go ye can not come." "As the tree falleth, there it shall lie; as death leaves us, so judgment will find us." Corrected—"I go my way, and ye shall seek me, and shall die in your sins; whither I go ye cannot come."

As to the first of these texts, Christ explains it to his disciples: "I go my way, ye shall seek me, and as I said to the Jews, so say I now unto you, whither I go ye cannot come;" and told them that they could not follow him then, but that they should come afterwards. The same was true of the Jews; they could not follow him then, but were to be brought in with the fullness of the Gentiles. As to the words of Solomon, they only want to be examined to see that they were introduced by him, to illustrate the giving of alms; that bread cast on the waters, should be received after many days, as certainly as that the clouds shall receive the rain again, after many days, that falls upon the earth, or the tree remain in the place where it falleth.

The words of God by Moses, "My Spirit shall not always strive with man," have also been introduced to prove that God's mercy was limited by death, to the unconverted. And the Lord said, "My spirit shall not always strive with man, for that he also is flesh; yet his days shall be an hundred and twenty years." Here is one hundred and twenty years taken out of always; to what, then, can the text refer? Certainly to nothing but the life of man before and after the flood, that from nine hundred years, called always, his days were reduced to one hundred and twenty years; so that instead of God's striving with man nine hundred years, he now only strives with him one hundred and twenty. Such is the testimony to limit God's mercy.

MORAL INFLUENCE OF NATURE.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

There are moral influences abroad in the universe of God, which act as motive springs to all human deeds. They are the delicate operators that weave the webs of mortal destiny—variegated and beautiful, or rough and unseemly, as suits their own peculiar genius.

Of these moral influences, there is none more mysterious in its nature, or delicate in its operations, than the subtle spirit that dwells in the beautiful creations of the material world. Who that has stood by the "melodious wave," 'mid the scented wild bowers that shadow it; or in the forest glade, where the "pine-grove's soft and soul-like sound" is blended with the still more ethereal music of the golden-winged choir; or by the rose upon the hill-side, or the lily in the valley, has not felt his spirit purer, and his heart more tender, beneath their kindly influence? Is there no dew-like fall of peace upon the breast—no tear welling up from a fountain of grateful and impassioned love—no fervent prayer stealing out from a soul full of unutterable praise?

"Day unto day uttereth speech"—continually, eternally is that spiritual voice repeating its celestial truths—and shall we not adore our Creator for these holy and delicate revelations of his goodness? for these ministering spirits, sent forth to minister to our moral pleasures, and our religious hopes?

"Millions of spiritual creatures walk the earth Unseen, both when we wake, and when we sleep;"

and these creatures, or influences, are our guardian angels, empowered by our almighty Parent to watch over the destinies of his offspring—to lead them in the paths of truth, and in the ways of salvation—to soften asperities, and awaken sympathies—to make adoration intense, and gratitude illimitable!

The avenger goes forth upon his murderous mission, bearing the deadly weapon in his bosom. His brow is dark, his eye fierce, and his whole soul full of malice. He steals through the sylvan thickets that intervene between himself and victim, with a noiseless tread; soft murmurs from the passing rivulet, and strains of melody from the lonely night-bird, fall not unheard upon his ear; silvery rays streaming from a thousand far-off fountains of light, come down upon his burning eyes, and enter into the dark place of his soul; his purpose falters—passion grows weak—better feelings spring up in the renovating light;—the thread is changed—the web of destiny becomes clear and beautiful—the guardian spirit has saved him.

The inebriate spurns from his bosom the pale, devoted creature, whom he has sworn to love and cherish—curses the little pleader that begs a paternal smile—and rushes forth to embrace the goblet, to bandy blasphemies, to applaud with the laugh of revelry, the vile jest and the impious oath. With thoughts too low and grovelling for brutes to cherish, he reels across the moonlit green sward at his door, crushing the tender vine and the dew-spangled flower. He passes beneath "the tall ancestral trees," that shadow the home of his infancy. The broad green leaves flutter gratefully in the breeze—fragrant odors are shaken from their plumed boughs. Confused remembrances of innocent childhood come over him, and he throws himself beneath their venerable canopy. The music of the grog-shop, the bacchanalian song, the desecrating laugh, the shout, and curse, and echoing blow, is borne upon the trembling air. His ear hears it—his soul is shocked—he shrinks shuddering from the association; the moral influence of nature operates, and he, too, is saved.

Who—who, then, may number the streams of blood, the broken hearts, the torturing consciences, that influences like this have spared? Oh, my God! I thank thee, that by means thus silent and unseen, thou dost work out the mysteries of thy Providence!

INGRATITUDE.

BY REV. W. BULLARD.

Gratitude signifies thankfulness for favors received. What, then, is ingratitude? It is the reverse. It denotes unthankfulness. Yea, more; sometimes an abuse of favors, and of the individual who confers them. It is not rendering good for evil—this is "the golden rule." It is not rendering evil for evil—this is retaliation. But it is rendering evil for good! Yes, reader, it is rendering evil for good—this is ingratitude. Monstrous disposition, this! Surely none but demons can possess it, and those the most infuriated. And yet we are told that ingratitude enters into the composition of man. It is foul slander—it must be—at least we could hope it were, but facts are too stubborn for us here. Alas, we are forced to acknowledge—unwilling to acknowledge that there is too much truth in the accusation. It is a hard case, but there is no disguising the fact—this wicked, this infernal spirit, does actually find a place in the human heart. Surely "the heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked." A sad commentary this on human nature. A humiliating confession for parties concerned.

But, gentle reader, do not undertake to escape from yourself; for this would be in vain. Besides, we would have you bear with us a little longer; we have not got through. We were discoursing, you know, on ingratitude. Now if we must own that this is an ingredient of human nature, we will indulge the fond hope that the cases are few where it is called into exercise; and in this way we, as individuals, may stand some chance of escape. For a man had better never been born than to stand condemned under the charge of ingratitude. Better that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were cast into the sea, than be found guilty of rendering evil for good. But that there have been some few cases of this kind, cannot be denied.

When we bestow favors on the undeserving, we may expect more curses than blessings. As often as we undertake to help the lazy, the shiftless, or the unprincipled, we may calculate, with some degree of certainty, on receiving in turn little else than abuse for our pains. Feeling himself, by your repeated indulgences, laid under an obligation which he is either unable or unwilling to discharge, ten to one if the miscreant does not seek to destroy either your property or reputation, or both; and thus, by depriving you of the means of redress, and by supplanting you in the estimation of your friends, shake off the obligation at once. However incredible it may appear, such instances do happen. It may seem a paradox, but so it is, acts of the greatest cruelty have been returned for those of kindness and hospitality. The innocent have received at the hands of the guilty, the blow that should have fallen upon his own head. Cain, the fratricide, slew his brother Abel, because his brother's works were righteous, and his own were sinful. Joseph was sold by his brethren into Egypt, because of his superiority over them. Being wiser and better, he was preferred before them. Therefore they envied him, and sought his destruction. While his works were righteous, their's were sinful. Daniel, who was the only one found in the royal court of King Nebuchadnezzar, to pay divine homage to the God of Israel, was cast into the den of lions, because of his uncompromising integrity, and the hypocrisy and wickedness of his enemies. But even in a den of hungry lions, he found that protection which was denied him among men.

But the case of our blessed Saviour, is the most eminent instance of this kind. It was written of him before-hand, that he should be hated without a cause, and so it came to pass concerning him. Jesus—the good, the mild, the benevolent Jesus—was hated of all men, and above all men; and not only without a cause, but against all cause—against the best of reasons why he should have been loved, and venerated, and protected. Yes, reader, it is an astonishing fact, that he, who was emphatically the Sun of righteousness—the brightness of the Father's glory—who, though tempted in all points as we are, yet was without sin, and without guile, was hated and persecuted above any and all other men that ever visited our earth, or that ever figured upon the stage of human life. Pilate said, "I find no fault at all in this man. But they cried out the more—Away with him! Away with him from the earth—let him be crucified!" And for this same cause, that they knew there was no fault in him, they cried out the more! They did not call for another examination, for they knew it would only tend to substantiate the innocence of their victim, and expose their own wickedness. They knew that a calm and deliberate investigation of the matter, would result in the liberation of the unoffending Jesus, and the frustration of their own murderous design. Hence the necessity of making the more noise and tumult—of crying out the more, in order to silence all further inquiry concerning the case, and despatch their victim at once. It was not truth and justice they were seeking for, but the extermination—the destruction of their prisoner, right or wrong—whether guilty, or not guilty, was no consideration with them, because, forsooth, they had willed that he should die. What an astonishing case of infatuation—of extreme cruelty—of maddening ingratitude!

Readers, are you of that sect which is every where spoken against, and is it your lot to be persecuted for righteousness' sake? Then "happy are ye—forso persecuted they the prophets which were before you." Does the world hate you without a cause? Remember it so hated your divine Master, before it hated you. And it is not meet that the servant should be greater than his master—it is enough that he be as his master. Only be sure that ye suffer for righteousness' sake, and for the sake of Him who died that ye might live, and you have abundant reason to rejoice and take courage. Oh, what a blessed and happy privilege it is, to be classed with the saints, and stand in the high rank with the worthies of the earth, and be counted worthy to suffer with them in the glorious cause of truth and righteousness. Surely, "it is better"—far better—"to be a door-keeper in the house of God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness."

THE WEATHERCOCKS.

Among sensible and observing men, nothing is more pleasing than the semi-laughable, bordering upon the ridiculous, conduct of Presbyterian or Baptist deacons, when they accidentally meet, one with the other, or either with a Methodist brother of official station in the fraternal family of the "peculiar people." They severally seem to be sensible of their responsible and important stations; and this sensibility is made more acute and prominent, by a reign of experimental rule over the several flocks subject to their respective cares.

I have most especial reference to those who have borne titles, and have been called deacon, elder, or some such-like name, for a series of years, and have "experimentally" felt the excellent influence of such titles toward a (popularly) pious promotion.

As they approach one another from opposite directions, an observer will see them nerve their necks, each a little inclined to the right, so as to pass without striking noses, and with apparent efforts, each to surpass in expressive gravity of countenance. They seem to feel like pilgrims traveling to the same happy land; but the paths they travel in, vary somewhat—one runs a little further to the right or to the left—to the east or south-east—to the west or north-west of the other; and as each is very sensible his own path is the right one, and they being very much like other folks in some minor things, that is, very desirous of leading, unless the other will condescend to fall into his path, the first cannot agree to be a companion.

If one address the other with an askant "good morning, deacon," the other will return the compliment with devotional moderation, and with the regularity and deliberation of truly "stiff-necked people." They bring their fronts to bear, and wonderfully condescend to shake hands. "Wonderful condescension this," they severally think. "What can it mean?" they tacitly say, as they gaze over the distant prospect, with backs turned half-quartermen. "I guess he is coming over to the truth," they severally think, and seem to say. Thus they very reservedly, coolly, unimpassionedly hold their parley, each considering the other a little to the right or left, or east or west of the way to heaven. Many and many a time have I seen this comical farce acted over, and smiled at the folly, the pride of men will reduce them to.

The variations of the poles of such official men, I saw very happily illustrated, some time since, in the village of Canastota, Madison county. There are two churches there, one Presbyterian, the other Methodist; upon the spire of each is a weathercock. I looked at the Presbyterian one, and saw it pointed "to heaven," to the west. "Ah," said I to a fellow traveller, "the wind is in the west." "No," he replied, "it is in the north-west." "It is certainly in the west," replied I; "for see yonder, (pointing to the vane of the Presbyterian church.)" "That seems to say so," said he; "but then look yonder," (pointing to the Methodist steeple, the vane of which pointed north-west.) "Well, that is curious," said I. "No, it is not curious at all," said an aged Canastotian, who heard what had been said; "for they have imbibed the habits and ways of the officers and members of their respective churches, and therefore cannot agree to go, or point, the same way to heaven; and when I want to learn the truth, I always look right between them, for I have learned that one points just as much too far to the right as the other does to the left." I was considerably pleased with the old man's suggestions; and it occurred to me that good men always diffuse virtue round about them, and others imbibe their habits; and then it again occurred, as by a kind of analogy, that the elders, deacons, and other peculiarly good people of the respective churches, might impart a kind of contagious habit, and incline their several weathercocks to be indexes of the ways, manners, and peculiar courses of themselves. At any rate, I agreed with the old man: that is, if they agreed with the respective churches in pointing toward heaven, they neither pointed the right way, and that the truth laid between them; and I pursued my way like a well pleased

BLACK HAWK'S MORALITY.

When reflecting on the moral tendency of Partialism, and its influence in making men better here on earth, the philosophy of the renowned chief Black Hawk, has often occurred to my mind. Although none of that refinement and luxury characteristic of the whites, is exhibited among these sons of the forest, yet, there is a native genius of which many of us are bereft. As all may not have seen the extract, I will here subjoin it. He says—"We can only judge of what is proper and right, by our standard of right and wrong, which differs widely from the whites, if I have been correctly informed. The whites may do bad all their lives, and then, if they are sorry for it when about to die, all is well. But, with us, it is different; we must continue good throughout our lives, to do what we conceive to be good. If we have corn and meat, and know of a family who have none, we divide with them. If we have more blankets than sufficient, and others have not enough, we must give to them that want them." Such is his sublime and highly impressive strain of practical morality.—Would to God it prevailed more extensively among enlightened nations! If in savage lands, such a regard is paid to morality, how much more ought we, who profess to be far more exalted than they in point of virtuous excellence, to practice peace and good will among all men; to pour the oil and balm of consolation into the bosom of the widow and orphan?—But, instead of carrying our pretensions farther, let us reflect; Do we even live up to his (B. H.'s) system? Do we, who possess abundance of the good things of life, divide with the destitute and needy? If we have more than suffices for our comfort and happiness, do we give to them that want? Few among professedly enlightened nations, can answer these questions affirmatively. Happy would it be for us, could we conscientiously reply to this with the simple and energetic word, yea. But, such a state of things can never exist so long as that doctrine obtains credence in the family of man, which teaches that though men carry on every species of sin and wickedness, if they repent ere they die, all is well. It is an ism replete with every baneful tendency. It crushes like the Boa Constrictor, all the finer sensibilities of our nature, and casts a mildew on the morality of our race. When the time will come that this doctrine will meet with the contempt it deserves, I can not predict; but that such a period will arrive, I fully trust. I trust the era will arrive, when the genial influence of Universalism will be substituted in its stead—and the Sun of righteousness will arise with healing in his beams—and dispel the clouds of ignorance and superstition which envelop a portion of mankind in the darkness of despair. The preaching was mostly of the mild, persuasive cast, well-timed and well-seasoned with the grateful spices of the Gospel of peace.

VALUE OF ACTIONS.

Much as is said and written respecting the importance of human conduct, and the influence which it exerts, it is still doubted whether one of a thousand is sufficiently aware of the value of his actions—of the remote and mighty interest which attaches to every separate and individual act, whether performed by the child or the man. The conduct of children especially, is seldom, perhaps never estimated at its real value. Not that people are absolutely indifferent to the actual vice or virtue perceptible in their actions, but what is good, is rarely appreciated and encouraged—and the child is coldly told that it was very well, when the highest and warmest commendation was deserved, if not expected. And if the action is mischievous, or vicious, it is too often the subject of a kind of half-apology—it was only a child who was the actor; and it is very possible, that the little villain is smiled upon for having given evidence of tact, or spirit, or uncommon calculation. But in defiance of all this, the single action of a child, may under particular circumstances, not only determine to a great extent, the principles by which his whole life will be regulated, but fix the criterion by which others will estimate his worth and his integrity. The following simple fact is a full illustration, both of our meaning, and the truth of our position.

I know a child—but on his ruddy cheek, time and toil have now deeply and indelibly worn their furrows—his smooth and open forehead bears the wrinkles of thought, and care, and age—his glossy and flaxen hair has been bleached by almost fifty winters, and he is a child no more. Such an one, however, when about eight or nine years of age, was sent on some unimportant errand to a country store, several miles from home. He was known to the merchants, two brothers in partnership—and having received his share of attention among others waiting at the counter, and the little business entrusted to him being accomplished, he departed.

On leaving the store and proceeding a few steps into the open street, he picked up a superb silk bandana handkerchief. Shaking the dust from his prize, and apparently unconscious, that it could be appropriated to his own use, he instantly returned into the store, and inquired if any person there had lost the article which he still held in his hand. Several gentlemen were very quietly smoking their pipes with one of the partners of the firm, ensconced in a corner which served as a counting-room, one of whom, after feeling his pockets, claimed the handkerchief. The identity of the property was established by the merchant of whom it was purchased—and it was promptly restored to the rightful owner.

Suitable offers were now made to the boy, of remuneration, which he most pertinaciously rejected as having no claim, and that he had made no sacrifice, nor suffered any inconvenience. But his bosom swelled, and his face glowed with honest emotion, when he received the thanks of the person whom he had obliged, and the praises of all present, for his frank integrity and manly uprightness. His conduct was contrasted with that of many a village urchin, who would in a similar case, most probably have pocketed his prize—sold it for less than half its value, and spent the money in procuring the means of annoying others, or of ruining himself. He was told that he was in the way, and the only way to become a useful and respectable man—that all the good would remember, and all the world approve of such actions. O how self-approving were the reflections of this little boy, as he sought the new-country cabin that constituted his paternal home!

Years passed away—the child became a youth—the youth a man—the man was approaching mid-life, and the affair of the pocket-handkerchief had long ceased to be a matter of recollection. The cares and business of an arduous calling engrossed his time, and most intense exertions. Almost forgetting himself, he was struggling with fortune, to render those comfortable, who had cared for, and sustained his helpless years; and whom the poverty, or dishonesty, or neglect of a friend had stripped of a competency. One day, while transacting some business that involved considerable responsibility, and which deeply concerned his pecuniary interest, with old Mr. B., the conversation turned upon the early aspects of the country, and the condition of its pioneer inhabitants. At length, as if suddenly recollecting something, the old gentleman inquired of the other—how long he had been in the country, whose son he was, and where he had resided? He was told. "Ah," said the old man, "you must be the identical boy, who, many years since, found, and so nobly returned, my pocket-handkerchief. I know you were honest then, and with such advisers as you must have had, you can hardly have become a knave—I am not afraid to trust you now."

Thus, the trifling circumstance of restoring a pocket-handkerchief to its owner, and that too by a child, had an important bearing upon the estimation of the man. It gave him a respectable place among those whose value upon integrity and virtue; and after a period of nearly thirty years, had a material influence upon his pecuniary interest and public reputation. It inspired a confidence in his pledges, which in his situation, could not have existed, but for that action. Let the youth learn hence, to set a value upon their conduct. Let them remember that actions are measured rather by their character, than their magnitude; and that every vice is both despicable in itself and sure to produce misery—that every virtue merits, and will receive an appropriate reward.

2 THESSALONIANS I: 7, 8, 9.

MR. SKINNER—Sir, knowing your ability to explain dark and intricate passages of Scripture, I would request an explanation of 2 Thess. i: 7-9; by giving which, you will confer a favor upon a friend to the cause of truth, and benefit your readers, by inserting it in the Magazine and Advocate.

Yours, etc.,

AN INQUIRER.

The persons who troubled—or vexed the Thessalonians, were probably the unbelieving Jews residing at that place, as they were foremost in exciting, or stirring up, if not actually carrying on, nearly all the persecutions raised against the Christians, for forty years prior to the destruction of Jerusalem, both in Judea and other countries where the Gospel was preached. See 1 Thess. i: 14, 15, 16, and other parallel passages. The troublers of the church at Thessalonica, being understood to be the unbelieving Jews residing there, the passages proposed for explanation will be readily and clearly understood.

"To you who are troubled, rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed," etc. Mark the language—he does not say, To them who shall be troubled in future generations, but to you, i. e. of this generation upon whom the trouble is coming. But when was the Lord Jesus to come with his mighty angels, or messengers, to execute judgment upon the ungodly, who troubled the Christians? Let him give the answer himself, and we shall be sure of having a correct one. Matt. xvi: 27, 28. "For the Son of Man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels; and then he shall reward every man according to his works. Verily I say unto you, There be some standing here who shall not taste of death till they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom." xxiii: 32-36. "Fill ye up, then, the measure of your fathers. Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers! how can ye escape the judgment of Gehenna? Wherefore, behold, I send unto you prophets, and wise men and scribes; and some of them ye shall kill and crucify; and some of them shall ye scourge in your synagogues, and persecute them from city to city: that upon you may come all the righteous blood, shed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel unto the blood of Zacharias, son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar. Verily I say unto you, All these things shall come upon this generation." xxiv: 30-34. "And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet; and they shall gather together his elect [the Christians] from one end of heaven [the Church or Gospel kingdom] to the other. Now learn a parable of the fig-tree: When his branch is yet tender and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh: so likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors.—Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass till all (not a part of) these things be fulfilled." Mark viii: 38, and ix: 1. "Whosoever therefore shall be ashamed of me, and of my words, in this adulterous and sinful generation; of him also shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he cometh in the glory of his Father with the holy angels. And he said unto them, Verily, I say unto you, That there be some of them that stand here, that shall not taste of death till they have seen the kingdom of God come with power." See also of the same import, Mark xiii: 26-31, and Luke xxi: 27-33, in both of which places it is declared that the Son of man shall be seen coming with the clouds of heaven with power and great glory, and that the generation then living should not pass till all those things were fulfilled. Here are no less than six passages already quoted where the coming of Christ is expressly foretold, and by himself, too, and limited particularly to that generation; and if these do not settle the question as to the time, it is impossible to settle it by Scripture testimony.

The measure of the Jews' iniquity was filled up in that generation, and wrath came upon them to the uttermost. The Lord Jesus was revealed from heaven, in the fulfilment of his predictions, with his mighty angels, the messengers of his vengeance, visiting that wicked generation with the punishment due to their sins—when there was tribulation such as had never before been witnessed—the sword without, famine, pestilence and civil war within, mothers butchering and eating their own children in the straits of the siege, their daily sacrifice taken away, their priests slain with the sacrifices they were offering, their temple finally demolished, their city in ruins and ashes, and the unfortunate survivors of the siege sold as cattle in the market, and carried as slaves into all parts of the world—thus were the persecutors of the Christians punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power. "The presence of the Lord" had long been considered, by the Jews, as being fixed at Jerusalem, and particularly in the temple, where the Shekinah, or Divine presence, had for so many ages been manifest, and the "glory of his power" so frequently displayed, in attestation of his favor, and the acceptance of their offerings. To be driven from their city and temple and all these privileges, and to know they were forever destroyed—to be dispersed among all nations and to become a hissing and a by-word among the Heathen for so many generations as their dispersion has already lasted, was, to the Jews, being punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power." In exact agreement with, and further illustration of this subject, is the language of Peter, 1st epistle, iv: 17, 18.—"For the time is come that judgment must begin at the house of God: and if it first begin at us, what shall the end be of them that obey not the Gospel of God? And if the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?" A clear intimation that though the disciples, or Christians, were much troubled and afflicted, yet their ungodly persecutors, the unbelieving Jews, would soon suffer far more severe calamities than they: and this proved to be the case. For while the disciples recollected the warning of Jesus, to "flee" immediately from the city to the wilderness, when they should "see Jerusalem compassed with armies and a trench cast about her," for thereby they should "know that the desolation thereof was at hand," they took advantage of this information and fled to the place called Pella, in the hill country, and thus saved themselves; and as history informs us, none of them perished at that time. They had scarcely effected their escape, (hence, the phrase, "if the righteous scarcely be saved.") when the storm which had so long been gathering, burst with ten-fold vengeance on the heads of the rebellious and unbelieving Jews, destroying at once hundreds of thousands of them, and reducing the rest to the most distressing state.

CHRISTIANITY.

That this should be valued above all else, is natural and right, for those who know what it is, find it an infinite, endless, continual treasure and source of light, peace and joy. But to judge of the estimation in which some hold it, by their actions, you would suppose it was as fleeting and evanescent as the changes of a cloud, or the baseless fabric of a vision. Now they see its total demolition threatened by Geology, now by Phrenology—to-day they tremble to read "Combe on the Constitution of Man," lest the strong foundations of religion should be undermined; and to-morrow they turn pale at the sight of "Buckland's Geology," lest it will sink into nothingness, the Bible and all its sacred truths respecting God's purpose and man's immortality! What is the language of these fears? Is it not an avowal that they do not believe Christianity to be the eternal truth of the immutable Jehovah, but a fleeting dream, contradicted by the workmanship of God, and the handwriting of our Creator on the solid layers of our globe? Such may be their faith in Christianity—or rather their doubts respecting it—but such is not Christianity. The God of revelation is the God of nature, and as surely as he is the God of truth, they must and will agree with each other in their positive and direct teachings. Man's interpretations of Scripture, may contradict the doctrine revealed in nature—or man's theories founded on a few isolated facts in nature, may contradict the teachings of revelation; but take facts, not speculations, and the Bible instead of the creeds of men, and a perfect harmony and unity will be found existing between them. They may teach different doctrines, but they will not teach contradictory doctrines, unless they are the work of different beings, or of a being of different opinions at different periods. Of this, every humble Christian may rest fully assured; and armed with this confidence, the tyro in theology and science may go on in his delightful studies, without the shadow of a fear to cloud the sunshine of truth upon his understanding.

Only be careful to ascertain the facts in science, and separate them from speculations, on the one hand—to learn the instructions of the Bible, in divine, spiritual, and invisible things, and separate them from the interpretations of men, on the other hand, and there can be no danger. If you find a supposed fact which contradicts (and not every difference is a contradiction) your views of the Bible, you may rely upon it that either the fact is misapprehended, or that its bearing upon the scriptural doctrine is misunderstood, or that the supposed doctrine of the Bible is not warranted by it, or is the result of a false interpretation of the text. One or the other, I am confident, must be the cause—the fault must be in you; for it can not be in the truth, whether it be a truth of nature or of revelation.

BACK NUMBERS.

We can still supply new subscribers from the commencement of the volume, but shall not send them unless specially ordered. Our agents will please bear this in mind.

THE PRIZE TALE

In our last, by Miss Edgerton, is one of the three which obtained the premium of Ten dollars. This should have been stated in the paper in which the tale was published, but was forgotten until too late. By this time it is an act perfectly useless to tell our readers that it is a very excellent article; and in point of literary merit, unsurpassed by any thing that has ever appeared in our columns—or, if my memory serves me, by any thing like it which has ever appeared in any of our periodicals within ten years. The author is yet in the very morning of life, and being already (to use the language of Herman Campbell) "rich in that faith that sustains and soothes the heart in all the chances and changes of life—and, forgive me if I speak too proudly, but I can not highly appreciate His gifts—rich in learning and talents"—we pray she may go onward to greater perfection in the use of them, for the benefit of man, the advancement of her own joy, and the promotion of the glory of their Giver.

TO CANDIDATES FOR PREMIUMS.

If evidence was wanting of the unpecuniary nature of the contest between the writers of articles for prizes, it might be found in the fact that many of them have not yet directed us how to dispose of the premiums awarded them. Each unsuccessful writer is also entitled to a gratis copy of the present volume. Whether they do not value the paper, or have forgotten the circumstance, we know not, but few of them have given us any orders concerning it. We wait their leisure, and shall endeavor to fulfil their orders when received.

ADVERTISING.

We have received from a friend in Virginia, an advertisement of a large lot of Oak, Cypress, and Ash ship timber, offering an interest in the same to any one who understands getting it out, etc. We are obliged to decline the insertion of all advertisements in our paper—except of what immediately concerns the cause to which it is devoted. By doing so, we cut off a profitable source of revenue for ourselves, but we thereby furnish a more valuable paper to our subscribers. There are few secular papers that furnish as much reading matter, as we do, for anything like the same amount of money, though our paper is smaller than most secular journals. Let any one count up the advertising portions of any country paper, and add them to our sheet, and he will at once be satisfied of this fact. It is important, therefore, as the price is less, and the sources of income fewer, that our periodicals should be more promptly supported, or the enhanced price for a delay of payment be exacted in all cases.

We respectfully decline the advertisement sent us, but any one wanting information respecting it, can apply to us free of postage, and it will be furnished.

MIRROR OF PARTIALISM.

This pamphlet has made its appearance, in a neat form, well covered, containing 48 pages, and 156 well attested cases of insanity and suicide occasioned by belief in and preaching of the doctrine of endless misery, most of them within six years past! They are well and briefly told, and the comments and remarks on them are in good taste and marked with right feeling and propriety. Many of the accounts are copied from the secular press, and nearly all give name, place and date. Br. Sanderson, publisher—Herald of Truth office, Rochester, N. Y.

THE KNICKERBOCKER.

I have no doubt that the number for May is an excellent one—but in this matter, I go "by faith, and not by sight;" for our copy has not yet reached us. The number for June has not yet appeared, that I can learn from any of our exchange papers—we hope it and the May number will come to us in company, and soon.

PRIZE ESSAYS.

The committee to whom was referred the Essays on the best practicable means of promoting the knowledge of Universalism, after duly considering the same, in connection with the original and extended offers, awards the first premium of twenty dollars, to an Essay written by Rev. S. P. Landers, Prompton, Pa.

The second premium of ten dollars, is awarded to an Essay written by Rev. Menzies Rayner, Troy.

The third premium, of two free subscriptions to the Magazine and Advocate for one year, or one free subscription for two years, (at the option of the writer,) is awarded to an Essay written by Rev. Joseph Baker, Swanton, Vt.

To which the Proprietors of the Magazine and Advocate add a free subscription to their paper for the present volume, to each of the writers of the remaining Essays—three in number.

THE RURAL REPOSITORY

Continues to be published by Mr. Stoddard, of Hudson, and remains the same excellent, unpretending little semi-monthly it ever has been. It is well worth its subscription price, (one dollar per annum,) to any one having a love for a literary paper, and unable to take the Knickerbocker, the Mirror, or any of Waldie's publications.

TRUST.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

Oh, give me back the artless trust,
That made the sunshine of my youth!
My God, I will—I must, I must Dream longer yet that dream of truth!
I'll give thee prayers, and thanks, and praise—
I'll part with my half-finished youth,
With hours of bliss, with cloudless days—
But give me back that dream of truth!

Oh! once I saw in every smile
The purity of human love;
And little dreamed a serpent's wile
Could sport the plumage of a dove!
I thought that ev'ry sunny brow,
And ev'ry soft and silvery tone,
And ev'ry whispered moonlight vow,
Received its seal at God's high throne.

I did not know the sweet toned voice
Conveyed a siren's poisoned lure;
I saw the eye and lip rejoice,
And thought the spirit must be pure.
Oh! can I lose this holy faith—
The very sunlight of my soul!
Sooner—ay, sooner, break, Oh, Death!
The silver cord, the golden bowl!

Falschood may lurk in ev'ry word,
May be concealed in ev'ry smile—
May blend with ev'ry vow, unheard—
Yet I will think, nor dream of guile.
I'll trust to ev'ry tear and prayer,
That asks or hopes to be believed;
Rather than doubt, or fear a snare,
Oh, God! I'll trust, and be deceived.

SELECTIONS FROM "LACONICS NO. II.

XIII.—Truth will be uppermost, one time or other, like cork, though kept down in the water.—SIR W. TEMPLE.

XIV.—A just man hateth the evil, but not the evil doer.—SIR P. SIDNEY.

XV.—A drunkard is a good Philosopher; for he thinks aright: the world goes round.—SIR T. OVERBURY.

XVI.—The law is the standard and guardian of our liberty; it circumscribes and defends it; but to imagine liberty without a law, is to imagine every man with his sword in his hand to destroy him who is weaker than himself; and that would be no pleasant prospect to those who cry out most for liberty.—CLARENDON.

XVII.—Of all wild beasts preserve me from a tyrant. And of all tam, a flatterer.—JONSON.

XVIII.—Eloquence, that leads nanking by the ears, gives a nobler superiority than power that every dunce may use, a fraud that every knave may employ, to lead them by the nose. But Eloquence must flow like a stream that is fed by an abundant spring, and not spout forth a little frothy water on some gaudy day, and remain dry the rest of the year.—BOLINGBROKE.

XIX.—Time is the feathered thing,
And whilst I praise
The sparkling of thy locks, and call them rays.
Takes wing—
Leaving behind him as he flies,
An unperceived dimness in thine eyes.—MAYNE.

XX.—The lightsome countenance of a friend, giveth such an inward decking to the house where it lodgeth, as proudest palaces have cause to envy the gilding.—SIR P. SIDNEY.

XXI.—As gardening has been the inclination of kings and the choice of philosophers, so it has been the common favorite of public and private men; a pleasure of the greatest, and the care of the meanest; and, indeed, an employment and a possession, for which no man is too high nor too low.—SIR W. TEMPLE.

XXII.—The truly valiant dare every thing, but doing any other body an injury.—SIR P. SIDNEY.

XXIII.—Weariness
Can snore upon the flint, when restive slath
Finds the down pillow hard.—SHAKESPEARE.

XXIV.—Fellowship in treason is a bad ground of confidence.—BURKE.

Selections from the "Tin Trumpet."

ISSUES.—Landed.—Natural prejudices, to reject the influence of which, in the education of youth, is, itself, one of the most unreasonable of prejudices.—"Why should we scruple," asks Mrs. Barbauld, "to lead a child to right opinions, in the same way by which nature leads him to right practices? He may be left to find out that mustard will bite his tongue, but he must be prejudiced against ratsbane."

LIGHT—Like the circulating blood, which returns to the heart, is supposed to return to the sun, after having performed the functions for which it was emitted from that body. Even so will the soul, our intellectual light, return to its divine source, when released from the body, to whose earthly purposes it has ministered.

MARTYR—That which all religions have furnished in about equal proportions, so much easier is it to die for religion than to live for it. Our high church conservatives cry out, with a lusty voice, "Touch not that which has been cemented by the blood of the holy martyrs."—Why, these very martyrs, whose devotedness proves nothing but their sincerity, died in the cause of reform; and yet their example is cited as a warning against it! If their blood appeal to us at all, it may rather be supposed to cry out against the monstrous abuses of that Christianity, for whose cause they became martyrs.

MOUTH—A useless instrument to some people, in its capacity, by the organs of speech, of rendering ideas audible; but of special service to them in its other capacity of rendering virtuous invisible.

PUBLIC OPINION—Is a river which digs its own bed. We may occasionally moderate or quicken its course, but it is very difficult to alter it.

REFORM—An adaptation of institutions to circumstances and knowledge, or a restoration to the original purposes, from which they have been perverted, demanded as a right by those who are suffering wrongs, and only denied and refused by those who have been fattening upon abuse. The real Conservatives are the Reformers, the real revolutionists are the corruptionists, who, by opposing quiet, will compel violent change. When the ultras, and men of this class, whose long misrule, and denial of justice, have inflamed the public mind, charge the Reformers with having thrown the whole country into a blaze, thus accusing the extinguisher of being the firebrand, one is reminded of the incendiary, who, in order to avoid detection, turned round and collared the foreman of the engines, exclaiming, "Ha, fellow! have I caught you? This is the rascal who is first and foremost at every fire—seize him! seize him!" There is no Reform Bill in Turkey,—no factions opposition,—no free press,—no two-penny trash,—yet, in no country are revolutions so frequent.

Reform, however, to be useful and durable, must be gradual and cautious. To those radical genry of the movement party, who would be always at work, without calculating the mischief or the cost of their vaunted improvements, I recommend the consideration of the following anecdote:—The celebrated orator Henley advertised, that, in a single lecture, he would teach any artisan, of ordinary skill, how to make six pair of good shoes in one day;—nay, six-and-twenty pair, provided there was a sufficiency of materials. The sons of Crispin flocked in crowds, willingly paying a shilling at the door, to be initiated in such a lucrative art, when they beheld the orator seated at a table, on which were placed six pair of new boots. "Gentlemen!" he exclaimed, "nothing is so simple and easy as the art which I have undertaken to teach you. Here are a new pair of boots,—here are a large pair of scissors;—behold! I cut off the legs of the boots, and you have a new pair of shoes, without the smallest trouble; and thus they may be multiplied, ad infinitum, supposing always that you have a sufficiency of materials."

DEATHS.

In Watertown, June 11th, Mr. GARDNER E. WILKINS, son of Mr. E. B. Wilkins, aged 31 years. He lived a virtuous life, believed the Gospel of universal grace, died in peace, and left a companion, an infant child, and many relatives and friends to mourn their loss.

Recently, in Allensville, Ind., of consumption, Mrs. BEULAH SAGE, wife of Dr. P. S. Sage, formerly of Deerfield, N. Y., aged 22 years.

Mrs. S. endured her illness with a calm resignation, and expressed herself ready and willing to depart. Her funeral was attended by Rev. Mr. Lee, Methodist.

In Champlain, Clinton county, June 13th, of consumption, Miss DELIZA E. FISH, formerly of Leyden, Lewis county. She bore her painful illness of about three months, with Christian fortitude and resignation, and when the hour for her departure arrived, bade her friends an affectionate farewell, and calmly resigned her spirit to him who gave it, cheered and supported by the glorious hope of a blissful immortality beyond the grave.

In life, the doctrine of God's impartial grace was a theme on which she delighted to dwell, and her pure life and happy death affords another evidence that Universalism will do both to live and to die by.

He has gone! but her bright examples of moral excellence will remain as an everlasting monument in the memories of those who enjoyed the pleasure of her acquaintance.

A wealth of records and sweet feelings given."

From sorrow's heart a faintness to remove,

By whispers breathing 'less of earth than heaven.'

Thus rests thy spirit still on those, with whom

Thy step the path of joyous duty trod,

Bidding them make an altar of thy tomb,

Where chasten'd thought may offer praise to God."

O. H.

At New-London, Oneida county, May 30th, of inflammation of the bowels, MARGARET E. RUDD, aged 10 years, 5 months and 21 days, and on the 29th ult., of inflammation of the brain, ANSON S. M. RUDD, aged 3 months and 2 days—eldest and youngest children of Dr. George W. and Palmyra Rudd. Thus were two lovely buds nipt in the early morning of their being by the chilling frost of death. But though the bereaved parents mourn their own loss, their faith enables them to mourn not as those without hope, but to rejoice in anticipation of a glorious inheritance and happy reunion in a better country, where sorrow and parting will be no more.

In Westmoreland, July 3d, of liver complaint, Mrs. LYDIA LOUISA PECK, consort of William S. Peck, and daughter of William Stebbins, of Clinton, in the 26th year of her age. Amiable in her manners and excellent in her life, she was ever cheered by the Gospel of universal grace, which was her support in death. The funeral was attended on the fourth, in the Presbyterian meeting-house in Hampton village, when the consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the twice widowed husband, and other bereaved relatives and friends, by the writer.

BY THE AUTHOR OF NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

LETTER IX.

MY BELOVED YOUTH—In my last letter I made some remarks, such as I might have addressed to you had I been your companion at the scenes which suggested the remarks. I imagined you to have been reading the observations of the traveller, and seeing the scenes or exhibitions of human nature which I noticed, in company with me, and the remarks made in the letter, are a specimen of such as I would have addressed to you, had you really been present with me. I return to my promised companionship in the reading and interpretation of the New Testament. I shall submit to you, first, what appears, to me, to have been the train of thought which passed through the mind of Jesus while addressing to his disciples and the multitude, the former part of the sermon on the Mount. But, I hope that, faithful to the plan which I have often inculcated, and concerning which I am, and you may be, well assured that it will highly conduce to your own mental progress and vigor, and independence, you have already, for yourselves, formed some opinion about the same passages. If you have not done so, I beseech you to make an effort, such as you can, before proceeding to read my views. If you neglect to do this, you must lose—you must forego much of the benefit which my remarks, as your companion in reading the New Testament, might be made to yield you.

We find Jesus, during the few years of his public ministry, almost constantly surrounded by immense multitudes, who accompanied him from very different motives. Some, as the Scribes and Pharisees, attended upon him, that they might, if possible, seize hold of some expression by which they might have him accused, condemned, and put to death. Some attended from curiosity and astonishment, at the miraculous powers which he displayed; some, from a desire of learning truth and wisdom from one who taught in a manner so very superior to that of the Scribes, and such may be generally understood when we read of his disciples—the twelve not being meant. They were, perhaps, his most regular and steady attendants. I can easily imagine Jesus seizing some suitable occasion, when surrounded by such a motley group of followers, and having gone a little way up a rising ground, that he might better be heard, to have harangued his auditors after the following tenor:—

"Ye have made, my countrymen, one great, radical mistake in supposing that the kingdom which the God of heaven promised, by the mouth of his servant Daniel, to set up and establish, is to be of the same kind as the powers and principalities which are now in the world. This radical mistake has led you to adopt many others springing from, or in accordance with it. For example; ye suppose that those whom ye call great or grand—the rich, the learned, and those in the upper ranks of society—that those will be peculiarly fortunate and much the happiest in this expected kingdom, inasmuch as they will naturally be participators in the administration, the emoluments, and the glories connected with it. From these ye think will be selected the officers and the court of your Messiah or Prince. But strangely as it may sound in your ears, I tell you, of a truth, that those who neither possess nor care for the distinctions of wealth and rank—those whom ye would call poor, or even poor-spirited, as having no ambition to get up in the world—these are those of whom this kingdom will be chiefly composed—who shall enjoy its privileges and benefits, and who, therefore, ought to be esteemed the happiest. Yea, verily, such are happy.

"Again, ye suppose that this nation is to be delivered from the Roman yoke, and to be free, independent, and pre-eminent over other nations, and that this state of things will call for and produce a general scene of rejoicing. Then will be a seasonable occasion for the gay, the jovial, the light-hearted, to make merry, and be glad. But the new kingdom will little affect such, and afford them no joyful occasions. It will be rather composed of those who are of a more serious and solemn mood, whom ye would call lugubrious and melancholy, and to such will it afford ever recurring occasions of joy, for their bosoms will it fill full of sweetest consolation and peace. Such will rejoice in God their portion.

"Ye suppose that when this new kingdom is set up, the forward, the bold, the enterprising, the rapacious, will rush forward and seize upon its most desirable offices, its most lucrative trusts and employments. Such ye think will be happy, because they are likely to take possession of the wealth and power of the kingdom. But I tell you that such characters, although they seize the shadow, do not possess the substance of enjoyment. Those who may be properly said to possess the earth, are such as derive from it the greatest satisfaction. The above-named are not such, but rather the meek, the mild, the gentle in disposition—the retiring, the unassuming—such, if they seize not the wealth, the grandeur, the power, and the property of the earth, do yet derive from what they do possess, a calmer satisfaction, a serenity, a tranquillity, composure and cheerfulness, to which the others are entire strangers. The latter, therefore, are the happiest.

"How can ye, oh! how can ye, descendants of the righteous, the upright, the right-doing Abraham, give yourselves to envy, or account happy those who, in their eager pursuit of wealth and worldly aggrandizement, do wrong, trample on the rights of others, and even rob widows' houses, even though they do, for a pretence, make long prayers and great pretensions. Will the dishonest, the rapacious, the robber, be great in the kingdom of heaven? No! in that kingdom, though ye think otherwise, there is no room for such. Neither will the pursuits of such ever yield them solid satisfaction. Who would be happy must be in spirit, and not by natural descent only, the children of Abraham. Their most eager desires, their most earnest efforts, must not be after wealth, by whatever means, but after justice and equity in their dealings—after fairness and uprightness—after the avoidance and the hatred of every unjust, injurious, or oppressive disposition and action. Such shall enjoy an abundance of peace—such shall be happy. Have ye forgotten what Solomon hath told you? 'He that trusteth in his riches shall fall; but the right-doers shall flourish as a branch. Behold the upright shall be recompensed in the earth; how much more the wrong-doer and the sinner?' As spake the king of Israel, so speaketh the king of the Jews, your Messiah.

"I wonder less at your neglect of mercy, when ye despise even plain justice. Coolly trampling on the rights of others, it is less wonder if ye are indifferent to their sufferings. But this indifference to the sufferings of others, is the 'curse and bane' of the world. Neither under the dispensation (aion or age) under which you have been living, has it ever been, nor under the coming age, will it ever be otherwise, than that the merciful—those disposed to pity and alleviate the sufferings of others—those unwilling to indulge or gratify themselves at the expense of others—those willing to forego emolument, ease, personal indulgence, rather than make others uncomfortable and unhappy—it has never been, nor ever will be, that such should fail of being kindly, mercifully dealt with themselves. On the other hand, they have and 'shall have judgment without mercy, who have shewed no mercy.' Have ye forgotten the word of the Lord by Micah? 'What doth the Lord require of you, but 'to do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with your God.'"

"How am I filled with indignation and with grief to know that under your Messiah's reign, ye expect full scope for the gratification of every sensual, low, and grovelling desire! Have ye ever found satisfaction in the indulgence of such inclinations? How, then, do ye expect it now? Why do ye look with envy on the licentious gratification of a victorious army, or of the grandes of Gentile nations? Ye cannot deny that ye hope, under a prince that will lead you to victory, for beautiful captives. With such desires, have ye the hardihood to call God your king, or to dream of being admitted into the presence of the SUPREME PURITY? My blinded countrymen, none can approach His courts, none can dwell in His holy temple, save the clean of hands, the pure in heart. Every mortification of such thoughts and desires, shall produce a nobler and more refined pleasure. As ye become more pure, ye shall be more happy. And not until pure in deed, pure in heart, can ye hope to be called the children of the kingdom or reign of heaven and purity, or to be admitted into the presence of PURITY HIMSELF.

"Under your Messiah, ye expect to conquer other nations, and to bear rule as do the Romans now. And as the rulers of the world, ye expect to be supremely happy, and to be regarded as the favorites of Heaven. Alas! how deceived. Not those who delight in battle, desolation, and slaughter, but those who avoid contention, who labor to promote brotherly-kindness, forbearance and peace, are happy. The favorites with the world are warriors and conquerors; but those who are like God—the God of peace—who are, in truth, his children—are such as love not controversy, love not domination and rule, but love to promote harmony and peace. Such labors of love are the most delightful of employments, as those best know who have tried.

"Ye expect to be honored and respected by all the nations of the earth, under your Messiah's reign; but far different must be the fate of my followers. They must expect persecution and suffering. Yet are those not unhappy who are persecuted—obliged to flee from place to place, if for a good, a rightful cause. Their persecutors cannot take from them their treasure, even an approving conscience, and the reign or dominion of a good spirit.

"On these principles, I pronounce such of you as may become my sincere and faithful followers, happy, even when men shall reproach and revile you, and shall speak all manner of evil language against you, falsely, on account of your connexion with me. Even under such treatment ye may rejoice, for after the same manner were the teachers before you—God's ambassadors—treated: yea, more, ye may exult with joy, for your bearing up

A VOICE TO YOUNG MEN.....CHAPTER III.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

THE HABITS.

Habit is the cherishing of certain emotions and the practicing of certain actions, until they become a second nature. It has justly been said that "man is a bundle of habits." From early infancy to mature manhood, he is forming habits, which will more or less influence his enjoyments through life. Youth, in this respect, is a most important period. When the young man has arrived at years of reflection, and has become capable of meditating seriously on his future plans, then is the favorable time, when the mind is still tender and pliable, to correct improper habits formed in childhood, and to lay the foundation for those useful ones, that will tend greatly to his future prosperity.

That it is all-important for young men to look well to the habits they are now forming, is a position so evident, that little exertion is necessary to establish it. What enabled Franklin, the poor printer-boy, to arrive to an eminence which none in modern ages have surpassed ? It was acquiring in his youth, habits of industry, economy, perseverance and patient research. Why does one man ascend from obscurity and indigence to fame and wealth, despite all obstructions, while another commences life surrounded by every advantage that riches and influential friends can bestow, and yet sinks into insignificance and poverty ? This diversity is mainly caused by the difference in the formation of their habits. The one depended upon his own powers and exertions, and laid the foundation of his prosperity, by acquiring industrious, persevering and economical habits—the other, relying upon his expected wealth or influential friends, failed to qualify himself for any useful avocation, and loaded himself with habits of indolence, carelessness and prodigality.

Young men should be aware that they can cause their habits to become whatever they resolve.—Firmly determine to be frugal, industrious and temperate, and you easily become so. A Cesar, a Napoleon, a Washington, a Cicero, a Canning, a Brougham, a Wirt, could never have arrived at their celebrity, had they not formed the outlines of their career in youth, and formed habits which enabled them to fill up these outlines with so much success. Youthful habits, as was remarked in the preceding chapter, are the seed of a crop which must be reaped in after life. If your seed be of the true kind—if you obtain habits of activity, perseverance and economy—your crop will be beautiful and gratifying. But if your habits be the reverse, your harvest will be of a corresponding character.

"Habits are easily formed—especially such as are bad ; and what to-day seems to be a small affair, will soon become fixed, and hold you with the strength of a cable. That same cable, you will recollect, is formed by spinning and twisting one thread at a time ; but when once completed, the proudest ship turns her head towards it, and acknowledges her subjection to its power. Habits of some kind will be formed by every youth. He will have a particular course, in which his time, his employments, his thoughts and feelings will run. Good or bad, these habits soon become a part of himself, and a kind of social nature. Who does not know, that the old man who has occupied a particular corner of the old fire-place, in the old house, for sixty years, may be rendered wretched by a change ? Who has not read of the release of the aged prisoner of the Bastille, who entreated that he might again return to his gloomy dungeon, because his habits there formed were so strong that his nature threatened to sink under the attempt to break them up ? You will probably find no man of forty, who has not habits which he laments, which mar his usefulness, but which are so involved with his very being, that he cannot break through them. At least he has not the courage to try."*

In order to be useful to yourself and your fellow-beings, it is necessary that you enter upon some profession or occupation. Even the most wealthy, should not be without a definite calling. Riches the most immense, often "take wings and fly away"—and when he who is thus dispossessed of them, is without an occupation, his condition in such circumstances, is truly deplorable. The occupation or profession, should be chosen in accordance with the abilities, taste, and circumstances of each individual—remembering that all honest and useful employments are alike honorable. It is, however, far better to be a good mechanic or agriculturalist, than a poor professional man—it is more desirable to be in the respectable class of the former, than in the lowest grades of the latter.

The habits necessary to insure success and respectability, are many. I will enumerate a few of the most prominent.

Industry is one of the most necessary and useful of the habits. Says St. Paul—"This we commanded you, that if any would not work, neither should he eat." It is the first law of our nature, that every true comfort we enjoy, must be purchased by exertion. And it is a law equally well established, that all well directed industry, shall receive an ample remuneration in health and vigor. Of all habits that fetter human powers, indolence is the most unmanly and debasing. Every thing around you—the earth, air and water—the insect, fowls and beast—all exhibit untiring industry, and cry out "shame!" against the human being who will suffer his capabilities to stagnate in the sluggish pool of indolence. Of what value is an indolent man to himself or the world ? He is good for nothing, and worse than useless—is a burthen to himself and a pest to society, and those connected with him. He cannot be said to exist—he but vegetates, as the weed of the garden ; and as the weed, he is disrespected through life, and at death is forgotten !

"Go to the ant thou sluggard : consider her ways and be wise." This little insect furnishes a useful lesson to every man of indolence. With a prudent foresight, she industriously "provideth her meat in the Summer, and gathereth her food in the harvest." And when the snows and frosts of Winter arrive, they find her fully provided with comforts to sustain her until the return of Spring. But the indolent man, has even less wisdom and foresight than the ant. With him the future is all unprovided for ; and in an unexpected hour, want, as an armed man, seizes him in its bony embrace ! As a punishment, God has entailed sickness, imbecility, unhappiness and premature death, on the indolent. For what purpose were our bodies supplied with joints, sinews and muscles, but to be exercised in industrious occupation ?

The benefits arising from habits of industry, are numerous. Industry is the most fruitful source of that highest of bodily enjoyments, health. A due exercise of the bodily and mental functions, are prolific sources of earthly happiness. Activity opens streams of enjoyment, that would otherwise be clogged by indolence, and generate discontent and pain. Let the truth settle deep into every mind, that health can not long be enjoyed without industry. It would minister far more to the enjoyment of the man of wealth, to go out with the sturdy woodsman, and make the forest resound with the blows of his axe, or to engage in some other stirring avocation, than recline in the Delilahian lap of luxury, to be shorn of his strength and energy, and to resort to nostrums to support a constitution filled by indolence with the prolific seeds of disease ! It is a good proverb, that "we had better wear out, than rust out." For this wearing out, as it is termed, is indeed, the prolonging of life and health ; but rusting out, is a living death.

* Student's Manual.

To secure health, individuals of sedentary occupations, should labor or exercise more or less, every day, in the open air.* The correctness of this rule is constantly becoming more and more apparent. "Pray, of what did your brother die ?" said the Marquis Spinola to Sir Horace Vere. "He died, sir," replied he, "of having nothing to do." "Alas ! sir," said Spinola, "that is enough to kill any general of us all." The Turks have a proverb, that "a busy man is troubled with but one devil ; but the idle man, with a thousand."

Industry is one of the most certain means of obtaining wealth. Although all industrious men do not become wealthy, yet comparatively few ever arose from indigence to wealth, without this qualification. And in this land of equality, it is the only safe basis upon which to rest your anticipations of acquiring property. Making some "lucky hit," by which a fortune is acquired at once, is a chance that occurs but to a small number ; and if you wait in indolence for such an opportunity, you will undoubtedly pass through life in poverty. The greater proportion of the wealthy in this country, acquired their property by assiduous industry. And I repeat, that this is the only proper resource upon which to depend to acquire riches. Industry ranks among the best recommendations a young man can possess. He who has this qualification can not want for employment, assistance or friends. The industrious youth, whose other habits are good, will always be respected, patronized and encouraged. But indolence, even though connected with many good habits, invariably inspires disrespect and disgust.

Let every young man, then, firmly resolve to establish a habit of industry. With it, he can rationally hope to be almost every thing great and good—to obtain every thing proper, and enjoy every thing consistent with virtue and propriety. But without it, even though he may inherit wealth, he can rationally anticipate nothing but ill health, abasement and wretchedness.

ORIGINAL ANECDOTE.

BY REV. W. BULLARD.

There was a certain Universalist, on whom, because of his hospitality, preachers of all denominations were wont to call. Among the rest, a Methodist preacher being in the habit of visiting him, called one day, and with him also came a stranger. They were zealous in their endeavors to oppose Universalism and defend their own peculiar tenets. As they came together, it was expected they would go together ; but, having tarried some five or six hours, the preacher took his departure, leaving the stranger, who appeared to be very easy and contented in his situation. From the manner of the stranger, the family soon perceived that he had made up his mind to take up lodgings with them for the night, but expected, of course, he would leave in the morning. Morning came—the stranger continued his visit. He was attentive to reading when not engaged in conversation, appeared tolerably well versed in the Scriptures, and seemed fond of quoting them against Universalism. Meanwhile he continued his visit from day to day, until weeks had rolled away, and yet said nothing about going, or wishing to board with his host. Whereupon the Universalist took occasion to observe, that Solomon was very curious in his proverbs—that there was one in particular which had lain very heavy on his mind for some days, and he wished the stranger would read it, and give his opinion, whether it is to be understood literally or figuratively. The stranger appeared anxious to read the text. The Universalist opened to Proverbs xxv : 17, and the stranger read as follows : "Withdraw thy foot from thy neighbor's house, lest he be weary with thee, and hate thee." The stranger made no comment, and left without ceremony !

THE PROTRACTED MEETING.

BY MISS U. M. FELTON.

It was a bleak December evening, in the winter of 1833, that I sat anxiously awaiting the arrival of the stage coach, at a hotel in the village of C—, which was to convey me on a short visit among friends and relatives residing in the western part of New York. The weather was uncommonly severe, and the small handful of coals that were placed in the grate, evidently bespoke the negligence of its present occupant. I was very chilly, having rode some distance in the cold, and accordingly strolled from one room to the other, in order to find some place that would ensure me more comfort. But as each part of the house seemed alike uncomfortable, and evidently in great confusion, and seeing nothing of "mine host" or hostess, I returned to my own room, and throwing on my cloak and hood, sat down as resigned as possible, with my aching feet and shivering frame. On inquiring the cause of so much apparent negligence, I learned that "mine host" and hostess, together with their family, were at a protracted meeting in the village, conducted by Myric and Knap, two of those "new measure" revivalists, whose labors, together with those of their co-workers, are already before an enlightened and discriminating public. I had not sat long, before mine host returned, and presently the room was filled with those whose curiosity or blind zeal had led them to participate in the revolting scene. It was five o'clock, but the afternoon services had but just closed, and another sermon was given out for the evening. At first they were too much engrossed with their own observations, discoursing on the proceedings of the afternoon, to notice any one present; and I sat for awhile a mute spectator of the scene, apparently unnoticed and unnoticed. At length I was interrupted in my meditations by a violent shake, and turning round to ascertain the cause of so much impudence, I was abruptly accosted by one who I afterwards learned was one of the new measure lights, with, "well, madam, are you a sinner?" Reader, I am one of those diffident beings who labor under a peculiar embarrassment, which prevents me, many times, from giving my opinion with clearness and precision, even on the most ordinary occasions. But the abruptness of the question, accompanied with so much insolence, dispelled all fear, and I looked at him with that silent contempt which I thought he justly merited, without answering, till he again repeated the question. I shall answer you, I replied, in the language of our divine Master: "let him that is without sin cast the first stone." He paused a moment, and then asked, "What are you?" A fellow-being like yourself, subject alike to the frailties and imperfections of human nature. "But what do you believe—what are your sentiments?" I believe, said I, that the time will come when enthusiasm will be done away—when fanatics will no longer dare blaspheme the name of our most high God—when the character of our heavenly Father will appear in its original levelness, and mankind will learn the difference between the cobweb inventions of man, and the mild religion of Jesus. "Have you a hope in God?" Yes; one that sustains me alike in the storm as in the sunshine. "You are a Universalist," said he—"none but a Universalist would dare evade my questions in this manner." Call me what you please, I replied; only do not think for a moment, that I cherish sentiments similar to those that persecuted the early followers of Christ, and which have continued their unhalloved persecutions from time immemorial, to the present day—which have traced their footsteps in the blood of innocence, blighting and destroying the small portion of happiness which it is our lot here to enjoy—making this earth, so fair and beautiful, a dreary waste—leaving parents childless, and children orphans, which have erected gibbets, filled our insane hospitals, with the victims of a God-disbonoring creed, poured the last contents from the cup of domestic felicity, by making parents forgetful of their duty, leaving their children at home suffering with cold and hunger, to attend one of those day and midnight howlings, in which reason has no share, and where common sense and decency would blush to be called in question—which represent the character of our heavenly Father in a light so odious and revolting, that I should blush to impute it to any other than the fiend of cruelty and darkness! The bell now rang for evening services, and as the stage did not arrive till twelve, I accompanied this band of fanatics to hear once more the soul-revolting dogmas of endless woe. But I will pass over the ensuing scene—too often has the fair sheet been contaminated by the relation of such blasphemous stuff—too often has it blushed at the weakness and folly of poor human nature, to be again subjected to a similar insult.

The stage arrived, and after being safely deposited, I had full leisure to ruminate on the past, and draw some conclusions which I trust will benefit my future life.

FILIAL INGRATITUDE.

"Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long." BIBLE.

Perhaps the term ingratitude may be too strong a name to express a simple deficiency of thankfulness for incalculable favors received. But how many children are there, who merit the reproach conveyed in even this severe term!

My mother now sleeps in the quiet little graveyard, in the romantically situated village of M. The graceful locust weeps the earliest tears of the morning over her lowly resting-place, and Summer's airy warblers hymn the requiem o'er her peaceful slumber. The rich green grass grows luxuriantly on the gently rising mound, and the night winds sigh plaintively through its waving ranks, laden with the perfumes of the many flowers with which nature, in most cases, but sometimes the hand of affectionate survivors, has decorated the home of the dead. The spot is now vividly before my mind, as it appeared the last time I leaned on the white tablet that recorded my mother's name, and birth, and death. Oh, what crowding thoughts pressed fast and thick through my mind! That mother's cares and tenderness for her children—even the severities to which her tender love compelled her to resort in our behalf, to reclaim us from vices, or to check our headlong follies—oh, how these presented themselves in living array to my remembrance! Then my own conduct to her—never, until the latter portion of her life, the most tender and dutiful—and even then it was too often dashed with the stubbornness of passion's impetuous rebellion, and the waywardness of a mind too intent on pleasure to perceive, with her, the dangers of my path—what bitterness—what worse than gall and wormwood were in these thoughts! I could not but feel that her last days—days of languishing and pain—were embittered by fears for my welfare—fears generated by habits which, though not evil in themselves, tended to it; and though I had avoided the shoals and quicksands, the rocks and whirlpools that lay in the track I was steering—though I had elevated myself to a height of reputation and usefulness she could scarcely have hoped I would attain, even if my conduct had been better and wiser—yet still, the thought of what I had caused her to fear—the belief that that fear had mingled in the infusion of death's bitter cup, as she slowly drained it for months, outweighed every approving smile of conscience on my subsequent course in life.

Well might the wandering mind of John Randolph dwell with intensity of agony on the word "REMORSE." There are volumes of meaning in it, that seem to mock the vocabulary of words, and to defy mortal power to feel them and live. Nearly a score of years have rolled by since I lost my mother, during which I am unconscious of a single act of disobedience or want of respect to my surviving parent. My success in life has also been far greater than my merits, and I believe my most sanguine friends rejoice at the prospect yet before me—yet, when in imagination I again stand in the churchyard of M., and again read the inscription at my mother's grave, and again call up in memory the events in the dim dark vista of my boyish days, I declare I would sacrifice all that I am beyond my parents' expectations at the time I entered manhood—all that I hope to be, beyond what I, myself, then dared to aspire to—all this in reputation, I would cheerfully barter to be freed from the bitter agony that now crowds my heart almost to bursting.

Surely such moments of remorse, so intense as to seem like ages of anguish, must tend to shorten life—they certainly lessen life's many enjoyments. I would that children could be made to realize what I here have written. Could they do it—and could they retain the impression, when inclined to be unmindful of a parent's cares, and admonitions, and entreaties—filial ingratitude would never be practised by them. They would be able, should God's providences ever call them to stand beside a parent's grave, to feel a holy unction resting on their souls—going with them into all subsequent duties and reflections; and would find verified the declaration of God, annexed to this "first commandment with promise." LUKE X: 36.

"Which now of these three, thinkest thou, was neighbor to him that fell among the thieves?"

If the Priest and the Levite were neighbors to the man who fell among thieves, was not the question of our Lord, which stands at the head of these remarks, decidedly useless and improper? Does not the very question itself, bear upon its front the evidence that cannot be done away, that there was but one neighbor in the account? Why did not Christ correct the answer of the lawyer, that "he that shewed mercy on him," was the neighbor, by saying that he was not a whit more of a neighbor than those who neglected him? If such was the fact, is it not reasonable to suppose Christ would have done this? The fact is, the moral obligation to do good to the distressed, the fatherless and unfortunate, was as strong on the Priest and the Levite, as it was on the Samaritan; and they were taught by the very corners of their fields, to remember those in affliction; but men are not always that which their duty, if performed, would make them. The Priest and Levite, for reasons for which many excuse themselves in the present day, refused to minister to the wants of him who suffered adversity; consequently they were not his neighbors. The Samaritan, on the other hand, showed himself a neighbor, in that he had compassion on him who was in want.

Does not the parable bring to view this principle, viz., that we are neighbors to those, and to those only, to whom we show ourselves friends and benefactors? Do we not learn from it to overleap the barrier of prejudice, unscaled by many, and alleviate the misfortunes of our fellow-man, without asking his caste? If it does not teach this, how shall we understand the words of Christ, "Go, and do thou likewise"—that is, if they were all neighbors, (for the lawyer was commanded to act like a neighbor,)—"go and pass by like the Priest, and like the Levite, and have compassion like the Samaritan." If all three were neighbors, then the Priest was a neighbor, the Levite was a neighbor, the Samaritan was a neighbor, and no more, and could not have been less by neglecting his duty. Such a barbarous application of terms, would annihilate all distinction in theory, between a neighbor and an enemy—between him who blessed, and him who cursed us. To be a neighbor, in our estimation, is to give a practical regard to the words of the Apostle, Heb. xiii: 3: "Remember them that are in bonds, as bound with them; and them which suffer adversity, as being yourselves also in the same body." Such was the spirit of the Samaritan—such were not the Priest and Levite—and we have occasion to feel that such are not some of our own brethren.

STARS BY DAYLIGHT.

BY NOAH G. BARROS.

"The days of Washington, Lafayette, Adams, Hancock, and Franklin, are gone by—there are none to fill their places—we, their descendants, have degenerated, and only weakness, imbecility of mind, cowardice and corruption, reign throughout the land!"

Such was the melancholy and half-misanthropic invective of Matthew Moody, to his friend Thomas Trusty, as they conversed on public matters in their Saturday evening's ramble. It was in vain to reason with Matthew; like Rachel of old mourning for her off-spring, he lamented the departure of his fathers, and "would not be comforted." After a time the shadows of evening gathered over the face of the earth, and the luminaries of night began to peep through the cerulean vault with increasing lustre.

"Strange," said Thomas, pointing to the star-studded dome above them, "that there are no stars in the day-time! They must be created every evening, and be annihilated at the return of morning."

Matthew looked at his friend in wonder; but perceiving him serious, he began to suppose him either far more ignorant than he had ever, before, supposed him to be, or that his wits were turned. But suspecting that, after all, there might be some mystery couched in Thomas' words, he replied—"You surely can not be ignorant that those stars above us, have been shining there for at least three hours past!"

"That can not be," replied Thomas, "for not one hour since I particularly noticed the heavens, and there was not one to be seen."

"True," replied Matthew, "they were not to be seen, because the greater light of the sun prevented it; but they were there, and as the darkness came on, their shining only became visible."

"You have answered your own complaints," answered Thomas. "In the night of our revolutionary struggle, Washington and his compatriots shone out as stars in the firmament, and all acknowledged, for then all saw their lustre. When better days arrived—when daylight again shone around—so little were they distinguished from their fellow-citizens around them, that even rejoicings were publicly uttered when our Country's Saviour quitted the Presidential chair! The night of the late war came on, and again the constellations of our country's worthies shone out in the political horizon, with great brightness. But now, again, the light of day is around us, and our Washingtons and Franklins are little noticed—their lustre cannot be seen."

Matthew Moody was silent—he could not help but believe that should the shades of trouble again cover our nation, the vault of our political sky would be filled with constellations of glorious brightness. God always fills the earth with great men; but it is only on great occasions that their greatness is needed, or becomes fully apparent.

IS IT SO?

"To a person in an unrenowned state, God is the greatest enemy he can have."

Such is the language of Partialism. Such were the words of the Rev. Mr. B., a Baptist clergyman, at a protracted meeting, in the town of C. some ten or twelve weeks since. They made so strong an impression on my mind at the time, and have been so frequently brought to remembrance since, that I have concluded to make them the subject of a few remarks. I need not stop to explain the meaning of the Rev. gentleman, as all will perfectly well understand, what he means by an unrenowned person. Neither is it my design particularly to point out, in all its naked deformity, the savage character and changeable nature which this sentiment ascribes to our heavenly Father; but merely to notice some expressions in the volume of revelation, and some things in the book of nature, which seem to be inconsistent and irreconcilable with such an idea. The Scriptures declare that "God is good unto all, and that his tender mercies are over all his works." Not good to a part of his children, and an enemy to the rest—not loving a part of his works and hating the remainder—not kind to a favored few, and filled with implacable wrath to all others—not loving at one time, and hating at another, or hating and then loving! No, the "Father of Mercies" loves all, and at all times, for he is "without variableness, or shadow of turning." Neither does he wait for weak, frail, finite and erring man first to love him before he can shew kindness to his off-spring. But he "commendeth his love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." Yes, his love for sinful, "unrenewed" man was so great, that he sent his "only begotten Son" "to seek and to save that which was lost;" yea, "reconcile the world unto himself." And the beloved disciple says, "we love him because he first loved us." Now this does not appear to be characteristic of an enemy, even "the greatest enemy we can have." But does God treat mankind generally, or even those whom the righteous of our day are pleased to call the wicked, as if he was their enemy? Nay; "He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sendeth rain on the just, and on the unjust." "He is kind" even "to the unthankful, and to the evil." All are alike blessed with the bounties of Providence, the productions of nature. "He openeth his hand and satisfieth the desires of every living thing." Such conduct and such treatment I am unable to reconcile with the idea that the God of the universe, is the enemy of any part of his children. And as I can find no proof in the volume of inspiration that he is our enemy, I am constrained to believe, that in his dealings with the children of men, he proceeds on the principle that "love worketh no ill to his neighbor," and that "the goodness of God" will lead men to repentance.

But again. On the supposition that God is the enemy of any part of the intelligent creation, I am at a loss to account for the perfect adaptation of the material world to the wants and circumstances of man. It is a fact, which no one will dispute, that there is a perfect harmony, and peculiar adaptation, existing between the infinite variety of the works of nature, and the physical organization of the human frame. Every thing seems to have been designed for our good—for our convenience, comfort, and happiness. Could we, with our greatest earthly wisdom, have had the management of affairs, we could not have devised a system that would have suited our condition half as well, or been half so conducive to our happiness, as the one our Creator has prepared for us. Let us notice a few things, which will elucidate these remarks. The eye, the organ of sight, while it is one of the most useful, is at the same time, one of the most tender and delicate members of the body. But the eye, useful as it is, would be of no service to us, were it not for light; and the light must be adapted to the condition of the eye.—Now observe how very easy it would have been for the Deity to have rendered the act of seeing very painful. Light is a little more than eight minutes in coming from the sun to the earth,—a distance of 95,000,000 of miles—which is nearly two hundred thousand miles a second. Consequently, moving with such inconceivable velocity, the particles of light must be exceedingly minute or they would have a very serious effect upon the eye. Therefore had the Almighty been the enemy of man, and acted in accordance with that character, he could, by making the particles of light a little larger, have rendered him miserable for life. And I can assign no reason why he did not do it, only that he was not our enemy, but our friend, and consequently designed our good.

In the construction of the atmosphere, also, the same goodness is peculiarly manifest. Of its various properties I shall notice but two or three.—The air we breathe is composed of two very different substances, termed oxygen and nitrogen, in the proportion of twenty-one parts of the former, to seventy-nine of the latter, in one hundred.

Oxygen is the principle of combustion, is indispensable to animal life, and the most active and powerful agent in nature:—while nitrogen will neither support flame nor animal life. At every breath we inhale a portion of air, which is decomposed by the action of the lungs. The oxygen goes to support life, and the nitrogen is exhaled.—Now if the nitrogen had been of the same weight with the oxygen, it would accumulate near us, and, at every succeeding inspiration, be received in a greater quantity into the lungs, to the exclusion of the life-giving principle. And had it been heavier, it would have fallen toward the ground, and in a short time the oxygen would be raised above us, and death inevitably ensue. The Creator has therefore made it lighter, so that when evolved from the lungs, it rises and is mixed with the circumambient air, where it enters into new combinations, and all injurious effects are avoided. "Such is the benevolent skill which the Author of Nature has displayed for promoting the comfort and preservation of every thing that lives."

But again:—our physical constitution is such that we require food and nourishment, to invigorate, and strengthen us, and continue us in existence. Now the Creator has so ordered things, that in partaking the alimentary provisions of nature, we should also be partakers of pleasure; that the act of eating and drinking should excite pleasurable emotions. But this was not necessary to our existence. Our bodies might be nourished, and our lives continued if it caused extreme pain and distress, to receive our daily aliment. And the Author of our being could easily have formed us in such a miserable condition. Yes, we might have been so constituted that every thing we swallowed would produce the most excruciating pain—would be like tearing asunder the vitals, and not only so, but it might have been necessary for us to take nourishment much more frequently than is the case, and thus the pain and misery be increased. And who can conceive of a state of more complete misery, than for a person to be continually annoyed by hunger, and yet to satisfy his raging appetite, at an expense of the most excruciating torture?

Once more: our sense of feeling, although now calculated to excite pleasurable emotions, might have been very different from what it is. The bodily organization might have been of such a nature, that the act of walking, though indispensable to health and subsistence, would be an almost insupportable task. And even the taking of hands, as is customary in the friendly salutation, might throw the whole system into convulsions. Yes, this sense might be so exceedingly acute that the least touch would make us tremble like the aspen, or cause us to feel, as the Poet expresses it,

"Tremblingly alive all o'er,
To smart and agonize at every pore."

Similar observations will apply to the senses of smell and hearing, but I forbear to particularize. Enough has already been said to show the adaptation of the natural world, to man's physical constitution, and that any material change in this department of the Creator's works, would serve to increase our misery, instead of bettering our condition. If we possessed any of the senses in a less degree, we should be, in a great measure, deprived of all those refined enjoyments which flow from the observation and contemplation of the works of nature. And although vain man is sometimes so foolish as to wish he enjoyed them in a higher degree, yet were his wishes gratified, he would find them equally destructive of his happiness.

"If nature thundered in his opening ears,
And stunned him with the music of the spheres,
How would he wish, kind Heaven had left him still,
The whispering zephyr and the purring rill!"

And in whatever light we view the character of our Creator, whether in the works of nature, the dispensations of his providence, or of his moral dealings with the children of men, we shall find that he has adopted the best possible means to promote our happiness and well-being here, and to prepare us for a blessed immortality hereafter. We are constrained, then, to believe that "God is not the greatest enemy we can have," but that he designs our good, and consequently is

THE METHODIST WAY AGAIN.

Brs. GROSH and HUTCHINSON—The following letter was handed me by Br. Parsons, and believing that our friends in your vicinity would be glad to learn that Br. Way, of Litchfield memory, is yet in the land of the living, and endeavoring to do the little that he is able, to save men from the delusions of Universalism and convert them to the beauties of Methodism, I have obtained his consent to have it published. W. BULLARD.

Cortlandville, April 21, 1837.

Rev. Mr. WAY—Sir, Although I am a stranger to you, I deem it unnecessary to make any apologies for addressing you this short epistle. But, Sir, I am sincerely sorry that your imprudence has given occasion for it. Doubtless you will recollect, Sir, that the drift of your discourse, at the school-house near Mr. Tisdale's, on the 12th ult., was to warn the people against deception. You labored hard to make your hearers believe that it was delusion to think that all mankind would be finally holy and happy. You stated that it was the carnal mind which induced men to wish for the salvation of the whole human family.

Now, Sir, if it is the carnal mind that leads men to desire the salvation of all mankind, I wish to know with what mind you approach the throne of grace praying for the salvation of all? You must remember, Sir, that the carnal mind is at enmity with God.

But, again, how can you consistently pray for the salvation of all, while you do not believe that all will be saved? Be not deceived, God is not mocked, for whatsoever is not of faith is sin. You was undoubtedly aware that Br. Bullard had preached here occasionally; and that he was to preach here again the Sabbath evening following your lecture. And did you not avail yourself of the opportunity thus offered you, to prejudice the minds of your audience against Universalism, by representing it in as bad a light as you could? I would have held my peace had you treated the subject fairly: for if our doctrine will not stand the test of a candid examination, let it fall.—But, Sir, you did not attempt the examination of a single point. You said Universalism was delusion: and to prove it you had recourse to an old worn out story, concerning a certain drunkard, who you said was a Universalist; and who was seen staggering through the streets, shouting glory; and on being asked, what was the matter? said, "I am happy in the thought that all are going to heaven." But what does this prove against our doctrine, allowing the story to be true, which is very improbable? I answer, nothing. But your introducing it shows what low and ridiculous means some men will resort to, in order to give error the advantage over truth. What would you say, if one of our preachers should say that a drunken Methodist was seen staggering through the streets, shouting glory! and on being asked what was the matter, said, "I am happy in the belief that we righteous saints are going to heaven, while our wicked neighbors are doomed to eternal woe?" Would you not say that such a course was beneath the character of a gentleman, not to say Christian? I think you would. And I believe in your sober moments you will feel ashamed of such conduct.

In proof of your own doctrine, you quoted Matthew xvi: 26. Now, Sir, did you not attempt to use this text in a way to deceive? or are you ignorant of its true meaning? But I can not believe you have yet to learn that the Greek term, rendered soul in the 26th verse, is the same as that rendered life in the foregoing verse; and that it should have been rendered life in both. If so, please consult Dr. A. Clarke upon the subject.

I shall close by exhorting you to be careful while you warn others against deception, that you do not deceive both yourself and those who hear you. Take the Bible for your guide—compare scripture with scripture. "Prove all things, hold fast that which is good." And if you can believe endless misery to be good, and prove it true, hold it fast; if not, cast it away. I have dealt plainly, not with the intention of wounding your feelings; if I have injured them, I am sorry. I subscribe myself your brother, in the bonds of Christian love.

DISMISSION HYMN;

Written for the Universalist Association at Ann Arbor,

BY D. K. LEE.

Great Father! whose blessing our love hath increas'd,
While here at the altar we've shar'd a rich feast,
With thy inspiration each bosom inflame,
As now from each other we take our adieu.

The heralds of Zion, the servants of God,
The trumpet did sound for the flock strown abroad;
And though we were scatter'd like sheep o'er the plain,
We mark'd the soft sound of the angelic strain.

We left the rich pastures in which we were blest,
And forth to the banquet exultingly press'd;
And met all together, once more at thy fold,
To see the bright banners of Zion unroll'd.

With hallowed fire from thy primeval ray,
Our cheeks brightly glow, and pulse quickly play—
Our full hearts expand, and our raptur'd lips move
To praise Thee for desserts prepar'd of thy love!

We came with the fruitage we pluck'd from our vine;
We laid our memorials fresh at thy shrine—
We bless Thee for bounties receiv'd at thy hand,
The while we were wand'ring abroad in the land.

Now, Father, protect us, when we are apart,
And let thy full spirit spring up in each heart:
Dismiss us with blessings, which e'er from Thee fell,
As we again take our fraternal farewell.

Per order,

T. WHEELER, Clerk.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JULY 21, 1837.

GEORGE COMBE, ESQ.

This distinguished individual, probably the greatest Phrenologist in the world, was lately a candidate for the Professorship of Logic in the University of Edinburgh, for the purpose of testing the claims of Phrenology as a new science of mental and moral philosophy. During the canvass (in which, by the by, he was not elected), he was objected to, on the ground, that many of the doctrines he laid down in his "Constitution of Man," tended to the subversion of some of the fundamental doctrines of Christianity. The charge was repelled by a number of clergymen, and others, and attempts were made to draw forth an expression of his doctrinal religious opinions. He refused to gratify this inquisitorial spirit, but in his answer he fully and unequivocally expressed his faith in the Scriptures as a revelation from God, and in Christianity as the religion of God and humanity—of enlightened reason, philosophy and nature.

As many pious, well-meaning persons in this country have been deceived into a belief that Phrenology is opposed to Christianity, I think it will be beneficial to them, and interesting to our readers generally, to read what Mr. Combe has written on that subject. Indeed, it is interesting to all, to know the views of eminently thinking men, upon any important subject. The extract is made from an octavo volume of 298 pages, entitled "Testimonials on behalf of George Combe, as a Candidate for the Chair of Logic, in the University of Edinburgh." Published in Edinburgh and London, by the Booksellers. The volume is a present to the "Oneida Phrenological Society," from Mr. Combe, through a friend of his in Boston. It is a splendid monument to the moral and intellectual worth of Mr. Combe; and in favor of the system of which he long has been the able advocate, through good and through evil report.

After reading it—after considering the variety of testimony from every portion of Europe and America—from the most distinguished men of every profession, in favor of Phrenology, and of Mr. Combe as its advocate, and then turning to the result of the election by the Lord Provost, Magistrates and town Council of his native city, I am strongly reminded of the saying of an ancient worthy, as being applicable in Mr. Combe's case—"I had rather people asked why a statue was not erected in my honor, than why it was." The former will be the inquiry of posterity in relation to the non-election of Mr. Combe to the Professorship of Logic in the Edinburgh University. But to the extract.

It appears that Dr. Neill wrote to the Rev. Professor Duncan, to procure his views on the harmony between Phrenology and Christianity. The Professor's reply was favorable, with one or two very slight exceptions to some language found in Mr. Combe's writings. In reply to that letter, Mr. Combe wrote the letter, from which I select the following very excellent extract. It is long, but will well repay a perusal.

"There are three questions which it is here necessary to distinguish and to treat separately, viz.

"1. What facts and doctrines in Phrenology are conformable to nature?

"2. What are conformable to right interpretations of Scripture?

"3. What are conformable to the standards of any particular church, the church of Scotland, for example, or that of England, or that of Rome?

"I assume it as a fundamental principle, that there can not by possibility be any discrepancy between real facts in nature, or sound deductions from them, and right interpretations of Scripture; because the God of Nature and Revelation is one; He is the fountain of truth and wisdom, and his works and word cannot be discordant.

"In directing my attention, therefore, to Nature, I never once imagined that if I discriminated truth I could be deviating from Scripture; nor can I conceive this even now to be the case.

"I regard Revelation as a sacred subject which ought not lightly to be brought into collision with philosophy. This may be done in two ways—by adducing ill-observed or incorrectly interpreted natural phenomena as evidence against revelation on the one hand—or by advancing erroneous interpretations of Scripture as objections against indubitable natural truths on the other. Many sceptical writers have been guilty of the first—while the Roman Pontiff and Cardinals who condemned Galileo, and also the religious authors who in our day denounce geology as inconsistent with Scripture—are chargeable with the second of these errors.

"It appears to me more advantageous to investigate nature by herself first, and to proceed to compare her phenomena with Scripture, only after being certain that we have rightly observed and interpreted them.

"By this method we shall preserve our minds calm and unbiassed for the investigation of truth; we shall test Nature by herself, which is the proper standard by which to try her; and we shall avoid bringing discredit on Revelation by involving it in unseemly conflicts with natural phenomena.

"To be able to discover, in a sound and satisfactory manner, the relationship between natural truths and revelation, the investigator should be critically acquainted with both. In reading the attacks made by serious persons who are ignorant of Phrenology, against the discoveries made in that science, you must have occasionally been convinced that, in so far as they had the power, they were injuring, while they intended to serve, the cause of religion; because they were denouncing as subversive of Revelation, facts which could not possibly give way before any form of argument, seeing that they were founded in nature. The same error is committed every day in regard to Phrenology. Religious persons attack certain statements as false, which are indubitably true, and only bring obloquy on their own cause when they imagine that they are overwhelming the advocates of the new science.

"It is rare, however, particularly in the case of a new science, to find an individual qualified by his knowledge of science and Scripture to compare them advantageously. The mind of the successful explorer of nature, is generally too closely and ardently directed towards her phenomena, to render him equally clear-sighted and zealous in his interpretations of Scripture. Both objects, therefore, will be better accomplished, if he who takes the lead in interrogating nature shall confine himself to that province; and if another individual possessed of a clear, calm, and unbiassed understanding, who has made theology his study, shall follow in his track—detecting his errors where he has fallen into any, yet recognizing and embracing all the truth which he has brought to light—and shall then proceed to compare this truth with Revelation, with the single and upright purpose of discovering their harmony.

"Entertaining these views, I have on principle confined myself to the investigation of nature, never doubting that, in so far as I may have discovered truth, Scripture will be found to harmonize with my doctrines. If in any instance I have observed or interpreted erroneously, I shall be most anxious, on this being pointed out, to renounce my errors. But I hope it will not be imputed to me as a fault that I have not discussed also the relation of nature to Revelation, regarding this, as I certainly do, as more properly the duty of individuals better qualified than myself for the task.

"There is another distinction which is too often overlooked. All Christian churches are agreed in regard to the import and obligation of the moral precepts of Christianity, and it is only touching points of doctrine and church government that they differ. Now, Phrenology as a mere human science comes into direct relationship only with the first—the practical precepts—and it has generally been allowed by those who have attended to the subject, that no mental philosophy in existence can be compared with it, not only for its exact accordance with this great and important department of Christianity, but for the power with which it demonstrates that all nature is framed and adjusted on the principle of enforcing by positive sanctions the scheme of Christian morals.

"I very respectfully maintain, therefore, that Phrenology, and the deductions which I have made from it, are in a remarkable degree in harmony with all the points on which the Christian world in general is agreed; and when you consider that the Logic Chair is one, not of theology but of science, and that, by the constitution of your University, the class may be, and generally is, attended by students professing a variety of shades of doctrinal belief—it may well be doubted whether this certain harmony between the principles of Phrenology and those Christian principles in which all the students are agreed, be not a decided recommendation of it to the patrons.

"The third question before stated, or the accordance of Phrenology with the standards of the Church of Scotland, is the only one that remains to be considered. If there be harmony between the constitution of Nature and the doctrines of Phrenology, and also between the moral precepts of Christianity and these doctrines, which there assuredly is, it would be strange indeed if discord were discovered between them and sound Christian doctrine. Assuming, then, that the standards are correct deductions from Scripture, it is a fair presumption that they and Phrenology do also agree. But as philosophy is addressed to men of every variety of faith, and as I appear before you exclusively as a philosopher, I humbly urge that it is the duty of the divines of each church, to adjust the relation between their own standards and any particular philosophical doctrines, if true; (and if mine be untrue, I shall cheerfully abandon them;) and that the members of the Church of Scotland are not entitled to insist on your rejecting my claims to a philosophical professorship, merely because they have not taken the trouble to discharge a duty incumbent exclusively on themselves.

"I am confirmed in my conviction of the soundness of the course which I have adopted in avoiding all doctrinal discussion in my printed works, by a fact which cannot be generally known. I have received letters from several excellent and ingenious friends, well skilled in theology, on the relation between doctrinal Christianity and Phrenology, reconciling them; but no two of them agree in the manner of doing so. Each proceeds according to his individual views of Christianity, and according to his individual cast of mind. Professor Duncan's views, although highly ingenious, differ from them all. This satisfies me that the time is not yet come, and that the men have not yet appeared, for doing justice to this great subject; and perhaps they will not arrive until both Revelation and Phrenology shall have been contemplated under broader and stronger lights than are yet possessed; and which, I cannot doubt, will at last bring them into complete harmony. Any attempt on my part, therefore, to enter on this question at present, would prove unsatisfactory to myself and unprofitable to the public. Probably a report from a committee of the first members of the Church, after Phrenology shall have been fully studied by them as science, will be necessary before the public mind will be thoroughly satisfied on the subject, and I should allow such a committee several years for deliberation. But this affords no reason why the progress of truth should be arrested in the meantime; why a doctrine founded in nature, and admitted by many sound theologians to be undeniably in harmony with practical Christianity, should be excluded from your University, and why I should be held forth as an enemy to religion merely because certain of those who take an interest in that sacred cause, have not yet found it convenient to study the two subjects, and deliberately to compare them. If I advance only doctrines founded in nature and in accordance with Christian morality, I am entitled to the benefit of the presumption that they are also in harmony with all sound doctrinal interpretations of Scripture. If any of my views are at variance with nature or Christian morality, I am ready to give them up."

CONVERTED UNIVERSALISTS AND INFIDELS!

The following precious morceau we copy from the "Eastern Baptist," of June 23rd, published at Brunswick, Me. It is a most important document, coming as it does, to us from Maine, some 400 or 500 miles to the East of us, and the scene described, having occurred nearly 150 miles to the West. Where the "American Baptist and Gospel Light," in which this marvellous story first appeared, is published, we know not, nor by whom, nor what is its character, any farther than the article below testifies concerning the latter. But here is the article—let it speak for itself.

"From the American Baptist and Gospel Light of June 8th, we derive the pleasing information that in Canandaigua, N. Y., a blessed revival has of late been experienced. The Baptist Church in that place, has been but recently formed, and was composed of a few poor disciples. A 'meeting of days' was held the latter part of March. An unusual spirit of prayer prevailed, and God in answer to prayer, first took hold of the wickedest of the wicked, one Universalist, who had taken and preserved Skinner's paper from the commencement of its publication, who attended the meeting to get something to publish in it, was cut down by the power of God's truth, and was soon rejoicing in hope of salvation. This striking case had a powerful effect. One evening, when the speaker referred to Skinner's paper, a drunken Universalist took that paper out of his hat, shook it at the speaker, uttering a most horrid oath, which blasphemous oath in the house of God, struck an infidel by his side with such horror, that he found no peace till he received an evidence of the forgiveness of his sins. Thus the wrath of man was made to praise God. His work continued to progress, and at the latest intelligence, 79 had joined the Baptist Church, 30 the Methodist, and 18 the Presbyterian. Among the converts in this revival, were 20 or 30 Sabbath School scholars, 16 of whom went forward in baptism at one time."

REMARKS.

How very courteous and polite, how mild and gentle, how affectionate and loving to Universalists, the writer of the above must have felt when he penned this kind compliment to us and our sentiments! How dignified and sublime his language! How lofty his conceptions! How vivid, and clear, and ennobling must have been his views of the system of impartial and universal benevolence! But, irony aside, to remark in seriousness on such a production, supposing it deserving of any notice, we wish the reader to observe the following particulars—i. e., on the presumption that the story narrated is true.

1. Much more importance is attached to the conversion of a Universalist than of any other class of people whatever. The writer occupies more space in describing the conversion of one Universalist, than he does in describing the conversion of seventy and nine just persons who joined the Baptists, who needed not to repent of this dreadful heresy. Of course our Limitarian brethren put a much higher value on converts from Universalism, than on any and all other converts they obtain. Query—Is it because the materials of which these converts are made, are so much better than all others?

2. Universalists are by this writer denominated the "wickedest of the wicked." The person said to have been converted at this "meeting of days," is so styled, and the evidence that he was "the wickedest of the wicked," is furnished in the fact (oh, horrible!) that he "had taken and preserved Skinner's paper from the commencement of its publication!" This was the head and front of his offending—this was the ne plus ultra of wickedness—bad enough, in all conscience—none could exceed this!

3. Not content with stigmatizing Universalists as "the wickedest of the wicked," our writer goes on to make the demonstration still more clear and strong, by instituting the invidious comparison between the "drunken Universalist," with his "blasphemous oath in the house of God," and the infidel (much better than he) who was so horror-struck at that very oath, that he was converted! Query—Was not that blasphemous oath, then, a most salutary instrument in saving the infidel? Would any thing else—even the prayers of the saints themselves—have been as efficacious? Again: what kind of oath was it that this drunken Universalist made use of? Was it an orthodox oath, or a Universalist oath? Why, most certainly orthodox, if orthodox authority be good; for Mr. McClure, whose soundness in the faith this writer will not question, says in his lectures against Universalism, that Universalists have no oath of their own, and that whenever they swear, they are obliged to borrow of their neighbors, and make use of orthodox oaths! Here, then, we have in this orthodox "meeting of days," the curious spectacle of a Universalist getting drunk, abandoning his own principles, and adopting and swearing orthodox oaths, in so horrid a manner as to convert an infidel to that very orthodoxy whose oaths struck him with so much horror! Thus orthodox oaths in the mouth of a drunken Universalist, were more effectual in converting infidels, than "the spirit of prayer" that so mightily prevailed among the saints!

4. The writer is very careful not to name the "Magazine and Advocate," nor the place of its publication, lest, peradventure, some of his readers might be disposed to procure and read it—a laudable concealment—but the manner in which he mentions it, is perhaps sufficiently definite. At all events, it marks it with sufficient contempt and abhorrence.

5. But the most remarkable of all that our story-teller has said, is the fact that this converted Universalist, when "cut down by the power of God's truth, was soon rejoicing in hope of salvation!" What an idea, or rather what a solecism is here! This man, we will suppose, was a thoroughgoing, real Universalist: of course he must have been firmly persuaded, and rejoiced with joy unspeakable and full of glory in the triumphant hope, not only of his own salvation and immortal glory, but also of the salvation—the endless holiness and happiness of the whole human family. The account supposes, as a matter of course, that he relinquished his faith and hope in so grand and glorious a result, and goes on to say that he "was soon rejoicing in the hope of salvation." In the name of wonder, what does this mean! Does it mean that after he had renounced his hope of salvation he immediately embraced the same again, and thence began to rejoice? If so, of what use was his conversion? But no, this could not be the meaning of the writer; for he intends to convey the idea that this convert embraced a very different faith and hope from his former. Why, then, does he not say that he began to rejoice in the hope of damnation, instead of salvation? or rather to tremble in dread apprehension of endless woe, instead of rejoicing at all? If it be answered, that he believed in his own salvation, and had exchanged his false and Universalist hope for a well founded Limitarian hope; we reply, that if he really believed and unwaveringly hoped for universal salvation, whether that doctrine were true and the hope justly founded or not, he must have greatly rejoiced in that hope, and the exchanging of it for any other hope could not have increased his joy. If it be now said that though he pretended it, he in reality had no faith in the holiness and happiness of all men, and therefore was destitute of any hope before his conversion, we reply, then he was not a Universalist, and the story is proved false by this very admission. But granting the integrity of the account, he must have exchanged a firm and confident hope in the endless purity and blessedness of himself and all mankind, based on the infinite and immutable benevolence and promise of the Almighty, for a trembling, doubtful uncertain hope of his own salvation, based on his own frail works, or the partiality of God; and therefore could not have been as happy after his change of views as he was before, unless his happiness increased in an inverse ratio to the amount of good anticipated. But if, on the other hand, (the account being true,) his happiness was really increased by his change from a Universalist's hope to the hope of a Limitarian, there is no other conclusion than this, that his increase of happiness was occasioned not by the hope he entertained of his own salvation—for that he must have entertained quite as firmly while a Universalist as he possibly could afterwards—but it must have been occasioned by the anticipation of the failure of some men to obtain salvation, and the confident expectation that many of his fellow-beings would suffer the interminable pangs of immortal woe! He must rejoice in the prospective endless sin and misery of those he had formerly hoped and believed would become holy and with a ransomed world be made endlessly happy! What a source of enjoyment! What a change of heart he must have met with! His heart of flesh must have been taken away, and one of adamant given him, to enable him to rejoice in his new hope. "O my soul, come not thou into their secret; unto their assembly mine honor, be not thou united!—Cursed be their anger for it is fierce, and their wrath for it is cruel." "Their throat is an open sepulchre; with their tongues they have used deceit; the poison of asps is under their lips: whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness—destruction and misery are in their way: and the way of peace have they not known." Gen. xlix: 6, 7. Rom. iii: 13-17.

In conclusion, we remark that we believe this story is an entire fabrication, without the least foundation whatever in truth, or else a gross perversion and wicked distortion of some very trivial circumstance very remotely resembling, not the whole, nor a majority, but some one or two particulars above narrated—that it was written and published at a great distance from the scene, not with a view of having the matter exposed and investigated at home, but for effect merely, and to scandalize that

"sect which is every where spoken against." Will some of our friends at or near Canandaigua, have the goodness to inquire into this matter, ferret out the author of the tale, and inform us whether any circumstances nearly or remotely resembling those narrated, ever occurred there; if so, who the writer is, who the converted Universalist and infidel and the blasphemous Universalist are, etc., etc., and give us as early information as possible on the subject? THE "CHILD'S UNIVERSALIST COMPANION."

By D. D. Smith and Abel Tompkins, Boston.—The complaint is often justly made by Universalist parents, that it is difficult procuring books suitable for children, that are not interspersed with doctrines calculated to undermine the very principles on which pure religion and morality are based. But in this work we find much that is not only adapted to the tastes and capacities of children, but is calculated to inculcate correct views of the character of God, and illustrate the practical influence of Universalism—indeed children of an advanced age may receive much useful instruction from this little book.

We recommend to those who desire the moral as well as intellectual improvement of their children, to place in their library the "CHILD'S UNIVERSALIST COMPANION."

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

BR. GROSH.—The following quoted lines, selected from an old print, are submitted for a place in your miscellany department. The other lines are merely the production of my own coarse pen—unskilled in poetry—never courted the Muses. Do with them what you will.

MAY TO APRIL.

It had arrived—the vernal board—
The woodland sang melodious pour'd,
When May, with charming sweetness blessed,
Her sister April thus addressed:

"Without your showers, I breed no flowers,
Each field a barren waste appears;
If you do n't weep, my blossoms sleep,
They take such pleasure in your tears.

"As your decay, made room for May,
So I must part with all that's mine;
My balmy breeze, my blooming trees,
To torrid suns their sweets resign.

"O'er April dead, my shades I spread,
To her I owe my dress so gay—
Of daughters three, it falls on me,
To close our triumphs on one day.

"Thus to repose, all nature goes,
Month after month must find its doom:
Time on the wing, May ends the Spring,
And Summer dances on her tomb." A. U.

SELECTIONS FROM "LACONICS".....NO. III.

XXV.—The scholar, without good breeding, is a pedant; the philosopher, a cynic; the soldier, a brute; and every man, disagreeable.—CHESTERFIELD.

XXVI.—Four things are grievously empty: a head without brains, a wit without judgment, a heart without honesty, and a purse without money.—BISHOP EARLE.

XXVII.—There should be, methinks, as little merit in loving a woman for her beauty, as in loving a man for his prosperity; both being equally subject to change.—POPE.

XXVIII.—
Glories, like glow-worms, afar off shine bright,
But look'd to near, have neither heat nor light.
WEBSTER.

XXIX.—If you would have a faithful servant, and one that you like, serve yourself.—FRANKLIN.

XXX.—Common swearing, if it have any serious meaning at all, argues in man a perpetual distrust of his own reputation, and is an acknowledgment that he thinks his bare word not to be worthy of credit. And it is so far from adorning and filling a man's discourse, that it makes it look swollen and bloated, and more bold and blustering than becomes persons of genteel and good breeding.—TILLOTSON.

XXXI.—A prison is a house of care,
A place where none can thrive;
A touchstone true to try a friend,
A grave for one alive;
Sometimes a place of right,
Sometimes a place of wrong,
Sometimes a place of rogues and thieves,
And honest men among.

INSCRIPTION ON EDINBURGH TOLBOOTH.

XXXII.—I can get no remedy against the consumption of the pulse: borrowing only lingers and lingers it out, but the disease is incurable.—SHAKESPEARE.

XXXIII.—Superficial writers, like the mole, often fancy themselves deep, when they are exceeding near the surface.—SHENSTONE.

XXXIV.—Philosophy hath given us several plausible rules for attaining peace and tranquillity of mind, but they fall very much short of bringing men to it.
TILLOTSON.

XXXV.—Moderation is the silken string running through the pearl-chain of all virtues.—FOLLER.

XXXVI.—The web of our life is of a mingled yarn, good and ill together; our virtues would be proud if our faults whipped them not; and our crimes would despair, if they were not cherished by our virtues.
SHAKESPEARE.

Selections from the "Tin Trumpet."

Jews.—The modern—are proofs, we are told, of the truth of Christianity. Are they not at the same time, proofs of the want of Christianity in those who profess, without feeling, its charitable doctrine? as the Scriptures, when they enjoin love of our neighbor, warn us to put the most enlarged construction upon the word, it is difficult to reconcile the virulent denunciations, and the incentives to scorn and hatred of the Jews, which so many of the clergy infuse into their sermons, either with Christianity, good taste, or right feeling. Our Saviour was a Jew; the greater portion of the Bible is Jewish; the ten commandments, which constitute the basis of our morality, are Jewish. Why, then, should we dislike our fellow-subjects, and spiritual half-brethren, because they happen to be Jews, more even than we hate Turks and Pagans, who are utter aliens and infidels? All persecution is demoralizing, and the Jews have been long exposed to its worst species,—that of public prejudice, aggravated by civil and other disabilities. Abolish all religious pains, penalties, and distinctions, and this oppressed race will quickly become elevated in the moral, as well as in the political scale.

KNOWLEDGE—of the world. The fancied wisdom of those whose reflections are created by a mirror. There is a class of persons who think they evince prodigious penetration into the human heart, when they ascribe every action to the worst possible motives, taking it for granted that all men are sordid, profligate, or designing, all women dissipated, thoughtless, and inconstant. This misanthropical ignorance they presume to term knowledge of the world. So it may be, but it is of that world only which is comprised in their own persons.

LAWYERS—generally know too much of law to have a very clear perception of justice, just as divines are often too deeply read in theology, to appreciate the full grandeur and the proper tendencies of religion. Losing the abstract in the concrete, the comprehensive in the technical, the principal in its accessories, both are in the predicament of the rustic, who could not see London for the houses.

LEARNING—very often a knowledge of words, and an ignorance of things; a common act of memory, which may be exercised without common sense. A mere scholar is generally known by his unacquaintance with everything but languages, which have so filled his head, that they have left room for nothing else. He mistakes the steps for the temple of Minerva; the shrine for the goddess herself; and is as proud of his mind's empty purse, as if there were money in it! Pedantry's jargon will no more improve our understandings, than the importunate clink of a smoke-jack, will fill our bellies. The elaborate triflings of scholiasts and commentators, the jingling sophistries of logic, and what has been technically termed the learning of the schools, all of which were so many antidotes to sound sense and reflection, may well be thrown overboard, when many a member of our Mechanics' Institutes, possesses useful knowledge that might puzzle a whole convent of college monks.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, 9th inst., by Rev. D. Skinner, Mr. EDWARD G. POND, to Miss LUCY EVERSON, all of this city.

In Somerville, St. Lawrence county, 1st inst., by Rev. WM. SIAS, Mr. GILBERT WAIT, to Miss ELIZA ANN MERRIMAN, both of that place.

In this city, on the 3d inst. by Rev. D. Skinner, Mr. WILLIAM H. PEARSON, formerly of Newark, N. J., to Mrs. JANE JOHNSON, late of Detroit, Michigan.

DEATHS.

In Havana, June 20th, of typhus fever, WILLIAM SEYMOUR, only son of Erastus and Julia Ann Barnes, in the 9th year of his age.

In Brownville, June 19th, LUTHERA S. PERSONS, daughter of Chesterfield Persons Esq., in the 17th year of her age. The deceased at the time of her death, was on a visit, with her relatives, having left her home a few days previous, in usual though not in firm health. The funeral was attended near her father's residence in Orleans. Sermon by J. BRITTON JR.

It becomes my painful duty, to record the death of my father, LYMAN COOK, who, after a lingering illness of nearly two years, departed this life, in Van Buren, Onondaga county, N. Y., on the 30th of June, 1837.

The subject of this notice was born in Wallingford, New-Haven county, Conn., in 1760; from which place, in the 18th year of his age, he emigrated to this State. He soon after took up his residence in the town of Marcellus, Onondaga county, where he resided till December, 1833. From Marcellus he removed to Van Buren, where, in the 57th year of his age, he died. In early life his mind was impressed with the notions of Partialism. But the shackles had not become so thoroughly riveted, as to be unyielding to the powerful influence of truth, and he was among the first, in the town of Marcellus, to stand forth in defence of the doctrine of God's impartial grace. He lived to see that glorious doctrine spreading in every direction, cherished by all, and fully defended by one of his family. In his last illness he found comfort in believing. He despaired of recovery, for nearly six months previous to his death, but he never despaired of the goodness and kind care of his heavenly Father. He told me that he had no fears of death—that he should rest soon from his troubles—that he should be at peace with God. Agreeably to his request, I attended prayers with him and the family, a day or two previous to his departure, to which he listened with attention and with apparent satisfaction.

His funeral was attended on the 2d inst., in the Episcopal church at Marcellus, and the richest consolations of the Gospel held forth to the mourners, together with a house filled to overflowing, with sympathizing friends and neighbors, by Br. A. Peck, of Fulton.

THEODORE D. COOK.

In Wolcott, Wayne county, June 22d, ORESTES HUBBARD, infant son of Nathaniel W. and Bethiah Tompkins.

"It died to sin, to woe and cure,
Yet for a moment felt the rod,
Then, springing on the viewless air,
Spread its light wings and soared to God."

The funeral was attended in the Universalist meeting-house, and the consolations of the Gospel tendered to the mourners by T. D. COOK.

In South Bainbridge, on October 8th, 1836, DANIEL MELLENDY, aged 60 years, in the triumphs of the Christian faith as held by Universalists. He, a number of times, assured his family and neighbors that, contrary to the assertion of many, it was good to die by, and affirmed that the nearer death approached, the more glorious was his hope, and the brighter his prospect appeared.

He was a Christian in practice, lived much esteemed, and died deeply lamented. A discourse was delivered at his funeral, from Romans xiv: 7, 8, by the writer.

G. M., Jr.

In Truxton, suddenly, June 29th, Mr. BROWN SMITH, aged 65 years. Most eminently did Br. Smith adorn the doctrine of God, our Saviour, by a well ordered life and godly conversation, for a great number of years.—Amid all the changes of fortune—in the two extremes of prosperity and adversity, which fell to his share in almost every variety of form, he proved himself emphatically the man of honor; sustaining a reputation for truth and veracity above suspicion, while in benevolence and humanity he was surpassed by few. Such was the influence of Universalism on his life. He selected 2d Samuel xiv: 14, as a text for his funeral discourse, which, agreeably to his request, was delivered by the writer, in the Baptist meeting-house in Truxton village, to a large and attentive congregation. W. BULLARD.

In Berkshire valley, Morris county, N. J., April 10th, of consumption, ELISHA P. MONROE, son of George W. and Betsey Monroe, of Colesville, Broome county, N. Y., aged 18 years and 9 months. Of a truly amiable character, he bade fair to be a blessing to his aged parents and an honor to society. His worth in life will long be remembered, and his death deplored by all who knew him.

In Hornellsville, April 16th, ELIAS, son of Frasier and Mary Stevens, aged 6 years. Funeral on the 18th, at the Methodist meeting-house—sermon by Br. Upson.

In the same place, May 7th, ELISHA REYNOLDS. Although attached to no denomination, he left the world rejoicing in the hope of partaking in a universal salvation. The funeral discourse was delivered on the 14th, by Br. Upson.

In Plainfield, Otsego county, June 13th, Mr. PIERCE REYNOLDS, aged 31 years. His faith in a world's salvation gave him joy during a protracted illness, and blessed his dying hour. A wife and four children are left to mourn their loss, and society to lament the early departure of a member highly esteemed by all. His funeral was attended on the 15th, and by his request, a discourse was delivered by the writer, from 1 Cor. xv: 53. T. J. SMITH.

NUMBER 30.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

BETWEEN D. SKINNER, OF UTICA, N. Y., AND A. CAMPBELL, OF BETHANY, VA.

The Questions for discussion being drawn up by the former, and the Evidence to be relied on, and Rules of Discussion by the latter, and mutually signed by the parties, (each making certain reservations or giving certain explanations of his intentions and views of the language employed by the other in drafting the questions and rules.)

QUESTIONS OR PROPOSITIONS.

I. Are sheol, hades, and gehenna, (or each of them) ever used in the Scriptures to express a place or state of endless misery?

II. Do the words olem, aion, aiônios, etc., when applied to the punishment of the wicked, mean duration without end?

III. Is there any word in human language that expresses duration without end, which is not applied to the future punishment of the wicked, or which can certify us that God, angels, or saints shall have duration without end?

IV. Shall eternal life (meaning thereby endless holiness and happiness) be, according to the Scriptures, the ultimate destiny of all mankind.

EVIDENCE TO BE RELIED ON.

I. A future state being wholly a matter of revelation, whatever illustrations or corroborations may be drawn from nature, society, or our own reasonings, no other witnesses than the Apostles and Prophets, or the spirit of God speaking in them, can be admitted as of any authority.

II. That as their testimony on the subject is complete in the Old and New Testaments, especially the latter—to these books, especially the latter, every appeal shall be made.

III. In this discussion the words of the Bible are to be subjected to the canons of criticism or laws of language current in the commonwealth of letters; and that no new or by-laws, other than those to which all writings of the same antiquity are subjected, can be admitted in the interpretation of any disputed word or sentence.

IV. That King James' version shall be ultimate in every appeal to translations; or, if the parties choose, the new version on the basis of Campbell, Macknight, and Doddridge.

RULES OF DISCUSSION.

I. The Universalists having opened the discussion D. Skinner shall continue to lead the way, and A. Campbell to respond to the close of the discussion.

II. The disputants shall occupy equal space in their respective periodicals.

III. No letter shall extend beyond six pages (burgcois) of the Millennial Harbinger.

IV. The discussion shall not transcend twenty letters each, from the first of Mr. Skinner's, of February 10th, to the close. The last letter, on each side, to be a recapitulation of the arguments of each, and to be simultaneously printed in their respective periodicals.

V. The parties shall, as early as possible, in every month, forward to each other a proof-sheet of their letters.

VI. The parties shall always confine themselves to the proposition under discussion so long as it is agreed to prosecute it; or should they disagree on this point, not more than five letters shall be devoted to any one proposition.

[Signed]

A. CAMPBELL.
D. SKINNER.

1st. If there must be four issues formed in this discussion, to prevent all ambiguity be it remembered that A. Campbell affirms, that, while sheol, hades, and gehenna, in their original import, only sometimes signify the punishment of the wicked; gehenna, by its adjuncts, or as used by Jesus Christ, does denote the future interminable punishment of the wicked.

2d. A. Campbell affirms that the whole force of the Hebrew word olem is found in the Greek aion, and that same force is carried into the adjective aiônios; which word, when applied to the future state of both righteous and wicked, does denote duration without end.

3d. A. Campbell denies that there is in the Greek language any word which, in its unfigurative and original force, denotes a simple state of duration without end, save aion; and that there is not any word which can certify us that God, angels, or men, will live forever, if aiônios does not.

4th. A. Campbell denies that eternal life will be the destiny of all men.

5th. To prevent all ambiguity, be it remembered that D. Skinner denies the affirmative of the first and second propositions, or questions, and maintains the affirmative of the third and fourth.

6th. D. Skinner deems King James' version as correct a standard as any version on which the parties would be likely to agree; but would prefer that neither party should be denied the advantage derivable from the translations and comments of men of acknowledged eminence and standing in the republic of letters.

7th. D. Skinner maintains that as the discussion was first commenced in the Millennial Harbinger not by himself but by others, and Mr. C. has the affirmative of the first and second propositions it properly belongs to Mr. C. to lead the way in whatever further prosecution of these propositions he may deem advisable, and that D. Skinner will lead the way and Mr. C. be respondent on the third and fourth propositions.*

A. C.
D. S.

A. Campbell hereby submits to Mr. Skinner (who accedes to) the following proposition:—

After the discussion shall have been published in our respective periodicals and in the periodical press, a copy right for its future publication in the form of a volume shall be tendered to the American and Foreign Bible society, that the profits accruing from the sale of the work may be consecrated to the distribution of the Word of life at home and abroad. And should they refuse, it shall be tendered to the American Bible Society; and they refusing, to any benevolent society to which the parties may agree.

From the Millennial Harbinger.

No. 6.†—Mr. Campbell to Mr. Skinner.

June 29th, 1837.

1. MY DEAR SIR—I have prefixed to your last letter (date unknown) the propositions, rules of discussion, and the evidence to be relied on in the pending controversy. You will see that I have given up the whole matter of discord to your own dictation. I do this, Sir, to avoid printing in every letter some three or four pages of matter, which, whatever we may think of it, cannot but be regarded by our readers as more puerile and captious than edifying. With regard to your alternative for my replying to your last letter, or closing the discussion which Universalists began, you have now made it evident to all that you object, not as suggested in your letter of May, through the fear of my introducing new arguments in the closing address: for I have given you my pledge that nothing of the kind on my part was intended, or should be attempted. As our readers cannot now doubt the true reason, I need not infer it for them. Yet you have the courage to say, that my objecting to your alternative for the usual mode of closing all discussions, is to you a "clear proof of my unwillingness to meet you on fair and equal grounds"! What singular vision is that, to which twilight or darkness is brighter than day!

2. I will not spend time in replying to your constant imputations of timidity or unfairness, or some sinister influence, as controlling or giving direction to all my movements in reference to the vauntings, challengings, or "modest requests" of Universalists. In all this, you walk in the steps of the leaders of Romanism in this country; for, time after time, did they boastingly say that the reason why I had for years paid no attention to them, was the full assurance I felt that their fortress was unas-

*Mr. Campbell will please copy my explanations and exceptions, as I have copied his.

D. S.

sailable, and that I knew too well what strength they could bring into the field, to think of hazarding a conflict on their grand peculiarities. But, Sir, the sequel has convinced them that rather the want of sufficient interest in their cause in this community, till recently, and the want of a respectable advocate, was the secret of all my cowardice and timidity.

3. There is another point in which I am sorry to see, or even to imagine that I see, a very striking analogy between your periodical and those of the Roman Catholics. Just about the time that I had a challenge from Bishop Purcell, their prints began to create prejudices against me, so that I might not have with the Romanists an impartial hearing. The most singular, misshapen, and unjust views of my sentiments, were held up for weeks to that community, so that I might appear under the greatest disadvantage in opposing the swaggering pretensions of the Man of Sin—the real "Sea Serpent" that has been around our coasts for some years.

4. The following notice from a gentleman in New York, illustrates my meaning, and gives an item or two by way of proof:—"Have you ever seen Mr. Montgomery's letter to the Universalist preacher with whom you had a short discussion at Lockport, last June? It was published in Mr. Skinner's paper, of March 10th, 1837, just on the eve of your correspondence with him, and was, without doubt, designed for effect. Mr. Potter, of Lockport, in his reply to Mr. Montgomery, accuses you of having 'lost sight of not only the Christian character, but of the gentleman;' of having given, at the time of that debate, 'evidence of entire recklessness to all decency, religion, and truth.' In the same paper of February 24th, 1837, you are accused by Mr. Grosh, one of the editors of the 'Advocate,' of having 'sinned against dignity and decency,' in your notice of Mr. Potter and his congregation, and of having 'violated truth for the sake of making himself [yourself] appear greater than he [you] really is' [are]. I have no doubt but these pieces were published in the 'Advocate' in order to destroy your reputation with the readers of that paper, and thus get an advantage over you in your intended discussion with Mr. Skinner. If not, why did they make their appearance in its columns at that period?"

5. In answer to my friend and correspondent, I must say, I did not read those pieces to which he alludes: but had I read them, I should not at such a crisis, have honored them with a reply. Yourself and brethren, Sir, seem to have very great confidence either in your theory, your learning, or your talents, when you imagine that so many appalling and terrific attributes belong to your defence of Universalism. If I thought I could dispossess you or your readers of these hideous spectres that guard the avenues to your fortress, by simply telling the truth, I would, Sir, from the inmost recesses of my soul assure you, that, according to my modes of thinking, your cause is incomparably the weakest cause in Christendom; and therefore I promise myself no honor in this earthly world from the most ample refutation of each and every of its pretensions. Its growing popularity, and its able defendant which I have found in you, Sir, with the frequent challenges I have had to discuss its merits, are my apology to this age for the attention which I am now to bestow upon it. Its growing popularity, and the talents of some of its champions, are, indeed, regarded by many as no weak proof of its claims on Divine authority. But, Sir, may not infidelity rear its hideous front and vauntingly urge the same plea in its defence? I expect then, Sir, from you better logic than this.

6. To put an end to all this manœuvring and cavilling about preliminaries, I have concluded to give you every thing you demand:—

1st. You asked a written rather than an oral discussion. I have conceded it.

2d. You have written out and propounded four propositions, and asked me to accept them in preference to any other questions, words, or sentences by me propounded. I have acceded to them.

3d. You proposed to open the discussion on your part by writing on the subject as propounded by Mr. Montgomery. I made no objection. And allow me emphatically to say, had you in your first letter, as I had every reason to expect, offered the propositions, rules, etc., which, before a debate commences, are as universal as debating schools from the village Lyceum up to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, you might have saved both the patience of our readers and so many words about nothing. Your last effort to place it all to the credit of your boldness and promptness in the faith, will occasion more smiles than convictions among the discerning.

4th. You have asked twenty letters, of six pages each, to deliver yourself on the subject. You have got them, counting from yours of February 10th to the close. Any excess of pages which you now have, will be regulated in the present number according to the computation of my compositor. Having then, Sir, nothing more about which to complain, I trust you will henceforth devote all your strength to the question under discussion, according to the preceding stipulations.

7. Your four propositions being now legitimately before us, it is in order for me to make a few farther remarks on their illogical, clumsy, and unworkman-like organization and arrangement. This is not so much the fault of my opponent, perhaps, as the hard destiny of his subject. Indeed it is proof of the difficulties that surround him. The barrenness of the genius of Universalism, is more apparent in the hands of one of its master-spirits, than when preached by the humblest of its advocates: for in the latter case, we excuse the subject and blame the advocate; while in the former, we excuse the advocate and blame the subject. In the present case we blame the soil rather than the cultivator.

8. Give me leave then, Sir, to say your propositions are most singularly illogical and unfortunate: for if there be any point in any one of them, the other three are redundant—yes, Sir, as useless as three additional pens would be at this moment in my fingers; or as three new tongues in your mouth when you arise to preach universal heaven. Suppose, for example, I affirm and prove the first proposition as you have written it, that sheol, hades, or gehenna, is used in Scripture to express a state of endless misery; what comes of Universalism! Can the other three propositions raise it from the dead!!

9. Again, if olem, aion, and aionios, etc., “when applied to the punishment of the wicked, do mean duration without end,” of what use is the first proposition? Does not this embrace the whole question!! Why prove the same thing a second time under different terms! Your second proposition admits that olem, aion, and aionios, although not applied to sheol, hades, and gehenna, are nevertheless applied to the punishment of the wicked; therefore you admit there are other words, besides these three, indicative of that punishment. Why did you not, then, put these words in the first proposition along with the aforesaid three?

10. And here it comes in my way to reply to the last paragraph of your letter now in review. In all that you say of the 2d paragraph, you evince how much you felt the dilemma in which you placed yourself in the terms you have chosen. But, Sir, you possess the happy art of dispelling sorrow by a smile. You represent me as imploring you for help to disprove your second proposition, while I am exposing its singular concession—that neither the nature nor duration of the punishment of the wicked is affected in the least by the decision of the first proposition. That it makes void your first proposition by the supposition which it avows—viz., that the punishment of the wicked is set forth under other terms than sheol, hades, or gehenna. Of course, then, nothing depends upon the truth of your first negation!—any more than to deny that fainting, swooning, dying means eternal death, proves that no other words in human language can represent that idea. You will not, my dear Sir, hazard the imputation of obtuseness of intellect by either doubting or denying this. This being admitted, converts your smile into a laugh, and disposes of every word in your last epistle on the second proposition. My request for you to enumerate those other words declarative of the punishment of the wicked, which some would call rather quizzing you, was indeed intended to make you feel how you had committed yourself, and not to compel you to dishonor your intellectual standing with the whole community by representing me as imploring your assistance to prove my side of the question. I do not think that my opponent ought to set so great a value upon his theory as to stupify himself, and spit upon his beard, feigning himself obtuse, for the sake of escaping from the unfortunate predicament of proposing for discussion two propositions that stultify each other. Truly, his average value of the intellect of his readers is not exaggerated, when he furnishes them with such literary repasts.

11. His 3d proposition is still more radically illogical and redundant: for if “there are words, or at least one word, in human language that expresses duration without end, which is not applied to the future punishment of the wicked,” if that word be also not applied to the future happiness of the righteous—neither applied to the one nor the other—of what use is such a proposition in this discussion! But when he produces said word and proves it, (which, we think, he cannot do,) we shall more fully show its irrelevancy.

12. The fourth proposition stultifies the three first; for if he proves that “eternal life will be according to the Scriptures the ultimate destiny of all mankind,” of what use to disprove the two first—of what use to prove the third? Mr. Skinner’s logic reminds me of a certain mystic theologian. His method after reading his text, usually was—“Brethren, my method shall be, 1st. To explain to you what my text does not mean—and in the second place, I shall endeavor to show you what it does mean. In the first place, then, it does not literally mean —. In the second place, it does not metaphorically mean —. In the third place, it does not analogically mean —. But, in the fourth place, it does literally mean —,” etc. A sagacious wag once interrupted his mystic reverence by observing—“Sir, the weather is cold, the day is short, and the congregation is thin; please, then, explain to us who are present what the text does truly mean, and reserve its negative meanings for those who are absent, or for more favorable circumstances.” So I would say to the champion of Universalism—My dear Sir, prove that all men are to be eternally happy; reserve what you have to say on the other three propositions to those to whom you fail to prove the fourth, or for the amusement of other readers than mine.

13. Say not, Sir, that I have compelled or caused you to take this course. The propositions are your own manufacture, raw material and all. [See again my first letter to you, M. H. p. 178.] I there showed how many points might be made, and left you to select or not, as you pleased. You made no selection, but offered such propositions and in what terms you pleased. You have then, Sir, the unrivalled honor of their organization and arrangement.

14. I do not, however, complain of the four propositions as being partial or more favorable to you than to me. They are, indeed, too favorable to me; because, should I fail to sustain my affirmatives, I have lost nothing as respects the claims of Universalism. Should you also clearly sustain your third proposition, still I lose nothing; because, should you blot olem, aion, aionios, sheol, hades, and gehenna out of the Bible, and show that there are ten words in Greek or Hebrew, that signify duration without end, which are never applied to saint or sinner, I have remaining other words and phrases from which I deduce invincible arguments in proof that it shall not hereafter be with the wicked as with the righteous; that to him who dies in his sins, posthumous, purgatorial, or future holiness and future happiness are as impossible as it is for God to lie. But your liberality is not yet all told: you have so arranged matters, that should I prove any one of the affirmative propositions you have tendered me, it is impossible for you by the other three to make out your theory. I complain, then, because you will have us travel forty years in the wilderness on a journey which might have been performed in a few days, and not of any partiality to yourself in this arrangement. You are, Sir, generous to a fault; and it is because I ask no favors, that I revolt at such uncalled-for bounty and munificence at your hand.

15. I disposed of the first proposition in my last, even to your entire satisfaction. The only thing that you do seem dissatisfied with is the full satisfaction I have given you on that point. I threw your proposition into my crucible; and when its alloy was purged you could not but be pleased with it. But even then you rather blamed me for disentangling your net-work. Or is it possible that you misconceived my object! It would seem so: for you speak of me as having “surrendered an inaccessible and invulnerable fastness”—“the strongest hold”—“I have driven the nail through and clinched it on the other side.” And after much to the same effect, you could contain no longer, but burst forth into the following sublime apostrophic personification, or rather rhapsody:—“Hear it, O ye Heavens! Listen, O Earth! Let the world take knowledge of it, let it be recorded in a book and never forgotten! The Reverend Alexander Campbell states in a set controversy with the Rev. Mr. Skinner, a Universalist, that the Hebrew Shemim, the Greek Ouranos, and the Persian Paradeisos, if fairly rendered, cannot of themselves, or without an adjunct, express endless happiness; and that we can no where find olem, aion, or aionios (his favorite term for expressing endless) applied to Shemim, Ouranos, or Paradeisos—in English, heaven and paradise; and therefore he has conceded there is no endless happiness, no eternal life for human kind!!!” I ask you, Sir, as an honest man, after reading this version or parody, or what you please to call it, of your aforesaid rhapsody, to say whether so far as this proposition is concerned, if the controversy were about the endless happiness of the saints, my version or imitation, etc., would not be to a scruple as exactly in point as what you have written? I expect no less from you than to say, that the Hebrew Shemim, translated sometimes air, sometimes heaven; and the Greek Ouranos and the Latin Cælum, frequently translated the sensible air, the visible sky, and only sometimes a state of bliss, and not necessarily alone, and without an adjunct, endless bliss, are exactly standing as hades, sheol and gehenna in the proposition; and if the question were about endless happiness as it is about endless punishment, my concession, as you call it, would in the one case prove as much against the endless happiness of the righteous as the endless punishment of the wicked. So much, Sir, for what you have gained by the first proposition.

16. I will now show what the truth gains from it. First, an explicit renunciation of that grand dogma of Universalism, which is expressed in the words following, to wit:—

“In the sincere penitence and reformation of the offender, justice is satisfied and can neither ask nor receive farther punishment, either retrospective or prospective. The sinner has been punished according to the full demerit of the crime (in his case at least,) and all good objects that could be obtained by punishment are already attained. Thus justice and mercy meet together, righteousness and peace embrace each other,” etc.

17. Now as sheol, hades, and gehenna do sometimes represent the punishment of the wicked, and never repentance nor reformation, the above allegation that repentance is the only hell or state of punishment, is fully discarded. Though I do not feel rhapsodic nor elated on obtaining this distinct renunciation of a doctrine so uncomplimentary to Christianity, which presents the Messiah's appearance and mediation a mere pageant, a splendid effort for nothing, still I am pleased that my friend Skinner admits that the wicked are punished in hades, sheol, and gehenna, extra the aforementioned popular dogma.

18. A second point is gained; these words sometimes signifying the punishment of the wicked, it obliges us always to ascertain the nature and extent of that punishment from the words and phrases in connexion with them. Thus the adjuncts of Gehenna make it probable that it was used by our Lord to represent not only punishment for sin, but future punishment—punishment after death; and perhaps we might go farther and say, that, with him, it meant sometimes by its adjuncts not only future, but everlasting punishment!! But then you, Sir, will say, or rather have said with the learned Mr. Balfour, or with Mr. Ballou, "How will you account for the fact that Christ never preached gehenna fire, or punishment to any but the Jews?" A learned question, truly! Did Christ ever preach eternal life to the Gentiles! What sage reflections do we sometimes meet with amongst the old sages of this age! Jesus had no commission but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. But we shall hereafter see what he preached to the Jews and what the apostles preached to the Gentiles. They never mentioned gehenna once to the Gentiles, Mr. Balfour will say. Nor did they ever mention shemim, nor Paradise, nor Abraham's bosom in any sermon to the Gentiles on record!! What does all this prove? no more than that they always chose such words as their hearers understood as best suited to their ideas. Hence, Peter once uses the Pagan word Tartarus, because its meaning was well understood in all the Pagan world.

19. You did not, Sir, concede quite enough when you conceded in your letter before me that gehenna is generally taken figuratively in the New Testament. I said always, and I repeat it. Of the twelve times in which it is found, it never means a literal punishment in the literal valley of Hinnom. When you mention an exception it will be time enough to examine it.

20. But that it signifies the punishment of the wicked is conceded, and being generally, you say, used figuratively, it generally denotes a punishment of which the flames of Tophet were but a type. Something worse than repentance truly! But what, let me ask, are its adjuncts! For this purpose we shall hear every passage in which it is found: "Whosoever shall say, 'Thou fool, (to his brother,) shall be in danger of hell fire.'" Matt. v: 22. "It is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell." This occurs twice, Matt. v: 29, 30. "Fear Him who has power to destroy both soul and body in hell." Matt. x: 28. "It is better for thee to ENTER INTO LIFE with one eye, rather than having two eyes, to be cast into hell fire." "It is better for thee to enter into life halt or maimed, rather than having two hands or two feet, to be cast into everlasting fire." Matt. xviii: 8, 9. "And when the proselyte is made you make him two-fold more the child of hell than yourselves." Matt. xxiii: 15. "Serpents! generation of vipers! how can you escape the damnation of hell?" Matt. xxiii: 33. "Enter into life, rather than go into hell, into the fire that shall never be quenched, where their worm dieth not and their fire is not quenched." Mark ix: 43. "Enter into life, rather than to be cast into hell, into the fire that shall never be quenched, where their worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched."—Mark ix: 45. "Enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, rather than to be cast into hell fire, where the worm dieth not and their fire is not quenched; for every one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt."—Mark ix: 48, 49. "Fear Him who, after he has killed, has power to cast into hell; yea, I say unto you, fear Him." Luke xii: 5. "The tongue is set on fire of hell." James iii: 6.

21. Now, Sir, these are the words of an Asiatic, of a Jew, of Jesus, the great Prophet, the Messiah, the Lawgiver, who is able to save and to destroy. In Eastern costume he spoke. Through comparisons, similes, parables, and the most apposite, striking and beautiful imagery, he communicated the knowledge of things spiritual, future, eternal, divine. Through the temple, a grain of wheat deposited in the earth, and Jonah's deliverance from the sea, he taught the destruction of his body and its resurrection again. Through the manna, the water of Jacob's well, he set forth the bread and water of life—the strength and consolations of the Gospel. By life and death he taught salvation and condemnation; through Paradise and the valley of Hinnom he set forth the joys of heaven and the future punishment of ungodly men. As we explain one we explain all. We bring all these figures into one court, try them before one and the same tribunal, and judge them by the same law. Such are the rules of interpretation agreed on.

22. Can we, then, with all these premises before us, doubt that gehenna is contrasted with "life" and "the kingdom of God?" By every law of language, then, it is a state opposite to that to which it is contrasted. Good and evil, light and darkness, pleasure and pain, sweet and bitter, etc., etc., are contrasts; so is life and death, heaven and hell, life and hell, so is the kingdom of God and hell. We have in the passages quoted the phrase "enter into life" three or four times contrasted with entering into gehenna. Now I ask, whatever is meant by entering into life, the very opposite of that is going into, or being cast into gehenna. If then, to "enter into life," as all Christendom admits, is to enter into future and eternal bliss, to be cast into hell is to be cast into eternal punishment, or into everlasting death.

23. But we have not only to consider its adjuncts by way of contrast, but by way of substitution. Thus in Matt. xviii: 8, 9, gehenna is substituted for to pur to aionion, THE EVERLASTING FIRE. To be cast into hell, and into the aionion pur, the everlasting fire, are, in the style of Jesus, identical expressions, perfect equivalents. But this is not a solitary expression, though then it were not to be explained away. It is the settled style of the Messiah. Thus, to go into hell, and to go into the fire that shall never be quenched, are also identical; for in Mark ix: we have this phrase repeated three times. Gehenna, then, as explained by its adjuncts, means, "fire, everlasting fire, fire that shall not be quenched," and this everlasting and unquenchable fire is by contrast explained to be the opposite of entering into life, the kingdom of God, or eternal happiness. So, then, to say nothing of destroying soul and body in hell, after the body is killed, which is so plain that even the ingenious Mr. Skinner can find no way of evading it, except by asking, who is he that is able to destroy—it is obvious Jesus threatened by gehenna an everlasting punishment to his enemies, who should be salted with fire as sacrifices were preserved by salt.

24. Thus the punishment of damnation of hell was always preached by Jesus as future punishment, punishment after death; a punishment contrasted with life, with the kingdom of God, expressed by the strongest imagery, not merely by fire, but by aionion or "everlasting fire," "a fire that shall never be quenched."

25. It will avail little for you, my friend Mr. Skinner, to take the ground of Mr. Balfour, and tell what the fire and worms of Hinnom anciently meant, or the salt of the sacrifices; and then assume that the destruction of the Jews at Jerusalem was meant, etc.; for we will then show it matters not what the manna, the rock of Horeb, the brazen serpent, the temple, Jerusalem, Mount Zion, Paradise, the valley of Hinnom, the undying worm, and a thousand other things, originally meant. That is one question; but what they became figures of, or what they in process of time came to denote, is quite another question. The New Testament manna, passover, circumcision, temple, Jerusalem, Mount Zion, Paradise, gehenna, and the worm that dieth not, you will never be able to show are the same as the Old Testament or first things represented by these words. Why, then, make a special law in favor of gehenna, the word in debate!!!

26. The assumption that the destruction of Jerusalem and all your etc.'s thereunto appended, constitute the gehenna or hell threatened by Jesus, scarcely deserve grave consideration. Then Jesus said in vain to his blasphemous contemporaries, "Serpents! offspring of vipers! how can you escape [the punishment] the damnation of hell!" By dying and being buried long before that day, they escaped the damnation of hell in the heaven of Universalism!

27. To prevent the recurrence of a new species of logic, I select a sample or two from the 14th, 15th, 16th, and 17th paragraphs of your June letter:—

"The Hebrew sheol," you say, "and Greek hades, more properly signifies [signify] a state or condition. It signifies [they signify] first, literally and commonly the state or condition (or if you please the place) of the dead in general, irrespective of their goodness or badness, their happiness or misery." So far I have already asserted.—Here, then, there is no need of proof, for we agree. But you add, "Secondly, in a figurative sense, severe judgments, great afflictions, sudden temporal destruction. Thirdly, in a moral and figurative sense—a distressing sense of guilt, remorse of conscience, great mental anguish." Then, without a single instance by way of proof or illustration, you proceed to prove your definition by the case in debate. This is summary justice—the Lynch-law of Theology. For example, you despatch Psalm ix: 17, and my other witnesses by assuming, without a single proof, "that in the second or third of the foregoing senses, or perhaps (yes, PERHAPS BOTH) does David use the word hell," etc. Ps. ix: 17. "The wicked shall be turned into a distressing sense of guilt, or perhaps into remorse of conscience, and all the nations that forget God"!!! A flaming abolitionist in Vicksburg could as easily escape the vigilance of Judge Lynch, as your humble servant from such a judgment seat as you have erected, and such witnesses as you have brought into court in this and many similar cases, both in your first and last letters to me.

28. "The case of Tartarus is a suppositious one!" "to illustrate an argument!" "most likely to refer to some heathen tradition," "some apocryphal book," "some fable or story" about angels and Tartarus!! This is summary work of the same category.

29. "Universalism is co-eval with the days of Christianity"!!! I thought it was more ancient. There is a fable that says, the Old Serpent was a graduate in that school; for his first sermon was from the text, "You shall not surely die," or, "You will be eternally happy!"

30. You will accept these as a mere specimen of the easy disposition of much that you have written, which, for the want of room, and because not pertinent to the question, I suffer in the meantime to pass toll-free.

31. I am now prepared to examine the second proposition, if you can only explain it, or show that it does not stultify the first. That olem, aion, and aionios do sometimes mean endless duration I do affirm, and you dare not deny; and that as we ascertain from the adjuncts that gehenna in the lips of Jesus represents punishment after death, future and eternal destruction from the presence of the Lord, so it may perhaps be made as evident that these epithets prefixed to those words which you are yet to reveal, may, by their adjuncts, as clearly indicate duration without end, as we have proved by an induction of every case in which gehenna is found, that it most certainly represents eternal death, if there be any eternal life into which the ONE-EYED hearers of Jesus entered, through faith in him and obedience to his will.

31. From the calculation of my compositor we are now equal in point of space. I have numbered the paragraphs for the sake of easy and certain reference, and will henceforth number our forty letters, commencing with yours of February 10th as No. I. I have signed the stipulations and prefixed them to your June letter. You will please present them to your readers with both our signatures attached to them. The yet unanswered parts of Letter No. I. will come in review under their proper heads.

Very benevolently and respectfully,

A. CAMPBELL.

P. S. We waited almost a month for the reply to our last; and unless the utmost despatch is observed by the parties, the discussion must be on hand a long time. This leaves Bethany by the mail of July 6th, it being the first proof we could, in the present circumstances, obtain. A. C.

No. 7.—Mr. Skinner to Mr. Campbell.

Utica, July 18th, 1837.

1. MY DEAR SIR—Yours of June 29th, has just come to hand. Accept my thanks that you have now settled the preliminaries of this discussion to our mutual satisfaction. The long and wide digression concerning them, was not of my seeking, and its termination, therefore, belonged to you. You seem, in conceding simple justice to me, to grant it as a matter of great grace and condescension on your part. Well, call it grace or justice, I am equally well satisfied, as I am afraid of neither; and as Universalists are so seldom able to obtain any thing approximating even-handed justice, from their opposing brethren, I am even thankful that (however long delayed or bad the grace with which it is given) you have at last conceded it. In reference to your other remarks about the preliminaries, and particularly about your having "given up the whole" to my "own dictation," I would observe, that you seem to have greatly altered your mind since your last letter. In that you said I had "acceded to the rules of evidence" proposed by you "to be relied on, and in the main, yielded to the rules to be observed," and had "finally come up to all" your "little quibbles," etc.

2. In reply to what you say in your third, fourth and fifth paragraphs, about the apparent design of "destroying your reputation with the readers of this paper," on the eve of the commencement of this discussion, I will remark, that I never saw or knew any thing of the articles mentioned by your New-York correspondent, as published in this paper of March 10th and February 24th, till after they were published. And had your correspondent quoted the whole paragraph by Mr. Grosh, instead of taking garbled and disjointed extracts, you would have seen that the article, instead of assailing your reputation, was actually written to defend it from a recent assault made upon it, by a cotemporary journal, in Rochester, N. Y., which has nothing to do with this discussion. Thus, Sir, you see you have not been so greatly dishonored in our columns after all. But your modesty in disclaiming the expectation of any "honor in this earthly world, from the most ample refutation of each and every" of the "pretensions" of Universalism, is only equalled by your affected contempt of the system. I shall leave it to wiser heads than mine to say what you could justly be compared to, if, on trial, you should find your powers inadequate to refute Universalism, which, you say, "is incomparably the weakest cause in Christendom."

3. In view of the above, and the serious difficulty you complain of in your seventh paragraph, and similar difficulties all along complained of, since you commenced addressing me, every master of sound logic and every skilful theological controversialist, must truly commiserate your unhappy destiny. To see so great a master in logic and controversy—one who is "logically and grammatically, as well as theologically and religiously," qualified to "put into the mouths" of novices "the bits of logic," and to "throw around their necks, the reins of reason"—to appeal on all occasions to the "oracle of reason"—to keep constantly "the canons of logic and philosophy in his eye"—to subject all matters "to the canons of criticism and laws of language current in the commonwealth of letters"—to see such a man linked in controversy with one embracing a system, "the barrenness of whose genius" is such as in the first place to induce him "informally, illogically, and lawlessly, to rush into the arena"—a system that has so stultified his intellect, as to make him incapable of ending any thing but "headless, pointless, wide-spreading declamation," distinguished for nothing but "its impotency," and which contains "not a single argument that will bear the line and plummet of sound sense and logical discretion."—all this, Sir, is peculiarly calculated to excite the sympathy and commiseration of great logicians. It is, forsooth, too bad!

4. In despite of the scintillations of your genius and system, so great still is the obtuseness of my intellect that I can discover no more stultifying of each other in my propositions than in yours. Take now the four questions you proposed in your April letter: "1. Is there any punishment for sin? 2. If any, is that punishment present or future? 3. If future, is that future before or after death? 4. If after death, is it temporary or eternal?" Now, Sir, I put it to your own conscience whether your second question does not stultify the first? the third the second? and whether the simple question, "Is eternal [endless] punishment true?" would not have stultified all the preceding questions. See Rom. ii: 1. The merriment introduced into your 12th paragraph about the "mystic theologian," is therefore at your own expense.

5. In your 10th paragraph you appear exceedingly happy, almost overjoyed, at the wonderful concession I have made, viz. that the punishment of the wicked is set forth under other terms than sheol, hades, or gehenna. If, my dear Sir, I had known this admission would have pleased you so well, I would have made it in the very first paragraph I wrote to you—nay, I would have furnished you with a number of instances in proof of its truth—I would have referred you to the first punishment for sin recorded in the Bible, the expulsion of Adam and Eve from Paradise, to the sentences upon the serpent and upon Cain, the drowning of the old world, the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, the plagues of Egypt, and hundreds of other similar cases of punishment both individual and national, where not a syllable is said about hell; but after all, such is the obstinate obtuseness of my intellect that I am utterly incapable of perceiving what possible advantage you, or any one of your positions, could have derived from such concession.

6. You complain of me, not because the propositions for discussion are unfavorable, but because they are too favorable to you—I am generous even to a fault. Very well, Sir—make the most you can of your vantage ground. I am contented. But, Sir, if you fail to substantiate your position relative to either of the first three propositions, so many of your strongest ramparts fall. And if I prove the affirmative of the fourth, your whole system of endless sin and misery falls.

7. In reply to your 15th paragraph, I would simply ask, Why, my dear Sir, did you take back with so much indignation the concession made in a former letter concerning sheol, hades, and gehenna, as though the concession were likely to prove fatal to your cause, if in fact it were a matter of no consequence?

8. Your parody of my apostrophe, or what you are pleased to call my rhapsody, is a perfectly futile attempt to shift the difficulty, in which you are involved, over to my side of the question.—You ask "were the controversy about the endless happiness of the saints," whether your "version or imitation" would not be, to a scruple, as exactly in point as what you [I] have written." I answer unhesitatingly, no. And for this reason: neither the Hebrew Shemim, the Greek, Ouranos, nor Persian Paradiseos, nor, I may add, the Latin Celum nor English Heaven, is ever relied on by any Universalist, nor any other enlightened Christian, as proof of "the endless happiness of the saints." The endless happiness of the saints is attested in Scripture by a very different kind of proof. And how very few are the instances where the words shemim, ouranos, and heaven, are used to designate either the place or state of the endless happiness of the saints, compared to the vast number of instances where they are used in a very different sense! How very different then the case you name. It is not at all in point.

9. Your 16th and 17th paragraphs fairly "stultify" me. Were you dreaming Sir, or what were you about when you penned that most outrageous perversion both of the language and sentiment of the quoted dogma? When and where, Sir, did you ever hear any intelligent Universalist say that "repentance is the only hell or state of punishment," for sinners, or any thing tantamount to it? Never, my dear Sir, since God made you. As well might it be affirmed that a birch tree is holiness, because with a branch therefrom you have chastised your disobedient child, and produced humility and reformation, which has resulted in confirmed holiness of character. I do not wonder Sir, after delivering yourself of such a perversion, that you involuntarily remarked, that you did "not feel rhapsodic nor elated," especially if you have any conscience! What you say about Messiah's appearance and mediation being a mere pageant, would be measureably true were his appearance and mediation to be regarded in the light of your system—a system that represents him as coming to save an alienated and lapsed world, and after much display and pretension, only succeeding in rescuing a small part of the general wreck, and dooming the rest to a far more hopeless condition than he found them in. But Universalism makes his mediation no pageant, but a triumphantly successful effort to reconcile and save from sin and death a whole world of intelligent beings.

10. In your 18th paragraph you assume that it is "probable" [so you are reduced to a mere probability] that "gehenna was used by our Lord to represent punishment after death"—and "perhaps" [so here you are reduced to a bare possibility of being right] "it meant sometimes—[not always] by its adjuncts [not by itself] everlasting punishment!" Sir, is not that cause "incomparably weak" that has nothing but bare possibility in its favor, and that based wholly on assumption without the least particle of proof, or any attempt at proof? In the quotation you pretend in this paragraph to make from me, why do you not quote me fairly? Why garble my question to my disadvantage? My language was, not merely that "Christ never preached gehenna punishment to any but Jews," but that "neither Christ nor his apostles ever" did it—"that none of them ever preached or lisped a syllable of it to Gentiles, or authorized others to do it?" Is there any thing in this incompatible with the fact that Christ's personal ministry was limited to the house of Israel? Moreover, did not Christ himself preach salvation for if not to, the Gentiles? See Matt. viii: 11, 12, and xxi: 41-43, and Luke xiii: 28, 29. And did he not commission his apostles to preach salvation to Gentiles? Mark xvi: 15, and its parallels. Why then, I repeat, if Gentiles were liable to gehenna, fire or punishment, were they never threatened with it? Could it not have been explained to them as well as you can now explain it to me? That the apostles did not mention shemim nor Paradise, nor Abraham's bosom to the Gentiles is evidence that they did not regard them as any proof of immortal beatitude.

11. In reply to your 19th paragraph, I remark that if I erred in conceding too little in regard to the figurative meaning of gehenna, I have erred in very good company. That the word is used literally and in its primary sense in Matt. v: 22, appears to have been the opinion of Drs. Parkhurst, Macknight, Rosenmuller, Heylen, Winne, Wakefield, and A. Clarke. See their notes, comments and illustrations of the passage—and their opinion that the punishment here threatened was burning alive in the literal valley of Hinnom. The above commentators happen to be on your side of the main question.

12. Your 20th paragraph being mostly quotations from the Bible, I am highly pleased with; and notwithstanding you take considerable pains to put in capitals and italics certain words and phrases, I see very little prospect of your being able thereby to make out your case. I would only inquire relative to the last passage quoted, if your definition of gehenna be correct, and it have the same meaning in all places, whether we are to understand James as saying that the tongue of his brethren was set on fire of endless misery, or everlasting punishment? Your 21st paragraph is a medley of truisms and assertions without argument, requiring no other answer than will be found in reply to the preceding and succeeding paragraphs.

13. I fully endorse all you say in your twenty-second paragraph, with all its et ceteras, et ceteras, excepting only the last sentence; and cordially maintain that "gehenna is contrasted with 'life and 'the kingdom of God,'" etc. "And now I ask [assert that] whatever is meant by entering into life, the very opposite of that is going into, or being cast into gehenna." Are you prepared to abide the issue? That "life," "entering into life," "passing from death unto life," "entering into the kingdom of God," "kingdom of heaven," etc., do not in the Scriptures generally signify future and eternal bliss, or entering into immortal beatitude, I think must be obvious to the most superficial of biblical critics. "I am the bread of life!"—"The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life." John vi: 35, 63. "He that heareth my word and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life." John v: 24. "The kingdom of God is come unto you." Matt. xii: 28. "For ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against men." Matt. xxiii: 13. See also Matt. xi: 12, and xviii: 1, 4. Luke xvii: 20, 21. John iii: 36; xi: 25; xvii: 3; xx: 31. Rom. xiv: 17. 1 John iii: 14; and parallels too numerous to name. That these and similar phrases, signify in general the Gospel dispensation, Messiah's reign, the joy and peace of believers, and the privileges of faith and hope therein, I think even you will not deny on further reflection. And so far from its being true that "all Christendom admits" that they denote "future and eternal bliss," the learned Dr. Hammond says—and with him agree the learned Lightfoot, Knatchbull, Wynne, Heylen, the Compilers of the Dutch Annotations, Poole's Continuations, and many other eminent critics on your side of the house—that the "phrase basileia ton ouranon, or tou theou, the kingdom of heaven, or of God, signifies in the New Testament, the kingdom of Messiah, or that state or condition which is a most lively image of that which we believe to be in heaven, and therefore called by that name." Now, Sir, if, as you say, going into or being cast into gehenna, is the very opposite of entering into the kingdom of God, entering into life, etc., as exhibited in the above quotations, it must mean, on your own premises, that mental and moral darkness and perplexity which the rejectors of the Gospel experienced, and the woes and calamities that befel them in consequence thereof. They have seen the Gentiles sitting down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of God, reclining in Abraham's bosom (or faith) and they themselves thrust out into everlasting punishment for nearly 1800 years since the destruction of their city—a condition "the very opposite" of that of every true believer. "For we which have believed, do enter into rest." Heb. iv: 3.

14. What you say in paragraph twenty-three, about considering the adjuncts of gehenna by way of substitution, as well as contrast, will be sufficiently answered by a few scriptural citations, where the same or still stronger phraseology is used respecting everlasting fire—fire that shall ne- ver be quenched," etc., and evidently applied to mere temporal things and punishments. "The fire shall ever be burning upon the altar; it shall never go out." Lev. v: 13. "A fire is kindled in my wrath, and shall burn unto the lowest hell." Deut. xxxii: 22. "It shall not be quenched night nor day: the smoke thereof shall go up forever: from generation to generation it shall lie waste; none shall pass through it forever and ever." Isa. xxxiv: 10. "For their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched; and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh." Isa. lxvi: 24. Now, Sir, I am confident you will not risk your reputation, as a scholar or theologian, by affirming that either of these texts refers to any thing beyond this state of being. Why, then, should you make an exception to the common scriptural import of similar phraseology, when found in connexion with gehenna? Is this your "Lynch-law of Theology?" If it be not a Lynch-law, it is surely an ex post facto law, of which the Scriptures and the Scripture writers knew nothing.

15. The unsupported assertions and swaggering assumptions of your twenty-fourth, thirtieth and thirty-first paragraphs, so ludicrously interlarded with the petitio principii, or begging of the question, together with your attempt at ridicule in your twenty-eighth, I need not notice. It is sufficient that I notice what bears the semblance of argument. Your hypercritical corrections of my grammar, as in the commencement of your twenty-seventh paragraph, where a singular verb is made to agree with one noun singular expressed in two languages, and numerous other examples of the same disposition in your letters, I shall hereafter pay no attention to, though I have in a few instances followed your example, as a mere caveat to you.

16. When your twenty-fifth paragraph is reduced in "my crucible" to its legitimate quantum, and tried by the "canons of logic and philosophy," I find nothing of it—at least nothing that is applicable to this discussion.

17. What you say in the close of your twenty-sixth paragraph, is not true, if Jesus the true prophet spake truly, and authentic historians are to be believed. For instead of "escaping the punishment of gehenna in the heaven of Universalism," upon that generation of unbelieving Jews came the righteous retributions that had been for ages accumulating, and they endured the full measure of the damnation of hell, or gehenna punishment. See Matt. xxi: 41-44; xxiii: 35, 36; xxiv: 15, 21, 34; Luke xiii: 28; and Josephus' account of the destruction of Jerusalem.

18. In your twenty-seventh paragraph, you speak of my "Lynch-law of theology." But, Sir, I leave it to our readers to say whether my definition of hades, and the use I made of the text, (the subject of your complaint,) was any thing near as Lynch-like as your gross perversion and misrepresentation of my definition in that very paragraph. If the reader will consult again my second and third definitions of sheol and hades, he will perceive that my version of Psalm ix: 17, was, "The wicked shall experience severe judgments, great afflictions, sudden temporal destruction," and perhaps also "a distressing sense of guilt, remorse of conscience, great mental anguish." Let us have, then, no more of this wilful perversion. You, Sir, had given your definition of hades, and then quoted Ps. ix: 17, not merely as an example of your sense, but you attempted to make your readers believe that Universalists always explained sheol or hades in this text, to mean the grave. I gave my definition, and, to disabuse our readers of that false imputation, cited and explained the same text and several others, in the different senses in which the word sheol, or hades, was used. And you have made no effort to prove my definition or version incorrect; but accuse me of adopting the "Lynch-law of theology," merely for disabusing our readers of your false insinuation!

19. That the fable you give in your twenty-ninth paragraph, is a spurious version, will appear evident from these facts: God said to Adam, "the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." The serpent said to Eve, "ye shall not surely die." Now Universalists believe that Adam did die the very death that was threatened, and on the very day of transgression. But my good friend, Mr. Campbell, does not believe it. He thinks the death there threatened, was eternal death—that Adam not only did not die the threatened death then, but never will—that though all mankind are threatened with it, they shall not all surely die—that it is even possible for all to escape it, if they will. He therefore thinks that God was mistaken, and the serpent told the truth. So it appears that his "sooty majesty" was not merely "a graduate" but principal professor in the school whence he and his brethren "of like precious faith" graduated. It is true that Universalism was preached in the Garden, but by a very different Professor. It was preached in the declaration that "the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head."

20. In your next I shall expect something bearing the semblance of proof in favor of your positions, or in answer to the arguments contained in my February letter. The proof sheet of this will be mailed for you on the 21st inst.

Very respectfully and sincerely yours,

D. SKINNER.

RELIGION.

BY MISS SARAH C. EDGARTON.

Maiden, thou art beautiful as a rose of June! Thy brow, fair as the crusted snow, when the moonlight falls shadowless over it, would seem the shrine of pure and holy thoughts. Wit, that diamond-pointed weapon, that wounds like a serpent's tongue, steals from thy coral lips, fraught with music and enchantment. But religion—that pearl so pure, so lovely, that the eye can gaze upon it, undazzled, forever—where, oh! where is that seen? That which should be the moonlight of thy soul—so holy and serene in its beauty, as to hallow every deed of thy life—so clear and glorious in its light as to make all thy starry graces dim—so celestial in its origin, so eternal in its irradiation, as to be superior to the influences of earth and time, shedding brightness upon thy pathway forever and forever!

"But I cannot relinquish all the sweet joys, the gentle gaieties, the beautiful pastimes of life," sayest thou. "There will be time for piety, when these are past, and age and sorrow have come."

Dear one! continue still that merry smile, that glad-hearted tone, and if so thou wilt, that guileless nonsense—we chide thee not for these; they are the mere bubbles upon the water; but far, far down in its crystal depths, there let shine the radiant pearl, whose lustre shall brighten the hidden abyss, as well as the visible surface—that shall make the current of thy life clear and unsullied meet to mingle with "the pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb!"

GRATITUDE.

Is there any thing within the ken of man, from which we derive more heaven-born satisfaction, than the exercise of gratitude? There may be—but the intrinsic value of this pearl of humanity, constrains us to cry out, "How great are thy riches, O Lord of hosts!" When all the grosser passions are subdued by the ravishing hand of sickness—when kind and tender friends in their attentions and anxieties, make our minds soar above the paroxysms of pain, which would otherwise be beyond endurance—then it is that gratitude is felt and appreciated—then it is that it appears, and, as it were with the hand of a guardian angel, pays debts that all the gold of Ophir and diamonds of Golconda can never cancel—creates a Paradise within, as calm and peaceful as the bosom of innocence. Let us cherish, then, this heavenly principle, which, like love, is felt though not seen, and which, like that, too, never fails to yield a plentiful harvest in due season. Let us realize that gratitude, whether in the peasant or the king, whether directed towards an earthly or a heavenly benefactor, is one of the most fruitful sources of felicity, to which the mind of man is allowed access.

ANECDOTE.

A Methodist, who lately attended a Universalist meeting, probably for the first time in his life, (except perhaps on some funeral occasion,) heard some things rather too good for him to believe. A few days after, falling in company with one of our sisters, (who was present at the meeting, and who also had attended meeting with him a few days previous, where he worshipped,) he made some invidious remarks about the preaching, and having no better weapon at hand, he resorted to ridicule. "Such stuff I never heard—no preaching at all—I should starve to death on such preaching," etc. Our sister not being able, always, to explain her views, when encountered by the unreasonableness of a superstitious Methodist, at last replied—"Well, if hearing the Gospel preached will starve you—if the good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people, that God will have all men to be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth—if preaching the goodness of God to all his creatures will starve you, you may starve. It do n't starve me—I rejoice to hear it—it is feasting to me. But I can tell you what starves me—to go to such a meeting as we attended the other Sunday, where the fire and brimstone flies thick enough to choke a person—that's what starves me!" RURAL.

MINISTERIAL LABOR AND SUPPORT.

PREFATORY.—I have long desired to offer some remarks on these subjects, but have waited in expectation that some one better able would do it for me. Delicacy requires me to conceal my name, while candor obliges me to state my profession. I feel justified in the former, as I write for the benefit of my ministering brethren generally, and not only for their benefit, but for that of their congregations, and of the cause which is dear to the heart of every Universalist.

By ministerial labor, I mean, not only the composition and delivery of sermons, but every other duty, from the vocation of his people, to his example in private life—in all of which he is to advance the cause of the Redeemer of the world. And by ministerial support, I would be understood to mean, all the countenance, encouragement and aid, pecuniary and other, which is properly due from a congregation to its preacher. Many important and injurious errors on these subjects, exist among Universalists—some of them quite superstitious—the removal of which will revive many languishing, supply destitute, strengthen feeble, and rebuild waste societies—causing the barren places in our Zion to blossom and bring forth abundantly with joy and singing. By their removal, also, many fainting preachers will be encouraged, and others, who desire to enter the ministry, but hesitate from prudential considerations, will be encouraged to enter upon their desired and desirable labors.

The numbers I may furnish will be few in number—being confined to those subjects which most need public notice.—I lost a long series on a subject not very entertaining, might weary the patience of my readers—and will be as brief as possible, to the end that they may be more generally read, and easily remembered.

FREE INQUIRERS.

Messrs. EDITORS.—If I am not mistaken, the motto over the columns of one of the infidel newspapers is, "He that will not reason, is a bigot; he that can not reason, is a fool; and he that dare not reason, is a slave."

In reply to the challenge of Rev. Robert W. Landis, to the Editors of the New-York Beacon, the Boston Investigator, and the Temple of Reason, to open their columns to a discussion of the merits of Taylor's Digesis, Mr. Kneeland says, "We must decline the above challenge." Is this to be understood as a practical comment on the above motto, or is it only another specimen of atheistical

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, D. SKINNER, AND S. R. SMITH, EDITORS.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JULY 28, 1837.

"SOCIETY IN AMERICA."

Miss Martineau, the author of these two volumes, has long been known as a highly gifted, strong-minded, and fearless writer on theology, political economy, and other subjects. Her "Times of the Saviour," has probably had a larger circulation in America, than any other of her numerous writings—next to that, perhaps, her "Prize Essays," (theological,) and tales illustrative of Political Economy—in the latter of which, the principles of "free trade" are carried out, and ably as well as beautifully illustrated. It is therefore not at all astonishing that her new work on our own country, should have been anxiously looked for, and when published, be generally talked of, if not read. And this anxiety was undoubtedly increased, by the previous information that the principal publishers in our country refused to publish it, out of fear (!) of the South, because (to use a common phrase) she "handled slavery without gloves on." Having found, or at least taken time to read it very hastily, I have marked a few brief extracts from those portions of it which treat on religious subjects, and which I believe will be interesting if not instructive, and pleasing to those of our readers who may not see the work itself.

It may be proper here to state, for the information of those who intend purchasing the work, that it is not a journal of her travels, (save a few sketches, here and there, intermingled with the other portions,) but rather a series of essays on the politics, political parties, apparatus of government, morals of politics, general economy, agriculture, transports and markets, manufactures, commerce, morals of slavery, manufactures and commerce, civilization, ideas of honor, the condition of women and children, the suffering classes, freedom of opinion, and on religion, its science, spirit and administration in this country. She is what would in England be termed a radical on these subjects—insisting on bringing the principles of democracy into immediate practice in every thing. She may be deemed an ultraist in general, and probably is deemed ultra on some particular or other, by a large majority of our countrymen. Her abolitionism she avows boldly, and paints slavery in the Southern states, in its darkest colors—both as it affects the individual, social, public, moral, religious or political—the agricultural or commercial condition of either the South or the North, of the slave and the free-man, or of the white or the colored population. Her opinions she enforces by facts as she witnessed, and conversations as she heard them, and squares off the whole with the natural fraternity, freedom and equality of man as taught in the Bible, as recognized in the declaration of independence, and in the various Bills of Rights and Constitutions of the land. And however the reader may differ from her, (and there are but very few that will not differ from her in some respects,) I think he will be pleased with the unreserve with which she avows the most startling opinions in religion and politics—and with the simplicity with which she advances them, as if she had not the most distant idea that any would take offence at their avowal, or deem her the worse for holding them.

One thing is singular, (though easily accounted for from the fact, that being a woman, and deaf, she was obliged to place herself under the care and direction of others—and that, too, of Unitarians probably, with whom, from her own religious profession, she was best acquainted,) and that is, she does not appear ever to have learned that there was a rapidly increasing denomination in this country, called Universalists—a denomination greater in numbers, even now, than the declining sects of Episcopalians, Quakers, Lutherans, Moravians, Tunkers, and some others—all of whom she names, while Universalists are not even so much as hinted at, that I can learn. This may seem the more remarkable, when it is understood that she does not hesitate to avow and defend her faith in universal salvation—a doctrine which is not held by any but the last named of the above denominations, and only secretly by that one!

In regard to our country and its institutions, I deem her the most candid and friendly (even though she has erred in some particulars) of all the foreigners who have yet commented on them—praising heartily and with pleasure what is really worthy—condemning frankly what she deems amiss, and censuring with severity our departures from the principles on which they are based. What more can we ask? Certain editors find fault with her for finding fault with us—thus doing what they blame her for doing, and rendering themselves ridiculous, instead of profiting by her plain-spoken friendship. For no one can read her book and not see that she is eminently friendly to the mass of the people, and wholly, fully imbued with a love of freedom and equality—and consequently partial to our country, its principles of government, and the majority of its institutions. But as I did not sit down to defend, but briefly to review the work; and as national matters are not my province, (though Universalism is essentially as republican in its principles,) I will here drop the subject.

To conclude—the poetic mind will find many a gem of feeling, grace and beauty, scattered abroad in this work; and however unpalatable may be her strictures—yea, even however false some of them may be—I believe their perusal may do good, if attended to. Certainly I do not feel disposed to quarrel, because in many respects I differ from her. And should females ever be allowed the right of suffrage and representation, as she contends for, and she become a citizen of this country, I had as lief see her at Albany in office, as some who now annually represent us there!

A. B. G.

PRAYER.

The questions are often asked by the devout, or by the captious, and the skeptical, or both, "Why should men pray to God? Can prayer change immutability? or alter the counsels or purposes of the Most High? or render him propitious and forgiving who is naturally stern and inflexible? or induce him to do better for us than he is otherwise inclined to do? Do not the idea and the general practice of praying to him, plainly imply that he is mutable, or at least susceptible of being wrought upon by his dependent and suppliant creature? If not, of what possible use can prayer be? Or how can it be our duty to pray to God?"

On the foregoing and all similar questions on this subject, we remark, that they are evidently founded either in misapprehension of the nature and objects of prayer, or in the desire of palliating or excusing the neglect of prayer, or on a captious, quorulous, and unjustifiable spirit in those who propound them.

Now, so far from its being the object or expectation of enlightened Christians to alter the mind or change the purposes of the Almighty—or so far from the impression that he is immutable and cannot be changed by our prayers and supplications, operating to deter us from praying to him—the very reverse of this is the fact. If we supposed that there was the least possibility of altering the mind or changing the purposes of Deity by prayer, we should never dare to attempt the service of prayer; we should never venture to lift our heart or voice in petitions and supplications to him; and for this reason: we now believe God is infinitely good—as good as he possibly can be—that all his purposes and all his dispensations, are as wisely, as righteously, as benevolently arranged and ordained as infinite wisdom could devise, infinite power and justice execute, and infinite goodness and grace prompt. Believing, therefore, that God is too wise to err, too merciful to be unkind, and that all things are ordered in the best possible manner, it would be presumptuous, irreverent, and unrighteous in us to wish to alter his purposes or dispensations; as they could not be altered for the better, but, if altered at all, must be for the worse. Hence, whenever we pray, we should pray in accordance with the known will of God, whenever that will is known; if not known to us, we should pray (from the full conviction that his will cannot be wrong) "not our wills, but thine, O God, be done"—"Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

But the question will again recur, If we neither hope nor expect to change the Deity by prayer, why pray to him at all? We answer, not to alter God, but ourselves; not to draw him away from his purposes, but ourselves into conformity therewith—not to bend him down to our frailties, but to lift ourselves up towards his perfections. By prayer, deep, heartfelt, solemn prayer to God, we catch, as it were, the inspiration of the Almighty, and our souls are lifted up to heaven—abstracted from the frailties of earth, the toys and bubbles of time and sense—drawn out in the contemplation of all that is lovely and sublime, all that is amiable and glorious, all that is beautiful and excellent—and thus by the view and contemplation of the greatest and best of all beings—by sweet and heavenly communion with him, are we in a measure conformed into his divine likeness, and made partakers of his blessed spirit. And when we go out into the world, amid its trials and temptations, with his divine image, and the impress of his purity and goodness in our hearts, still bearing with us the spirit of prayer and devotion, we cannot but derive incalculable benefits and consolations therefrom.

In health and prosperity prayer keeps us near God, and consequently humble and sensible of our dependence on him—it makes us feel that all we have and are, belong to him—that he bestowed all, and therefore it becomes us to be grateful for his goodness and mercy, and to improve the blessings he has sent us to his honor and the good of our fellow-men, thus using these things as not abusing them.

In sickness and adversity, prayer is the balm and solace of the heart. It keeps us near God, who is "the health of our countenance," our "high tower," and the "rock of our defence." Do earthly friends forsake or prove treacherous? Here is a Friend that will never forsake nor leave us, nor ever prove unfaithful to those who trust in him. The devout poor man feels that in God is his portion, his everlasting inheritance; and here he has untold and exhaustless riches, where neither moth nor rust can corrupt, and where thieves break not through, nor steal. The mourner feels while in prayer, that in God is rich and everlasting consolation. The dying man feels while his heart is drawn out in prayer to God, that, though he dies, he shall live again, for in God is his life, his salvation, and his all.

Prayer is the appropriate food of the Christian. Without it, his spiritual life languishes, and he grows poor, and by degrees faints and dies—he can not live without prayer. Prayer is, therefore, not merely a duty, but the high and inestimable privilege of every devout soul. The spiritual life can no more be sustained without prayer, than the natural life can without natural food.

Again, prayer may, like hope, be compared to an anchor. Let the anchor of a boat be cast on shore; it would not draw the shore to the boat, but the boat to the shore. Let the anchor of a ship be cast to the bottom of the haven; it attaches the ship to the bottom, and not the bottom to the ship. So prayer draws the soul to God, and fixes it there, instead of drawing God down and fixing him to the soul. The anchor of prayer, as well as hope, "enters into that within the veil, whither the forerunner hath for us entered, even Jesus, who is made an high priest forever, after the order of Melchisedec."

Reader, neglect not the offering of thy vows to the Most High, nor deem it a useless or vain service to pray to the Almighty. Thou art needy, he is bountiful; thou art altogether dependent on him for life and breath and all things; he is ready to bestow on thee every needed good. Is it not, therefore, right and proper that thou shouldst feel and express thy dependence on him, and ask him for those things which thou needest and his wisdom sees proper to bestow? He has appointed prayer as the medium through which to bestow many and great spiritual blessings on thy soul—that is the medium appointed by him whereby thou mayest become acquainted with him, and be at peace. Say not, then, in thy heart, "Depart from us, for we desire not the knowledge of thy ways. What is the Almighty, that we should serve him? and what profit should we have, if we pray unto him?"* The service of prayer is not intended either to benefit or change the Almighty, but to benefit and improve the heart and life and happiness of those who wait on him in the way of his appointment. Therefore, "pray without ceasing; in every thing give thanks," and be thou, like Cornelius of old, "a devout man," "giving much alms," and "praying to God always."†

PHRENOLOGY.

By the special request of an eminent medical gentleman of this city, I have selected from a great many others, the following recommendations of this delightful and interesting science. The reader will see that if we poor Phrenologists are in an error, we have at least very respectable company in our folly—clergymen, philosophers, and physicians without number—the most eminent, too, of their respective professions.

Among the recommendations of those not here published, are those of Broussais, Professor of the Faculty of Medicine of Paris.

Dr. Casimir Broussais, Physician and Professor to the Val de-Grace Agrégé and Professeur Suppléant d'Hygiène to the faculty of Medicine of Paris, member of several learned societies and Vice President of the Phrenological Society of Paris.

Dr. Fossati—President of the Phrenological Society of Paris; member of several learned societies, formerly Clinical Professor and Director of several Italian Hospitals.

M. Bouillaud—Professor of Clinical Medicine to the faculty of Paris.

M. Julius Cloquet—Professor to the Faculty of Medicine of Paris, and Surgeon to the Hospital of St. Louis.

M. Sanson (Ainé) Surgeon of the Hotel-Dieu, Paris. M. Peltier—President of the Society of Natural Sciences, and member of the Philomathetic Society.

Dr. Ferrus—Physician to the Hospital of Bicêtre; Professor of Clinical Medicine of the Diseases of the Nervous System, etc.

Dr. Joseph Vimont—of the Faculty of Paris, Honorary Member of the Phrenological Societies of London, Edinburgh, Boston, etc., and Author of a "Treatise on Human and Comparative Phrenology."

Dr. Gaubert—Ex-Professor of the University of France, Knight of the Royal Order of the Legion of Honor, Principal Editor of the Journal of the Phrenological Society of Paris, Member of the Anthropological Society, etc.

M. Dumontier—Anatomical Assistant to the Faculty of Medicine of Paris, and Honorary Member of several learned Societies.

Dr. Felix Voisin—of the Faculty of Paris, Physician to several Hospitals of that city, Founder of the Establishment at Vanvres for the Treatment of the Insane, and Founder of the Orthopneic Establishment.

Dr. John Elliotson, F. R. S. President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical, and of the London Phrenological Societies; Professor of the principles and practice of Medicine, and of Clinical Medicine, and Dean of the Faculty, in the University of London; Senior Physician of the North London Hospital; Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians of London; formerly Physician to St. Thomas' Hospital and President of the Royal Medical Society of Edinburgh, etc., etc.

From Dr. Whately, Archbishop of Dublin, late Principal of St. Alban's Hall and Fellow of Oriel College, Oxford—who, by his works on Logic and Rhetoric, has established a right to be regarded as the highest British authority on the subject.

"I am convinced that even if all connection of the brain with mind were regarded not merely as doubtful, but as a perfect chimera, still the treatises of many phrenological writers, and especially yours, (Mr. Coube) would be of great value, from their employing a metaphysical nomenclature far more logical, accurate, and convenient, than Locke, Stewart, and other writers of their schools."

"That the religious and moral objections against the Phrenological theory are utterly futile, I have from the first been clearly convinced."

From the Hon. Judge Crampton, formerly Fellow and Professor of Law in Trinity College, Dublin.

"I can have no hesitation in stating my conviction, that, in the present advanced state of mental philosophy, an adequate knowledge of Phrenology will be found to be a most useful, I had almost said a necessary qualification for a Professor of Logic and Metaphysics, as it is, I am sure a most valuable assistant to the medical practitioner in his treatment of insane and nervous patients, and to the school master in his education of youth."

From J. P. Nicholls, Esq., Professor of practical Astronomy in the University of Glasgow.

"I am acquainted with no work relating to Moral Philosophy, from the perusal of which so much pleasure and benefit may be reaped, as from a careful dispassionate study of 'The Constitution of Man.' It unfolds views, novel in most respects, concerning the character and right treatment of the mind, which are already obtaining wide currency and acceptance in society, and preparing more rapidly than has been usual with discoveries in this field, a large increase of happiness for mankind."

Extract from the discourse of Professor Andral, whom Medical men recognize as the greatest Pathologist of the age, President of the Phrenological Society of Paris; delivered at the Annual Meeting, in April, 1836. Published in the "Journal de la Societe" Phrenologique de Paris—April, 1836.

"In all that I have said, Gentlemen, I have had but one aim, and it is—to prove that the science of which Gall is the founder, and which is known by the name of Phrenology, must henceforward be included among the grave and serious studies of Physiology." "It has the great fault of being younger than those it claims to enlighten; but let it alone, and it will throw all obstacles behind it with marvellous force. The earth did not become immoveable, like the sun round which it gravitates, because three or four centuries ago, Galileo was forbidden to declare that it moved; and the circulation of the blood was not arrested by its being obstinately denied, for many years subsequent to the labors of Harvey."

From the Rev. David Welch, D. D. Professor of Church History in the University of Edinburgh.

"I have found the greatest benefit from the science as a minister of the Gospel. I have been led to study the evidences of Christianity anew, in connexion with Phrenology; and I feel my confidence in the truth of our holy religion increased by this new examination. I have examined the doctrines of our church also, one by one, in connexion with Phrenology; and have found the most wonderful harmony subsisting between them. And in dealing with my people in the ordinary duties of my calling, the practical benefit I have derived from Phrenology is inestimable."

The last, I confess, is rather a poser to me, if the Rev. Dr. holds among other "doctrines of our Church," that of total depravity, and endless misery; unless he supposes that the Deity has conferred on his children moral sentiments at utter variance with his own "vindictive justice." However, let it pass—these Partialist Doctors of Divinity have a queer way of understanding the creeds of their church one way, even while the letter conveys a totally opposite meaning.

POETRY.

THE THREE SCEPTRES.

A VISION.

"Bring forth the sceptres of command!"

That awful voice I heard—

"And let the subject nations stand!"

The waiting world appeared.

Then drew the sceptre-bearers nigh,

Old Asia, first, crept cowering by;

Next Europe, with her troubling eye;

Then young America:

Each placed her sceptre, passed; and then,

Unveiled before the sons of men,

A Sword, a Crozier, and a Pen

'Upon the altar lay.

Again the voice uprose, and loud

Like battle-cry it came.

And wildly, from that heaving crowd,

Echoed the shout—"For Fame!"

Brother 'gainst brother fiercely stood,

The earth was graves, the rivers blood—

Kingdoms were crushed, as vasting flood

Had swept o'er crumbling clay,—

Till, 'mid the din, a dove appeared!

The heavenly tone of "Peace!" was heard—

I looked, and, with that gentle word,

The Sword had passed away!

Then like a storm of ashes hurled

From the volcano's height,

A thick, dark cloud rolled o'er the world,

Blotting Mind's blessed light—

And men sunk down, in utter dread;

Mailed warriors, weak as infants tread.

And monarchs, with uncovered head,

Strooped low the cowl before;

And Superstition's iron reign

Has seared the heart, and shrunk the brain—

Ha!—Thought's strong grasp has rent the chain;—

The Crozier's sway is o'er.

Pure as the light on altar glows,

Lit up by prophet's prayer,

Small, soft steady light arose,

On earth, on sea, and air;

It shines as shed from seraph's wings,

Withering all vile, old useless things—

Like scorched flax from the cusp of kings

The reigns of empire sever;

It burns from Craft his mask of night.

Intemperance blasts with perfect light.

And show the Ethiop's soul is white,—

"The Pen—the Pen forever!"

Thus rang the voice—its trumpet tone

Burst like a swelling river;

From land to land went sounding on,

"The Pen—the Pen forever!"

I saw earth's joyous millions move,

Justice their shield, their banner love,—

While Freedom's eagle, high above,

Soared with unslumbering eye.

Hot springs gushed forth mid arid sands,

Bright flowers sprung up in desert lands.

And bands of peace, from angel hands,

Linking earth and sky.

THE TEST OF BENEVOLENCE.

A SHORT AND TRUE STORY.

"The hand that wiped away the tear of want,

The heart that melted at another's woe,

Were his, and blessings followed him."

David Wentworth had the kindest of hearts. There was neither meanness nor bound to his benevolence, except mobility. And happy was any man who had a title of the prayers that were offered up for the welfare of my friend, by the unfortunate and wretched whom his hand of prayers—for it was the only reward he obtained; and of course the only reward he obtained; I mean here—but I forget.

David was paying attention to an excellent young lady of his native city. She was wealthy, beautiful, and accomplished, and consequently had many suitors. Among them were richer, and nobler (in extraction I mean), and handsomer than David, but n'importe, there was a kind of frank-hearted, straight-forwardness, about my friend, that could not fail to carry him somewhere near the heart of his discerning mistress, even if an emperor had been his rival.

The young lady in question hit upon a project to put the characters of her lovers to a test. She had come her benevolent excursions, and the idea occurred to her that it would be a good opportunity to ascertain the stuff her lovers' hearts were made of. Letters were forthwith indited, setting forth the good woman's tale, and forwarded to the different gentlemen in the widow's name, requesting an answer and assistance.

The first reply was a lecture on idleness and begging, and concluded with the information that the writer was not accustomed to give to those he did not know. This was from $10,000 a year! The second advised her to apply to some of the benevolent societies whose duty it was to relieve those who were truly in want. This was from one who had a great reputation for benevolence—who had taken a leading part in several charitable associations, and whose pharisaical liberality had been blazoned in the Gazette. The lady thought that, interested as he was in the success of these institutions, he displayed a very commendable reluctance about taking the business out of their hands. A third from a good hearted and generous kind of a fellow—enclosed her a $5 bill with his compliments. Several took no notice of the good woman's petition. But there was another answer which the lady read with far different feelings. It was from David—from $500 a year—and I need not say, like himself kind and consoling. It spoke of the writer's narrow means, and also of the principle he had adopted, of never giving unless persuaded of the worthiness of the object, and concluded by requesting an interview.—"If," said he, "I find myself otherwise unable to afford the assistance you require, I trust I may be of service in interesting others in your behalf."

Nor was this profession. For it was but a few weeks before the widow found herself comfortably located, and engaged in a thriving little business, commenced by the recommendation, and carried on by the aid of my friend. And all this was done in genuine Scripture style.—There was no sounding of trumpets—and the right hand knew not the doings of the left. But his lady-love was a silent observer of his conduct, and he received many a kind glance from that quarter, of which he little suspected the cause. She began to think that the homage of a spirit like his was a thing not to be despised; and she felt something very much like a palpitation of the heart, as she questioned herself respecting his intention.

Such was the train of thought which was one evening, as is often the case, interrupted by a call from the very person who had been its cause. Hour after hour passed by that night, and still David lingered. He could not tear himself away. "She is a most fascinating creature," thought he, "and good as she is beautiful.—Can she ever be mine? And a cloud came over his features and he sat for a moment in silence. "This suspense must be ended," he at length thought. He started as the clock told eleven.

"You will certainly think me insufferably tedious," said he, with a faint smile, "but I have been so pleasantly engaged as to think no more of time. And the sin of this trespass upon the rules of good breeding, must lie at your door. Besides, I have lengthened this visit," he continued after a pause, "under the apprehension that as it has been the happiest, it might also be the last, it shall ever be my good fortune to enjoy with Miss H."

The lady looked at him with some surprise. "Nay," said he, "the matter rests with yourself.—Will you forgive my presumption? I know that others, perhaps more worthy of you, at least nobler and wealthier and higher in the world's esteem, are striving for the honor of your hand. And yet I cannot restrain myself from making an avowal, which, though it may be futile it is yet but a deserved tribute to your worth." And he popped the question.

The lady did not swoon nor turn pale. But a flush of gratification passed over her face, and lighted his eye for a moment.

She frankly gave him her hand and looked up archly in his face. "The friend of the fatherless and widow," said she, (David blushed) "can not fail to make a constant lover and a worthy husband."

DEATHS.

In Baldwinsville, Onondaga county, N. Y., on the 13th inst., of pulmonary consumption, Mr. HIX TABER, in the 49th year of his age. In the death of Mr. Taber, community has sustained the loss of one of its worthiest and best members. He was an honest peaceable, and industrious citizen, and fully maintained this character in all the various intercourse of life. He died as he had lived, a firm believer in the doctrine of God's impartial grace. Throughout a tedious illness of several months, he manifested the utmost resignation to the will of his heavenly Father, and at the same time seemed to enjoy a living faith in Christ, as the Saviour of the world.—A few days previous to his death, he testified to the writer of this, his unwavering confidence in the goodness of God, and his joyful hope of the ultimate purity, and consequent happiness of the whole family of man. He sweetly fell asleep in Jesus, without a struggle or a groan. He left an affectionate wife, and ten children, together with a large circle of friends, to mourn his loss. His funeral was attended at the Presbyterian church in this village on the 14th, and a sermon preached on the occasion, by Elder E. Morill of the Christian denomination, from 2 Corinthians, v: 1.

Baldwinsville, June 20, 1837.

J. M. C.

In Lockport, Jefferson county, N. Y., July 8th, Capt. LEVI BUTTERFIELD, aged 75 years. He has left his aged companion and a numerous train of children and grand children to mourn the loss of his society. But oh, how enviable is their condition when compared with that of those who mourn without hope, or even with those who have a faint hope, yet mingled with a thousand fears.

In the life of this good man have been exemplified both the purifying and the happy influences of Universalism. He embraced the doctrine at the age of about sixteen, without having seen an advocate, or read any book in its favor, except the Bible. His father, a thorough going Presbyterian, spared no pains in teaching the catechism to his children.—One day after repeating those answers which contain the doctrines of foreordination, election, and reprobation, Levi said to his father, "If this be true, then he that does evil serves God as well as he that does good." His father with a frowning eye and an indignant voice called him "Block-head." Such were the teachings that led him thus early to the knowledge of the truth.

His faith was unwavering, his piety was ardent and his devotional feelings unusually warm—and though reproached by bigots because he "trusted in the living God who is the Saviour of all men," yet the high esteem in which he was held by the community at large, was evinced by a numerous sympathizing congregation, who assembled on the 10th, to pay their last tribute of respect to his remains, and mingle their tears with those of the weeping relatives. Sermon by J. FRENCH.

In compliance with the desires of the friends, I would accompany this sketch with a notice of the death of CLARINDA B., daughter of the above, who died several years since at the age of 12 years.—Under the influence of her father's teachings she had embraced that doctrine which gives joy in life, and peace in the hour of death. She was calm and resigned—begged her friends not to weep for her, for she was going to a better world. She selected the hymn to be sung at her funeral, and requested that Br. P. Morse should preach the sermon.

J. F.

In Oswego, Oswego county, June 1st, 1837, ASA FRANKLIN, youngest son of Ira Reynolds, in the 3d year of his age. The flower budded on earth, was plucked by death, and now blooms in heaven. The funeral was attended by the writer, and a discourse delivered on the occasion from 2d Cor. v: 1.

T. D. COOK.

In Salina, July 11th, Miss AUGUSTA RICE daughter of James J. Rice, aged 18 years. Seldom has one been mourned, who was more esteemed for her amiable disposition, pure morals, correct deportment, and strong intellectual powers. To these she added a deep piety, and warm devotion to her God and her Saviour, which enabled her to bear with Christian fortitude the severe pains of a long illness, and to meet death without a fear. The funeral was attended by Br. Woolley of Cazenovia.

OCCASIONAL SERMON.

Delivered before the Otsego Association of Universalists, at Burlington Flats, June 28, 1837.

BY REV. T. J. SMITH.

"For none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself." Romans xiv: 7.

Your humble servant, as the chosen organ of communication on this occasion, feels the full weight of embarrassment attached to his situation, and fain would transfer his task to more experienced and abler hands. Not that he would shrink from the duties of a servant—but he must ever tread with a cautious and trembling step every new and untried path. He is well aware that apology cannot lessen duty, nor atone for a lack of experience and ability in the performance of that duty, he therefore offers none, but throws himself on the charity and candor of his auditors—trusting that they will do justice to his intentions, even if it should be their lot to deplore his weakness—promising only, to the extent of his limited abilities, to do the best his circumstances will allow.—Therefore, with due respect, your attention is called to the feeble remarks he is about to offer on the words of St. Paul, found recorded in the 14th chapter of Romans, 7th verse—"For none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself."

The obvious doctrine of this passage may be held in dispute by many men, and utterly denied by others, while, at the same time, it is daily lived in the world. There is so much apparent selfishness with men—so much seeming self-interest manifest among the various classes of community, that many men honestly believe they live for themselves alone, and believe likewise, that the same principle actuates the multitude, from the cradle to the grave. This conviction, we believe, has not been gained by a proper and careful attention or consideration of themselves—not by consulting their own experience and searching deep for the secret-springs of their actions, or analyzing the motives of their own conduct,—but rather by a superficial observation of the minds and manners of other men.—Intent on trying to trace the cause, men have often neglected to follow the effect. They have looked to the action, and to the apparent motive of that action, but here their observation was withdrawn and the varied and manifold effects flowing from one single deed, have not been sought in all their intricate windings. Or, if they endeavored to keep pace through successive gradations of cause and effect, the disappearing of the one into the form of the other, thwarted their powers, until that which was particular and distinct became blended under one general head. With many minds the influence of an action ceases when that action is performed, nor beyond the moving cause have they been accustomed to look for any material influence or effect. Hence many effects have been veiled in obscurity, and disconnected with adequate causes, or else resolved into general principles without the proper marks of division and distinction.

Observation is often of a general and not of a particular nature—actions are classed, but not individually considered in all their bearings and effects upon human society. For illustration, we refer to one case out of thousands that might be named—to the intemperate man. He may be looked upon with pain, and pitied as a ruined man—as lost to all that makes life pleasing and good—and considered as a lone individual, disconnected with the weal or woe of his fellow-men, while the evil influence of his habits too often are left entirely out of the account. Community are very apt to view him distinct from the effects of his loathing conduct—to see the man alone, while they pass by the immediate or remote influence which flows from his fallen state, as though that influence, misery and disgrace, must rest alone on its author. He reels the streets before their eyes—a bloated face, a haggard look and a wretched form, too often only excite a smile of contempt or awakens feelings of disgust for him who lays aside the dignity of man. But his wretched appearance, loathing as it is, is only a part—as it were, but a starting point in the course of misery. And however plain it may seem to thousands, that the reward of his evil doings will result upon himself alone, and there the error of his ways will be stayed, yet this is far from being true. However abandoned and despised of men—there is still some connecting link that binds him to his kindred and kind—some bosom that swells with a nobler sentiment than pity—left to grieve in secret over his wayward sin—left to bathe the couch with tears! Even while the world may scoff, scorn, deride, abiding love will temper the feelings of some kindred heart. Perhaps a companion in a worse than widowed state, with her helpless children, is left without the necessary means of life, to deplore a husband's excessive dissipation.

Nor is the want and misery brought upon immediate connexions, the whole extent of that influence, which flows from the intemperance of one individual. Beside the want, the shame and reproach heaped upon these, and the misery entailed upon the rising generation, there is an influence imparted to community which they must feel—an example given which many others may follow to their own ruin. However solitary may be the case, it nevertheless will and must have its influence in society—like the waters set in motion by some moving cause, its influence will not cease till the whole mass has felt its effects.—When we analyze this one case, we see its plainest marks from the beginning to the end. The love of money may tempt the vender to satisfy the vitiated taste of the inebriate; and he, in turn tempted to satisfy an unnatural appetite created by excessive indulgence, quaffs the poisonous draught; which, in turn undermines his health and constitution, and unfits him for the ordinary business of life—his family are left destitute—shame and reproach are thrown over their reputations—community more or less feel the effects—their charities too often are solicited to supply the needy—and when he is no more, they are called upon to pay the charge of their living.—Thus it is, in many cases, while in others, language would only beggar description. From this cause, numbers of untrained, uncultivated and headstrong youth are let loose upon society to prey upon its vitals—disturbing the otherwise quiet repose of the virtuous and peaceable with thefts and darker crimes, till that community which has nursed them like vipers in its bosom, and long been annoyed with their evil deeds, at great trouble and expense removes them to the penitentiary for safe keeping.

This is one case of evil-doing, and only one—a fragment, as it were, from the mountain of iniquity and transgression—neither the greatest nor the least that might be named, yet this learns us a lesson. It teaches us that however much the intemperate man may think he lives for himself alone, or how falsely community speculate on the limited effects of his beastly conduct, yet his or their bounds will be overflowed, and the result prove such calculations visionary and unfounded. By reasoning minutely, and tracing the varied actions of men through their immediate and remote effects, the subject will appear in a far different light.

Still we are not prepared to say that there is no selfishness in the world, for we believe there is, though there may be a much smaller amount than is generally supposed. It is not our object to disprove the existence of selfishness, but rather, that however limited to self many actions may appear, they nevertheless affect others beside the actor. And this appears to us to be the plain teachings of the text—"For none of us liveth to himself." Hence, the question is not whether men mean to be selfish, or live for themselves; or whether they may be called selfish by others; but rather, whether, in reality they do live for themselves alone. This is the question, and if we succeed in proving that none of us liveth to himself, the doctrine of the text will be sustained, and we be prepared to apply the subject. A few cases, only, and they in common life, we trust will satisfy the most fastidious of the truth of our position.

Look, for a moment, at the case of him who tills the soil, who sows, and reaps the produce of the earth, and tell us if you can discover any thing but selfishness—any other motive to action, save the gratification of self in the numerous cares and toils which devolve upon him. He rises with the first beam of morning, and begins the daily task. The morning damps—the noon-tide sultriness and the evening shades, all by turns are upon him as he pursues his accustomed toil. Through cold and heat—through wet and dry, and the changes of the seasons, he knows no rest from labor—days pass away—months make their exit, and years in order are numbered, and still active employment is the current that rolls him on through life. Now what is the object of all this exertion, care and toil? "Why," says one, "the man is evidently laboring for his own individual good, and endeavoring to obtain the necessary means of life—to gather through the genial season, the staff thereof, and store the same against the wintry time of snows—apparently self impels him on to garner up the fruits of the earth, and if so, your reasoning and text must be false; and for once at least, the great apostle is in the wrong." But let us not be too hasty in passing judgment upon the apostle, for he may be right and we wrong, in our conclusion. We will examine the case a little farther, and perhaps it may appear different. The farmer toils to support himself and family—to make the helpless and dependent of his own household comfortable and happy—to procure for his children necessary food and clothing—that their glad smiles may enliven and cheer his heart. The thought of others fills his mind through all his toil—the wants of his offspring inspire him to renewed activity to cancel the demands of the needy. And take away all near and dear, and he still labors for others beside himself—labors to gain a reputation or amass wealth, that community may admire and love him. “For none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself.”

The mechanic and artist through all grades of active life, feel a prompting beside the demands of self which invigorates the frame and induces to industry and care. Some object tempts the sailor to forego the peace and joy of his native land, and man the frail, buoyant barque, bound for other seas and climes. And what think ye, is the object—the motive which fills his bosom when he launches on the perilous waters, and bids adieu to his native home? Is self the grand object of all his dreams?—the idol alone of his hopes? Think ye that for himself, alone, without one solitary thought or one lone consideration of those held near and dear, he embarks upon the briny wave and makes the reeling ship his only home? There he hears the roughening gale rush by—sees the foamy billows rise and fall, while his frail dwelling groans at every surge—his home and his kindred are far away, and he is on the starless deep—and while they are locked in sweet repose, fanned by some guardian angel’s wing, he by the dim light of the flickering lamp, stands beside the binnacle, rocked by the surges to and fro, and traces the faint lines of the long used chart, or lays his hand upon the helm, and with a trembling nerve guides on the dancing ship towards its destined port.—What fears and cares are undergone!—What anxiety felt, and sufferings endured! And is self the sole cause—the fulcrum on which all these turn? Believe it not! His wife and children are in his thoughts—a tender chord vibrated with the changing circumstances that affect him, or a feeble, widowed mother still held dear, swells his heart, and nerves his arm to the performance of worthy deeds and sweetens all his toil. There is some sweet charm near or remote, that lures him on; and take away all relatives—snap all kindred ties whatever, and still there is something more than self which engages his attention and awakens activity. “For none of us liveth to himself.”

And though the actor may not be aware of the extent of the effects resulting from his individual conduct, yet his ignorance can never curtail that influence in the least. In this case, again, our text is proved true—proved to be the language of reason and experience, worthy of its author, and of our constant and serious consideration. But these are not solitary cases in which the assertion of the apostle is made good, in the daily walk and conversation of man.

Night has thrown her sable pall around the world, and darkness comes on apace. Bird and beast have sought their respective places of repose—the hum of business is stilled—the toils and cares of the day are closed—the light, the life and joy of day’s sunny hours have given way to the deep nocturnal shade. A change has come over the face of nature, and no sound disturbs the pensive silence of the stilly scene. And while all nature seems to sleep, the lone mother moves softly through the apartment where rest her sleeping offspring, unconscious of her near approach. An unnatural sound had reached her ear, and sleep fled from her eye-lids, and repose from her pillows—a tender feeling stirred at her heart, and she can not rest until she is satisfied, again, that all are safe. Or go abroad on the wings of the night, and see her sit by the sickly glare of the midnight lamp, and watch every pulsation of her child, and mark the change and progress of disease upon its infant form. What care—what anxiety and ardent desires swell her bosom at that solitary hour! No human eye is upon her, no kindred heart is near to share her cares and fearful forebodings. Those who might mitigate her sorrows and share her toils, are far away, nor dream of what she undergoes. What is the object that fills the mother’s heart—the motive that inspires to all this care and anxiety and watching? Is it for herself she lives, regardless of the well being of others? O, tell it not! Mock not a mother’s love by so base an assertion. There is a stronger and purer feeling at the mother’s heart than selfishness, that prompts to more noble, high and heavenly deeds. For others, beside herself, she lives—for them she toils and watches, let what will betide; and thus confirms the truth of the text, “that none of us liveth to himself.”

And thus on with every case in life, we believe our text will still apply, and it may be made to appear that none of us liveth to himself.

The last number of the text, doubtless had special reference to the primitive Christians who suffered martyrdom in attestation of the truth of the Christian religion. For dying as they did, by violence, for simply believing in the Gospel of our common Lord, it was not to benefit themselves that their blood was spilled, but for the good of others—as a testimony to the world of truth—of facts which themselves personally knew; hence, at that time it might have been said with truth and propriety, “no man dieth to himself.”

Thus far have we labored in support of the apostles declaration—feeling that it ever is of the greatest importance for a clear understanding of any doctrine, to have the premises made simple and easy of comprehension, that all may feel and know the reason of the conclusion we arrive at; and believing the doctrine of individual influence is true as a matter of fact, and not as a speculative theory, we have labored long to make its principles easy and plain. We will now review that doctrine, and endeavor to apply the subject.

If, then, our text is true, as we trust we have satisfactorily shown, it follows that none of us liveth to himself, but every action of every individual has an effect either good or bad, on those with whom he or she is connected in life. That, notwithstanding the seeming selfishness of man in laboring exclusively for his own interest, his actions have an influence on his brethren of the human family—a lasting influence which he may not be aware that others feel, and will continue to feel when the frail tabernacle of his being shall have crumbled to dust, and he has been welcomed to the cold embrace of the grave. That influence shall still last to other men and other times, leading others on in the paths of virtue or vice—imparting to them wisdom, and restraining their feet from evil, or (woful effect!) raising high the flood-gates of crime, misery and death, according to the purity or impurity of that influence, taken in connexion with the adaptation to receive of those who follow successfully on in the pilgrimage of life. This remark meets with confirmation in the experience of the world, and facts, numberless facts are arrayed in defence of its truth. How many events, trifling, indeed, in themselves, have nevertheless, in their consequences produced the most powerful and glorious results!

Joseph dreamed of being in the wheatfield, and that the sheaves of his brethren fell down to the earth and did obeisance to his lone sheaf. He told his dream. It was nothing but a dream—a vision of the night—how trifling in itself considered.—And yet, what a glorious result! A pit receives the vain dreamer—he is taken from thence and borne away captive to a distant clime—and what a glorious, endless train of circumstances may date their origin to that dream of the night! His father’s family were saved and blessed—Egypt too was blessed by him, who, as modern philosophy will have it “caught at a shadow and followed the wind.” He dreamed, and told his dream; and that dream was fulfilled to the letter, and thus from a seemingly trivial beginning, powerful and mighty effects have followed—have reached to us, and doubtless will reach to others—yea to lands now unknown and nations yet unborn.

Look again, at a still more trifling event.—It is said that the gabbling geese saved the mighty city of Rome. They awakened by their noise the sentinels at their posts, and they in turn aroused the slumbering army to a sense of approaching danger, and thus their crafty enemies were timely met and put to flight or death. What a train of mighty and glorious events took their rise from the vain gabble of the senseless bird! Imperial Rome was saved from sword and flame, and her slumbering thousands permitted again to hail the rosy beams of another day and still rejoice in their strength and glory.

Once more. Look at the trivial circumstance which swayed the powerful energies of a Newton’s mind, awakened the dormant faculties thereof to active exertion, and led him on to the grand results which he has left to benefit the world. We are told that he was driven from the land of his nativity by the scourge of pestilence and in the place of his retreat, he sought the cooling shade in the orchard of his friend. There seated, he saw an apple fall to the earth, and by its peculiar motion in descending to the ground, a new train of ideas shot through his mind, and the secret springs thereof were touched as with a magic hand, and he was led on from the sight of the rolling apple to make some of the most important discoveries in philosophy of which mere man was ever the author, to overturn the system which had stood for ages previous, unmoved, and discover in fact, the operations and changes of the material world. And where, think ye, shall be the end of that effect on the minds of men resulting from such a trifling starting cause? Who shall set bounds to the influence arising from this seemingly trivial event? Nor to this only but to all that have transpired? Cause results in effect, and effect in turn becomes a cause, and thus on, ad infinitum.

We are too limited in our powers to know the beginning of each event—finite and weak, we can not know infinity—a little circle around us, is all we are permitted to view, within which is all that of ourselves, we know; while to all beyond, our feeble powers, are locked in the mysterious chambers of the unknown. The influence of former ages and times reach to and affect us, and our conduct in turn will affect those who shall be after us on the stage of life, and begin a new scene in the drama thereof.

But to come more immediately to our own land and time, and approach more directly the object that claims our attention on this occasion, we ask your attention but once more. Three score and nearly seven years ago, had you stood on the shores of New-Jersey and cast your eyes over the great waters, you would have seen through the mist that hung over the deep, one lone sail, dancing on like a thing of life. It nears the strand buoyant upon the swelling waters, it enters the inlet before you; but this is not the place of destination. It must return, but first must part with some of its freight. A little craft is obtained and laden—all are ready. The wind is blowing off the shore—the canvass swells, and the brig moves on his course. The lighter craft would fain follow, but the wind has changed, and she must furl her sails and be content. Night draws nigh, and a lone stranger walks the shore in quest of food. It is obtained, he returns—but the spirit has revealed him; even as he was known to his father, he is now made known to a brother. He is bound to the spot—and the wind will not change that he may go. He wishes and prays, but all in vain. The wind hears not his cry, and He who holds the same within his fist, has a greater and nobler object to accomplish.—The Sabbath arrives. Feeble and trembling, the pilgrim moves toward the house of prayer—others have assembled—and there, in that secluded spot, by the tremulous tones of the human voice the illimitable grace of God is pronounced. The doctrine of a world’s salvation is sounded to the wayward children of men. The Gospel banner is unfurled, and its trumpet is heard. The message is closed. The streaming pennant shifts its course—the wind bound barque swings from its moorings, and the sainted pilgrim leaves the hallowed spot. What a trifling event! How often has a like seemingly unworthy occurrence taken place. Vessels often lose their course, and the wind, for a number of days in succession, blows from the same point of compass, and who has thought of marking the same? 'Tis an every day event.

But what has been the result from the combined circumstances to which we have briefly alluded? Look abroad over our land for an answer, and tell us what you see and hear? Now, instead of one obscure, lone and trembling stranger, imbued with the spirit of the Gospel and speaking in defence of its truth and its wide extended salvation, nearly FOUR HUNDRED heralds of the cross have gone forth in defence of the "restitution of all things, spoken by the mouths of all God's holy prophets since the world began." They have girded on the Gospel armor, and have been shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace. The trumpet of salvation has been heard and its reverberating sounds have reached from mountain to mountain, and from the rivers to the ends of the earth. The light of Gospel truth has been shed abroad—the light divine unveiled, and those who long had sat in darkness and under the shadow of death, have been visited with its genial healing beams. The wide-spread banner of Gospel love, on whose folds the golden words appear, "God is love"—"glory unto him in the highest and on earth peace and good will towards men," is unfurled; and thousands are flocking to the standard of their Master, determined to run with joy the race that is set before them, and press forward toward the mark for the prize of the high calling in Christ Jesus our Lord. And this day a manifestation of that influence is seen. From the East and from the West—from the North and from the South, many of a kindred faith have congregated to congratulate each other on the saving power of that faith, which works by love and purifies the heart to every good word and work, and to hear of the great prosperity of our Zion—to see eye to eye, and lift up their voices together, and togetherness the song of redeeming love and ceaseless praise!

From these facts severally and collectively, do we not learn that no man liveth to himself—that we do not live for ourselves, but for others? As other men have lived for us, and as we profit by their examples and toils, so will other men in other times, reap the reward—the influence more or less, of our exertions. As we look back to gain wisdom from our predecessors—to those who have gone before to learn how to appreciate the real value of human life—so the coming generation will doubtless turn back to us, to profit by our wisdom and folly, and gain by our examples what experience alone can impart. Nor they only, but those who live with us, and enjoy the same great blessings of life, will now be affected and influenced, more or less, by our every action. And as every like produces its kind, so if our actions are tempered by love, and moulded in virtue, the influence of the same will flow gently through community like the soft breathing zephyr laden with the aroma of a thousand fragrant flowers, and others will feel its effects and live. But on the contrary, if our actions are evil, the effect of the same will sweep through society like the howling gale of Winter, and leave after it, tears, misery, and moral death. Then, how important the station we fill! How great the obligations upon us, to take heed to our ways, and be wise for ourselves. Brethren in the ministry of reconciliation—Does not the doctrine of the text, that none of us liveth to himself, come home to us with power? And will it not teach us a lesson—teach us to sow to the spirit, that from the same we may reap life everlasting? Does it not teach us to take the word of inspiration as the man of our counsel—turn to it at all times as the great depository of wisdom—and from it draw the all-important instruction how to live as we ought? Will it not teach us to have a single eye to the glory of God our Father, and inspire us to become perfect, even as our Father in heaven is perfect? To impart instruction to the ignorant and to those out of the way—to let our light continually shine before men, that others may see our good works and be led with us to glorify our Father in heaven? Shall we not feel, while laboring and suffering reproach, that others will be blessed by our labors of love,—and that our every word and deed may live, and live on, to the remotest time, and not return unto us void, but accomplish, in part at least, the end we intend, and prosper in the purpose for which we sent it? Then let us not despair, but go on our way rejoicing, even through good and evil report. When reviled, let us not revile again—when cursed, turn back and bless our foe. And if we possess the life-giving hope of the Gospel, let us remember to purify ourselves as the Author and Finisher of our faith was pure; and like him go about doing good to the evil and unthankful—and when at last our change shall come may we feel to say like our Master, "Father, not my will, but thine be done!" and like the author of our text, be able to say, "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought the good fight—I have kept the faith—I have finished my course: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day." Fathers and mothers in Israel—the doctrine that none of us liveth to himself, appeals to you, and teaches that you live for others—for the surrounding community and the rising generation. Then how important that you heed its teachings, and feel the full weight of its obligations upon you, and conform your lives to the dictates of wisdom, and to the precepts and spirit of the Gospel!—How should you impart, by your daily walk and conversation, to others the healthy and happy influence of your faith in the life-giving effects of pure religion and undefiled—subdue by meekness, charity, and love, the turbulent passions of the human heart, and mould them into pure devotion to the king Eternal! How important, if you live for others, that you live for their good, and exemplify every day of your lives, by word and deed, the high and holy tendency of the Christian virtues! Thus will the world be rendered better by your exertions. Thus and thus only will you be fully prepared for the great enjoyment of life—thus will you truly live for others' good, and thus will the sweet savor of your names descend and bless the coming generation, when you shall be no more. One and all—the sentiment of our text brings its teachings to your minds and your hearts. It speaks the language of revelation and reason; and will you not heed it? Will you not permit its doctrine to awaken you to a sense of your situations and duties—teach you to cease to do evil and learn to do well—to choose the ways of wisdom, whose ways are ways of pleasantness and all her paths are peace, that your lives may be pure and holy, and the influence of the same may build up the cause of righteousness in the earth? May it inspire us all with love—induce us, to the extent of the abilities granted, to labor faithfully in the cause of our Master—to do away superstition, bigotry, iniquity and vice of every manner and form, that everlasting righteousness may come in and the knowledge of the Lord cover the whole earth as the waters do the face of the great deep—till all shall be brought to know him, whom to know is life eternal. And may we remember that our actions—our labors in the cause of Christ are for others as well as ourselves, and that all we do, may live and live on, to other men and times; may our children rise to fill our places—to bless our names and follow our examples when we sleep the sleep of death.—May God enable us to work while the day lasts, "for the night cometh when no man can work." AMEN.

UNIVERSALISM IN CORTLAND.

Br. GROSH.—It is no exaggeration to say that the cause in this region is onward—our friends are awake—our congregations increase—there seems to be an unusual anxiety manifested amongst all, both friends and enemies, clergy, and laymen, to hear the preached word,—to see whether these things are so.

The old Baptist house, abandoned by its former occupants to the moles and bats and poor Universalists, was filled yesterday in every part—some coming a distance from eight to ten miles. I observed many strangers and some acquaintance who had never attended before. I heard from others who were anxious to attend, but dare not, for fear of men (women). They will come by and by, when they become of age. The tide is setting strongly in our favor and is bearing many of all denominations, old and young, male and female, into the haven of hope. The signs of the times promise of a great and important revolution—I trust it is near at hand. The Babel builders of Partialism are confounded by a confusion of tongues—they can no longer understand one another—they can not pronounce their own Shilboleth.

The Presbyterian church is shaken to its centre—it is rent in twain from top to bottom. How are the mighty fallen! This, it will be remembered was, but a few years since, one of the most conspicuous theatres of revivalism. Rant and blasphemy was the order of the day—many converts were made—the church was replenished with members—among the rest, several lawyers were led to inquire what good they could (pretend) do that they might escape eternal death! and joined the church, and became very popular of course. But how stands the case with them now? It is indeed most desperate. The farce is over. The truth—the candid truth is out. They have had their consolation. Reader will you believe it? It is a fact attested by many witnesses, that the Rev. Mr. FOOT, who has labored with the Presbyterian church some two years, and with whom the church have labored for the last six or eight months in the most shameful and abusive manner—assailing the good man behind his back with ridicule and mockery, and both in his presence and absence outraging all manner of decency in their abuse alternately of him and one another, until they have quarrelled themselves out of all countenance, not only with the public but with one another, and have finally turned his reverence away and are now left in a destitute and prostrate condition—yes, reader it is a solemn truth, that this same Mr. FOOT, (and he is far from being alone in his opinion of the matter) declared openly and publicly in his farewell discourse, to his beloved brothers and sisters, last Sabbath, that he had lived in the State of New-York, four years, and that during the whole time there had not been a genuine revival of religion within fifty miles of him, though he allowed there might have been some genuine conversions, which, however, were like angels' visits few and far between.

May we not adopt the language of Christ in such a doleful case as this! "Wo unto you lawyers! wo unto you rich men, for you have had your consolations!" Yes, they have had their good things, and likewise Lazarus evil things, but now he is comforted, and they are tormented.—Yea, Br. GROSH, and what aggravates the distress and consternation of our opposers in this beautiful village, is to be compelled to witness the progress of a Universalist meeting-house, which is now being erected on the most commodious and beautiful site in the whole country, in close proximity with the three houses, Baptist, Presbyterian, and Methodist; and which bids fair to be the most novel and splendid building in this region. It is built of cobble stone, 44 by 60 feet, with a basement galleries on three sides, and surmounted by a steeple. We are aware that it is a great enterprise to be engaged in these scarce times for provisions and money, but our friends seem determined to make up what they otherwise lack, in zeal and perseverance. They come up to the work bravely, I assure you, and I see no reason why it will not prosper in their hands. Nor can it be said they are pushed forward by opposition, for opposition here has almost ceased to be a subject of remark!

TIME.—The vehicle that carries everything into nothing. We talk of spending our time, as if it were so much interest of a perpetual annuity; whereas we are all living upon our capital, and he who wastes a single day, throws away that which can never be recalled or recovered.

A VOICE TO YOUNG MEN.....CHAPTER III.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

Perseverance, is another habit which young men should acquire. This habit must be long cultivated, before it can be fully obtained. Parents should be aware that a training for it, can profitably be commenced, even in childhood. In his infantile undertakings, the child can be influenced to persevere until his designs are accomplished. And in all the doings of youth, pains should be taken to induce them to avoid fickleness of purpose, and to infuse into their minds, a spirit of unwearied perseverance. This will soon grow into a habit, the beneficial influences of which will be realized through life.

A habit of perseverance well adhered to, will accomplish the most surprising results. Through its influence, Napoleon was enabled to scale "the cloud-capped Alps"—Franklin to become one of the eminent philosophers of the world—and Clinton to accomplish one of the most splendid projects of modern ages. The beautiful islands of the Pacific, are but immense coral reefs, raised from unknown depths, by the perseverance of minute insects, who carry but one grain of sand at a time. It is related of the celebrated conqueror, Timour the Tartar, that upon an occasion of adverse fortune, he was compelled to secrete himself from his pursuers in a ruined building.—While in this condition, as he was ruminating upon his ill fortune, he espied an ant, sedulously engaged in efforts to carry a kernel of grain, larger than itself, up a high wall. For a long time its efforts were unavailing. Still at every defeat, would it renew its exertions with unabated energy and perseverance. Sixty-nine times did it essay to perform this feat, and as often failed. But the seventieth time, the industrious insect succeeded in gaining the top of the wall with its prize. "The sight," said the conqueror, "gave me courage at the moment, and I have never forgotten the lesson it conveyed."

The example of the ant, is worthy of all imitation. Let your plans be deliberately and maturely formed—see that they are honest and honorable—and then let "Perseverance" be your watchword, and you will seldom fail of success. "I can't," never accomplished any thing. "Col. Miller," said Gen. Ripley, at the battle of Niagara, "can you carry that battery?" "Gen. Ripley, I will try!" was the laconic reply. "At the head of his gallant regiment, he tried, and by uniting bravery with perseverance, succeeded in repulsing the foe and carrying the battery. "I will try," has accomplished wonders in the world. When the habit of perseverance stands by you, as a hand-maid, to lend her assistance, you can safely calculate upon a favorable result in all your reasonable operations; but without this desirable qualification, you may commence a thousand projects, and fail in all. When a proper business is fairly undertaken, or a resolution formed, persevere in its pursuit—bend all the proper energies of your mind to its service, and let no common inducement swerve you into another track. "A young man who had wasted his patrimony by profligacy, whilst standing, one day, on the brow of a precipice from which he had determined to throw himself, formed the sudden resolution to regain what he had lost. The purpose thus formed, was kept and persevered in; and though he began by shovelling a load of coals into a cellar, for which he only received twelve and a half cents, yet he proceeded from one step to another, till he more than recovered his lost possessions, and died worth sixty thousand pounds sterling."

A well-directed perseverance in a laudable determination, will insure success against many disadvantages. It will overcome obscurity of birth, the want of fortune, and of wealthy and influential friends. A case in point, occurred under the observation of the writer. I remember well that antiquated school-house, in a small hamlet, at the north-western part of the State of New-York. The teacher procured a silver medal, and suspended it at his desk in sight of the school, with the annunciation that at the end of the term, it should be the prize of the scholar who should excel. A spirit of eager rivalry was awakened in the school—all strived assiduously to gain the glittering reward. But the eye of memory rests particularly upon two lads of nearly an equal age, who bore the most prominent part in this intellectual strife. The disparity in their circumstances was striking. The one, the son of a man of wealth and high standing in that community, was promised additional rewards by his relatives, did he secure the prize. The father of the other was poor—all he possessed was honesty and industry—and to the son, no other inducement could be held out, but the prize itself and the honor of obtaining it. And this was sufficient to fire his ambition. The son of poverty formed a fixed determination that the medal should be his. He applied himself to study with the most indomitable perseverance—nothing could divert his attention, or thwart his purpose. His efforts resulted in complete success—his industry and perseverance met their certain reward. He was crowned victor; and with the blushes of boyhood, received the envied prize! In this instance, perseverance accomplished what wealth could not.

Let us trace the history of these lads a little farther. After living side by side, engaged in the same sports and amusements, a few years after the incident above related, they parted. The son of the man of wealth, entered higher seminaries, to obtain the advantages of a more extended education; while the other was put to a trade. It was then that the latter first felt with force, the disparity in the gifts of fortune—first sensibly realized the evils of poverty. While he was engaged in laborious occupation, as a means of subsistence, his early companion was expanding his mind with the lights of literature and science, with every prospect of occupying a station in life, as superior to the other as were his advantages. But the poor lad, notwithstanding his adverse circumstances, was not disposed to remain in obscurity. He firmly resolved to make every exertion in his power, to arise above the disadvantages of birth and indigence. He summoned Industry and Perseverance to be his hand-maids, in the career he had marked and determined to pursue. Every effort was put forth—every means of improvement within his reach, was diligently used—and every possible advantage secured. Nor were his efforts unavailing, or his labors fruitless. Success, beyond his most sanguine anticipations, attended him. And now, at the penning of these lines, he occupies a station in one of the most enlightened communities of the world, which, while requiring far more talent, is as elevated, as respectable and honorable, as that filled by the wealthy companion of his childhood! These circumstances are not narrated to cast any disparagement upon the latter. His course thus far in life, has been prosperous and honorable. He occupies a station which none can obtain, but those well skilled in his profession. But they are adverted to, solely to convince young men, that enlightened perseverance can overcome almost every obstacle in an honorable career.

Faithfulness, is a habit which the young should cultivate. What more desirable qualification can a young man possess, than faithfulness to his employers, in the discharge of all business and interests entrusted to his disposal. Once let a young man obtain the name of being faithful in all the duties and obligations resting upon him, and he secures the confidence of the whole community. But once let it be known that he is faithless, and all trust in him is destroyed, and his character receives a fatal blow.

Have you business to transact? Do it faithfully, if your own; and especially so, if it is confided to you by others. Have you work to perform? Let it be done faithfully—as near what you contracted to do, and as near what it appears to be, as possible. Avoid all deception in regard to these things. A mechanic or a merchant very much mistakes his interest, who slights his work, or palms off his goods for what they really are not. Such men may gain a few dollars in the outset, by pursuing this deceptive course; but a just and speedy retribution awaits them. Their deceptions are soon discovered—their dishonesty is laid bare—and an indignant community will withhold all farther patronage and encouragement.

"A Mahratta Prince, in passing through a certain apartment, one day, discovered one of his servants asleep, with his master's slippers clasped so tightly to his breast, that he was unable to disengage them. Struck with the fact, and concluding at once that a person who was so jealously careful of a trifle, could not fail to be faithful when entrusted with a thing of importance, he appointed him a member of his body guard. The result proved that the prince was not mistaken. Rising in office, step by step, the young man soon became the most distinguished military commander in Mahratta; and his fame ultimately spread throughout India." Thus faithfulness will ever gain confidence, and is one of the most essential ingredients in securing respect and prosperity. Be faithful, then—faithful in all you do, even in the most trivial things—and a certain reward awaits you.

LETTER FROM BR. ROGERS.

Vevay, Switzerland county, Indiana.

BR. GROSH—Being at present on a professional visit at this place, and requested by two gentlemen here, to procure them your paper from the commencement of the current volume, I avail myself of the occasion for sending you, at the same time, a hasty communication—hasty it must necessarily be, as I am exceedingly driven by my engagements. But I must have a subject—let me think—it shall be

THE OHIO RIVER.

From its source, to its confluence with the Mississippi, this is every where a beautiful stream, and its shores are every where correspondently beautiful. I have several times passed up and down it in a steamboat, and rode for hundreds of miles together, along its shores, and never grow weary of looking at it. One's first impulse, on arriving at any town on its margin, is involuntarily to exclaim, "What a lovely situation! Indeed, every last spot on this river, which one surveys, will seem to surpass its predecessor in loveliness, and it is no uncommon thing for the inhabitants of each place to inquire of a visitant—"Have you, any where on this river, seen a situation equal to ours?" Were I, however, called upon to determine a preference for one above all other situations on the Ohio, it would very decidedly be in favor of Pittsburg; that of Cincinnati is unquestionably next, and Wheeling—last.

Wheeling is situated on a narrow strip of ground, which is highest toward the river, and depressed toward the hill in its rear, insomuch that from the water, none but its front row of houses can be seen. The hill in its rear, is two or three hundred feet in height, and, for more than a mile, is without curvature, indentations, defile—any thing to vary its monotony—and its sides are quite too steep to admit of cultivation, or improvement of any kind. All that can possibly be done with it, is to tumble it into a large and deep hollow, immediately in its rear—there is where it properly belongs. I see not what nature was about, when she scooped out that hole, in order to form so dull and gloomy a pile! Another defect in the situation of Wheeling, is, that an island opposite, entirely prevents the other shore of the river from being seen.

Think of a stream which, for more than a thousand miles, is unbroken by shoals or reefs! In its whole length, but one such interruption occurs—which is at Louisville—and whose shores are uniformly of a soft and verdant character—sufficiently undulated for variety's sake, and nothing more! Still, in a scenical point of view, the Ohio will not compare with the Hudson, nor even with many parts of the Susquehanna—the Susquehanna in Pennsylvania, I mean. It will not compare with the latter in the pellucidity of its waters, much less in that bold and broken character of margin, which gives such pleasing and ever-changing variety to the daughter of the Otsego Lake. In fact, the scenery of the Ohio is entirely unmarked by those abrupt changes which seem requisite to redeem it from monotony; and yet its monotony is of so exquisite a character as never to fatigue the eye, nor even to cease to interest it. There is not a single scene on that river, that can be called sublime—not one. On the Susquehanna, I know of some that can—on the Hudson, I know of many. Art can scarcely much improve the two latter streams—I mean their beauty—it can do every thing for the Ohio; and the time, I think, is not very, very distant, when in this respect, it will not yield the palm to any river in the world.

Most of the streams which compose the Ohio, are pure and pellucid, and this circumstance gives to the river its chief beauty. The Monongahela, however, one of its main branches, is a turbid stream, but comparatively shallow, and sluggish in its current. The Alleghany, on the contrary, is deep and rapid, and, being a child of the mountains, it is also clear, and often reflects their beetling crags upon its mirror-like surface. You may stand on some of the heights at Pittsburgh, and trace it by the eye, for a mile or more below its junction with the Monongahela—it seems very tenacious of its individuality, and refuses, for a considerable space, to blend its translucent waters with those of its muddy-complexioned sister.

Nature has formed a line of land travel on each margin of the Ohio, for the most part of its entire length. There are few obstacles in the whole distance to the formation of a good carriage road. I regard this as a peculiarity—and certainly a very pleasant one. In riding along the Hudson, the Susquehanna, Delaware, Schuylkill, or Potomac, I have found my way at times obstructed by ledges jutting out to the water's edge, or by impassable morasses, and it became necessary to prosecute my journey, for a space, by some rugged interior path among the hills. Such barriers rarely intrude in the traveller's way along the Ohio; for which reason, a journey on its banks is very delightful. I found few such privileges on the Southern rivers—the Tennessee, Tombigbee, Alabama, and others;—in travelling in a line parallel with their courses, I could scarcely keep them in sight for one half hour at a time; the way is so obstructed with bluffs, and lagoons, and other circumstances—and the marshes—oh, the marshes! they so abound in the vicinity of the Southern waters, that the smelling sense can detect the miasma with which the atmosphere is surcharged by their means.

Now for an offset. When I first moved to the West, I was impressed with the idea that no situation could be more delightful for a residence, than on the Ohio river. "Should I make this country my permanent home," thought I, "it shall certainly be within sight of this stream. I will not immerse myself among the hills, while so much beauty and convenience are here found combined, are spreading their attractions before me." I have changed my opinions since then. I had not taken into the account the drawbacks which nature invariably makes upon the advantages she confers. The most serious drawback in this case, is, the swarms of mosquitoes which infest these shores in the Fall season—these are a most serious annoyance. It would not do for a man of my unwarlike disposition, to have to maintain a warfare for my rights, for three months in every year. I would rather abandon to the claimants the fee simple title in the premises, and retreat to some more peaceful (even if less beautiful) abode. Beside, the mosquitoes are natives—the aborigines of the country—and Congress has never made appropriations for the extinguishment of their claim. Would that they could! and that their removal could be effected toward the Rocky Mountains; for I fear that they will never become amenable to our laws.

All-revealing time alone, can disclose how many towns and cities are to spring up on the margins of this mighty stream—how many hundreds of vessels are to agitate its waters—how much hum and bustle of human enterprise is to re-echo among its hills. This valley, alone—I mean the entire country drained by these waters—would, without doubt, sustain twenty millions of human beings—sustain them, I say, but do not mean as the starving hordes of Europe are sustained, but sustained in a manner compatible with comfort and independence. The number of towns and villages even now on this stream, is immense. Pittsburgh has upwards of 30,000 inhabitants; Beaver city may contain 5,000; Steubenville, 4,000; Wheeling, 8,000; Marietta, 2,000; Portsmouth, 2,000; Maysville, 4,000; Cincinnati, 35,000; Madison, 4,000; Louisville, 25,000; Albany, 4,000; besides these are numerous towns containing from one to two thousand, and an indefinite number of smaller villages. If such is the populousness of these shores within so short a period from the date of their first settlement, what prospect, as to its future increase, can it be deemed too extravagant to indulge? But enough on this head; I must now go into details of another kind.

At the time of my removal to the West, to take the pastoral charge at Cincinnati, how many of our ministers, think you, were located on the Ohio? The sum total can be given without much "ciphering"—though for that matter, it must wholly consist of ciphers. There was not one! Two years have not yet elapsed—nay, full six months are wanting to complete that term—and the number regularly engaged in their vocation, is now (if my humble self may be included) seven; and in this number are not included Br. Hoag, of Pittsburgh, and Br. Cox, of Elizabethtown—not because they are not as good as any of us, but simply because I wished to embrace such only as are wholly engaged in the work—including these, the number is increased to nine. The last named gentleman, however, though not in actual connexion with us, was engaged in the ministry of reconciliation some years previous. "And yet there is room." I'll tell you, Br. Grosh, what kind of men, in my opinion, we want amongst us. We want men who, without stopping beforehand too nicely to calculate the chances of loss and gain, will throw themselves into the work, soul, body, and spirit, and trust the issue—as it regards their temporal weal—to Him who feedeth the raven. There is an extreme on this head to be avoided, I know, but then I also know that very few in this selfish age are prone to it. No, no; there are certain sage maxims that are now most prudently kept uppermost, so as to be ready for application when a sordid grasping after pelf, on the part of the ministry, is to be defended. "He that provideth not for his own household," etc. It was excessively kind in Paul to furnish this maxim for the behoof of these careful gentry. We do want men who are willing to make some sacrifice for the cause of truth, and if either extreme is to be more especially avoided, let it be the selfish, Providence-distrusting one. However, no risk of sacrifice is incurred by our ministers in coming to the West; for, at the least, quite as good a support can be obtained here, as at the North; and as this is a wider field, they may journey hitherward without any very great danger of getting into each other's way.

This letter, you perceive by the superscription, is being written at Vevay. This is a county town on the river, by water seventy miles from Cincinnati, by land little more than half that distance. As may be inferred from the name, both of the town and county, it was originally settled by the countrymen of William Tell; and, after their European custom, they continue to cultivate the grape, and manufacture wine. They are, in general, an honest and laborious people. A sudden and very prevalent interest in our cause, is manifesting itself here, and, if no untoward circumstance should arise, the time is not far off which will witness a good Universalist society and meeting-house in the place. The latter is now already in contemplation, and the former, I propose to organize when I next visit them; which I have appointed to do in a few weeks from now. I am now giving them a series of lectures, and am much gratified with the serious and general attention they are receiving; and still more so with the respectable character of those who seem chiefly interested in the business. There are many adjacent places, on this and the opposite (Kentucky) shore, where the Word would be gladly received "in good and honest hearts." But the want of proclaimers (as they are termed in reformed parlance) is very sadly felt. But I have made this communication terribly long—so, good bye for the present.

Very affectionately yours,

GEO. ROGERS.

P. S. I don't see the Advocate, to know if you have copied my proposals, for a new work, from the Sentinel. If you have not, I would wish them not copied in the present form, as all the publishers here agree in telling me that I have put the terms too low. I have, consequently, determined on reducing the issues to 16 pages medium size. I will abide by the proposals as thus altered, and will have the first number in press ere this reaches you.

G. R.

REMARKS.—We copied the proposals before this reached us, and now publish the P. S. above, by way of correction. Br. Rogers will please send the work to Porteus Morgan, Reimsen, Oneida county, and to Avery M. Backus, West Winfield, Herkimer county, N. Y.—and charge Grosh & Hutchinson for the same.

Concluding addresses, Br. W. Bullard. Benediction, Br. W. M. Delong.

The services throughout, were well attended—especially on Thursday, notwithstanding it was the commencement of the haying season. And it is confidently believed they were so conducted, as to be useful and instructive. Our young Br. Delong, has merited the confidence of his brethren, and it is not doubted will be such a minister as the zealous society in Lebanon both desire and deserve.

The following preamble and resolution was unanimously adopted by the council of conference and ordination, and ordered to be published:—

Whereas, complaints against the moral character of Mr. Edward Edwards, of Georgetown, and formerly a Methodist minister, but who for some months has been preaching as a Universalist, have been presented to Rev. E. M. Woolley, one of the committee of discipline of the Central Association; and,

Whereas, said complaints have been satisfactorily sustained, and the same being submitted to the council of conference and ordination, assembled at Lebanon, Madison county, N. Y.—therefore,

Resolved, That we owe it as a duty to the denomination of Universalists, to apprise the members of the same, that said Edwards is not in fellowship with any Convention or Association of the order; and is not, therefore, under our discipline, or considered as a minister of the restitution.

ST. LAWRENCE ASSOCIATION.

Brs. GROSH and HUTCHINSON—In the proceedings of the St. Lawrence Association of Universalists, as published in your paper of last week, I observe that a complaint was preferred to the committee of discipline against E. A. Garfield, which was presented to the Council for their deliberation and action. Subsequently it is stated that the following resolution was passed, viz. "That as regards the testimony yet laid before this Council in the complaint against Br. E. A. Garfield, it is the opinion of the same that Br. E. A. Garfield is not guilty of the charges preferred by Br. M. Rayner." And it was furthermore resolved, that the "decision of the Council be read before the congregation assembled in the meeting-house"—which was accordingly done.

I should think this was rather a summary and unusual way of despatching a business of so serious and important a character; and its bearing, in relation to me, requires some explanation. As it now appears on their minutes, the idea seems to be conveyed that I had preferred charges against E. A. Garfield, maliciously, or without just cause—which are false and slanderous: and such would naturally be the impression on the minds of the congregation to whom a statement of the proceedings was read.

In the written communication which I made to Br. Wallace, I did not consider myself as "preferring charges" against E. A. Garfield. This I supposed was not properly my province—not belonging to that Association. But by the advice of several ministering brethren, to whom I related the circumstances touching E. A. Garfield, which occurred during the week or more that he spent in Troy, I wrote to Br. Wallace (with whom I have no personal acquaintance), and gave a somewhat particular statement of the occurrences alluded to; and that said Garfield during his stay in Troy—and most of the time at my house—was chargeable, in several instances, with wilful deliberate falsehood—of which the most conclusive proof could be adduced. I supposed the committee of discipline for that Association, if the matter should be laid before them, and they should judge an investigation expedient, would take the proper measures to effect it, or if they should choose, without further inquiry, to lay the matter before the Association, that that body would not proceed to decide the case merely upon the statement I had made, and explanation that might be given by E. A. Garfield—with no one present to gainsay it—but that either a special committee would have been appointed to inquire into the business, or some other course adopted to ascertain the facts of the case: that an enlightened and equitable decision might be had in the premises. Instead of which, however, the Council proceed to resolve "That as regards the testimony yet laid before the Council—it is the opinion of the same that E. A. Garfield is not guilty of the charges preferred by Br. M. Rayner." They might, perhaps with equal propriety, have proceeded further, and resolved, that from the testimony of E. A. Garfield before this Council, it is the opinion of the same, that M. Rayner is guilty of having preferred false charges against E. A. Garfield; and then to have resolved that the whole be read before the congregation assembled in the meeting-house.

In view of the above proceedings—made thus public—I feel it my duty to state, as publicly, that the written communication, above mentioned, made by me concerning E. A. Garfield, is substantially, and even strictly correct; and can be so proved. And if said Garfield has seen, or heard that communication, he knows it to be correct. And if, with that knowledge, he has no compunctious visitings of conscience, but instead of a penitent acknowledgment and amendment, would fain transfer the odium from himself to the author of the before named communication—from whom, when in Troy, he received nothing but hospitality and faithfulness—he must be an instance of reckless depravity, rarely, I hope, to be met with.

No one can more sincerely regret than I do, the occurrence of any thing in the ministry of reconciliation, which requires the exercise of discipline; and where it is called for, I would not have it unnecessarily rigorous; for I know how to "have compassion on.....such as are out of the way."—But the cause of truth is paramount to individual considerations; and requires, in its friends and advocates, vigilance and integrity; and in associated ecclesiastical bodies, the due exercise and maintenance of government and discipline.

I would respectfully suggest to the committee of discipline of the St. Lawrence Association of Universalists, the propriety of making due inquiry into the matters alleged relative to E. A. Garfield: for—believing him to have erred greatly from the truth—I should greatly rejoice to have him "converted from the error of his way," and "restored in the spirit of meekness." M. RAYNER.

Troy, July 17, 1837.

P. S. Should the above suggested inquiry be instituted, if notified at the time, I will endeavor to be at home, and will give the necessary references. And I would request that E. A. Garfield may also be notified, and I hope he will not fail to attend the investigation in person. M. R.

The following, written probably without the knowledge of Br. Rayner, and without knowing that he had written his article, is inserted because it points out a mode of immediate redress of the grievance offered to Br. Rayner. A. B. G.

Br. GROSH—I have a word to say in relation to the manner in which the St. Lawrence Association disposed of a matter of discipline; or rather, the form in which it appears in the minutes. Article 5, prefers a charge against a ministering brother, without giving the name of the complainant. Article 9 gives, as the opinion of the Council, that the brother accused "is not guilty of the charges preferred by Br. M. Rayner;" and is "read before the congregation assembled at the meeting-house."

This would appear designed to exonerate the accused at the expense of Br. Rayner: i. e. the public would so interpret it, "Br. R. has wilfully preferred false charges, and we will expose him."

Now was "the hand of Joab in this?" or was it only an oversight in Br. Langworthy, who penned the notice? If the resolution was not only designed by the Council, to censure Br. Rayner, Br. Langworthy will have the goodness to explain and disclaim such intention on the part of the Council. This may save Br. Rayner, or his friends the necessity of publishing a defence, which might prove unpleasant. L. C. BROWNE.

UTICA, FRIDAY, AUGUST 4, 1837.

APOLOGY.

Br. A. B. Grosh, now the principal Editor of this paper, has for more than a week past, been wholly disabled to write any thing for the editorial department; having been confined to his house, and mostly to his bed, by an attack, first of canker-rash, and then by a gathering in his throat. This has broken and discharged freely this week, and he is now fast improving in health. He will doubtless be able to resume his place at his writing desk by next week, and again let our readers see and hear from his prolific pen. D. S.

PREJUDICE.

Few obstacles to the spread of divine truth among men exist, that are more formidable or difficult to overcome than prejudice. To those under its dominion, it is next to useless to talk—with them it is in vain we reason—in vain do we appeal to argument, experience, observation, or even to conscience or to Scripture. Prejudice, deep-rooted, sullen, fixed, determined, holds the entire control of all the moral and intellectual powers. All the affections, feelings, passions, even conscience itself, are its obsequious tools, and it wields them at pleasure. It says to one, go, and it goeth; and to another come, and it cometh. Prejudice, when she wishes not to see, has no eyes: but when she wishes to see a particular thing, her vision is so acute that she can even see that which does not exist. When she wishes not to hear, she has no ears: but what she wishes to hear, she hears, whether it be audible or not. She has the power of transforming a friend into a foe, good into evil, and vice versa, at pleasure.

What seems to be peculiarly unfortunate in regard to prejudice, is, that those who are under her dominion, are generally wholly unaware of the fact—they never suspect this horrid monster of holding any power or influence over them whatever. Indeed they would sooner suppose the whole world, in all the varieties and shades of opinion and sentiment, principles and practice, that pervade the world, to be under the dominion of deep-rooted prejudice, than suspect themselves of being swayed in the least, by her power. She approaches, and gets dominion over her victims, by very insidious advances and means. Sometimes it is by means of tradition, or early education, sanctioned by all that is venerable and revered in parent and teacher; sometimes in the guise of love and disinterested friendship; sometimes she appeals to the love of wealth, often that of fame and popularity; more frequently still she assumes the garb of piety, and approaches her victim in the shape of a most devoted friend, both of God and man: she finds ingress to the heart at a very small aperture—one would hardly think so potent a monster could gain admission at so small a door as that at which she often enters. And when once seated in her empire, it is no easy matter to dispossess her. She is as fearless and shameless in fighting to maintain her dominion, as she is insidious in her first approaches to gain it. But of all tyrants in the world, she holds the most unlimited control over, and is the least complained of by her own subjects. In the very tyranny she exercises over them, they deem her the most devoted friend they have.

We presume most of our readers have seen the anecdote of the aged Baptist gentleman, of Massachusetts, with his son, in Boston, attending the respective meetings of Dr. Stillman and the venerable Murray, and reflected on the astonishing and blinding power of prejudice on the father's mind. We are acquainted with several similar anecdotes, illustrative of the same point, so luminously exhibited in that; two of which we will here briefly narrate for the edification of our readers.

The first occurred some years since, in our native State, New-Hampshire. The Rev. Mr. R., an Orthodox Congregational clergyman, was settled in the town of S—, and had long occupied the town meeting-house; clergymen of other denominations seldom or never preaching in it. At length the Universalists becoming somewhat numerous, and having a right in the house according to the property owned, resolved on having a preacher of their own faith at least once a month, and accordingly engaged Br. W., a young man of ardent piety, commanding address, and most solemn and dignified appearance in the pulpit. When Br. W. preached, the Rev. Mr. R. was obliged to occupy a school-house near by, and was always very careful on the preceding Sabbath, to notify his church and the people, that the meeting of the saints would be holden at the school-house next Sabbath. On one Sabbath, when such notice was given, a very venerable matron of his church was absent, from some unknown cause, and on coming to meeting the next Sabbath, went as usual to the meeting-house instead of the school-house. To the interesting discourse of Br. W., she paid the most devout and marked attention, supposing him to be an Orthodox preacher with whom the Rev. Mr. R. had exchanged. At intermission she was interrogated, "How did you like the sermon?" "Admirably well," replied the old lady; "I never was better entertained in my life. He is truly a pious man. And, O my soul! such melting, powerful preaching! I do hope Mr. R. will exchange often with him. Do you know what his name is? and where he is from?" "His name, Madam, is W.—the Universalist preacher who preaches here once a month. We are very glad to see you here, and to find you were so well pleased; we presume you will attend and hear Mr. W. again this afternoon." "Oh, no, no—not for the world! The Lord forgive me for hearing him this morning! How could I have been so deceived! What a wicked man he must be!"

The second instance occurred more recently in one of the counties bordering on the Hudson river, in this State. An aged and venerable gentleman, in the town of G., deceased. And having been one of the first and oldest settlers of the town, and generally known and respected, not only in that but several of the adjacent towns, his funeral was attended in the Baptist church, and by a vast concourse of people. Many in attendance knew not who was to preach the funeral sermon. Mr. S., a Universalist, had been sent for, who resided in a neighboring village. But some of the congregation had heard that Mr. W., the Presbyterian minister of the same village, had been sent for, to preach the funeral sermon; and these latter, being personally acquainted with neither of the clergymen mentioned, labored under the erroneous impression during the whole service, that it was Mr. W. and not Mr. S. who was preaching. The most profound attention was paid to the service throughout, by the vast assemblage of persons in attendance. On returning from the meeting-house, towards their respective homes, several of the hearers were interrogated concerning their opinion of the sermon. One gentleman in particular replied to his interrogator, that he was very, very much pleased—he did not know when he had been more edified and pleased—he really thought Mr. W. was an excellent preacher—the sermon was most excellent, appropriate to the occasion, and well delivered; and the addresses to the mourners were so feeling, so consoling, and so good, he did not see how any one could help being pleased. After extolling the sermon, addresses, etc., quite as highly as their merits would allow, he was told "it was not Mr. W. that preached, but Mr. S." "What do you say—it was Mr. S.!" "What, that Universalist?" "Most certainly." "No, no, that can't be possible." "Yes it is, both possible and positively true; for I know him well, and have often heard him preach." "Well, ha-m! well—I—I thought there was something not exactly right all the time!"

It is scarcely possible to conceive of two cases more strongly proving the blinding, deafening, and tyrannical power of prejudice in resisting the influence of divine truth, than the two above narrated. Reader, may this tyrant never hold dominion over thee. D. S.

THE DISCUSSION.

We regret to perceive by the July number of the Millennium Harbinger, that even our June letter to Mr. Campbell, has not yet appeared in that paper, nor, of course, his reply to that, which, with our answer, was inserted in last week's Magazine and Advocate. His August number can, therefore, only contain our June letter, and this will, as a matter of course, delay the discussion one month. Mr. Campbell complains of the delay in the time of our proof sheet's reaching him. But we reply to him as soon as received, and mail the proof to him quite as soon after the reception of his, as he does his proof, after the reception of ours. And although his reply to our June letter is dated the 29th of June, yet neither appears in his July number.

In regard to his Rules for the Discussion, as published in our last, prefatory to his letter, (No. 6,) we would remark, that they did not come to hand till after our reply to his letter was written and in the hands of the compositor. This accounts for our not remarking on the first and most exceptionable of those rules in our letter, and for our exceptions being appended to his exceptions to our propositions. D. S.

Brs. GROSH and HUTCHINSON.—I have seen with mortification, that the name of the Rev. O. Whiston, of Cooperstown, was left from the Minutes of the proceedings of the last session of the New-York State Convention; and had it not been for the same omission in the Minutes of the proceedings of the Convention in 1836, and that I was one of the Clerks of that body, I should not have deemed it my duty to make this public correction.

I therefore state that Br. Whiston was present at the session of the Convention in 1836, at Auburn, and also at the last session of the same body at Albany, and took part in our deliberations, and gave a good account of our great Master's cause in the section where he resides.

I would assure Br. Whiston that the omission of his name was on the account of the hurry I was in when at Auburn, and that I did not discover the same until after I returned home, and it was then too late to correct the error. Yours, etc., N. SAWYER.

Medina, July 13, 1837.

REMARKS.

It is presumed no blame is or can reasonably be attached to the Clerks of the Convention, who do not always know, and even when acquainted with can not always remember, every preacher present on such occasions. It is also customary to request every preacher and delegate present to hand his name and residence in to the Clerk. The Clerks depend on the list thus made up. Brs. Whiston and Belding did not thus hand in their names. Consequently, no blame can be attached to the Clerk, who is compelled to make out the Minutes, frequently in a crowd, and always in a hurry.

THE PRIMITIVE CHRISTIAN—AGAIN.

Our friend Sheppard informs us that the word ventrosity, which we asked him to explain, was a misprint for ventosity. As we were unacquainted with the word he used, we did not pretend to guess at his meaning.—But he, in attempting to guess at our meaning where a typographical error occurred, happened to guess wrong. If he had looked at our paper of June 9th, he would have found an erratum correcting the word erroneously printed irrelevant in our preceding number, and informing him and our readers generally that irrelevant, not irrelevant, as he supposes was intended. D. S.

TO MY DEBTORS.

Gentlemen, you that are indebted to me for this paper, have been owing me, for value received, from two to ten years. Is not this period long enough for you to be indebted to any man? Is it not long enough for me or for you to trust any man? So it seems to me. Few or none of my creditors will wait on me as long. I do not wish to make any of you cost, unless compelled to. I hope, therefore, that you will without further delay, and without compelling me to make you cost, pay up your old accounts; that my books with you may be all "settled and balanced." I expect to go to the South in the Fall, to spend the Winter, and desire to have all those old accounts adjusted before I go. To you individually, the amounts are but small; to me the aggregate of the whole is large.

Will one and all in my debt, send me my due? And will agents and those who have bills or accounts in their hands for collection, endeavor to adjust and make returns, if possible, between this and October next, and thereby greatly oblige their humble servant,

D. SKINNER.

Br. Lewis will pardon us for omitting to publish a notice of the Conference—his letter was mislaid, and not found till too late.

POETRY.

MY MOTHER'S SIGH.

I've felt it oft in childhood's hour—
The magic of a mother's sigh:
I've yielded to its gentle power,
With heart subdued, and drooping eye.

When full of glee, a wayward child,
I've stolen from my task away,
That sound din'd the frolic wild
Would rouse and check my careless play.

I've read, with rapt and earnest look,
O'er pages filled with wild romance.—
My mother sighed—I closed the book,
And broke at once the idle trance.

If passion flushed my youthful cheek,
And pride and gloom were on my brow,
When others' frowns were vain and weak,
Her sigh could bid my spirit bow.

If, checked in Folly's wayward whim,
I've turned away with laughing eyes,—
My mother's sigh that smile could dim,
And tears, repentant tears would rise.—

My dream has fled—and wearying care
Has silenced Folly's childish strain;
The thoughtless mirth that revelled there
May never, never come again

But still I feel that holy power,
It thrills my heart and fills my eyes,
With tears, as when, in "childhood's hour,"
I yielded to my mother's sigh.

NATURAL THEOLOGY.

The following extract is taken from Mr. Combe's latest work on moral philosophy. We commend, not only this extract, but the work itself to the perusal of our readers. A. B. G.

"Mr. COMBE repeated the statement, that our notions of the character of God become more correct and sublime in proportion as we become better acquainted with his works; and also that our perception of the duties revealed by natural theology becomes clearer and more forcible in proportion as we compare correctly our own constitution with the other objects of creation. To illustrate the fact that natural theology is in reality extremely prolific in precepts and imperative in enforcing obedience, whenever we know how to read the record, he compared the ten commandments with the dictates of natural religion."

The first commandment is, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me." The whole of nature, in so far as it has been scientifically investigated, proclaims the existence and unity of an intelligent, creating and governing power. The second commandment, "Thou shalt not worship graven images," etc., forbids an abuse of Veneration. The moral and intellectual faculties, when enlightened by science, also enforce the precept. The third is, "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain." This forbids an abuse of self-esteem in irreverent utterance of the divine name, and prescribes the practice of reverence towards God. The dictates of the natural faculties entirely coincide with this commandment. The fourth is, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy," etc. The constitution of human nature is essentially in accordance with this precept. The mind depends for its efficiency on a vigorous condition of the brain, upon which uninterrupted bodily labor has a depressing influence; so that, without an interval of rest, we should be unfit for the due performance of our religious duties. But the extent of relaxation prescribed by our constitution is still greater than that enjoined in the fourth commandment; it imposes the duty of resting from labor several hours each day, and dedicating them to moral, religious, and intellectual occupations.

The mode of observing the seventh day, prescribed by natural theology, is somewhat different from that commonly laid down by interpreters of Scripture. On this subject the New Testament is silent; but Scotch divines usually forbid all sorts of bodily exercise and recreation on that day. By a law of the human constitution, however, bodily exercise, to a certain extent, is necessary on every day of the week, for securing the efficiency of the body, and consequently of the moral and intellectual faculties themselves. Religious occupation for a whole day, without recreation, exhausts the mind, and has a prejudicial influence on the health of the body. The fifth commandment enjoins respect to parents. Natural theology, by disclosing an organ of Veneration, prompting us to reverence virtue, wisdom, and experience, issues the same command. Parents, however, must render themselves, by their moral qualities and intellectual attainments, natural objects of respect before they can hope to receive it from their children. The sixth commandment is, "Thou shalt not kill." Benevolence, Conscientiousness, and Veneration issue the same precept.—The seventh commandment, "Thou shalt not commit adultery," prohibits an abuse of Amativeness. The natural law coincides in this, but goes still farther, and forbids many other abuses, such as marriage too early and too late—with blood relations—and with persons having very inferior brains, or laboring under serious diseases. The eighth and tenth commandments forbid abuses of Acquisitiveness; and the ninth an abuse of Secretiveness.

All these precepts are enforced in natural theology by the dictates of the moral sentiments, and also by the arrangements of the social world, which bring evil on those who contravene them. The ten commandments are, however, incomplete, inasmuch as the abuses of various of our faculties (such as Philoprogenitiveness, Adhesiveness, Self-Esteem and love of Approbation) are not forbidden in them, and they do not require the direct exercise of any faculty except Veneration. There is no commandment enjoining the positive exercise of Benevolence, Conscientiousness, and the intellect, or commanding the proper employment of Philoprogenitiveness, Adhesiveness, Cautiousness, etc. The Christian revelation supplies these deficiencies of the law of Moses. Christ forbids the abuses of all our faculties, enjoins the legitimate exercise of them all, and proclaims the supremacy of the moral sentiments, by commanding us to love our neighbors as ourselves.

It has been objected to the doctrine of the natural laws, that its tendency is to abolish the practice of devotion and prayer. This, however, is a mistake. The opinion that God rules by general and immutable laws, and that our prayers have no effect upon Him, has been maintained, not merely by the advocates of natural religion, but by the most eminent divines. Among these are Dr. Isaac Barrows and Dr. Heylyn, Piebendary of Westminster, in England and Drs. Leechman and Blair in Scotland. "Prayer," says Dr. Leechman, "only works its effects upon us, as it contributes to change the temper of our minds, to beget or improve right dispositions in them, to lay them open to the impressions of spiritual objects, thus qualifying us for receiving the favor and approbation of our Maker." Although these sentiments were condemned in 1744 by the Presbytery of Glasgow as heretical, yet the General Assembly pronounced them orthodox, and they are repeated almost verbatim by Dr. Blair in his sermon on the unchangeableness of Divine nature. Adoration as an expression of the emotion of our minds on contemplating the Divine perfections, is a pleasing, elevating, and most rational exercise. Prayer and praise, then, being exercises beneficial to our minds, though not calculated to give any personal gratification to the Deity, or to alter his purposes, are perfectly accordant with the dictates of natural theology."

DEATHS.

In this city, on the 20th inst., after a short but distressing sickness, Mrs. ELIZABETH MUNSON, consort of Mr. Edmund Munson, aged 25. Seldom are we called to witness a more distressing sickness, or a family more deeply afflicted by the death of the subject, than in the present case. Till a very few days before her death, Mrs. Munson appeared to be in the enjoyment of perfect health, the affectionate faithful wife, the fond and loving mother (of three small children,) in the blooming morn of matured womanhood, and in the midst of domestic quiet and usefulness, is thus suddenly cut down, and leaves the widowed heart of her doating husband; her tender children, and all who had known her virtues and her worth to mourn her sudden, her untimely exit. But they mourn not as those who have no hope; but cherishing in fond remembrance her many virtues, they joyfully anticipate a happy and final meeting in another and better world, where sorrow, sickness, pain, and death, can never come, and where parting will be no more.

In Noble county, Ind., May 31st, Mrs. MARIAN FRINK, aged 38 years, wife of Mr. N. Frink, and daughter of Flam Pease, Esq., of Copenhagen, N. Y. Mrs. F. was intelligent, amiable, and respectable in all the duties and relations in life. Her numerous relatives, are not left to mourn as those without hope; but trusting in the God of Abraham, they look to the time when all the dead shall be raised, all the living changed, and all the human race become holy and happy.—Com.

In Butternuts, Otsego county, July 5th, Mrs. RUTH LULL, consort of Nathan Lull, aged 73 years. She lived the life and died the death of the righteous, and bore dying testimony to the consolations of Universalism—to the same consolations that were tendered to the bereaved husband and children, and a very large number of mourning relatives, by M. B. SMITH.

In the city of Buffalo, July 3d, GAYLORD, son of Aaron and Susanna Bean, aged four weeks. Uncontaminated by the vices and corruptions of the world, the little pilgrim passed onward and upward to his destined abode among the blessed—leaving the parents to mourn, but not as those without hope. They are strong in faith, giving glory to God, who will, of his abundant goodness, supply all their need. R. T.

In Sardinia, June 7th, Mrs. MARY, wife of Mr. Steel Collins, aged 28. It is but justice to the deceased, as well as to the influence of our "most holy faith," to observe that she was truly an excellent woman, a practical Universalist, and that she found the doctrine equally good to die by as to live by. Though it seemed a sore trial to leave her companion with 5 young children, the youngest a mere infant, she was nevertheless enabled to meet her fate with resignation, yea to depart, "rejoicing in hope" of a better world when "the whole family in heaven and earth" shall ultimately arrive, and parting be known no more. Funeral services by the writer. J. L.

In Boston, N. Y., June 22, an infant son of Dr. Enos Blanchard, aged 11 days. J. L.

Recently, in Galway, Saratoga county, N. Y., REUBEN COGSWELL, aged 80 years, 3 months, and 12 days. He lived in the full belief of the final restoration of all men to happiness and glory. He lived and died beloved by his friends and esteemed by all who knew him.

At Cortlandville, of dropsy, July 13th, Mrs. RACHEL BADGLEY, consort of Jacob Badgley, Esq., aged 52 years. In the death of Mrs. Badgley, her husband has lost an affectionate companion, her children a kind and provident mother, and society a respected and respectable member. She employed much of her time and took great delight in perusing the Scriptures, especially in her latter days, and the assurances which she had gathered from their prolific pages afforded her substantial comfort in her last moments. She was attached to no sect but in sentiment a Restorationist. Her funeral was attended at the Baptist church at the village, and a discourse delivered by the writer from Ps. xlv: 1, 2, 3—on which a particular mark was found subsequently to her death. W. BULLARD.

In Norwich, on the first of April last, JACOB REYNOLDS, aged 79.

Br. Reynolds was truly a Universalist in faith and practice. At an early day he had attended on the ministry of Winchester, Murray, Barnes and Lathe, and was present at the organization of the first Universalist society in Oxford, Massachusetts. He took a part in the eventual struggle for liberty, and through his life he made the golden rule of moral action the basis of his intercourse and dealings with his fellow-men. He died at peace with God and man, in hope of the immortal life and purity of himself and all mankind. N. D.

In De'evan, Racine county, Wisconsin Territory, of inflammation on the lungs, GEORGE C., only child of Salmon and Betsy Thomas, who removed in company with their brother Trumbull D. Thomas in May last to the former place, aged one year and eleven months. L. T.

A VOICE TO YOUNG MEN.....CHAPTER III.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

THE HABITS.—CONCLUDED.

Punctuality, is another habit which should not be overlooked. This habit can easily be formed, but more easily neglected. Begin while young, to be punctual in your occupation and in all your business transactions, and it will soon become a habit that will sit easily upon you, and save you from many perplexing difficulties. A man who is punctual in fulfilling all his engagements, and in discharging all his responsibilities, has many facilities and advantages offered him by the business community, that are denied those who are known to be slack and neglectful. The credit of the former stands far higher than that of the latter, although his means may not be as ample. "Procrastination is the thief of time," and the stumbling-block to prosperity. "If I had been there but a moment sooner —," But you might have been there, had the spirit of punctuality stirred within you. "Do at once, what at once ought to be done. Let not the season of action be spent in hesitancy. Do not let to-morrow be perpetually the time when every thing is to be done." "A time for every thing, and every thing in its time—a place for every thing, and every thing in its place." These are maxims that should be engraven upon the tablet of every young man's memory. There is no truth more certain, than that if you do not drive your business, your business will drive you. He who drives his business has every thing done promptly and correctly, and still has leisure at his disposal; while the individual who is driven by his business, is constantly hurried and perplexed—his affairs are in confusion, and often suffer for want of attention—for what is done in a hurry, is generally ill done. Study, then, to be punctual, prompt, and methodical in all your affairs. Punctuality is the "fly-wheel" which gives steadiness and precision to all the machinery of business.

Early Rising is a habit that should be sedulously cultivated. This habit is conducive to health, to longevity, and to prosperity. When your avocations commence with the opening light of morning, it gives every thing a forward impulse that can be felt throughout the day. But let the sun commence his daily work long before you leave the bed, and all things drag as though a spell rested upon them. "A sluggard takes an hundred steps, because he would not take one in due time." Sum up the hours that are, by many people, needlessly spent in bed, and they will amount to years in a long life. Napoleon, in the midst of his triumphs, allowed himself but four hours sleep in the twenty-four. This untiring application to business, was undoubtedly one secret of his extraordinary success. There is wisdom in the proverb of Solomon—"Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep; so shall thy poverty come as one that travelleth, and thy want as an armed man." Experience testifies to the truth of this declaration, that indolence is the cause of poverty and want. Let the young take heed of this danger and avoid it. Let the words of the wise man be called vividly to mind on retiring to rest, and with due reflection, they will arouse you with the dawning light of morning.

Economy is not, by far, the least in importance among the habits to be commended to youth. It needs no argument to show that a spendthrift must, ere long, necessarily be involved in poverty. The young man who expends in useless amusements or sinful follies, all he earns, of course can lay up nothing to commence business for himself, or to provide for future misfortunes or wants. And such an one can hardly hope for assistance in pecuniary matters. The confidence of community is wanting; and when that is gone, all is gone. And he who spends more than his income, will soon become involved in toils which it will be difficult to escape.

The necessity of economy is acknowledged by all; but with too many, especially the young, it is one thing to make this acknowledgment, but another and quite different thing, to practice in accordance with it. It is not very difficult to take care of whatever large sums we may possess, but it is a work of greater care to economize the smaller sums. Hence the propriety of the maxim—"take care of the shillings, and the pounds will take care of themselves." A man that is truly economical, will become rich in saving what another deems too little to deserve care. "A penny saved, is two pence earned," was one of the wise sayings of Franklin; and in practicing it, he became wealthy.

Every young man should study economy, in all his expenditures. A trifling sum squandered every day, soon amounts to an aggregate of importance. How many are there in the middle and advanced stages of life, who, could they have what they heedlessly and uselessly spent in youth, would be saved from ruin and want. The young should remember that every farthing which they expend unnecessarily, will cause them to be so much poorer through life. I would not inculcate a parsimonious, miserly disposition. I would have the young generous and liberal in all their conduct. But there is a vast distinction between the liberal man and the spendthrift. True economy is not opposed to expenditures for all that is necessary fully to supply your own wants, and to satisfy the claims of charity, benevolence, generosity, justice, and the public welfare. But farther than this it forbids your proceeding. It calls upon you to husband your means carefully, and to avoid all sinful, frivolous, and useless expenses. If young men desire to obtain a competency, this is the only safe method to secure it.

Young men should also be economical of time. "Time is money," says Dr. Franklin. An hour or a day needlessly idled away, is so much money taken from your pocket. Let all your time be occupied usefully. Your leisure hours, should not be idle hours. A useful book, or other publication—the conversation of select friends—the obtaining in any proper manner of valuable information—should occupy those hours not devoted to business. Men who have distinguished themselves in the world, have always been economical of time. One of the most industrious men in England, is Lord Brougham. He often does not leave the House of Lords until midnight, and yet he always rises by four o'clock, A. M. And by thus husbanding his time, he has been enabled to attend to a greater diversity of interests, and to despatch a greater amount of business, than any other individual of the present age. Dr. Cotton Mather, to prevent his time being wasted too much by visitors, placed in large characters over the door of his study, the motto—"Be brief." Professor Vorsinus, of the University of Heidelberg, for the same purpose, wrote over the door of his library—"Whoever thou art that enterest here, be brief or get you gone." Scaliger, professor of the Belles-Lettres, at Leyden, whom his friends denominated "an ocean of science," and "the master-piece of nature," inscribed on the door of his study: "Tempus meum est ager meus," (My time is my field.) "Sire, one word," said a soldier one day, to Frederick the Great, on presenting a lieutenant's commission for his signature. "If you utter two," said the industrious prince, "I will cause you to be hung up by the heels." "Sign," said the soldier. The monarch, astonished at his presence of mind, granted his request. Let young men cultivate such habits of economy in time, and in after years they will realize the beneficial fruits of their wisdom.

Temperance.—The evils of intemperance, I have already adverted to in a former chapter. Habits of temperance are of the utmost utility to health, usefulness, and success in business. And here I would repeat that temperance in drink, is entire abstinence from intoxicating liquors of every character. Adopt this judicious rule, and you are entirely absolved from all danger of becoming engulfed in the wretchedness and ruin of the habitual drunkard. But if you overstep this line, and become what is sometimes termed the temperate drinker, you are exposed to imminent danger; and the chances are greatly against you, that you will ere long be involved in the deepest evils of intemperance. The only way to be insured against intemperance and its woes, is to avoid the commencement of the evil, by refraining wholly from all intoxicating drinks as a beverage!

It is also necessary to acquire habits of temperance in regard to food. In the Scriptures the glutton and the drunkard are ranked upon nearly the same level; and so heinous were these habits considered by the Israelites, that they punished those guilty of them, by stoning to death. Gluttony is a vile and low habit, and assimilates its victims far too near the nature of the swine. It is the fruitful source of the most painful diseases, and leads to a premature grave. Let every young person avoid it as they value respectability and comfort—for it is highly destructive to both. Read the words of Ecclesiasticus—"Eat modestly that which is set before thee, and devour not, lest thou be hated. When thou sittest among many, reach not thy hand out first of all. A wholesome sleep cometh of a temperate belly. Such a man riseth up in the morning, and is well at ease with himself. Be not too hasty of meats: for excess of meats bringeth sickness, and chole-ric diseases cometh of gluttony."

Temperance also forbids the use of tobacco, in any form or manner. Those who urge the propriety of temperance in drink, and yet use that nauseous weed, are inconsistent—they are temperate in one respect, but intemperate in another; they abjure one evil and cling to another. The man who lectures publicly against intoxicating drinks, with his mouth loaded with filthy tobacco, or his nostrils filled with snuff, furnishes a most beautiful commentary on consistency and propriety! In the great majority of cases, to those who use tobacco, it is not only useless and uncalled for, but it is absolutely injurious to health and appearance. And it is now becoming generally believed, that tobacco is not necessary to health in any case—or, in other words, that in those few instances where it has been considered beneficial, health and soundness can be procured much better by another course of treatment. It is estimated that in the United States, $16,000,000 are annually expended in the consumption of tobacco! Were this enormous sum, which is now worse than thrown away, to be applied to internal improvements, or to the education of the people, how immense would be the benefits that would flow therefrom.

"If you have ever learned to chew or smoke that Indian weed, called tobacco, I beg that you will at once drop all, cleanse your mouth, and never again defile yourself with it. Let a man be thrown from a shipwreck upon a desert island, and in a state of starvation, and he would rather die than to eat this weed, though the island might be covered with it; and no youth can use it, either in chewing, smoking, or snuffing, without decided and permanent injury to his appearance and health, and progress in study. When the fashion was so strong in England, that James I. could get no one to preach against it, his own royal hand took the pen and wrote a treatise which he denominated 'A Counterblast to Tobacco.' The strength of his princely antidote may be gathered from the following closing paragraph of this royal counterblast:—'It is a most loathsome to the eye, hateful to the nose, harmful to the brain, dangerous to the lungs, and in the black, stinking fume thereof, nearest resembling the horrible Stygian smoke of the pit that is bottomless.' All experienced people will tell you that the habit of using tobacco, in any shape, will render you emaciated and consumptive, your nerves shattered, your spirits low and morose, your throat dry, and demanding scratching, coughs, your person filthy, and your breath stinking. In fact, not a few persons are made deranged by this very means. Dr. Rush has a long chapter on this subject, in one of his volumes, which is well worth your attention. He declares to all this, it has been observed that, in several other diseases, medicines never operate well in constitutions which have been accustomed to the use of tobacco." With these facts in view, young men of sense and discretion, surely will not contract habits which cause them illness and pain in obtaining them, and which, when obtained, result from being any benefit, are a cause of evil only, and that continually. To speak as I do is to speak as I am.

Finally, a word to the mother—"Temperance in all things"—adhere to it strictly, and as a general rule, your reward will be health, cheerfulness, and a green

'Keep one's word' is a good maxim for young men. Much depends upon habit in this respect. A young man, if so disposed, can generally avoid becoming involved in debt. If he is prudent and economical, there will be no necessity, in all any cases, of becoming indebted. If a man who has done so provide for but himself, can not avoid debt, his prospects of future success must be exceedingly dark. If he means at hand, and in hand, all, until you can pay, proceed.

By way. By adopting this rule, many a young man has been deterred from doing that which was unnecessary.

Avoid cherishing a 'fault-finding disposition.' There are those who so incessantly indulge in complaints against men and things, against the weather, the times, the ways of Providence, and even themselves, that it finally becomes a depressed and confirmed habit. Fault-finding seems to be the vital atmosphere they inhale; and they can not exist satisfactorily to themselves, without waging a perpetual war of complaints against every body, and every thing. Such people become an evil to themselves, and to all with whom they mingle—they are a curse to them, whose presence contentment and happiness flee away. Avoid this disagreeable habit, as far as possible. Cultivate a cheerful, contented disposition. Always be disposed to look upon the bright side of things, and to throw the veil of charity over the imperfections of mankind, rather than to indulge in useless complaints. Man was not intended for perfection in this life; and he who looks for it, and complains that he does not find it, will be constantly disappointed, and possess an endless theme of dissatisfaction. The world is as it is, and fault-finding will not mend it. Better, far, to smile than to growl at its failings—and better still to amend our own faults and inconsistencies, and endeavor by kind precept and faithful example, to improve our fellow-beings, rather than to hurl captious complaints against them. Make the best use of what you have, and do the best you can in the discharge of all your duties, and trust the rest to the care of the wise Disposer of all events.

TENDENCY OF FALSE DOCTRINE.

BY REV. J. CHASE.

"And they were filled with madness, and communed one with another, what they might do to Jesus." Luke vi: 11.

A false and unfounded religion is of all things the most to be dreaded and detested. It perverts the mental powers, obscures the light of conscience, arrests the demands of moral justice, destroys the exercise of mercy and charity, turns truth into falsehood, light into darkness, love into hatred, peace and harmony into contention and strife; changes God into an unfeeling tyrant, clothes heaven in sackcloth and mourning, metamorphoses man into a demon, and glories in its shame. And notwithstanding all this, it has ever managed in such a manner, as to maintain its power and influence over the majority of mankind, condemning and torturing the innocent and the virtuous, and pampering and encouraging the hypocritical and the vile.

In proof of the foregoing remarks, the reader is referred to the depraved religionists alluded to in the passage which stands at the head of this article. Who were they? They were the people who professed to be the beloved of the Lord—the faithful servants of the Most High—the only truly religious people in the wide world—the people who were the exclusive favorites of heaven, and the only people for whom salvation was by God designed. They were the ancient Jews. Poor, deluded and mistaken mortals! They "verily thought themselves righteous, and despised others"—thanked God that they "were not like other men," and lived in the indulgence of every vile propensity and passion, and verily thought they were doing God service! What a disgusting spectacle to the virtuous mind! And yet, we find here a subject of the richest instruction, if properly improved.

It seems that our Saviour had given great offence to these ostentatious pretenders to religion, by not properly observing, in their estimation, the Sabbath-day, which they considered so much holier than any other portion of time.—He had been guilty of walking through a corn-field, and using some of the grain to satisfy the cravings of his appetite, even on the Sabbath! At this they were highly incensed, and insultingly inquired of him, why he did that which was not lawful to do on the Sabbath? Jesus, ever ready to render a prompt reason for all his acts, refers them, in justification of his conduct, to what David, the servant of God, did on a certain occasion, and tells them, that "he went into the house of God, and did take and eat the shew-bread, and gave also to them that were with him; which it was not lawful to eat, but for the priests alone." And then he says, "The Son of man is Lord also of the Sabbath."

This matter being settled, not very satisfactorily, however, to his religious opposers, it came to pass also on another Sabbath, that he had the audacity to enter into the Jewish synagogue, and teach there. And it appears that "there was a man there, whose right hand was withered." The Scribes and Pharisees now watched him very narrowly, to see whether he would heal the poor invalid on that holy day, and in the sacred synagogue too, that they might have an opportunity to accuse him before the magistrates. But he was fully aware of their evil intentions, and therefore, said to the poor sufferer, "Rise up and stand in the midst." And he came forth and stood where he was directed by Jesus. These preliminary arrangements being made, our Lord turns to his enemies, and says to them. "I will ask you one thing; is it lawful on the Sabbath-day, to do good or to do evil; to save life, or destroy it?" They were silent; and evidently because they could not frame an answer that would not justify Jesus, and condemn themselves. But "looking round upon them all, he said unto the man, stretch forth thy hand. And he did so; and his hand was restored whole as the other."

The powers of darkness were thus foiled, and the miraculous power of Jesus established, in the immediate presence of an assembled multitude of his religious opposers and persecutors, and here the matter for the time being, ended. But, in this instance, as in many of more recent date, the following poetic maxim was strikingly verified,

"He that is convinced against his will,
Is of the same opinion still,"

for, "they were filled with madness, and communed one with another, what they might do to Jesus." No doubt, the conviction, which the miracle then and there performed, fastened upon their minds, that Jesus was the Messiah, served to increase their rage, redouble their persecuting zeal, and greatly increase their hatred towards the man whose doctrine they could not refute, and whose growing influence among the people, they could not check.

Madness, and a desire to exercise revenge, are the common consequences which result from a conscious refutation and exposure of false, superstitious and dogmatical theories. Meet a man, whose brain is filled with enthusiastic zeal, in the propagation and defence of a false and degrading religion—expose his ignorance and superstition, and refute his groundless theory, by conclusive and unanswerable arguments, and appeals to the Scriptures; and if he is not "filled with madness," and does not "commune" with his own sect, for the purpose of framing some plan by which he can be revenged upon you, I will acknowledge my ignorance of human nature when under the influence of a mistaken zeal for God and religion. We have witnessed too many demonstrations of this fact, not to set it down among the few problems that have been duly solved and settled.

How often have the advocates of universal reconciliation met their opposers in the open field of theological investigation? How generally have they succeeded in vanquishing and exploding the errors and follies which those opposers undertook to defend? Let their reluctance to continue such discussions, stand as a sufficient answer to the last interrogatory. If there had been an instance of the kind, where their own consciences did not tell them that their traditional errors were thoroughly refuted, a further discussion would not have been considered "unprofitable" and improper. But as it is, they have generally concluded to follow the example of the "orthodox" Jews, and when they find themselves unable to sustain their sinking cause against the overpowering arguments of divine truth, to withdraw in sullen silence, under the conviction of defeat, and "commune with one another" how they may manage to disgrace and vilify those whom they can not honorably and successfully compete with in sound argument. "Filled" with superstitious "madness," they vociferate "heresy, blasphemous, emissaries of the devil, infidels, deniers of the Scriptures, Sabbath-breakers, wine bibbers, justifiers of sinners," etc., etc.

But all this should never move the passions of the servant of him, who "when he was reviled, reviled not again," when he was slandered, and misrepresented, and abused, bore it patiently, and relaxed not his natural zeal and unexampled industry in the holy cause of truth and universal benevolence. Retaliation is unbecoming to the follower of Jesus, and can never essentially benefit the abused party, nor promote the cause of impartial grace and love. "If thine enemy hunger, feed him, if he thirst, give him drink; for, in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good." This is the way to gain the victory; to spread the knowledge of the truth, and to "adorn the doctrine of our God and our Saviour," and permanently establish the supremacy of truth over religious error and delusion. If it becomes necessary to "rebuke sharply," it should be done in the spirit of kindness. If error, fanaticism and hypocrisy must be exposed, let it be done in charity, and solely with a view to extend a knowledge and love of truth, and to benefit all mankind.— Acting thus, we shall imitate the example of our Lord Jesus Christ, obey the reasonable commands of God, vanquish every foe, overcome every obstacle, and prove to the world that our doctrine is the truth of God, from its benevolent and beneficial tendency.

PRACTICAL RELIGION.

BY S. JENKINS.

Practical religion is regarded by many, as wholly disconnected with that which is experimental; and hence the little value placed on the former, by many of the professing Christians of the age. Experimental religion, being something between them and their Creator, is raised above practical religion, which is considered as being only between them and their fellow-beings, in proportion as the character of God is raised above that of poor, frail, erring man. They look upon experimental religion as the procuring cause of their eternal felicity, about which, alone, they seem concerned; and when that is once secured, the work is done. I know not but that the opposite extreme is followed to as great an extent. I believe, in some instances, it is. It is true, we can not practice practical religion too much, but when sinister motives move us to action, it loses its virtue, and if not equally odious with the former, conveys no more peace and satisfaction.

But, is it not possible that an error somewhere exists;—that the principle on which the distinction is founded, is a false one? It will be readily admitted, that both experimental and practical religion are good and beneficial to mankind, and as such, must have their origin in the same source.— Now, as "a fountain can not send forth at the same time both sweet water and bitter," so they must agree in their natures, and one can not exist independently of the other. Experimental religion, unaccompanied by practical, degenerates into enthusiasm and hypocrisy; while practical religion, unsupported by experimental, is like "a sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal." Experimental religion, if I may so speak, is the tree, and practical religion is the fruit which it bears. It is said in Scripture, that "Every tree is known by its fruit." Luke vi: 44. Hence, St. James, in defining religion, defines it by its fruits. He says "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father, is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." James i: 27.

The apostle seems to have known nothing of the distinctions made in religion at the present day. He uses the term in its general sense, and this affords me another reason for believing, that experimental religion is the tree, and practical religion the fruit. He seems to inculcate the same sentiment through his epistle; for he says, chap. xi: 18, "Yea a man may say, thou hast faith, and I have works: shew me thy faith without thy works, and I will shew thee my faith by my works." He also says, verse 20th, "that faith without works is dead."

From this we learn, that if we would imitate the great Author of our faith, "who giveth liberally and upraideth not," we must be a support to the needy, a comfort to the afflicted, and the cause which we know not, we must search out. Then shall we "cause the widow's heart to sing for joy." If any man claims to be religious let us carefully examine his daily walk, and if he doeth the things commanded, and soundeth not a trumpet before him, we may conclude his claims to be just.

Religion has been too long shrouded in mystery; it has been looked upon as an indescribable something; and he who felt its influence, could not tell the cause why, only, that it was religion. Under such circumstances as these, it could not but be expected, that its practical part should be forgotten, and the loving kindness of our God which we have experienced, cease to have its wonted effect upon us, till only the remembrance of our former joy, would be visible to our minds.

RELIGION IN SOCIAL LIFE.

[It may be necessary, for the information of the reader, to state that the Utica Berean Institute have established a Manuscript Literary Journal, to receive the contributions of its members, and to be read at its meetings when no other business is before them. It is edited, or managed, by three curators. The following is one of the articles lately read before the Institute. I hope we may be able to obtain from some of the correspondents to the Budget, permission to copy some other of its excellent articles. A. B. G.]

For the Budget.

MESSRS. CURATORS—With your permission I will occupy a small space in the Budget, by offering a few reasons why I consider it not only the duty, but for the interest of our youthful friends to take an active part in the promotion of the Christian religion.

I am aware that the hideous form and uncomely garments in which religion has too long been clothed, present an appearance so gloomy and forbidding, that the naturally buoyant spirits of youth as instinctively shrink from any thing bearing its name, as they would from any disagreeable object that they had reason to fear would mar their happiness. But, my youthful friends, such is not the nature of the religion that I am disposed to urge upon your consideration—such is not Christianity, when divested of those heathenish superstitions which have been permitted to coil around her fair form and deface the beauty of her pristine loveliness. The sad countenance, the disfigured face, the measured step, or the deep drawn sigh, which result from the drent of the fury of an angry God, and flow from the genius of a partial and limited system of theology, are no indications of that pure, undefiled, and heart-cheering religion, the influence of which I long to behold, where now reign blind bigotry, hot-headed fanaticism, or dark and gloomy skepticism. Neither do I consider religion as barely something necessary to prepare us for another state of existence. Too long has its practical beauties been lost sight of, in viewing it merely as a ladder on which to climb to heaven, instead of a guide to conduct us in the paths of virtue and peace.

The religion that I would urge you to cherish, is just such a religion as our heavenly Father, knowing our wants, has provided for us—a religion that is calculated, from its very nature, to subdue the more turbulent passions of our natures, to refine our feelings, to purify our affections, to chasten our thoughts, to elevate the moral powers of our minds, and, in short, to make us better and happier members of society.

We are social beings, endowed by nature with all the necessary faculties for the promotion of human happiness. But these faculties need cultivation—there must be a controlling influence, a governing principle, for their guidance. In the law of Christianity we have this principle: it is the law of love—observe it, and we are happy—break it, and envy, strife, hatred, and every other mischievous passion follow, bringing degradation and misery in their train. How grateful, then, ought we to be to the Giver of a law, on the observance of which our happiness depends; and how inexcusable are we, if we are so ungrateful to the Author, and so disregardful of our own happiness, as to neglect its easy and agreeable requirements!

I do not ask my fellow youth to renounce their cheerful recreations and innocent amusements, because religion is something of more importance; but I desire to see the principles of Christianity adopted and carried out in the pursuit of these amusements. Let the cheerful laugh be heard; let the merry song be repeated; let the graceful form trip down the social dance; and the light foot keep time with the thrilling vibrations of the spirit-stirring viol; let the youthful soul be as free as the playful lamb; but still let the holy influences of religion inspire with love and pure devotion each gay member of the happy band; and let every impure thought or unholy desire be brought into subjection to its heaven-born principle. It is nonsense to pretend that pure devotional feelings cannot mingle with youthful amusements, and the consequences of attempting to draw a dividing line between piety and youthful pleasures are plainly seen in the disgust with which youth are too apt to treat the subject of religion. This is not as it should be. Religion should be looked upon as a refiner, rather than the destroyer of the pleasures of life.

Let us imagine a social circle in which every member should resolve and strive to be governed by the hallowed principle of love to his neighbor as himself, of doing in respect as he would wish, under like circumstances, to be done by. Does it need the spirit of prophecy to discern, that in such a circle all would be harmony and peace; that there would be enjoyment, not of that perfect felicity to which we are never to attain, but each in striving to make those around him happy, would be pursuing the very course to increase his own happiness? Certainly not. There the strife and discord that now distract almost every department of society, would find no dwelling place; but fraternal love would beam in every feature, and irradiate every countenance. Oh, who would not give worlds, if he possessed them, to be attached to such a circle!

But the question is, can such a circle exist? And if so, how can such an object be effected? I answer, it can. It is in the power of the members of the Berean Institute to maintain the principles which subjects; and seriously, my pleasure of being one of such a circle, would be a sufficient compensation to each of us, in subduing in our own breasts passions which, if allowed to reign uncontrolled, can only in proportion to their free exercise, be rendered more inducement were necessary, it is that the honor of being has ever been known to exist where the principles of Christianity effectually dispel every unholy passion, and prevent every discordant act would be a sufficient appeal to our love of approbation.

Shall we, my young friends, try the experiment? There is nothing impossible or any ways difficult to encounter in the accomplishment of this object; yet nothing can be more desirable. All we have to do, is, for each to resolve, and keep the resolution, to conduct toward all with whom we associate, as he would wish them to conduct toward him. Let this rule be adopted, and there would be nothing to call into exercise those feelings of jealousy and ill will, which, when exercised, make us feel so miserable ourselves, and appear so disgusting to others. Let this rule be adopted, and should any of us be afflicted with what is termed a quick temper, there would be nothing to call it into exercise, and our better judgments and feelings would, consequently, gain the ascendancy.

To this resolution let us add another: to check our passions, should we imagine ourselves ill-treated by others, and learn to heap coals of fire on the heads of our enemies, by rendering, in all cases, good for evil, and pity their weaknesses, rather than resent their injuries.

In conclusion, my object in uniting with this association was improvement, and I trust I have derived lasting benefit from it. As a testimonial of my gratitude for these benefits, these lines have been penned with the hope that the hints therein contained, may prove of some service to the society. If you, Messrs. Curators, consider them worth reading, well; if not, their suppression will give no offence to

LAWS RELATING TO RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES.

For the information of our friends in this State we publish to-day all the extracts from the laws now in force relating to the legal formation of societies. In a future number we shall publish a form for a Constitution, so that full and explicit information will be possessed by all on the subject, and every thing may be done without difficulty, or embarrassment, in decency and in order.—Let our friends carefully preserve this number for future reference, and see that the formation of our societies, their annual elections, etc., are carefully managed in accordance with the provisions of the law here given.

§ 6. And be it further enacted, That the trustees first chosen according to the third section of this act, shall continue in office for three years from the day of their election, and immediately after such election the said trustees shall be divided by lot into three classes, numbered one, two and three, and the seats of the members of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the first year, of the members of the second class at the expiration of the second year, and the members of the third class at the expiration of the third year, to the end that the third part of the whole number of trustees, as nearly as possible, may be annually chosen; and the said trustees, or a majority of them shall, at least one month before the expiration of the office of any of the said trustees, notify the same in writing to the minister, or in case of his death or absence, to the elders or church-wardens, and in case there shall be no elders or church-wardens, then to the deacons or vestrymen of any such church, congregation or society, specifying the names of the trustees whose times will expire, and the said minister, or in case of his death or absence, one of the said elders or church-wardens, or deacons or vestrymen shall, in manner aforesaid, proceed to notify the members of the said church, congregation or society, of such vacancies, and appoint the time and place for the election of new trustees to fill up the same, which election shall be held at least six days before such vacancies shall happen, and all such subsequent elections shall be held and conducted by the same persons, and in the manner above directed, and the result thereof certified by them, and such certificate shall entitle the persons elected to act as trustees, and in case any trustee shall die or refuse to act, or remove within the year, notice thereof shall be given by the trustees as aforesaid, and a new election appointed and held, and another trustee be elected in his stead, in manner aforesaid.

§ 7. And be it further enacted, That no person belonging to any church, congregation or society, intended by the third section of this act, shall be entitled to vote at any election succeeding the first, until he shall have been a stated attendant on divine worship in the said church, congregation or society, at least one year before such election, and shall have contributed to the support of the said church, congregation or society, according to the usages and customs thereof, and that the clerk to the said trustees shall keep a register of the names of all such persons as shall desire to become stated hearers in the said church, congregation or society, and shall therein note the time when such request was made, and the said clerk shall attend all such subsequent elections, in order to test the qualifications of such electors, in case the same should be questioned.

§ 8. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed or taken to give to any trustee of any church, congregation or society, the power to fix or ascertain any salary to be paid to any minister thereof, but the same shall be ascertained by a majority of persons entitled to elect trustees, at a meeting to be called for that purpose, and such salaries, when fixed, shall be ratified by the said trustees, or a majority of them, by an instrument in writing under their common seal, which salary shall thereupon be paid by the said trustees out of the revenues of such church, congregation or society.

§ 9. And be it further enacted, That whenever any religious corporation within this State, other than the chartered corporations, shall deem it necessary and for the interest of such religious corporation to reduce their number of trustees, that it shall and may be lawful for any such religious corporation to reduce their number of trustees at any annual meeting: Provided, That such reduction shall not be such as have a less number than three trustees in any one of the said religious corporations.

And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the chancellor of this State, upon the application of any religious corporation, in case he shall deem it proper, to make an order for the sale of any real estate belonging to such corporation, and to direct the application of the monies arising therefrom by the said corporation to such uses as the same corporation, with the consent and approbation of the chancellor, shall conceive to be most for the interest of the society to which the real estate so sold did belong: Provided, That this act shall not extend to any of the lands granted by this State for the support of the Gospel.

§ 13. And be it further enacted, That every corporation of any church, congregation or religious society heretofore made in pursuance of any law of this State, and in conformity to the directions contained in this act, shall be, and the same is hereby established and confirmed, and such corporation shall be deemed to have commenced from the time of recording such certificate as aforesaid; and in case of the dissolution of any such corporation, or of any corporation hereafter to be formed in pursuance of this act, by reason of a non-compliance with the directions herein contained, the same may be re-incorporated in the manner prescribed in this act, at any time within six years after such dissolution, and thereupon all the estate real and personal formerly belonging to the same, shall vest in such corporation, as if the same had not been dissolved: Provided, That in such case the said account and inventory required to be exhibited by such corporation in the cities of New-York, Albany and Schenectady, shall be exhibited within one month after such re-incorporation, and triennially thereafter, as above directed.

§ 15. And be it further enacted, That no religious corporation shall be deemed to be dissolved for any neglect hitherto, to exhibit an account or inventory of its real or personal estate, and the annual income thereof, nor for having held or hereafter holding elections of church officers on days before or after any moveable feast observed by such church, the intervening time between such elections being more than a solar year: Provided, That such account or inventory shall be exhibited within two years after the passing of this act, and that previous public notice be given to the congregation of the time and place of holding such elections.

§ 16. And be it further enacted, That whenever any religious corporation shall be dissolved by means of any non-user or neglect to exercise any of the powers necessary for its preservation, it shall be lawful for the religious society which was connected with such corporation, to re-incorporate itself in the mode prescribed by this act, and that thereupon all the real and personal property which did belong to such dissolved corporation at the time of its dissolution, shall vest in such new corporation for the said society.

And be it further enacted, That in every case where a church or religious society which has been or may be duly incorporated, shall have exhibited such account and inventory as is specified in the ninth section of the act, entitled "An act to provide for the incorporation of religious societies," it shall not be necessary for such church or society again to exhibit any account and inventory unless the said church or society subsequently to such exhibition shall have purchased or acquired any lands, tenements or hereditaments within this State, any act, law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided always, That nothing in this act contained, shall be construed to affect, or defeat the right of any person or persons or of any body corporate, to the estate real or personal now held, occupied or enjoyed by the corporation of Trinity church.

AN ACT TO AMEND AN ACT, ENTITLED "AN ACT TO PROVIDE FOR THE INCORPORATION OF RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES," PASSED APRIL 5, 1813. PASSED FEBRUARY 15, 1826. CHAP. 47, P. 34.

§ 1. Be it enacted by the people of the State of New-York, represented in Senate and Assembly, That if any church, congregation or religious society, now or hereafter to be incorporated, according to the provisions of the third section of the act hereby amended, shall neglect or omit, or have neglected or omitted at their stated annual election, to choose any one of the three classes of trustees as mentioned in the sixth section of the said act, the said church, congregation or religious society, shall not be deemed and taken to be thereby dissolved, but the trustees then or now already chosen, shall continue to hold their offices, until others be chosen in their stead: and whenever such neglect or omission shall happen, through defect of due notice or otherwise, the trustees of said church, congregation or religious society, or a majority of them, shall immediately thereafter give notice thereof in writing, to the minister, or in case of his death or absence, to the elders or church-wardens, and in case there shall be no elders or church-wardens, then to the deacons or vestrymen of any such church, congregation or society; and the said minister, or in case of his death or absence, one of the said elders or church-wardens, deacons or vestrymen, shall, in the manner prescribed in the third section of the said act, proceed to notify the members of the said church, congregation or society, of such neglect or omission, and appoint the time and place for the election of new trustees to remedy the same; of which election, at least fifteen days notice shall be given in the manner aforesaid. And the said election shall be held and conducted by the same persons, in the same manner, and the result be certified in like manner as is prescribed in and by the sixth section of the act hereby amended, and shall have the same force and effect as elections held under and by virtue of said section, and not otherwise.

§ 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the members of any church, congregation or society, qualified to vote for trustees, wardens or vestrymen, or a majority of them, at any stated annual meeting of the said members, to appoint and fix any day in the succeeding year, as the day on which the election of officers of such church, congregation or society shall be held; and the elections held on such day shall be as valid to all intents and purposes, as if the same had been made on the days formerly appointed for that purpose: and in case elections shall not be held on the days so appointed, it shall be the duty of the trustees, church-wardens or vestrymen, then in office, to give the notice prescribed in the first section of this act, and to proceed according to the provisions thereof, to an election to supply all vacancies then existing.

TO APOLLOS.

DEAR BROTHER—I have read thy epistle—have been amused with thy wit, and somewhat instructed by thy explanations. Thy concluding paragraph (not thy P. S.) I thank thee for—it hath refreshed my spirit.

It was not for dreaming as thou claimest to have done, that I complained of thee; but for giving certain parts of thy dream publicity. Though we be not accountable for dreams, yet surely the telling of them, when awake, is our own act. It doth not appear that the publication of dreams was considered, among the ancients, as the proper business of any of the heathen deities. How then should I have "preferred my complaint to Somnus or Morpheus?"

I did suppose that the itinerant evangelist seen by thee was a symbolical personage. If he was not, (as thou seemest to say by thy reference to a certain coppersmith, and to other real characters,) then was thy brother mistaken; and Somnus, or Morpheus, or whoever else dictated thy dream, must have designed by said itinerant to satirize merely an individual. May it not then be the case, that by some means, perhaps by the erroneous rendering of a word from the language of the dreaming into that of the waking state, (a very natural mistake,) the appellation given to thy opium eater is not the one designed for him by thy dream given? Would not itinerant revivalist better suit the sense? This is a mere suggestion; and is by no means designed to derogate from thy skill in language. Thou art unquestionably an "eloquent man." But thou certainly knowest that the language of dreams is neither vocal nor written. So also, in my former article, I had no idea of representing thee as "guilty of a solecism." I used the word corked, instead of "embossed," the word employed by thee, not as pretending to quote thy language, but as presenting the interpretation of thy language given by a smith. This remark I, not the press, unfortunately omitted.

My vocation is indeed that of an evangelist, but I am by no means so noted an itinerant as to have need of supposing myself particularly aimed at, in thy random shooting, and especially as I neither eat opium, nor am knowingly one of the opposers of truth, among whom it seems thou designest to send thy arrows. If thou art truly an evangelist, I tender to thee my cordial fellowship, and reciprocate all thy benevolent wishes. And may the time soon arrive when all true evangelists shall not only be professedly such, but eschewing pompous titles, shall be styled what they are by occupation. Grace, mercy, and peace, be with thee, and with all our kindred race. Thy brother,

"THE END JUSTIFIES THE MEANS."

In perusing the excellent tale, published in the twenty-sixth number of the present volume of your paper, I was forcibly reminded of the polluting and demoralizing influence of the sentiment that stands at the head of this article. Mr. Benson, in the tale to which we allude, is not the only individual that believes "the end justifies the means." Acting under the influence of this sentiment, man has not only persecuted his fellow-man with a fiend-like malignity, but deluged the earth with the blood of martyrs! Acting under its influence, selfishness has created bitter jars and contentions that have convulsed neighborhoods and nations; and well nigh rent society asunder! It has caused devastation and death, to cover the fairest portions of human society, and could it be traced in all its legitimate bearings, could we see its effects throughout its desolating course, we should hear "the moan of the widow and the cry of the orphan," and perceive that dread misery had entwined her deadliest coils around many an aching heart.—Analyze the long vista of past events, and we discover that it exerted no small influence in instilling those hellish tortures that in Spain have reeked with the blood of more than six hundred and seventy thousand human beings. This sentiment has exerted a powerful influence in producing that utter recklessness and disregard of honor, that is now so prevalent in our own country. And is it a source of wonder? The preacher says (in private) that "the end justifies the means." He practices this precept in public, and the people also believe and practice it. Religion is practical. We are commanded to practice it, and if we believe that "the end justifies the means" in religion, we doubtless shall in other matters. This belief removes all restraint, and if we resort to improper means to accomplish an end however desirable, we act upon a principle that may carry us headlong on to ruin. One vice or even an impropriety, soon opens the way for another, and that for a third, and thus on, till life is one continued scene of misery and degradation. Hence we see the consequence of even resorting to improper measures to accomplish our purposes.

We have said that clergymen sometimes teach and practice this sentiment. The following story was related to us by a highly respectable Partialist lady, and is no doubt substantially correct.—Should it happen to meet her eye, we trust she will pardon its publication, as the good of community imperiously demands that the motives of public men, should be generally known and appreciated. In the Winter of 1833, a protracted meeting was held among the Baptists in the society of W—, county of O—, and State of N. Y. The Rev. Mr. C—, a Presbyterian, who resided a few miles distant, was invited to attend and take part in the services. He accepted the invitation, and in a discourse delivered at that meeting, endeavoured to prove, not only that the Bible countenanced protracted meetings, with all their concomitant appendages; but that many instances might be cited from both the Old and New Testament, which showed that the Jews and the primitive Christians held such meetings, and adopted such measures. If our memory serves us, among other instances given, as proof, was the meeting of the children of Israel in the wilderness. Our intelligent and pious informant did not happen to be present, and when his remarks were related to her, she sincerely doubted their truth, and supposed he must have been misunderstood. Being an acquaintance, not long after, and while the meeting was being held, he called at her house. At a suitable time, she mentioned some of the assertions said to have been made by him, and asked if he made them. He informed her that he did. "Do you believe that the meeting of the children of Israel in the wilderness, and the other instances you cited, afford evidence of the antiquity of protracted meetings, similar to the present? Not exactly. You say you preach so, and do not believe it. Being closely questioned, he told her, that he believed that it was sometimes absolutely necessary to preach what he did not believe, and among other observations said, that without doing this he never could produce a revival!" The lady was astonished. She believed in the efficacy of protracted meetings, but not believing that "the end justified the means," she thought that they should be supported by none but honest arguments, and observed, "if that is your opinion, I will not hear you preach."

Such was the acknowledgement of a zealous advocate of those new fangled measures, that have filled the earth with mourning, and veiled the character of their heavenly Father in clouds of almighty wrath and vengeance, that have prostrated the intellect of man, and all that is fair and lovely in the moral creation! The deep depravity, heartless pretensions, and base hypocrisy that have been shown to extensively pervade the breasts of many of our people, bear ample testimony, that the tendency of their system is as base and licentious, as its doctrines are cruel and revolting! "Whoso readeth let him understand."

to perform a duty. It not only serves to convince the sinner that he has certain laws to obey, and to lead him better to appreciate happiness by tasting of its opposite; but it also serves to enlighten the sensibilities of man towards his fellow-man, and soften down all our faculties to that state of vestal purity which is a necessary requisite to a sweet communion with God. Nay, it does more. It enables us to discover who are our friends (for friends must be tried as well as gold,) and to bring down the proud heart of the infidel to acknowledge that there is a God, by evidence which he must feel, if he does not see. The satisfaction derived from sympathy alone, (which is the offspring of adversity,) is enough to warrant us in saying that it is beneficial to mankind.

UNIVERSAL-ER.

Br. Grosh—Why may we not claim the credit of making a word for our own accommodation!—In taverns and groceries—among the profane and licentious, and in various other cases and places, the word at the head of this article is used instead of our own name. And glad am I that it is so, if it would only be understood.

Not long since in a conference of Partialists, a certain member was very profuse in belching out against Universalism. He exclaimed in high tone. "I was once a Universal-er—I would lie, swear, cheat, get drunk," etc., etc.—How often do we hear of some drunken sot exclaiming "I am a Universal-er, by—," as great an oath as profane man could turn his tongue to. Let these things be understood and our purpose will be answered. Let the term Universal-er apply to those characters, and they can then, in short metre, be distinguished from the Christian community, bearing and deserving the name Universalist, without making use of a lengthy phrase as we are frequently obliged to do.—Br. Grosh how will it do?

SINCERITY OF LOVE.

"Let love be without dissimulation."—PAUL.

What does the apostle mean by this exhortation? "Let love be without dissimulation." Does he mean that there is danger of true and genuine Christian affection's assembling, or acting for the profit of the hypocrite, and thus deceiving mankind, either friend or foe, to their injury? No; surely not. For he says in the same epistle, "Love worketh no ill to his neighbor; therefore love is the fulfilling of the law." Does he mean that there is danger that genuine love will often be found in company with hypocrisy or dissimulation? No; for it is scarcely possible to find two principles farther apart than true Christian love and base and heartless hypocrisy. The poles are not farther apart. The Chinese and Americans are not greater antipodes. The one is of heaven, the other of earth; the one from above, and the other from beneath.

What then does he mean? We answer, he means to exhort his brethren to exercise love itself, in all its purity and power, and not merely pretend to love one another while they were destitute of the principle at heart. He means precisely what John means (1 Epis. iii: 18) when he says, "My little children, let us not love in word, neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth." He would not have his brethren dissimble, and with honied words and fair speeches pretend to be full of love and good will towards each other, while at heart and in their practices they were ready to bite and devour one another.

The exhortation, "Let love be without dissimulation," might be well applied and profitably urged in many cases at the present day. When the deserving poor and the unfortunate needy apply to the rich and independent for aid, assistance, or patronage, and get nothing but expressions of pity and protestations of love, there is a great lack of that love which is without dissimulation.

When people have visitors call to see them, and protest how very, very glad they are to wait on them, and then go about the house fretting to every member and domestic in the family, because their quondam friends have called to see them, and they are thus compelled to wait on company, we are reminded of the exhortation, "Let love be without dissimulation."

When either old or new acquaintances accidentally meet each other, and protest how very much gratified each would be to receive a visit from the other, and on parting, each congratulates himself, that the other did not accept of his invitation, it looks much as if there were a large share of dissimulation and little or no genuine love between them.

When husbands and wives in the presence of visitors and strangers, call each other by a profusion of tender names, such as "my love," "my dear," etc., and immediately on being left alone, fall to quarreling like cats and dogs, and liberally shower on each other every vile epithet they can think of, it appears as if they much needed to be under the tuition of good old Paul.

When merchants offer you their goods twenty-five per cent. lower, as they say, than they have ever offered them to others, just to oblige you, and even at a price which they protest is actually below their cost, because they are so very desirous of giving you a good bargain, and then make the same offers to every one who enters their shop, it would be well to say to them, Let your love to me be without dissimulation.

When doctors persuade you, out of pure friendship, as they say, that you are really very ill, and need their attendance and a thorough course of medicine, and then go to work doctoring you till they make you sick, and keep you so till their bills for attendance amount to half enough to support your family half a year, and your health is poorer than when they began, you have abundant reason to suppose there is much less of friendship and love than avarice and dissimulation.

When lawyers persuade you to enter the field of litigation for the sake of obtaining justice, and after keeping you in the mill of the law for five years, under the pretence that they are so friendly to you they cannot bear to see you wronged out of your rights, finally strip you of your whole fortune to pay their own fees, you may properly vary the language of the text and say, Let avidity be without dissimulation.

When ministers of the Gospel profess so much love for souls, that they are willing to spend and be spent, if they can only be instrumental in converting and saving one poor soul, at the same time professing to believe that every collar that is given to the missionary society, may be instrumental in saving from one to three heathen souls, while they themselves are living in the most luxurious manner and hoarding up large sums of money yearly from their salaries, the question arises, Is there any dissimulation in these professions of love?

When people tell how ardently they love the cause of religion, how much they are willing to do to support the stated ministrations of the Word, and engage a worthy minister of the Gospel to remove and live and labor with them, and then refuse or neglect to do what they had promised him, and, as is often the case, allow him and his family to be continually vexed and harassed for want of that competent support and encouragement they had engaged to render him, the question occurs, Do such people love the cause of truth and religion without dissimulation? or is their love only in word and tongue, and not in deed and truth?

When a large body of professing Christians, at their annual meeting spend most of their time in quarreling with each other, cutting off heretical branches, and indulging in such a spirit and such language as one of their leaders solemnly declares causes an annual jubilee in hell, sober and reflecting people are disposed to ask, Is their professed love for each other without dissimulation?

An application of these questions and of the text, may be made to a great variety of people, classes, professions and individuals, but the above instances must suffice for the present; they will at least serve as specimens of cases where there is quite as much of dissimulation as of genuine Christian love.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

How unwise and impolitic in society, to deprive itself of the services of any of its members—even the worst—when as experience proves, the services of even such may be beneficially used! On principles of mere utility—of profit and loss, then, (not to say anything of moral and religious considerations,) we should abolish capital punishments, and substitute long confinement with useful employment, in its stead.

Let us take an estimate of the expense of a public execution. Say 5000 persons attend it, each one day—one half with horses and other conveyances—and this is but a moderate calculation. We have then an expense of at least 5000 dollars, independent of the military and executive department—of the gallows—of the money expended in food and drink—of the time and money spent in visiting the prisoner previous to his execution—all of which would treble the above sum at the least. Fifteen thousand dollars worse than thrown away to choke a man to death! Surely a better disposition could be made of the criminal—one less expensive to community—more beneficial to the world—more salutary to those to whom his punishment is to be an example—more humanizing—more in accordance with civilization, and more consonant to the mild and forbearing principles of Christianity.

To those who doubt it, I would put the question—and would beg them frequently and deeply to ponder it in their hearts—Can a worse disposition be made of a criminal, than to hang him? Of course, I except setting him loose on society, which is not to dispose of him at all.—But can a worse use be made of a human being, than to hang him? I can imagine no worse use than destruction,—no more demoralizing scene for society, than a public execution—and certainly there can be no punishment less calculated to reform the criminal, than capital punishment.

But such is the sanctity of the laws in the eyes of lawyers and legislators, that nothing but the demands of the people will induce them to altar even its errors.—Like sectarian theologians, they will cling to even a wrong translation for proof, sooner than give up a false doctrine which they have taught as truth. Or, like Jonah, they would sooner see all Ninevah destroyed, than have their reputations as prophets called in question. In the common sense, good judgment and humanity of the mass of the people, then, I place my whole reliance for the abolition of capital punishments.

WHAT HAVE WE DONE?

It would appear as if some of us had highly offended nearly all of our numerous correspondents, so studied is their silence, and so long continued. From some of them we have heard nothing for nearly a year—from others, not for several months! What is the matter? What have we done to deserve such long silence and neglect?—Whatever it may be, may we not hope we have been sufficiently punished? It is really dreadful to think that sickness may come again, and prostrate me on the bed of languishing and pain—and that if it does, I leave the office without a supply of copy, and no one to furnish it—that even now, just recovering from the debility of my late illness, I am racked and perplexed to find the necessary copy to fill out the paper acceptably to its readers and satisfactorily to myself! How long must such a state of perplexity be my portion? Will not some or all of our former and late correspondents take pity on us, and as soon as possible relieve us by furnishing us several articles apiece? A few sermons are needed, but our principal want is for articles of from half a column to two or three columns in length. Of these we can never have too many on hand. We like a box full, ready prepared for the press, from which the hands may draw as they want them, without fear of exhausting the supply.

We would name, by name, those on whom we thus call—but the list is too long—let every correspondent to this paper consider herself or himself especially addressed, and answer the call accordingly.

A. B. G.

WESTERN ASSOCIATIONS.

I will be unable to attend any of these bodies. The scanty supply of copy, scarcely coming in fast enough to supply the demand, requires my constant attendance at home. But, worst of all, the scanty remittances we have received, and yet receive, absolutely prevent my leaving home. By the most rigid economy, I can scarcely make out to procure the necessities of life for my family, even aided by credit—let alone to pay the constantly recurring demands for other items—and how then can I find means to travel? True the money expended in going West, would ultimately be well spent—but so great is the pressure of the present time, that I can not afford to put money to harvest. I must therefore stay at home, and aid in weathering the difficulties here as well as I can.

I have purposely abstained from saying any thing of our difficulties, presuming our patrons would guess them—but there are some demands ahead which we must meet—there are some now due which we should meet—and the question has been asked several times whether I would not attend the Western Associations—all of which have induced me to state the above facts. Our debtors and agents will therefore see the necessity of aiding us as soon as possible, by paying us what they can, of the many small sums due to us—the whole, if possible.—May we not hope that every one will use a little exertion to be credited in full on our books, and thus relieve us from a very great burden? Do try—we ask it from your brotherly kindness, as well as from your justice and your generosity.

CIRCULAR.

TO THE STANDING CLERKS OF THE UNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATIONS IN THE STATE OF NEW-YORK.

Brethren—Having been appointed by the State Convention, at its late session, to prepare a statistical report of the condition of our denomination in this State, to be presented to the United States Convention in September next, I respectfully solicit your aid in preparing the same. Will you please, therefore, to furnish me with a definite answer to the following questions, as you have it in your power to furnish.

1. What are the limits of your Association?
2. When was it formed?
3. What was its original number of churches, societies, congregations, preachers, members and attendants on meetings?
4. What was the number of meeting-houses owned by Universalists in its limits when formed—and what number owned in part?
5. What is the present number of churches, societies, congregations, preachers, members of societies and attendants on meetings in its limits?
6. What the present number of Universalist and of Union meeting-houses in its limits?
7. What has been the probable increase of churches, societies, congregations, preachers, meeting-houses, etc., during the past year?
8. What number of societies is supplied with preaching, the whole, half, and quarter of the time?
9. What number is supplied with merely occasional preaching?
10. What number of societies, is destitute of preaching?

To these add any other information you may deem interesting or useful.

I do not expect that you will be able to answer every question here put, definitely and fully—though an answer to every one is desirable; but hope you will be able to answer such a number of them as will enable me to make a full, general and distinct statement—a thing that has never yet been done in relation to the cause in this State.

Please answer as early as possible, as my report must be made out before the 15th of September next, and will require sometime in its preparation. Let your answers therefore, reach here at least before the 10th of September next. Respectfully and fraternally yours, Utica, August 8, 1837.

APOLOGY.

I verily thought when we put our last paper to press, that I would have been able to write as usual for the columns of the present paper. But though regaining my former strength as rapidly as could have been expected, I found my hand too unsteady to guide a pen with ease and freedom, during the past week. This difficulty is also disappearing, and I now have good reason to believe I shall be able to attend to my duties as usual from henceforth. For the past I throw myself on the usual indulgence and kindness of our readers, and shall endeavor to merit their generous indulgence, by never drawing on it without imperious necessity for so doing.

A. B. G.

Br. S. Felton, of Westville, is informed that the person to whom he says he paid money for me one year ago, is not an authorized Agent either for me or for Brs. Grosh and Hutchinson. We have no confidence in that individual and shall never appoint him our agent. Will Br. Felton please attend to this, and so arrange matters as to prevent any evil consequences from his well-meant mistake in paying over the money, etc.?

BRETHREN—Permit me respectfully to remind you of the following resolution, passed by the "General Convention of Universalists in the United States," at its last session, viz.:—

Resolved, That the Standing Clerks of the several State Conventions, be requested to forward to the Standing Clerk of the United States Convention, a certified list of their respective delegates elect, as soon as may be after said elections may be made.

The importance of attending to this request, may be seen by the next resolution of the same session, which I subjoin:—

Resolved, That it shall be the duty of the Standing Clerk of the United States Convention, to prepare a list of the delegates thus appointed, and present the same to this body; which, when certified by the clerk, shall be the roll of the Convention.

As the time is approaching when I must prepare such list for the next session, I would respectfully request the clerks of the several State Conventions to forward their respective lists as soon as possible.

SHE DIED IN BEAUTY.

BY JOHN C. McCABE.

She died in beauty, like the young rose leaf,
When ling'ring frost has nipt the fragile stem,
She died in beauty like the dew drop brief,
That glitters in the flower's diadem.

She died in beauty like the soft South winds,
That crisp the deep blue star reflected lake;
She died in beauty like the wreath that binds
The statue's brow when minstrels cease to wake.
The wonted sounds of song, or harp in hall;
And plume and casque in rusty silence lie,
Nor laugh through diamond panes the bright blue sky.

She died in beauty like the fairy strain
Of midnight music, or the Arabian's breath;
Or like the last lay faintly heard again,
Of stricken swan, as slow it melts in death.

She died in beauty like an angel's sigh,
When on its white wing falls a sorrowing tear
For erring man, as with uplifted eye
It breathes a benison for wanderers here.

She died in beauty like a morning star,
That slowly sinks beneath the gay-god's blaze,
Fading (yet lovely) till it fades afar,
And softly dies before the morning's rays.

She died in beauty and in beauty lives,
For Heaven is beautiful and she is there—
Sweet is the hope divine religion gives
As from our cheek it wipes the woeful tears.

THE VOICE OF GOD.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

Amidst the thrilling leaves thy voice
At evening's fall drew near;
Father! and did not man rejoice
That blessed sound to hear?
Did not his heart with him burn,
Touched by the solemn tone?
Not so! for, never to return,
Its purity was gone.
Therefore midst holy stream and bower,
His spirit shook with dread,
And called the cedars in that hour
To veil his conscious head.
Oh! in each wind, each fountain's flow,
Each whisper of the shade,
Grant me, my God! thy voice to know,
And not to be afraid.

A FEW IDEAS ON PUBLIC AND PRIVATE EDUCATION.

Various opinions are entertained upon the question, whether public or private education be preferable.—The term education is here taken in a limited sense, and the answer would be easy, if education were what it ought to be. In the actual state of things, the greater number of parents can not adopt the private mode of education for want of pecuniary means. They must have recourse to public schools, if they wish to give to their children any education at all. The question, then, concerns chiefly the richer classes of society.

There are advantages and disadvantages on both sides. Generally speaking, in private education, moral conduct and religious principles may be more carefully taught, and the natural dispositions better exercised. But here we must suppose the governors to be of superior ability. Such persons, however, are not so easily found. On the other hand, private teachers and servants kindle very often inferior propensities, which would remain inactive were the children sent to public schools. Again, as the education of boys and girls must be conducted in a different manner, particularly in large towns, several day or boarding-schools become necessary. And if in these the moral conduct be particularly attended to, they will combine the advantages of a public and private education. In them, physical education can be better attended to than at home; common play grounds and bodily exercise can be more easily procured. Such abodes are commonly in healthy situations, and better teachers may also be provided. It is of advantage to children to afford them opportunities of comparing their talents with those of others. When alone, they easily think themselves above all other children; but when together, they often feel their inferiority. The less intercourse we have with others, the sooner we are satisfied with ourselves. This happens with children as well as with adults.—Those who have travelled with reflection and without prejudice, lose in many respects their national pride.—

They find that every where there are good and bad, ignorant and well informed persons. Whoever remains confined to his own small circle, thinks all other society inferior, partly through a natural attachment to his accustomed manners, and partly through his not knowing what others are, or what advantages they possess.

Knowledge of the world, of different characters, of manners and social intercourse, is an important point in education. It is easily acquired in public institutions. Children soon learn to distinguish between the different manners of feeling and thinking of their companions.

Greater uniformity in manners, more mutual attachment, and general benevolence, more order and greater readiness to obey and to depend on their superiors, may result from public education. There the feelings, in general, may be more easily exercised and directed, because society is indispensable to that purpose, and private education can never afford the same opportunity. Finally the great effect of emulation is entirely lost in private instruction; and emulation may be necessary to some children in order to push them on.

Thus, even in the actual state of things, public institutions are preferable, and they will be far superior, if once regulated according to sound principles and adapted to human nature.

The great object of education is, not to create, but to prepare, to develop, or to impede, and to direct the natural dispositions: vegetative, affective and intellectual. The nature of the fundamental powers, and the condition on which their manifestations depend, must be known, to enable us to cultivate and direct them. The difference between the feelings and intellectual faculties is particularly to be attended to. Then, if the means of excitement and those of direction be employed, as I have detailed them, arts and sciences will improve, moral evil will diminish, and mankind will become more happy.—I do not flatter myself, however, that in the present state of mankind, the most perfect education can abolish all disorders. Hence institutions of another kind are necessary, which I shall speak of in the following pages.—Spurzheim on Education.

MARRIAGES.

DEATHS.

In this city, on the 30th ult., WILLIAM H., youngest son of J. C. Space, aged 15 months.

In this city, on the 31st ult., of the Summer complaint, GEORGE R., youngest son of Orin and Emeline Marshall, aged about 18 months.

On the 20th of July last, by poison, in consequence of eating some perussion caps, ALVIN, son of Ira White, of Markham, U. C., aged 2 years.

In Sharon, Medina county, Ohio, on the 27th of June last, after a distressing illness of seven weeks, Mrs. ABIGAIL BRIGGS, consort of Br. Thomas Briggs, aged 42.—The deceased was formerly a resident of Bloomfield, N. Y., where she was expelled from the Baptist church for expressing her belief in a world's salvation. It is doing no more than to speak the language of all acquainted with her, to say that she was an affectionate wife, an amiable companion, an exemplary mother and a devout Christian. She departed this life under the influence of the love of God; fully believing in the doctrine of impartial and unmined grace. She found by happy experience that it was indeed, a source of never-failing consolation. Her death although distressing was triumphant in hope, and joyful through faith in a world's salvation. She breathed out her soul in peace, and calmly passed from the entanglements of mortality into that celestial temple not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

"Sweet is the scene where virtue dies;
Where sinks the righteous soul to rest;
How mildly beam the closing eyes!
How gently heaves the dying breast!
So fades a Summer cloud away;
So sinks the gale when storms are o'er;
So gently shuts the eye of day;
So dies a wave along the shore."

The Glad Tidings will please copy the foregoing.

STEPHEN HULL.

In Stack, on the 14th of June, WILLIAM, son of Christian Brommer, aged 12 years. The deceased left his father's house on the morning of the 13th, and in the afternoon was found in the edge of a wood with his feet entangled in the reins of a bride attached to a colt, he was bruised and mangled in the most shocking manner and died on the day above mentioned. His funeral was attended on the following day in the Otsego meeting-house, and a discourse delivered by the writer to a large and attentive audience of sympathizing friends and relatives, from Rom. viii: 38-39. AGENTS.

We this week commence publishing another list of agents, revised and corrected, but still not as perfect as we could wish. Much, very much depends upon our having a good active agent in every place where the paper circulates, yet there are many places where we have a number of subscribers who are subject to inconvenience in making remittances, merely because we do not know which of their number to appoint our agent. It is possible that the names of some who have been in the habit of acting as agents may, through mistake, be omitted from our list. But our subscribers must be their own judges as to the responsibility of such. If they are responsible men, the subscribers will run no risk in transacting business with them, if they are not we must look to the subscribers, not them, for our pay, as we consider ourselves responsible for the acts of none but those whom we publish as agents. We will cheerfully correct any errors in our list, when notified of them.

ESSAY.

Written for the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate.

A CORRECT KNOWLEDGE OF GOD, THE NATURE OF MAN, AND OF DIVINE GOVERNMENT, ESSENTIAL TO PRODUCE A FAITH IN, AND PRACTICE OF UNIVERSALISM.

BY REV. S. P. LANDERS, OF PROMPTON, WAYNE COUNTY, PA.

When we take a survey of the world, we discover that there are existing among men, numerous religious sects and doctrines, widely differing from each other, both in consistency and moral tendency. Each sect has its peculiar views or tenets, and each its advocates. We find, too, that the means used to further the knowledge of these respective systems, have been as widely different and various, as the systems themselves. The advocates of each system, believing their doctrine to be the Gospel of Jesus, and consequently calculated to dispel the moral blindness and mental debasement of our race, have used their exertions to extend the knowledge, and, in some cases, the practice of their religion. But contemplating them all, we find that as the character of the Deity has been viewed by each individual sect, so have been their doctrines, and so, to a certain extent, have been their efforts to extend the knowledge of them.

It is a truth that must be obvious to every observer, that whenever the character of the Deity has been misunderstood, and it has been supposed that he was angry at the follies of his creatures, and pleased by the performance of some religious rite—like the pagan divinity, Janus, smiling upon his friends and frowning upon his enemies—whenever the character of God has thus been viewed by any sect, the doctrines of that sect bear the same features which are supposed to exist in the Deity, and when the dictates of reason are overpowered, their sentiments are too often carried out in practice.

It is true that our religion, and, to a certain extent, our characters and dealings with our fellow men, are regulated by the character which is supposed to exist in the being we adore. This is equally true with the Pagan, the Mussulman, the Jew, or the Christian. Hence, to promote the knowledge and practice of true religion, it is necessary to have correct ideas of God, of ourselves, and of divine government. Since, then, it is so impossible to come to right conclusions from wrong premises, it will be the design of this essay, to begin at the basis of all true piety and religion, by considering—

I. The necessity of having correct and just ideas of the character of God.

II. The necessity of a proper knowledge of the nature of man, and the motives that will influence him to obey the truth.

III. The necessity of an acquaintance with the nature of DIVINE GOVERNMENT, and its adaptation to the purpose for which it was instituted; and

IV. The consequences that will follow, when the knowledge of these considerations shall be known and obeyed.

Universalism professes to be founded on, and derived from the attributes existing in the Deity, and hence to promote the knowledge and practice of this religion, it is necessary to know these attributes. To do this, we proceed with our first proposition.

I. The necessity of correct and just ideas of the character of God.

The only way of acquainting ourselves with the character of God, is by the study of his providence and his revelation. The means we possess, derived from the page of Nature and Revelation, are amply sufficient to satisfy any enlightened mind of the true nature of the Deity, since they both agree in teaching the same great truth, that "God is love," and that "the Lord is good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all his works." God has not revealed this in word, and contradicted it in his works; for the continued manifestation of his love to a wanting world, brings the truth home to our understandings, that from the "Father of lights" comes every good we enjoy. God is the creator, and stands in the relation of father to all mankind. This our Saviour has inculcated by teaching his followers that "One is your Father who is in heaven, and all ye are brethren," and by instructing his disciples to call God by the endearing appellation, "Our Father." This the prophet has taught us by the interrogations—"Have we not all one Father? Hath not one God created us?" This was true in the morn of creation, this was true when the prophet taught, and this God continues to confirm, by his kind and parental protection, his guardian and watchful care over the creatures of his power. His love is as far above our comprehension as his being, but is the same in kind that he has been pleased to implant in the heart of man.

God is the only self-existent being in the universe, consequently his love must be underived, uncaused, unbounded, coeval with himself, and lasting as eternity. This being the case, we infer that he is, and always was the same, infinitely happy and glorious—that to him, all that is past, all that is present, and all that is future, exist as one infinite and eternal now. God being infinitely perfect in all his attributes, cannot be made more merciful, more just, or more happy, by the workmanship of his hands.

For what purpose, then, was intelligent man created? Was it to augment God's happiness or glory? This is impossible. God's nature being love, and his own eternal mind looking forward and comprehending all the changes of time, and the scenes that man must pass through, he could not, without violating his own nature, give being to an intelligent world, for the express purpose that that being should prove an endless curse to its possessors. Considering his nature, the only reasonable conclusion that can be drawn, is, that God has destined man to be happy, happy not only in time, but happy during eternity. He has given us an existence, and made it the basis of all enjoyment. We need but open our eyes, to see the continued manifestations of that same love, the operation of the same wisdom, and the display of the same power, whose combined influence first devised and put in execution the great plan of the creation of a world. God has not only given us a being, but he has distinguished it from all others by the faculty of reason. He has given us a social nature, which leads us to mingle with our fellow man—to participate in his joys and sorrows; and to improve the weaknesses of our nature, he has added the Gospel of Jesus, to support the weak, to give peace to the sorrowful and comfort to the mourner, to give hope to the desponding, and sustain the dying, to disarm death of its terrors and the grave of its darkness—in one word, to bind mind to mind, and man to his God with one everlasting bond of union and friendship. These few indications of his love and goodness, were there no others, are sufficient to establish the truth, that God has created man for happiness. But there are other views of the divine character, equally important for the furtherance of the Gospel.

1. The impartiality of God's love. There are many sincere Christians who believe in the love of God, yet entertain very erroneous views concerning his character. The Saviour has taught that God is impartially good unto all, to the evil as well as the good. He has commanded us "to love our enemies, bless them who curse us, do good to them that hate us, and pray for them that despitefully use us and persecute us," and the reason given for this requirement is, "that we may be the children of our Father in heaven."

This knowledge is of great importance to the Christian world. Man is an imitative being, and he naturally regulates his conduct according to the character of the Deity he worships. If he believes that God has determined to show favor to a part of his creatures, and that he has doomed the others to dishonor and wrath, he very naturally exercises the same spirit, and loves those to whom God has determined to show mercy, and disregards those doomed to destruction. The fruit of this belief may be seen exemplified to the very letter, in the conduct of the ancient Pharisees and Jews. They believed that God was partial to them and their nation, and that the Gentiles were the objects of his displeasure; and while they thus believed, the secret whisper constantly rose in their minds, "stand by thyself, come not near to me, for I am more holy than thou." But let the broad and illimitable spirit and grace of the Gospel be poured into the mind with its life-giving power, and let man believe, in sincerity, that "God commendeth his love towards us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us," and the contrast between such a faith and the former, will be daily evinced by mildness and benevolence between man and man. If, then, we would believe and teach Universalism, let us remember that "God is no respecter of persons."

2. The justice of God. The Christian community has long been in an error on this important attribute of God, by supposing that it is the very antipode of mercy. It has long been supposed that the mercy of the Deity would save the human race, but inflexible justice must have its demands, and therefore some must be lost. But this same community is necessitated to admit that God will the salvation of all men, notwithstanding his justice, and he being just, can not will an unjust act, therefore if justice ever has its demands, all men must be saved according to their own reasoning.

Justice is but a modification of goodness. What is just in the Deity, is just in man; and it would be folly to argue that to be just, we must be unmerciful. Such an assertion would contradict the good sense of any individual. God is just in all his dealings with man, therefore we are required to "be (mimetic) imitators of God as dear children," and "to do justly and to love mercy," etc. But it is allowed that justice is an indispensable virtue among men. If, then, it is attended with good where it exists in a finite degree, it must be attended with greater good in God, where every attribute is perfect.

In addition to these attributes, we are taught that God is immutable, "without variableness or the shadow of turning." Hence he changes not. He is of the same mind that he was when he saw all he had made: "and behold it was very good." He is now the same kind and good being that he was, when he commissioned Jesus to a world lost in sin, and alienated from its duty, its happiness, and its God. The means to promote this knowledge must vary according to the habits, the customs, and the tempers of those who teach; but he "who spake as never man spake," has taught this character of the all-wise Creator, by appealing to the impartial and universal dispensation of his providence in the works of nature. The falling shower, the impartial diffusion of the sunbeams, and the satisfaction of all the wants of dependent man, are living examples of the impartial goodness of God. The works of nature, and the volume of holy Writ, show forth this great truth, and to them we must appeal for the confirmation of this view of the divine character.

These views of the character of God should be confirmed by his works and his word. When this is done—when God shall be regarded as the Father and Friend of man—the Christian world will work itself aright; it will be impossible in the nature of things to come to any other conclusion than that “God is the saviour of all men”—that “he will reconcile all things unto himself,” by his own beloved, Jesus Christ—that when time’s course shall end, every foe of man will be destroyed—the Saviour bring every wanderer back to the fold—his mission be ended, his kingdom be delivered up to the Father—that then “shall tears be wiped from all eyes,” “and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things are passed away”—that “every creature in heaven, and on the earth, under the earth, and such as are in the sea,” shall be heard singing the song of redemption, salvation and glory, and God himself “be all in all.”

This is the conclusion to which the Scriptures bring us, and this is the only one to which reason responds, amen. The more and the oftener we appeal to the Scriptures and the providence of God in confirmation of these sentiments, the brighter will they become. As the dim light which first appears in the East, increases in brightness and splendor, till the sun reaches the meridian, so it will be with the mind, when these views are infused into the soul; they will expand wider and wider, till man shall behold the truth in all its loveliness, and the daylight of Heaven’s truth and joy shall dawn upon his mind. When “the Sun of righteousness shall arise with healing in his wings,” on the darkened understanding, the character of the Deity will appear more and more lovely, his providence more and more just and impartial, and the fruit of this knowledge will be seen lighting up the countenance with joy and peace, and man will become what he should be, a good and happy citizen. This is the legitimate fruit of a correct knowledge of the character of the Deity. These views can be simplified and taught to the child by the parent; but since children always copy from example rather than precept, let the parent illustrate the ways of God in the various avocations of the domestic circle, by acting at all times on the same principles that God acts.

Every child should be carefully instructed concerning God’s true character, and the duty existing between the child and its parent. No time in the period of man, is more important than the seasons of childhood and youth. The impressions that are made on the mind at these early periods, are almost indelible, and generally go with us through life. How important, then, for the well-being of man, it is for the parent to impart to his child proper ideas of God. The parent who loves his good, his religion, and the welfare of his children, will generally imbue the tender minds of those placed under his care, with those principles which will sweeten every temporal blessing, guide and sustain through the vicissitudes of life, and crown old age with honor and peace. No duty incumbent on the parent, is more important than that of instructing his children in that religion which will increase their happiness here, and perfect their bliss and joy in heaven.

II. The necessity of a proper knowledge of the nature of man, and the motives that will influence him to obey the truth.

The object of the following remarks is to show, that if we would promote happiness by advancing any religion, that religion must not violate our moral, religious, and intellectual nature. “God created man in his own image, after his own likeness; in the image of God created he him, male and female created he them.” As children resemble their parents in form; so man resembles his heavenly Parent in a spiritual point of view, “for God is a spirit.” This illustration is used by the apostle Paul, when speaking to the idolaters of Athens—he says, “as certain of your own poets have said; For we are his offspring. Forasmuch then, as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man’s devices.” The argument of the apostle stands thus:—“if we are the offspring of God, he can not be like those images of gold, silver, and stone; for the offspring must resemble the parent. Seeing, therefore, that we are intelligent beings, He, from whom we have received our existence, must also be intelligent.”

Man is not only the creature but the child of God. This is clearly taught, both in nature and revelation. Since man is the creature, the child, the offspring of God, his nature, to a certain extent, must be godlike. Having remarked on the nature of the Deity, it will be unnecessary to pursue that subject further, to show what the nature of mankind must be, “who are made after the similitude (or likeness) of God.”

The Creator has given to man animal faculties, but these relate to the body. But if he possesses these in common with the brute, he has others distinct from them. He has intellectual faculties, and by ratiocination becomes a progressive being. He has moral powers, by the assistance of which, he perceives and knows the difference between right and wrong. He has a religious nature which impels him, like the instinct in the brute, to worship some object or being. By the power of his religious faculties, he is made a religious being.—The Psalmist in giving utterance to his religious feelings, says, “As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God. My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God.”—Many deny that religion is natural to man, but it is evident from the page of history, as well as from the Scriptures, that man is a religious being.—The unnatural rites of Paganism and those of the Christian church during the middle ages, prove that man’s religious faculties are more powerful than his intellectual. The abuse of any faculty is no argument against its existence, but positive proof of its predominancy. All the faculties of man may be satisfied without warring with any of the others, and then he is most happy. But from the strong power of his religious nature, he believes in certain doctrines, and performs certain religious rites, which violate his moral and intellectual nature, and the consequence is, they detract from his happiness. Being ignorant of his own constitution, he expects happiness in gratifying to excess a particular desire to the total neglect and violation of all others.

For an example to illustrate this, we take the atheist who believes in no supreme Intelligence, and who regards all religion as the fruit of an over-heated imagination. Ask him if he is satisfied in the possession of his faith, and the secret out-breaking of his soul responds, “No.” There is a longing desire which remains unsatisfied—an aching void in the mind—a something which is constantly inclining him to embrace some more reasonable system to suppress the confusion and doubt reigning in his bosom. The reason of all this is, he who believes in atheism, violates his nature, the religious faculties of his mind remain unsatisfied, and while they are thus, they are constantly reaching out, like the hungry man, for something to satiate their longings. The man must remain unhappy as long as he thus believes.

For another example to illustrate the same, we take the religious man, who ascribes all zeal and fanaticism to the impulse of religion—who believes that for the offences that man commits while he acts on the stage of life, his Creator will punish him ages without number, and time without end, and all this without the least probable benefit, either to the punished, the punisher, or any other being in the universe. Ask such a person, if the contemplation of the Deity affords him happiness and peace?—ask such an one, if the future destiny of man is all he could desire? The answer is as before. Such a doctrine contradicts all the principles of right and justice, and while these are violated, the soul is ill at ease. Nature calls aloud for obedience, but she is looked upon as a deceiver, aiming at the prostration of all happiness, both here and hereafter. The most holy and devout aspirations of the heart have been regarded as the teachings of depraved nature, and thus believing the most pious and humble Christians have frequently been driven to despair and suicide.—They suppose that their desires are wholly averse to the will of God, and therefore their hearts are yet at enmity with him, their faith is infidelity, their hope a delusion, and their religion hypocrisy. All this is to be attributed to their ignorance of God, and their own nature. Could they believe that man bears the impress of his Maker, and that therefore his nature must be right, they would inquire into those doctrines of theology, at which reason and benevolence revolt. The result of this investigation would be, the abandonment of false systems, and the advancement of righteousness and truth. Universalism will advance just in the ratio that ignorance and superstition recede.

The theology taught in nature is the most happy illustration of the great truths of the Bible; for here the love, the goodness, and the wisdom of God are seen and felt. But in all the works of God, his love and goodness are not more clearly evinced than in the constitution of man. Hence, it is necessary to be acquainted with it, not only for the purpose of knowing what religion coincides with the nature of man, but for the purpose of showing the wisdom and benevolence of the Deity. When we show that man is formed for happiness, the mechanism of the body, the perfect adaptation of means to ends in that body, and the exquisite contrivance of the physical constitution, all show that the Creator had benevolent intentions in creating man. When we appeal to these things to prove the love of God, the question naturally arises in every mind, can these be the works of a malevolent being? Owing to our peculiar nature, it is impossible that we should not love happiness, and the desire of happiness constitutes a motive to action. That which will produce in the mind the most permanent enjoyment, presents to us the strongest motive to embrace it.

This leads us to remark in the second place, on the motives that will influence man to obey the truth.

We have said, that the greatest amount of happiness consists in obeying the high calling of our nature. The principles of Christianity are perfectly adapted to satisfy the moral wants of man. The love, the goodness, and the justice there taught by our Saviour, and exemplified in his life, perfectly harmonize with those principles implanted in our nature. In the practice of them we are happy. Hence, when we rightly present these truths, we present the strongest motive to belief and action. If we will obey the teachings of reason, we shall practice Christianity in its primitive purity, all the laudable desires will be satisfied, each and every faculty of the mind will expand, and the index of man’s peace and happiness will be seen pictured on his brow. But when we live in the total neglect of these virtues, our course is retrograde, our way is sorrow, and the wages thereof is death.

Man’s greatest happiness is not physical, but moral, and when he is satisfied of the truth of this position, he will live a life of religion and piety. Religious devotion is the first law of nature—it shoots up from the very seat of life—it cleaves to the human constitution by a thousand ligaments—it entwines around human nature, and sends to the very bottom of the heart its penetrating tendrils.”

Since it is certain that the greatest happiness is the strongest incentive to action, when it shall be known that “there is no peace to the wicked,” not merely because this is the language of Holy Writ, but because a wicked course is contrary to our nature; when this is known and felt, the consequence will be, that men will embrace and live in accordance with the doctrines of the Bible, for in the exercise and practice of them, every faculty which conduces to enjoyment, may be fully gratified.—Are we benevolent? we there are taught to love God supremely and “our neighbor as ourselves.” Are we disposed to reform, and lead a life of piety and honor? we are encouraged by the exhortation to “let our light so shine before men, that they may see our good works and glorify our Father who is in heaven.” Are we just? the injunction is, “All things whatsoever we would that men should do unto us, do even so unto them, for this is the law and the prophets.” And so on with all the virtues that adorn humanity.

When we reason with mankind on the importance of a religious life, and appeal to their sense of right for the justice of the above scripture, we find their answer is in the affirmative. These being the leading doctrines of Universalism, and corresponding with the nature of man, when we hold them forth for the observance of mankind, not for the purpose of averting the displeasure of an angry Sovereign, or to secure heaven hereafter, but for the purpose of making men happy here and promoting “peace on earth”—when we do this in a right manner, we present the strongest motive to believe and practice Universalism.

The world has long been in an error, in believing that religion consists in forms and scowls, and that they who pass their days in wickedness are the happiest men. These ideas have been common among almost every class and condition of society. With these impressions on the mind what class of young persons can, in the sober hours of reflection, embrace religion to secure happiness and peace? It is true that many have led a religious life; but their object has not been to secure the greatest happiness here, but to avert an infinite evil hereafter: The glory, the sublimity, and the purity of the Gospel have been eclipsed by the misdirected teachings of the multitude.—It remains for Universalism to do away these erroneous doctrines, and present Christianity to the world in its primitive purity. This can be effectually done, by imparting a true knowledge of our own natures, and the reasons of the requirements of the Gospel. The Gospel of Jesus has been given to improve and call into exercise those faculties of the mind, which without it might have remained dormant. The man who is benevolent and just, will not become weary in the practice of these virtues, for as he advances in his course, these faculties will be improved, and become the sources of more refined enjoyment, and he will go onward in virtue, and upward in happiness and peace, till death closes his earthly career. When these views of God and man shall be more fully taught, enforced, and believed, it is believed that scepticism will be disarmed of its strong hold, the wicked reformed, and man universally will drink in the spirit of, and approximate to the doctrine of the great Restitution. Our Partialist brethren admit, that were they to listen to the teachings of their nature, they should believe with us. If, then, men can be led to respect themselves, they will venture to inquire into the truth or falsity of their theology, and the consequence will be the advancement of Universalism. In thus teaching, there is no forced work. The voice of reason, nature, and revelation combine in teaching this one great truth—that the greatest happiness consists in the full and free exercise of our moral, religious and intellectual nature. If this view is correct, in presenting it to mankind, we present the strongest incentive to belief and action.

INFIDELS.

It is certainly bad policy (as are all false statements) as well as bad manners, to class all who differ from us in Christian doctrine, among the infidels. Is a man a Quaker, a Swedenborgian, a Unitarian, or a Universalist—straightway the Methodist, Presbyterian, or Baptist sets him down as an infidel, and classes him with deists and atheists. The influence of names is very great on some minds, and many may be led to avow themselves infidels, on finding that certain great and revered men were such, who would have never thought of doing so, had they never heard that such men were infidels.

Now let us see what an array of names are placed in the list of illustrious infidels, by these injudicious and false denunciations of Partialists. Sir Isaac Newton was a Unitarian, so were Drs. Priestly, Price, Lardner, the poet Milton, Isaac Watts in the close of his life, Bishop Watson of Landaff, and a number of others equally illustrious, many of whom also denied the eternity of punishment. Origen, Archbishop Tillotson, Oberlin, Dr. Lettsom, Soame Jenyns, Dr. Rush, Dr. Redman, Dr. Franklin, Washington, and a host of others equally pious and benevolent, were Universalists. All these great and good men are uncereemoniously and contrary to all proof, thrown among the infidels, and their influence made to tell in favor of deism and atheism, by whom? By pretended friends of Christianity! Well may the Christian religion pray to be saved from such friends!

But the absurdity does not end here. Admitting that Unitarians and Universalists are infidels, it follows that the first defence of Christianity ever written, was by an infidel—Origen! The ablest and largest collection of testimonies, Jewish and Heathen, in favor of Christianity, ever made by any man, was made by an infidel—Dr. Nathaniel Lardner! The first publication against the use of ardent spirits, ever published in the United States, was made by an infidel—Dr. Benjamin Rush! The first time a theatre was converted into a house of religious worship, in the United States, was by an infidel—Elhanan Winchester! The first public vote against the use of ardent spirits as a drink, ever passed by any ecclesiastical body, was by a body of infidels—the General Convention of Universalists! The first time the National Convention that formed the United States Constitution, was opened by public prayer, it was at the request of an infidel—Dr. Franklin! The most popular treatises in defence of Christianity, lately published—at least those of which the largest editions have been sold—have been written and published by infidels—Pickering, Thayer, and Williamson! Strange infidelity this—and stranger still its fruits!

I might add other facts, but these are sufficient to show the falsity and absurdity of the charges made by Partialists.

THE CAUSES OF INFIDELITY REMOVED.....NO. VI.

BY S. R. SMITH.

ENDLESS MISERY.

It is hoped that the believers of certain doctrines, will not take it amiss, that some of the most common and obvious causes of infidelity, and which are found in those doctrines themselves, are briefly stated and examined. It may be of service to them. For the Christian can lose nothing except a few cumbersome and unintelligible dogmas—which Heaven could not reveal, either because what can not be understood is no revelation, or because it is derogatory to the character and perfections of the Deity—the entire removal of such parts of his creed, would be to his mind and moral feelings, what the clearing away of fog and clouds is to his sight and perceptions. On the other hand—if the infidel could be shown that several doctrines against which his indignation has been excited, and which have been the moving causes of his unbelief, are really no part of the teachings of the Bible, but that they are the antiquated remnants of a vain philosophy, fostered by ages of extreme darkness, he will probably find new and higher reasons to respect both Christianity and its friends.

These, then, are the very things which are here intended; and it is believed with some confidence, that if the patience of the parties will hold out with our labors, the result may be useful. It is, however, a thankless task to endeavor to give information to those who are not aware that they need any—more especially so, when it is offered to those who have long been in the habit of giving, rather than of receiving instruction. From those professors whose opinions will be made the subject of remark, little gratitude or even complacency is expected; and from unbelievers, whom we would lead up from their troubled waters, to the ever-flowing fountain of Christian truth, experience has taught us to anticipate a most fatal apathy. The former are too dogmatical to be taught—the latter too indifferent to desire or seek further information.

We shall, however, cast our “bread upon the waters,” believing that there are, and will be some, to whom it may prove the bread of life—the healthful food of the soul. The great difficulty with many very honest Christians, in relation to their opinions, is, their sincere conviction that religion, the Christian religion must be contrary to nature. That its principles and requirements are opposed to the dictates of reason, to the better feelings of the heart, and to the enjoyment of social comfort. Any one thing in which they find themselves comfortable and happy, is viewed with suspicion, as emanating from some evil source. Hence they feel a kind of necessity to believe the most revolting dogmas, and to perform a number of supposed duties at much self-sacrifice and mortification. Some of these we have already noticed, and others require particular consideration—among which may be reckoned, the doctrine of endless misery.

There can be no proof more conclusive, than that furnished by many of the most distinguished unbelievers—that they were first led to doubt the truth and genuineness of Christianity, by contemplating the horrors of the doctrine of endless punishment. How wide this influence may have spread, is beyond our means of determining. That it is very extensive, is unquestionable, as this very doctrine is daily urged as one of the principal grounds of objection to the truth of Christianity. And even where these objections could not be made with safety, it is morally certain that the human mind takes the same direction—and a silent but fatal infidelity is generated and maintained. The history of the French Revolution, is a history of the success of the combined efforts of a band of skilful and reckless unbelievers, who covertly plotted and finally overturned the social, civil, and religious institutions of the state.

The aspect of the doctrine of endless punishment, is so dreadful, as not only to drive some into infidelity, but it has destroyed the happiness and the reason of thousands of its professors. It has been fruitful in despair, derangement, and suicide. Some of its most learned and devoted advocates have been constrained to acknowledge, that its contemplation rendered every enjoyment insipid, and life itself a “cruel bitter.” Others have admitted that its direct assertion was attended with great danger, as few could bear the thought of its mere possibility without becoming insane. And under this impression, they satisfy themselves that it should not be made the subject of frequent discussion, especially in times of general religious excitement. To this there are many modern exceptions; and the distressing consequences have been, a great increase of religious mania, and a proportionate number of suicides.

Such are the concessions made to this terrible doctrine, by some of its most talented and devoted friends. And it should satisfy them, as it does many others who have never doubted the truth of the Christian system, that the doctrine of endless misery can not be true. When they witness the multiplied cases of infidelity to which it gives rise—the havoc which it makes with many noble minds—the utter despair with which it overwhelms so many hearts, and the shocking deaths of which it is the undeniable cause, they should stop and ask themselves—whether it be possible for such a system to be a revelation from Heaven? They should earnestly, repeatedly, and solemnly interrogate their own hearts—if such consequences can be supposed to follow any truth which is of undoubted divine authority? Whether the Deity could permit the existence of misery so intense and so horrid, if he be the good and gracious Being every where evinced in all the works of nature, and uniformly asserted in the Scriptures? Is it—can it be consistent with his acknowledged attributes, to suffer such intolerable miseries to constitute any part of the plan of his moral government? Or, is it possible that any being—much less a good one—should reveal a system which, if true, must forever degrade him in the eyes of all intelligences—the influence of which always has been, and always must be, detrimental to human happiness? Surely the world was already wretched enough without the apprehension of endless torments; and that must be a most singular benevolence, which would interfere with the condition of man only to augment his woe! And above all, could a God of infinite wisdom reveal to mankind for their adoption, a system so odious, that he must have foreseen its rejection—and instead of rendering the world more devout and religious, to fill it with skepticism and despair?

And who can marvel that a system which comprises so many serious and alarming difficulties and incongruities, should be rejected as an instrument of oppression in the hand of tyranny, and alike unworthy of the mind of God or man? Who can be surprised, that many who can not, or will not perform the labor of examination, should take for granted that it is a doctrine of the Bible, and consequently reject both together? And there is great liability of confounding the doctrine in question with the truth of the Bible, from the unwearied pains which have been taken for some time past, to fasten it upon the Scriptures. All the means at the disposal of several whole communities of Christians, have been put in requisition—every passage of Scripture having the most remote allusion to the punishment of the wicked, has been tasked to the utmost in order to sustain this miserable dogma. It has become the theme of daily gossip—the subject of pulpit labor—the burden of the press, and the bone of public controversy. Hence the public mind has been specially called to its contemplation; and no man can wonder that among the palpable consequences may be found an increase of infidelity. For while there are those with whom absurdities pass for mysteries, and who seem to relish with ferocious pleasure, the picture of anguish which a morose and gloomy system presents to their imagination; there are others, who are too impatient of an unreasonable and cruel doctrine, ever to think of inquiring whether it was fabricated by the church, or derived from revelation.

But the unbeliever is assured, that there are many good and substantial reasons for believing that the doctrine of the endless punishment of any part of the human race, is not contained in the Bible. And if it should be fairly shown that it neither is, nor can be found in that book, it may be presumed that, as a reasonable and candid man, he will admit, for once, at least, that he has charged upon Christianity a doctrine for which it is not responsible. And this should also admonish him to be more vigilant in future, and not decide on the truth of an immensely important subject, from some particular appendage which vice or folly may have added, and which superstition or terror may have perpetuated. It is believed that he will be the more disposed to do this, if it should be successfully shown that, while reason inculcates a more benevolent view of the destiny of man—that view is sustained by the strongest expressions of truth recorded in the Bible.

1. The doctrine of the positive eternity of misery as the punishment of human offences, is inconsistent with the acknowledged attributes of the Deity. There is not, and there probably never was a believer in the doctrine in question, who does not admit the existence of perfections in the Deity, which can never be reconciled with the idea of endless suffering. To go no further: he believes and acknowledges that God is infinitely, uniformly and universally good; and that he is, consequently, unchangeably good to all men in general, and to every man in particular. Now, by what possible deduction of reason, consistent with that goodness, can it be inferred that any one member of the human family can be made miserable through a proper eternity? None can pretend that such sufferings are in themselves good—they are universally supposed to constitute the greatest possible evil. No man will or can say that they are productive of good to the sufferer—or that they are the evidence of goodness, much less of infinite goodness, in the Being by whom they are inflicted. They are, therefore, inconsistent with that goodness in God, which is plead for and maintained by the advocates of endless punishment. Nay, more—this doctrine is not merely inconsistent with, but is directly contrary to the divine character. For were he infinitely malignant instead of benevolent, and had he tasked the resources of his infinite mind to produce an infinite evil, what worse could he have done than to inflict endless tortures upon his sentient creation? Let the advocates of this dreadful system beware then, lest they so far forget what infinite, universal, and unchangeable goodness is, as to impute to it the office of infinite malevolence!

2. The doctrine of endless punishment, is inconsistent with reason. No doubt is entertained of the right to punish for offences, nor of the propriety of punishing so long as it is productive of any good. But it by no means follows, that it is either right or proper for any being to inflict punishment so long as it possesses the means—especially when such punishment can do no good. And as endless punishment can do no good, reason can never acquiesce in its infliction. Again—man is a being possessed only of finite powers and capacities—his actions and their consequences are therefore limited. Hence reason infers, that he can neither deserve nor properly and justly receive endless punishment. The pretence that justice requires the endless misery of the wicked, is assuming what never has been, and never can be proved—for it is to maintain that eternal justice demands what is unreasonable. Besides, it becomes us to distinguish between justice and cruelty, but the very idea of such misery, is to confound all such distinctions, and amalgamate all perception in one concentration of unutterable woe. Strict and impartial justice must have an ulterior object in all its inflictions; and the existence of such an object, implies that those inflictions must have an end.

3. The doctrine of endless punishment, is inconsistent with the truths of the Bible. However long or severe punishment may be, it is not once said in the Bible to be without end. So far from this, the strongest expressions indicative of perpetuity, are never once applied to sin, punishment, or misery. Thus aphtharsia, signifying incorruptibility, immortality, and its adjective aphthartos, meaning immortal, incorruptible—athanasia, immortality, deathless, and athanatos, immortal, perpetual—akatalutos, indissoluble, or endless—and aperantos, infinite, boundless, are all used in the New Testament, but are never found in connexion with either sin or misery. Besides these, there are several others, as aidios, perpetual—akeratos, pure, uncorrupt, immortal—and apeiros, unlimited, indefinite, which might have been used to convey a much stronger idea of duration than any word that is applied to punishment. But neither of these is so used—a fact not easily accounted for, if it was the intention of the sacred penmen to convey the idea of a strict eternity of punishment for the wicked. That they were well aware of the meaning of these terms, there can be no doubt, as they used the first class above enumerated, to convey the idea of life and blessedness. And in particular, these are the words which they employ as descriptive of the state, condition, and duration of the human spirit after the resurrection. On the contrary, every word applied to the sufferings of the wicked, is, by common usage, of limited signification. None are employed to express the duration of sin and misery but aei, aiou, and aiouios, which are commonly rendered always, forever, everlasting, eternal, world, and age. Some of these are used in the plural, which sufficiently implies their limitation, and all of them more or less frequently, in such connexions as to show that they can not mean endless duration. And as it is plain that the writers of the New Testament were under no necessity to use the words which they did, to express the duration of misery, it is evident that they chose such as were of limited import. To these facts there are no exceptions, nor can the utmost ingenuity of man ever find one.

But we are not left to rely upon negations, in this important subject. The Scriptures do unequivocally declare, that a period shall come when there shall be no more pain, nor sorrow, nor death—when Christ shall draw all men to himself, put all things, including all enemies, under his feet, and having subdued all things, God shall become all in all. And finally, even punishment is represented in the Bible as one of the means of bringing about that holiness which is necessary to perfect and endless happiness. It is said that God chastens us for our profit, “that we should be partakers of his holiness,” and also, that “afterwards”—that is, after punishment—“it yieldeth the peaceable fruits of righteousness” to those who are punished. But if the punishment of sin is endless, when is this afterwards to come? and why punish men when they have become partakers of the holiness of God? But enough of these queries. It has now been shown that endless punishment is inconsistent with the character and perfections of God—that it is contrary to reason, and unsupported by the Bible. It is not, therefore, a doctrine of Christianity, and in rejecting it, no man should suppose that he rejects the Bible or the truths of the Gospel.

In view of these facts, the unbeliever is asked, if there is any good reason for rejecting the Bible because some Christians believe and maintain the doctrine of endless punishment? Christianity and the Bible are no more responsible for this doctrine, than they are for a thousand other foolish and absurd things which daily occur among men, and which are known to originate in other causes. Nor are they responsible for the moral apathy which prevents unbelievers from properly investigating the subject, and ascertaining where the doctrine properly belongs. Unfortunately it would seem that the gloomy and misanthropic temperament of some early Christians, originated the doctrine in question; and more or less of modern infidelity, is fairly chargeable to the tenacity with which it is at present maintained. It is very certain, that the doctrine of endless punishment was scarcely known in the Christian church during the first two centuries. For the first person who is known to have asserted the equal duration of the misery of the wicked and happiness of the righteous, is Tertullian, who flourished about A. D. 200, and as no one maintained the positive eternity of punishment before that time, there is much reason to conclude that it was not believed. This is rendered still more probable, not to say certain, by the very important fact, that many of the most distinguished Christian fathers of that period, maintained, in the most unqualified manner, the doctrine of universal salvation. Of these the most eminent was Clemens, of Alexandria. Since, then, it cannot be denied that universal salvation was the belief of many, and those of the first distinction, while only one can be found who maintained the doctrine of endless punishment, it is very full proof that this latter hypothesis is a corruption of Christian truth. But the doctrine of endless punishment once broached, found advocates, and eventually became the standard of orthodoxy in the church. This honor was however delayed for several centuries. And it was not until the year 394 of the Christian era, almost two hundred years after it was first avowed, that it had gained numbers sufficient to authorize a public censure of the doctrine of the restitution. Nor was it fully established, and Universalism suppressed under the name of Origenism, until A. D. 553, nearly four hundred years after its introduction into the church by Tertullian. So that the doctrine of endless misery has not been the prevailing sentiment of the church more than about thirteen hundred years. How preposterous then, its claim to be the doctrine of Jesus and his disciples!

Let the infidel look to these things, if he wishes to be thought candid, or if he seriously has any desire of discovering and embracing the truth. And let those who would palm this doctrine upon the world as the truth of Heaven, look to the consequences. Existing facts go far, very far, to prove that infidelity will never be expelled from some minds, while endless misery makes a prominent part of any Christian creed. For however he may triumph over the unbeliever in a general argument, this terrible doctrine will perpetually haunt his imagination, and will finally expel every favorable impression. For depend on this, that however he may feel vanquished on other points, he will regard this as a position from which he has not been driven; and he will not consent to the truth of a doctrine which destroys the harmony of the Divine attributes, and sets the deductions of reason at defiance. He will say, if such be the doctrine of the Bible, it must be the work of designing men; and if his infidelity has not become the madness of atheism, he will add—leave the character of the Deity unpolluted by the imputation of a system so offensive to its purity. But when he learns that this doctrine is neither a part of Christianity, nor taught in the Bible, if he is constituted like other men, and the religious feelings ever touch and warm his heart, he will feel new and grateful emotions as he imbibes the great and redeeming truths, that a God of goodness could not devise—a God of truth could not reveal, and a God of mercy can never inflict endless miseries upon mankind. But that the Bible teaches that Christianity secures to the believer the hope of future universal glory and blessedness.

MINISTERIAL DUTY.

VISITATION.—This duty is most neglected, and will be, until every society has its own pastor—and certainly, until every preacher is so well supplied with the necessities and comforts of life, by the societies with whom he labors, that he can devote all his time to their service. Yet I consider it a far more important duty—one that more imperatively calls for its regular and well performance—than the public services of the sanctuary. And no society can long prosper, and improve in the Christian virtues, feelings, and graces, without it—while with it, they can not fail to flourish and be useful.

1. The pastor should, as early as possible, make out, and keep perfect, a list of all who attend on his ministration, or are friendly in their feelings to the doctrine of impartial grace. By noting opposite to each name, the residence, occupation, number of family, condition and disposition of the person, as fast as he can learn them, he is prepared to qualify himself for profitably conversing with them, and assisting them with his advice, in their inquiries after truth, or efforts to rise in Christian worth.

2. He should set apart at least two days in each week to make calls upon the attendants of his meetings—at the first, perhaps, giving the individual notice, on the previous Sunday, of his intention to do so—and continue the practice in regular order, until he has visited every individual on his list—become intimate with them, in the most friendly manner, and render them intimate with himself. And this practice he should continue, so as to visit each family, or individual on his list at least once every six months—and as much oftener as may be pleasant and convenient to both parties.

3. After he has gained their, and given them his confidence and affection, he should induce them to become more affectionately social and intimate with each other—to seek and receive each other's advice and assistance in those matters wherein they can mutually benefit each other—and thus unite the whole congregation in the unity of the spirit of Jesus, and in the bonds of Gospel love and peace.

If he is a married man, he will find himself much aided in these most agreeable labors of Christian affection, by the co-operation of his wife—that is, supposing both to have drunk in deeply of the spirit of Christianity, with which they are to imbue the minds of others by precept and practice. But all will perceive, that to enable the preacher and his wife to engage in these labors—to become, indeed, domestic missionaries—they must be placed in circumstances of such comfort and ease as will enable them to devote the necessary time to the work, without injuring their family by their absence from home.

In this manner, the sick and the dying may be sought out, refreshed, consoled, and comforted—the vicious be dragged from their abasements and degradation, and encouraged to return to virtue and usefulness—the suffering poor be relieved by the hand of friendship, and introduced to the notice and regard of those who are able to furnish them with suitable employment—the diffident be soothed into ease and confidence, the strange be made familiar, and the distant be encouraged to draw near and unite with the congregation—the ignorant (and who is not ignorant of some things?) can be enlightened in those things in which the preacher is best versed, while they instruct him, in turn, in many a useful lesson—the absentees from meeting can be induced to attend more frequently, for their increased acquaintance with, and kind feelings for preacher and congregation, will be a powerful inducement to meet them as often as possible in the public sanctuary—and, indeed, what may not be done—what difficulties may not be removed, by a faithful, regular system of social, Christian visitation by the preacher, and by his congregation with each other?

I hope society will yet open their eyes to the great benefits of this measure, and urge, and enable their preachers to put it into practice, as far as circumstances will admit.

CHANCE.

A few individuals in both ancient and modern times, have contended that the universe was created by chance. This opinion is supposed to have originated in Epicurus, who founded a sect of philosophers called Epicureans, about 200 years before Christ. He maintained that there was no superior power, that ruled the world, or its inhabitants; and that nothing existed in nature, but material atoms. No evidence of the existence of this opinion can be traced from that age, until a little more than 200 years since, when it was revived by Gassendi, a celebrated French philosopher. He was soon succeeded by Descartes, who in 1633, wrote a treatise of the world, supporting that system, and in his whimsical theory contending that the universe was produced "by the fortuitous combination of atoms moving in vortices, through the immensity of space." Whether these atoms existed from eternity, or were created from, made of and by nothing, we are not informed. It is presumed that these persons, believed in nothing that was not susceptible of ocular demonstration, and consequently, dare not soar into the regions of the imagination and hazard an opinion on so speculative a subject. Admirable consistency, ingenuity and unparalleled incredulity! When a bottle of ink will move without a mover, upset itself upon paper and produce a regularly written oration; when a bunch of types will print a pamphlet without a printer; when the siroc winds of the desert of Sahara will form houses of sand; when matter will produce mind; the fortuitous combinations of atoms will form unnumbered worlds, then we shall readily believe that man, in effect, was originated without a cause, or was caused by no cause; that the earth in the plenitude of its riches, before cultivation had marred its fertility, produced the human race; and that it will yet be ascertained, that the caves of the rich western wilds, teem with human intelligences, who will rise in majestic greatness and assert their inalienable rights! Atoms may fortuitously combine and produce poets, philosophers, orators, statesmen and warriors, as numerous as the frogs of Egypt. A Homer and a Virgil, a Demosthenes and a Cicero, a Thales, and a Plato, an Alexander and a Bonaparte, a Jefferson and a Franklin, may grow like vegetables, and come upon the stage of action to the astonishment of a wondering and admiring world! Such are the legitimate conclusions deducible from the theory of chance, and such a system we are invited to embrace that we may rid ourselves of credulity, absurdity, and inconsistency, become reasonable and philosophical, and solve all the phenomena of nature!

It may be contended that the earth once possessed a law that produced men and animals, but that it is not now in operation. Then, we ask, who gave matter this law, and who suspended its operations? Tell us when, and why, this law was abrogated, or prove to us that the laws of nature are changeable and we will embrace your system.

A FAMILY DIALOGUE.

A father with whom it was a custom to require from his family some account of their reading, reflections, and other engagements, and who encouraged them to put such questions to him as occurred to them, was thus accosted one day, in one of his leisure moments, by one of his children:—

"Father, I have been trying to picture to myself the appearance of the lepers who came to Jesus to be healed, and also to imagine what were their feelings before and after their cure."

"You have been usefully engaged, my son, and now let us have a description of your picture of a leper."

"I conceived of him as a man covered almost all over with a loathsome eruption—bright white scales, large scabs, and deep sores, from which, in many places, were springing up quick or fungous flesh."

"I believe you have formed a pretty accurate picture of an inveterate or very bad case. You have or may find in the 13th chapter of Leviticus, that such cases the priest, who acted as physician among the Jews, was authorized to pronounce unclean; temporary confinement was totally unnecessary, such cases being regarded as incurable, or unclean for life."

"Why were the poor lepers banished from cities and society?"

"Because the disease was contagious, and partly, also, because it was so very loathsome. Recent travellers inform us, that in the Barbary States, lepers are treated in much the same way as they were by the laws of Moses—they live outside the walls, wear a particular badge, and intermarry only among themselves. They are avoided as if they had the Plague. The law of Moses which secluded the leper from society, was very punctually observed, as even kings were expelled from their palaces, shut out of society, and deprived of the government, when affected with this disease. Do you remember any instance?"

"Yes, father, I do. King Azariah was so treated. And I can well imagine with what earnestness a poor leper, separated from his family and friends, would plead with Jesus to be made clean. I now also distinctly perceive a propriety in its being said, that the lepers "stood afar off"—did not intermingle with the crowd—when they besought Jesus to heal them."

"Do you suppose that healing leprosy was a miracle?"

"Yes; for Jesus included this among the other proofs of his being 'he that should come,' when John sent his disciples to ask that question of him; and I remember to have heard you, father, or some one else, say, that it was generally reckoned incurable by human means."

"I believe your information to have been correct. God alone was applied to for its cure."

SCIENCE AND CHRISTIANITY.

The present is a restless, inquiring age. The fountains of the great deeps of ignorance and indifference are broken up. Every where we meet the tyros of natural science, and hear technical terms, which, but a few years ago were confined to the schools, and used familiarly only by the literati. Now the mechanic studies chemistry—the day laborer knows there is a science called botany—the school boy ponders on the revolutions of planets and explains the phenomena of eclipses—the farmer talks of the nature of soils and rocks—and even woman, lovely woman is no longer confined merely to know the contents of a pudding bag, or the length and breadth of a ruffe or a wrist-band. And though this knowledge is, in most cases, but very superficial, yet it is knowledge—useful knowledge, and calculated to create a thirst for more. Its superficiality constitutes its only danger. Old and long cherished errors are overturned by it, and yet it is not sufficient to show that many other opinions, as long and as dearly prized, are not errors also. This, in my opinion, is one great cause of the latent skepticism, which is occasionally developed around us, in the half-philosophers who have just emerged from the fogs of dulness and the mists of ignorance. They have just learned that the moon is not made of green cheese; and, forsooth, the Bible is an absurd old fable-book, because it says it was made "to rule the night." Some one has told them that geologists have discovered that, in all probability, thousands of years elapsed in the preparation of the earth for the reception of man; and, wonderful! none but fools will believe Moses, who declares that "six days" elapsed between "the beginning," in which "God created the heavens and the earth," and the creation of man upon the earth! Some one has told them that animalcula that had been petrified in flint stones, have been restored to vitality, and, presto! if flints yield insects, why not the mud of Nile bring forth human beings? Thus "a little learning" has made them mad, and nothing but "drinking largely" can sober them again.

Then, on the other hand, there are some good souls, who hearing of these wonders for the first time, decry all science as at war with revelation, and all knowledge as adverse to religion. Their opposition to established facts confirms the tyro in his skepticism—and, the increased skepticism of the half-philosopher, confirms these ignorant pietists in their ridiculous opposition to stubborn facts disclosed by the study of nature. Thus each party manages to become the worst enemy to his own side of the question, and to retard the advancement of that very knowledge he is most desirous to spread abroad in society! It is lamentable—truly lamentable to the enlightened Christian, to witness such perversion and folly on both sides. What is the remedy?

The limits of an article like the present, will barely suffice to hint at the remedy. Because piety has been stupidly perverted into an obstruction to science, religion must not be discarded as if it were the natural ally, the twin-sister of ignorance and superstition. And because natural science or rather the alphabet of natural science, has been set in seeming array against Christianity, it must not be set aside as the boon companion of impiety and irreligion. Far otherwise! The friends of science and Christianity, must unite the train, so that they shall be one in the minds of the people—so that the opposer of the one shall no longer be considered the friend of the other.

For a long time the pulpit has been losing its influence over the public mind—its teachings are less and less regarded, and its teachers are rapidly sinking from the heights of intellectual superiority into the abyss of philosophical and literary contempt. The press is usurping the place of the ministry, and even the literary and scientific periodical is thrusting aside in many minds the theological tract and the religious newspaper. Why is this? for if we can find the cause, we may be able to suggest the remedy. The cause is found, I humbly believe, in the state of the public mind sketched in the commencement of this article. The people are seeking for facts rather than theories—for knowledge rather than speculations—for practical and useful truths, rather than dry morализings and finely spun metaphysical subtleties—for information in natural science and in the every day concerns of life, rather than disquisitions on the shape of a Roman toga, the form of a Greek verb, or the uses of a Hebrew Masoretic point. And they get what they want, in greater abundance, from the press than from the preacher—and from the literary and scientific periodical, than from the religious newspaper. Am I correct? If I am—and I feel confident I am correct in a majority of cases—the remedy for all this evil is as clear as the cause is truly stated.

Let the clergy endeavor to satisfy the wants of the people. Let them devote some less time to the study and preparation of merely scholastic subtleties, and more to practical and scientific subjects—less time to Greek and Hebrew, and more to the study and explanation of the ampler, richer, better, more enlivening and glorious volume of nature. Let them drown the skepticism of the tyro by a flood of that very knowledge in which he is now only ankle deep. Let them remove the hesitancy of the doubting, because ignorant Christian, by removing the veil which in his mind divides God from nature, religion from reason, piety from knowledge, and religious duty from the every-day affairs of social and domestic life. Let them show the harmony between philosophy and religion, between nature and revelation, between Christianity and common sense. Let them prove that all the works of God, (in nature and in grace,) speak the same language—teach the same truths—inculcate the same precepts—and irrevocably and undeniably confirm each other's teachings. Then will the inquiry of the age lead to wisdom—to the highest wisdom, because yielding the greatest happiness—and Christianity will be seen to be the only, THE UNIVERSAL PHILOSOPHY—THE INFINITE SCIENCE.

MUSIC.

It is a beautiful sentiment, that I have read somewhere, but can not pretend to quote correctly, that "music is the companion of devotion and the sister of prayer."—There are few, very few in society totally insensible to music's influence on the feelings—and many, very many who can be powerfully affected by it. A ministering brother of great experience has said that good music in a religious assembly is an excellent apology for a poor sermon, and sends a good sermon home to the heart winged with double power. This is true—emphatically true. And nearly every public speaker will testify to the aid—the species of inspiration afforded him in the delivery of his discourses, by the singing of a good choir. Instead of having to wade half-way through his sermon, before he can warm his feelings up to the point necessary for its effective delivery, an appropriate hymn, well sung, gives his frame the necessary degree of excitement, warms his feelings and quickens his mental powers, so that he begins his discourse feelingly, and pursues it to its close without flagging in his ideas and exertions. There was therefore more philosophy than courtesy in the remark of a clergyman to a choir who had just murdered a hymn by singing it badly—"It is impossible to preach well after such singing; please try to sing that hymn again!"

Singers should be careful to note the sentiments they sing—not only that they may sing with the conscience, "the spirit and the understanding," but that their voices may be duly modulated to make others feel what they sing. They would justly blame a preacher who should deliver the language of entreaty and admiration—of exhortation and description—of supplication and triumph, in the same tone of voice. Yet many of them sing all these varieties of expression in precisely the same tone, manner, and with the same degree of loudness. They little know the beauty of variety in these things, and do not realize what a solemn, thrilling effect is produced by the proper changes expressing these various sentiments.

Another thing is too general a fault among singers—a drawling, inaudibility of their words. Many of them might as well sing the old fa, sol, la, re, ut, mi, na, as sing the words of the hymn, so far as the mind of the hearer is concerned; for, from the manner in which they pronounce the words, one mode would convey as much meaning as the other. A preacher who should, through a mawkish, false delicacy, be afraid to open his mouth and utter his words distinctly—who would let his sounds ooze out between his teeth and through his nose, and gargle the syllables drawlingly in his throat, would edify his congregation about as little as such singing does. This fault is easily corrected. Only let singers aim to pronounce each word as clearly, fully and distinctly, as they would do it if speaking slowly. When music is properly performed—sung with spirit—according to the sense of the words, and to the understandings and feelings of the hearers, then, and then only are the words of Moore realized.

"Music—oh, how faint, how weak—

Language fades before thy spell!

Why should feeling ever speak,

When thou canst breathe her soul so well!"

EPISCOPALIANISM.

The people are beginning to think for themselves, and to subject their creeds to the test of Scripture and reason. If there was no other proof of this fact, it would be sufficient to know that there is scarcely a denomination in our land that has not modified the expression of its doctrines, if not rejected many of the doctrines themselves, within the last twenty years. Election and reprobation are no more even the shadow of a name among many of our Calvinists—infant damnation is less than even that—original sin, total depravity, etc., etc., are repudiated altogether. But of all the creeds with which I am acquainted, I supposed the thirtynine articles of the Episcopal church the least in danger—because they are merely used to be signed. Lord Chatham well said, "we have a Popish liturgy, a Calvinistic creed, and an Armenian clergy." But with all the inconsistencies of the Episcopal church, it still held to orthodoxy, in the popular acceptance—and it will hold to it, for whatever may become the orthodoxy of the day, Episcopalian faith will be that, too. Like a cat, you may throw it as you will, it will light on its feet—or, rather like the three legs and feet of a Manks penny, turn it which way you will, and it will have one foot and one knee on the ground. As Dr. Rush said of the climate of Pennsylvania—"it has but one characteristic, it is always changeable."

The following article is taken from the Churchman (a standard Episcopal print published in New-York), of the 12th inst. We copy it to "show which way the wind blows" in relation to the popular doctrine of the atonement. Depend upon it, when the standard Episcopalian periodicals endorse such sentiments, there is reason to believe they will soon become general, if they are not already so. The attempt to reconcile the new view with the old doctrine, and thus secure the favor of both parties, is as absurd as it is contemptible. The idea that mercy and goodness were shut up in the bosom of God, so that they could not flow forth—that even he could not send them forth, without the death of himself, in the person of his own Son, etc., etc., is an outrage on common sense; and, if the writer understood his own language, a blasphemy against Jehovah. We quote enough to show the bent of the article, not having room for it entire.

A. B. G.

"The doctrine of the atonement has often been unfortunately conceived of and exhibited as though the sacrifice of CHRIST were the instrument of exciting the Divine compassion and producing the Divine mercy towards sinners. The Son has been represented as the compassionate friend of the human race, interposing to avert the consequences of the Father's inveterate and unrelenting severity, and procuring from him a reluctant consent to pardon the objects of his unmingled hatred and abhorrence. Such views rob the Father of the attribute of mercy, cloud him with an aspect of austere and forbidding sternness, and expose that primary truth of Christianity, the vicarious death and sufferings of JESUS CHRIST to the cavils and objections of acute and discerning opposers. The true mode of representing the effect of the atonement, is to exhibit it not as exciting, but as expressing the Divine mercy; not as originating or drawing out a disposition to pardon and save the guilty; which before did not exist or was dormant in the Divine bosom, but as manifesting its prior existence and operation, as providing a channel through which it may safely, and honorably, and effectually flow out, and spend its exhaustless fullness in rescuing from destruction the objects of its affectionate solicitude. This sentiment is forcibly and beautifully expressed in those words of St. John, 'God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have eternal life.' 'Not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins.' The end and design then of the propitiatory sufferings of the Redeemer, was not to excite compassion in the bosom of God, but to let forth compassion from the bosom of God; not to render God merciful, but to make it practicable for him to exercise his merciful dispositions without weakening his authority and compromising his justice and veracity. All the resources of infinite wisdom were pressed into the service of infinite love, to devise a solution of the difficult problem, how this ruling principle of the Divine character might have scope for its free and unfettered operations, without impairing the influence of infinite justice. The result of its mighty labors is 'the redemption that is in CHRIST JESUS, whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins; 'that he might be just and the justifier of him that believeth in JESUS.' The atonement then is not a tribute of justice to mercy; it is mercy's tribute to justice. Mercy, had there been no antagonist principle, would gladly have executed its benevolent purpose in the free and full pardon of every offender, without 'the precious death' of the Son of God."

PHRENOLOGY.

Well knowing the aversion of some, and the indifference of others, to this bewitching science, I fear I may give them dissatisfaction by my frequent mention of it in our columns. But an article on Phrenology even, may be more acceptable to them than a complaint of hard times, or a dun for arrearages, if they feel the one, or owe the other. Besides, the importance of the subjects with which this philosophy of the mind is so intimately connected, warrant me, I think, in devoting an occasional article to its consideration.

As many have a great reverence for what falls from the lips of titled dignitaries, I prefer giving a few remarks under the sanction of some great names, to offering the same ideas in the form of my own humble thoughts on the subject—they are also entitled to more consideration, in many cases, as coming from men whose extensive and long continued experience has proved their truth. The first class I shall adduce, go to prove the utility of Phrenological knowledge in the education of youth.

Alexander J. D. Dorsey, Esq., Master of the English department in the High School of Glasgow, says, in a letter to George Combe—"In reply to your question regarding the bearing of Phrenology upon Education, I beg to state, that, as Education, properly considered, aims at the proper development and regulation of man's nature; as it is, therefore, absolutely essential to a teacher's success that he should have a guide to the knowledge of that nature; and as Phrenology appears to me not only the plainest, but the most satisfactory guide yet discovered, it is my decided opinion, that he who teaches and trains upon phrenological principles, will experience a constantly increasing attachment to his profession, will invariably secure the affectionate esteem of his pupils, and will, as a necessary consequence, succeed in giving them a thorough education, moral, intellectual, and physical. I write this, not from a theorizing spirit, but from several years extensive experience.

"To enter into details, would be here impossible. I may, however, briefly state, that the principle of presenting to the faculties the objects to which they are respectively related, is of itself truly invaluable in guiding the teacher to the end he has in view. Acting on this excellent principle, I have not merely employed such physical objects as tended to develop the knowing faculties, but have also habitually exercised the pupils in the use of their reflecting powers. In teaching morals, too, I consider mere instruction as very inferior to training. For instance—instead of telling a boy to be charitable, I direct his benevolence to a suitable object; instead of commanding him to be just, I exercise his conscientiousness by making him act as a jurymen in deciding the petty cases of the school; and thus he learns by practice, what others fancy they have learned by theory.

"In history, the use of Phrenology is truly valuable. In fact, till I knew something of this beautiful system of mental philosophy, I never taught history properly, or, I may add, any thing else." Stronger recommendation can no man give.

REMITTERS—TAKE NOTICE.

Br. Davis, of the Glad Tidings, published in Pittsburgh, Pa., proposes that when it is most convenient, subscribers to that paper, may remit in company with subscribers to this paper, and vice versa. The proposition is acceptable to us—more especially as Southern, Ohio, and Western Pennsylvania notes are more current in Pittsburgh than in Utica, and probably Eastern and Northern notes are more current in Utica than in Pittsburgh—and also, that by this arrangement, two or more persons owing a small sum each to the different establishments, may unite them into one that can be easily and cheaply remitted, by sending the whole to either publisher. Only let the names be plainly written—the postoffice and State be carefully named, and the sum paid by each person, and how it is to be applied, be definitely stated, that no mistakes may be made.

Our scattering subscribers, or agents having small sums in their hands, will please remember that we have a similar arrangement with the Trumpet and Ladies' Repository offices, Boston, and with the Union office, New-York, and that should it be necessary for them to remit to either of those offices, they can send what is due to us along with it—or, what is due to them can be sent with remittances to us, in an exchange of circumstances.

Of course, it is best to send the remittances directly to the offices where they are due, when it can conveniently be done; but we have resorted to the above plan to ensure the more speedy reception of such subscriptions and sums as can not otherwise be conveniently sent to us directly.

G. and H.

A REQUEST.

Should any one of our agents or friends ascertain the present residence of John Howe, formerly of Cranberry Creek, Montgomery county, who left that place indebted to this office to the amount of $11, it would be conferring a special favor on us to let us know where he may be found. If subscribers have not moral principle enough to at least let us know where they may be found, they must not complain if we publicly inquire them out.

A SELECT SCHOOL.

Do those who are in favor of unsectarian schools, know that an excellent select school is kept in the basement story of the Universalist meeting-house, on Devereux street, in this city? Miss Grant, the teacher of the same, governs by the law of kindness, is an excellent teacher, and carefully confines herself to the proper duties of an instructor of youth in the common branches of an English Education. Such a school we have long needed, and I trust our friends will remember this notice of it to some purpose—to the proper encouragement of its teacher.

Working in wax.—A word to the young ladies. Miss Grant is an excellent worker in wax. A flower of her manufacture which I saw, could not be distinguished by the sight from a natural flower—it was that of the sweet pea—one of the most delicate productions in Flora's kingdom. I am informed Miss G. would be pleased to instruct a class of young ladies in this elegant accomplishment, on moderate terms, and at an hour separate from her day school. A desire to oblige those who would learn and her who would teach, thus benefiting both parties, has induced me to write this brief notice.

THE DISCUSSION.—Mr. Campbell's reply to Mr. Skinner has been received, and, with a reply to it, will appear in our next. The preliminaries are all settled at last, and the discussion proper fairly commenced.

Publishers of other papers are informed that any article in our paper is heartily at their service—even our prize tales, which cost us considerable money—if they will but give the proper credit for them. That credit we are entitled to—we ask it—and when refused by those who use what cost us time and labor, we will expose the dishonesty that would use our property as if it was exclusively and originally their own. We may seem over-tenacious on this subject, but I am persuaded we are correct, and I apprehend that no honest man will condemn us for wrong doing in contending for our due.

POETRY.

SHE DIED IN BEAUTY.

Under this head, in our last, we published some poetry by John C. McCabe, taken from the Boston Amaranth. The following so similar in sentiment, was handed us by a friend, who says it was published as original in the Edinburgh Literary Journal, in the close of 1828 or the commencement of 1829. Whether Mr. McCabe ever saw it or not, is not for us to say—but we believe it will be admitted to the precedence of his lines in beauty, as in priority of publication.

A. B. G.

She died in beauty—like a rose
Blown from its parent stem;
She died in beauty—like a pearl
Dropp'd from some diadem.
She died in beauty—like a lay
Along a moon-lit lake;
She died in beauty—like the song
Of birds amid the brake.
She died in beauty—like the snow
On flowers dissolved away;
She died in beauty—like a star
Lost in the brow of day.
She lives in glory—like night's gems
Set round the silver moon;
She lives in glory—like the sun
Amid the blue of June!

BEAUTIFUL EXTRACTS.

"Virtue has resources buried in itself, which we know not till the invading hour calls them from their retreats. Surrounded by hosts without, and when nature itself, turned traitor, is its most deadly enemy within; it assumes a new and a superhuman power, which is greater than nature itself. Whatever be its creed—whatever be its sect—from whatever segment of the globe its orisons arise, virtue is God's Empire, and from his throne of thrones he will defend it. Though cast into the distant earth, and struggling on the dim arena of a human heart, all things above are spectators of its conflict, or enlisted in its cause. The angels have their charge over it—the banner of archangels are on its side; and from sphere to sphere through the illimitable ether, and round the impenetrable darkness at the feet of God, its triumph is hymned by harps, which are strung to the glories of the Creator." BULWER.

"Dark and inexplicable fate! wild contrasts, demon of this hoary and old world, that move through it, as a spirit moveth over the waters, filling the depths of things with a solemn mystery, and an everlasting change! thou sweepest over our graves, and joy is born from the ashes: thou sweepest over joy, and, lo, it is a grave!—Engine and tool of the Almighty, whose year can not fade, thou changest the earth as a garment, and as a vesture it is changed; thou makest it one vast sepulchre and womb united, swallowing and creating life! and reproducing, over and over, from age to age, from the creation to the creation's doom, the same distant atoms which were our fathers, and which are the sole heir-looms that through countless generations they bequeath and perpetuate to their sons."—Hill.

RELIGIOUS ARISTOCRATS.

These are strange specimens of human nature. We have them all around us: especially in our large and populous places. Their devotion being a matter of question—yes, a matter, for spirit it is not—they leave no doubt on the mind of observers that they can live best by swimming on the popular current. Hence if a stranger comes into the place, in whose reputation they take a deep interest, they will just take the trouble to tell him or her, as the case may be, which is the most popular and fashionable meeting for them to attend, if they would be considered respectable; as though devotion was to be measured by this standard! Heaven pity such advisers.

"Where did you go to meeting when you lived in B—?" said Mrs. Gossip to another lady who had just moved into C—. "To the Unitarian," was the reply. "Well, there are no Unitarians here," was the rejoinder, "and I hope you will not go to the Universalist meeting, for that is not considered so respectable."

What think, candid reader, of Mrs. Gossip? Was not this insinuation a low and contemptible one? And yet this poor lady really thought she belonged to the very elite of the place—the spiritual lords and ladyships were her companions, and the whole concern was highly popular, and whatsoever was not of this number, must not be considered respectable. No expression did she make, however, on her advice, but took the liberty to attend the Universalist meeting, if she pleased, and let reputation take care of itself. Yet there are many weak souls who would have been charmed or frightened by this fashionable cant—this religious aristocracy. Heaven preserve us from such creatures as these same aristocrats! We earnestly pray God that they may not come near us, unless to be reached by the sword of the spirit, and made humble by the Gospel. Until this can take place we pray for their absence from our ranks.

MARRIAGES.

In Madison, on the 2d of August, by Rev. A. Dismore, Mr. SEYMOUR CURTIS, to Miss ELIZA ANN CURTIS, daughter of Mr. Eli Curtis.

In Morrisville on the 3d of August, by the same, Mr. PALMER HALL, to Miss LUCETTA LEWIS, daughter of Capt. Isaac Lewis.

DEATHS.

In Aurora, July 31st, of stoppage of the wind-pipe, Mr. ELIAS AVERY, aged 69 years. For nine days he could not take food, which, joined with mortification, terminated his days. The deceased sustained the reputation of a practical Christian, and was beloved for his moral integrity. His faith was firmly fixed in the Restitution; so much so, that it enabled him to bear his sickness with composure, and to meet death with a smile. He frequently alluded to the common objection against his faith that "it would do to live by, but not to die by," and affirmed that it not only blessed him in life, but abundantly sustained him in meeting death; which was proved by his departure in triumph, his faith having enabled him to rob dissolution of its sting. So fell asleep a virtuous follower of Christ. "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." May God give comfort to a numerous circle of mourners. The consolations of the Gospel were preached by G. W. M.

At his residence, near Wome's lott, Berks county, Pa. on the 17th of June, BR. SAMUEL LONGANECKER, aged 38 years, 6 months, and 3 days. His disease was of a consumptive nature, and baffled all medical aid. He was confined to the house for about six months, and the greater part of that time to his bed. He left a widow and three children to mourn his departure. His earthly remains were deposited in the Universalist burying ground at Womelsdop, on Monday following his decease, on which occasion the writer of this, spoke the words of consolation to a very numerous assembly of mourners, friends and neighbors, from 1 Cor. xv: 19.

As a man, Br. Longanecker was strictly honest and fair in all his dealings, his spiritual enemies (others he had none) themselves testifying thereto. He was a firm believer and advocate of the doctrine of the filial holiness and happiness of the whole Adamic family.—He died full in the faith, and we may of truth say of him, that "he fought the good fight, he kept the faith" etc.—In him we have a strong verification of the grand truth, "that Universalism is good to live by, and good to die by." His faith was good to live by, for he was an upright dealer and good neighbor, as all who knew him must testify; and his faith could not be otherwise but good to die by, as he had a conscience void of offence, which gave him peace of mind, and as he was firm in faith, he had no fears in relation to an angry and vengeful Deity, but on the contrary feelingly knew that "God was good unto all, and that his tender mercies were over all his works," and in this assurance could calmly commend and resign his spirit into the hands of a kind and good Father, breathing out in resignation, the prayer of his Lord and Master, "Father, not mine, but thy will be done." JACOB MYERS.

At his residence in the village of Mason, Branch county, Mich., on the evening of the 25th ult., JONATHAN CONGER, Esq., aged 34 years. His disease was first a congestion of the brain, which continued for about a week, and then relapsed into typhus fever, with which he constantly and rapidly failed until after an illness of two weeks death, closed the scene. In the death of this individual, community has lost an active and efficient member; a wife a kind and affectionate husband, who has thus in an early period been torn from her embrace, and consigned to the dark mansion of the tomb. His funeral was attended on the 26th, by a large and respectable concourse of people, whose listening and death-like silence, served constantly to remind the writer while he attempted to hold forth the consolation of the Gospel, that he was truly in the house of death.

Mr. Conger was a believer in the constant goodness of God, but being personally unacquainted with him, the writer is unable to say how far his life and conduct were influenced by his belief, or how deep he drank of the waters of life and salvation. May a perfect love for, and confidence in God, serve to cast out all fear from the minds of his widowed companion and friends, and may this afflictive dispensation of his providence, serve to unite their hearts more firmly to himself who is the original source of all consolation and comfort.

On the 14th inst., at Edmeston, Otsego county, CATHARINE FITCH, consort of Prentes Fitch, aged 71. She was a member of the Universalist church in Burlington, and died in the full faith of a world's salvation.

NUMBER 34.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

From the Millennium Harbinger.

No. 8.—Mr. Campbell to Mr. Skinner.

Bethany, Va., August 1, 1837.

1. MY DEAR SIR—Yours of the 18th ult. arrived yesterday. No thanks are due me for settling preliminaries to "mutual satisfaction." That has not been done. You may, indeed, thank me for having given up every litigated point to your entire satisfaction. Your thanks would have been in order had you substituted my for "mutual."

2. Your 2d and 3d paragraphs have no bearing on the question before us. Your 4th admits the justice of my strictures on your four propositions; but you defend your nullifications, etc., upon the ground that my four questions were objectionable on the same score. Shrewd, indeed! To allow a person to select one out of five questions, is, in your optics, identical with compelling him to discuss the whole. To be asked at table to partake of any one of five dishes, is, in your reason, equivalent to be compelled to digest another five! To offer for selection four or five homogeneous propositions, and to constrain the discussion of just so many heterogeneous points, are just the same thing! Having in the very elements of your defence admitted all that I alleged in my general review of your positions, I feel no necessity of farther demonstrating the entire dissimilarity of the case you urge to protect you. Without farther comment, I fearlessly refer the review to all our readers.

3. You candidly allow (paragraph 6) that your first three propositions only reach the ramparts, the mere outposts of the besieged city; and wisely say, "If I [you] prove the affirmative of the fourth, my whole system of endless sin and misery falls." Yes—if you prove the fourth! Aye, that is the point: for this not proved, yourself being judge, your other toils are vain and useless. Hasten, then, my dear Sir, to the fourth. That is the vital point—and the affirmative is yours.

4. The first point of interest bearing on the question before us, is in your 8th paragraph. My parody upon your apostrophe you allege is not in point. Here we are at issue; and it is an important issue. The great point with your school on the first proposition is, that gehenna originally meant the valley of Hinnom, as we have been told a thousand times: therefore it cannot represent a state of punishment after death in another world. This is your great enthymeme. Syllogistically expressed, it would read in full—

5. Whatever word has represented a place of physical misery in this life, cannot represent a state of future misery after death.

But gehenna has represented a place of physical misery in this life:

Therefore, gehenna cannot represent a state of future misery after death.

6. Now, Sir, answer me unequivocally, and say whether the above syllogism does not state the point, to illustrate and prove which, the ten thousand pages written about gehenna have been published from Georgia to Maine. Be definite, and explicit, too, on this question: for here I do claim for the truth a decided victory. Out of the lips of Universalists themselves, I refute these ten thousand pages, by showing that their syllogism and philology as fully prove that the words shemim, ouranos, cælum, heaven, because they originally signified the sensible air and the visible sky, cannot signify a state or place of future happiness after death: I say, the case is precisely similar. Take the Hebrew shemim and gehenna, or the Saxon heaven and hell, and compare their history, and there are not two cases more parallel in universal language. HELL has often denoted the vale of Hinnom, the pit, the grave, and sometimes a state of punishment after death. HEAVEN in like manner, has often denoted the air, the region of the sun, moon, and stars; the blue ethereal, exaltation, and sometimes the state of future happiness after death. Do you, Mr. Skinner, deny this? If so, say it distinctly. If you do not deny it, then I ask you, are not these two cases parallel? Compare the following with the preceding syllogism:

7. Whatever word has represented a place of physical enjoyment in this life, cannot represent a state of future enjoyment after death.

But shemim has represented a place of physical enjoyment in this life:

Therefore, shemim cannot represent a state of future enjoyment after death.

8. You may have another still more precise case, if this one is not fully satisfactory. For example:—

Whatever word originally signified a state of limited and temporary suffering, can never afterwards represent a state of unlimited and eternal suffering.

But gehenna originally signified a state of limited and temporary suffering:

Therefore, gehenna can never signify a state of unlimited and eternal suffering.

Its counterpart is as follows:—

9. Whatever word originally signified a state of limited and temporary happiness, can never afterwards represent a state of unlimited and eternal happiness.

But Paradise originally signified a state of limited and temporary enjoyment:

Therefore, Paradise can never afterwards represent a state of unlimited and eternal happiness.

But both Heaven and Paradise are so used in the New Testament. Therefore all these Universalist syllogisms are equally fallacious and delusive.

10. On comparing these four syllogisms, then, ask how much has been gained to the cause of Universalism from all the concessions of all the believers in future punishment; or from all your writings and debates on sheol, hades, and gehenna. This, Sir, I wish you to remember, is one of my outposts, which I cannot surrender till you bring forces of reason and logic incomparably superior to all that have ever marshalled under your banners. It is, indeed, a rampart in which I feel perfectly impregnable, and I wish to give it conspicuousness in the ratio of your efforts to slur it over. I fearlessly conclude, that as the word heaven represents a state of future happiness, so the term hell as undeniably represents a state of misery after death. So do all the words in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, which are now properly translated by them.

11. And here, Sir, I am sorry to accuse you of shuffling in a most palpable manner. You change the point most dexterously. You say, "Neither the Hebrew shemim, the Greek Ouranos, the Persian Paradiseos, nor, I may add, the Latin Cælum, nor the English Heaven, is ever relied on by any Universalist, nor any other enlightened Christian, as proof of the endless happiness of the saints." That is not the point. The question is not, "On what words do Universalists rely;" but, Do these words sometimes represent the future happiness of the saints? You, my good Sir, have admitted this; and this being by you admitted, is all that is necessary to my parallelism. Why then did you, ingenious Sir, change this point into a question about what Universalists choose to rely on in debate? By thus subtly changing the point, and by conceding that these words do sometimes mean a state of endless happiness, in despite of their original or more common signification, you prove that you are sometimes sufficiently acute; and, moreover, you establish, to my full satisfaction, all that I have alleged about gehenna.

12. Permit me, Sir, to correct your style of address. You are so much accustomed to speak of "wilful perversions," and "outrageous perversions," and to a swelling, declamatory, and highly turgid and boastful manner, that you are not only sinning against human dignity, but misinterpreting the proper language of decency and respect. I now allude to your 7th, 10th, and various other paragraphs, where you declaim on certain terms of modesty, almost to an utter perversion of my meaning. You say that I am "reduced to a mere probability," "to a bare possibility," "a perhaps," that gehenna was used by our Lord to represent punishment after death. Because I did not in your style, or in that of "His Holiness," say it certainly does so signify, or I have proved it beyond all doubt to signify, etc., etc., but modestly said it is possible, it is probable, etc. But, Sir, I think that I have proved more than I allege in these words. I wish my arguments to be always a little stronger than my assertions. Yet if you require it of me, I now say that I have fully proved—

1st. That gehenna in the New Testament does not represent the valley of Hinnom; but

2d. That it is used by our Lord, not possibly nor probably; but certainly to represent a state of future punishment after death. I assert now the more positively, because we have seen all that you have been able to allege against it. And what is it? That, in the opinion of certain interpreters, it once (Matt. v: 22) refers to burning alive in the literal valley of Hinnom. Then, Sir, yourself being judge, we have it eleven times out of twelve the representative not of the valley of Hinnom, but of something more terrible.

13. It is unnecessary for me to contend about Matt. v: 22, as you only urged it upon mere authority. But, Sir, were it necessary, I could show that you misinterpret the authors you quote. Of those that I have now leisure to examine, not one of them authorize you or any one else to say that Jesus threatened a literal burning in the valley of Hinnom. They only say that he alluded to this valley, but meant a future and a different punishment. You rely too much, Sir, upon Mr. Balfour. Jesus never threatened his disciples or his hearers with Jewish punishments for disobedience to his instructions. I have given, some dozen years since, the substance of all these comments, in a note on this passage, in the first edition of my Family Testament.

14. Your cordial admission that to "enter into life" is the contrast of being "cast into hell," and that to "enter into life" is in Scripture style sometimes equivalent to entering heaven or eternal happiness, goes far indeed to justify my remarks in my last letter on gehenna. But you will have to go a little farther on this point. You take refuge from your own concession that "to enter into life" sometimes means to enter into future and eternal bliss; "into immortal beatitude"! by throwing a glorious ambiguity around the phrase "enter into life." But, Sir, I must allure you out of the smoke you have thrown around you. To talk of life and of the bread of life, and of passing from death to life, in such a connexion, is supremely rabbinical. You will have "entering into life" sometimes to mean entering into the church! You ask me gravely, am I prepared for the issue of my assertion, viz., "that whatever is meant by entering into life, the very opposite of that is going into, or being cast into gehenna?" I answer, I am. But why do you immediately fly from the issue by introducing phrases in which the word life occurs; such as "bread of life," "my words are spirit and life," etc., as if these had any thing to do with the contrast before us? Did Jesus contrast "the bread of life" with the "everlasting fire," or with "gehenna," or being "cast into hell"?! You abandon the issue the very moment you dare me to the conflict. I am prepared for the issue, Sir, and fearlessly assert that you cannot produce a single instance in the whole Bible where the phrase in issue, viz., "enter into life," means to join the church, to become a citizen of Christ's kingdom on earth, or regeneration, or any change of state which happens in this world. You need not parcel out these words and tell me what life sometimes means, what enter means, and what into denotes. No, Mr. Skinner, this is mere trifling. To be cast into gehenna, is the phrase with which enter into life is contrasted.

15. No one denies that the phrases "kingdom of heaven," "kingdom of God," sometimes mean the church of Christ, or Christian institution. No person living, perhaps, has either said or written more on this subject than your humble servant. But that to "enter into life" and to "enter into the kingdom of God," mean the church or Christian institution, in contrast with entering into any other state, is as gratuitous an assumption as you can make. Jesus said to a rich young man, "If you would enter into life, keep the commandments"—"a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven"—"it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God." Do these phrases by any conceivable interpretation, mean entering into the church on earth!! If they cannot, in such a connexion, how much less possible or probable that in the contrast with being cast into gehenna, or the everlasting fire where the worm dieth not, they mean admission into an earthly institution!!

16. Among other delusive questions and assertions, you ask me, paragraph 12th, If gehenna have the same meaning in all places, how are we to understand James speaking of the tongue? etc. Who says that either heaven or hell has the same meaning in all places!! Is this, or is it not, ad captandum? I have then, Sir, formed the issue. It is with me a strong outpost. That life implies death, that eternal life implies eternal death, that to enter into life in contrast with being cast into hell, means the possession of as great a contrast as reason or language knows: in one word, Sir, that in the preaching of Jesus to be "cast into hell," "into the everlasting fire," as certainly means endless punishment, as to "enter into life," or "into the kingdom of God," does mean endless bliss; and that "to enter into life" does in no place mean to enter into the church or kingdom of God on earth, has been shown, and may be most clearly seen by an induction of every passage where the phrase occurs. As I gave all the places where gehenna occurs, do you give all the places where "enter into life" occurs.

17. I am much abused for an alleged "wilful perversion" of your favorite dogma which I quoted in my last. I have not, Sir, wilfully perverted it. You affirm that "justice can neither ask nor receive farther punishment than sincere penitence and reformation." Nay, you go farther and say, that, in this way, "the sinner has been punished according to the full demerit of the crime," etc. Now, Sir, if hell and punishment are two names for the same state, and if justice can demand no greater punishment than repentance, where is the mighty wilful perversion of your dogma in regarding repentance as the only hell or the only state of punishment. If in repentance "the sinner has been punished according to the full demerit of the crime," where shall we find a severer hell than in a penitential heart!! I contend then, Sir, that your words amply justify my conclusion.—Here I might retort upon you with seven-fold evidence. Why do you coin dogmas for me at the mint of your imagination? Where did you learn that I think that "Adam was threatened with eternal death," etc., etc.? These are fictions of your own manufacture.

18. I protest against such a defence of yourself in any case as you exhibit in the 18th paragraph. You call my exposure of your fantastic or nameless "version" of Psalm ix: 17, "a wilful perversion." I unequivocally and ex animo repel the charge. Except it be your own wilful perversion of reason and truth, there is no other perversion in the passage. You again say, "the wicked shall experience severe judgments, etc., and perhaps also a distressing sense of guilt," etc. This is your hell with a perhaps in the middle of it! Let the reader examine your 18th paragraph, and turn back to my 27th; and after comparing them, I venture to predict he will hereafter understand your "wilful perversion" to mean your own signal and unanswerable defeat. You talk about my making "no effort to prove your definition or version to be incorrect"!!! My whole 27th paragraph is given as a perfect disproof of what yourself did not so much as attempt to prove but by the case in debate, as I there told you. Hereafter I advise the reader to look for an unanswerable refutation of your speculation where you talk of "wilful perversion." You will be surprised, Sir, to find how soon we begin to understand your style. Your 19th paragraph also proves a proposition not now in debate—viz. That it is possible for a person to be ridiculous without being sublime. This indeed, you proved to a demonstration in the 21st paragraph of the preceding letter, when you made the Roman power "Him that had power to destroy both soul and body in hell"! Yes, reader, Mr. Skinner's version of "Fear not them that kill the body," is, "Might not the Saviour have intended the Roman power?"!!!

19. I have now touched upon all the important points before me, and have formed with you two main issues. These two contain every thing of vital consequence to the discussion of the first proposition. Your 14th paragraph runs out into the second proposition, on the words everlasting, endless, etc. Still, as the phrase the everlasting fire occurred as a substitute for gehenna in my quotations from the four gospels, I must observe that your quotations from the Old Testament are not in point. Not one of them is of the genus, much less of the species before us. "A fire ever burning upon the altar," or a "smoke ascending forever," are as unlike to pur to aionion, the everlasting fire, or to pur to asbeston, the unquenchable fire, as the phrase "bread of life" differs from the phrase "enter into life," or as the phrase "it is truth" differs from "it is the truth," or "he is a light of the world" differs from "he is the light of the world." The "everlasting fire" substituted by Jesus for the word "hell," is never found identified with any thing else but hell or future punishment. It is defined by him as "the everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels," Matt. xxv: 41. You can not produce a single instance in the whole New Testament wherein it is applied to any thing temporal or limited! Take notice, I have given you the chance of an issue on the second proposition. My dear Sir, there is the width of the poles between saying "Thou art a man," and "Thou art the man"—between a fire that ever burns on my hearth and "the everlasting fire." I beseech you to abandon your loose style of quoting Scripture.—No man ever can arrive at the truth who interprets and applies words regardless of their adjuncts.

20. Universalists believe that "Adam did die the very death threatened on the very day of transgression." They believe many other strange things. I believe that Adam died at the end of NINE HUNDRED AND THIRTY YEARS after his creation, and that this was threatened in the words, "in the day that thou eatest thereof DYING THOU SHALT DIE." But of all these curious matters in their own place.

21. What the apostles preached to the Gentiles will also appear in the sequel. That they preached fearful vengeance, future punishment, punishment after death, everlasting ruin to wicked men, to those who rejected the Messiah, is awfully certain. Yes, Sir, you will as soon quench the orb of day by your spittle, as quench the everlasting fire of Heaven's insulted Majesty, by all your powers of reason and declamation.

22. You admit there has been PUNISHMENT for sin—punishment issuing in the destruction of sinners. Of these admissions, hereafter. You pass too lightly over many things in my last epistle, No. VI. The 17th, 21st, 23d, 24th, 25th, 26th, 28th, and 31st paragraphs have been either leaped over, or trod on as burning embers.

23. That the Scribes and Pharisees, addressed by Jesus as an off-spring of vipers, were cast into the hell of Jerusalem's destruction, is as baseless, wretched, miserable, blind, and naked a get-off from a dilemma, as, in my opinion, can be found in universal history. These Scribes and Pharisees, so ripe in wickedness, could not be less than 40 or 50 years old when Jesus was 33. They had seen their fourscore years and more before Titus, A. D. 70, besieged the city: and if they did not escape that damnation of hell, must, in at least nine cases in ten, have been raised from the dead!

24. Your reply to this letter, if it reach me not before the 22d inst., will not find me at home. I shall be gone to Ohio for two weeks or more. In case it should not arrive in time, I will leave a letter on the 2d proposition, to follow your next, and shall attend to your reply to this on my return. This will be forwarded in proof by our mail of the 3d instant.

In all benevolence your friend,
A. CAMPBELL.

For the Magazine and Advocate.
No. 9.—Mr. Skinner to Mr. Campbell.
Utica, N. Y., August 12, 1837.

DEAR SIR—Yours of the 1st inst., reached me yesterday. It is useless to waste more time about the vastness of your concessions.

2. You admit that you had been wide from the question before us, when you say that my 2d and 3d paragraphs, which directly met what you had written, had no bearing on the question. I hope in future you will observe more strictly your own rule to keep to the question.

3. You attempt to evade my retort of your own charge of the proposed questions' nullifying [nullifying you now have it] each other, is a lame effort. You pretend that your questions were all homogeneous; either of which would have been sufficient to cover the ground of difference between us, but mine were heterogeneous, compelling us to travel over more ground than necessary. Is it possible you can be serious in this? If your first question, "Is there any punishment for sin?" had been settled in the affirmative, would you not then have desired a discussion of your next, viz.: "Is that punishment present or future?" and so on with the third and fourth questions? And yet you would persuade our readers that you only meant to give me the option of selecting one out of four or five questions! Admirable consistency!

4. If your strongest ramparts fall, you need not "lay the flattering unction to your soul," that your citadel will be spared. It will be time enough for me to advance further proof of my fourth proposition, when you have disposed of that brought forward in my first letter, or done any thing towards establishing the affirmative of your own side.

5. All you say in your 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th and 10th paragraphs, is wide of the mark. Unfortunately for my learned and acute opponent, it is an entire misapprehension (whether intentional or unintentional, I know not,) of the views and arguments of Universalists generally, and certainly of my own. Certainly I have never argued, nor known any Universalist to argue, that, because gehenna originally meant the valley of Hinnom, therefore it cannot represent a state of punishment after death in another world. No, Sir, such are not the arguments of Universalists. And all your fine syllogisms, based on this supposition, are, like the fragrance of a rose in the wilderness, wasted upon the desert air. We say, Sir, that gehenna originally and literally meant the valley of Hinnom. This you admit. We further say, that in process of time, gehenna, or the valley of Hinnom, and tophet, another term for the same thing, were used in the Old Testament figuratively to set forth the temporal but severe judgments coming upon the Jews. The learned Schleusner, in his Lexicon, (and with him agree the most eminent critics,) in vice gehenna, says, "As a continual fire was necessary to consume the substances, [carcasses of animals and of desperate criminals,] lest the air should be infected by putrefaction, and as there were always worms feeding on the remaining fragments, [see Isa. lxvi: 24.] it hence came to pass that every severe punishment, and particularly every ignominious kind of death, was called by the name of gehenna." He refers to Matt. v: 22—"shall be in danger of a gehenna of fire"—i. e., he says, "shall be worthy of an ignominious death." See as confirmation of the justness of this definition, Jer. vii: 25, to end, and viii: 1, 2, 3, and the whole of the 19th chapter of Jeremiah. Also, Isa. xxx: 27-33, and xxxi: 1-4. The reader is requested carefully to examine all these places.

6. Such being the acknowledged meaning and uses of the valley of Hinnom, in the Old Testament, what reason have we to suppose it was used in an entirely different sense in the New? Would Jesus have used the term in so very different a sense from that in which the Jews had been accustomed to understand it, (and it was never used in addressing Gentiles,) without giving the least intimation that he had entirely changed its meaning from that in which their ancient prophets used it.

7. Though Schleusner, Dr. George Campbell, and other advocates of the doctrine of endless misery, assume that gehenna was afterwards used to designate the future punishment of the wicked, or the state of the damned in the eternal world, it is only their opinion, unaccompanied by a particle of proof. They may assume or opine ever so confidently, and you may assert ever so positively any doctrine or position you please, but this to me and our readers is no proof. You and they can prove as far as the Bible warrants, the application of gehenna to severe temporal punishments; but beyond this you have no warrant in the Bible to go. As the term was used in the Old Testament to designate, besides the literal valley of Hinnom, the severe temporal judgments coming on the Jews, I maintain that it was used by our Saviour in the New Testament in the same or a similar sense, to designate the severe temporal judgments coming on the same nation. Therefore I do not say, that because gehenna originally meant the valley of Hinnom, it cannot represent a state of punishment after death in another world; but I say you have brought no proof of the latter. Give us the proof, Sir, and we believe; but not without. Or show that my definition is incorrect, and I give it up. [See my June letter, published in your August number, 19th and 20th paragraphs.]

8. The position you would establish by showing the fallacy of your peripatetic syllogisms, reminds me of, and is about as well sustained, as the visionary theory of Emanuel Swedenborg. Swedenborg established his doctrine by correspondencies, you yours by contrasts; and though both are alike visionary and devoid of proof, the Baron's is altogether the most beautiful and inviting. You attempt to establish the doctrine of endless misery on the ground, that it is the exact opposite of the endless happiness!—of eternal death, not once mentioned in the Bible, on the ground that eternal life is mentioned! About as consistent as the Orthodox argument, that because there is a personal God, there must be a personal devil. Of two days, one is said to be hot and the other cold. It is proved that the thermometer rose to 100 degrees of Fahrenheit on the hot day. It follows syllogistically, and by contrast, that it must have sunk just 100 degrees below zero, on the cold day!

9. I deny that the Hebrew shemim, and Greek gehenna, are always used in opposite or contrasted senses in Scripture, or that the Saxon heaven and hell are always, or generally, or even frequently, so used. True, they are so used Matt. xi: 23, and Luke x: 15; but you will not contend that in these places any thing more is meant, than temporal prosperity and temporal adversity. There are a great variety of senses in which these Saxon words are used in the Bible, but these different senses are by no means always opposites. Heaven (or heavens) is used to signify the air, the visible sky, the heavenly bodies, temporal prosperity, honor, exaltation, God himself, or his dominion and providence, spiritual enjoyment, and sometimes the place or state of endless happiness hereafter. Hell is used to signify the grave, the state of all the dead, a dark, hidden or concealed state, temporal adversity or destruction, mental condemnation, guilt, remorse of conscience, the valley of Hinnom, the judgments of God on the Jewish nation and infidel persecuting opposers of his Gospel; but that it signifies a place of misery in the eternal world, you have not offered one particle of proof, nor do I believe you can offer any. This strong rampart of error then falls for want of support; and I therefore "do claim for the truth a decided victory" here. And the greater "conspicuity" you have sought to give this point of the debate, only serves to render your defeat the more signal.

10. Your 11th paragraph is mostly about a matter on which we do not differ essentially, and which is not in dispute between us, viz., the meaning of the words rendered heaven, etc. It is needless, therefore, to waste words about my "shuffling" or "changing the point," which I certainly did not do. I have shown above, that you were not to the point, or rather that that point was not to the question in dispute. The conclusion of your 11th paragraph, is a non sequitur.

11. One can hardly avoid smiling on the perusal of your 12th paragraph. After accusing me of a "highly turgid and boastful manner," and of "singing against human dignity," by "misinterpreting the language of decency and respect," we have a formal declaration of your extreme "modesty." Reader, take notice, my friend Campbell is a very "modest" man in controversy. But unfortunately for him, his arguments, instead of being "a little stronger than his assertions," fall very far short of them. Indeed the latter, though the very quintessence of modesty, are frequently found entirely unsupported and widely separated from the former. In the same paragraph you assert that you have fully proved, "1st., that Gehenna in the New Testament, does not represent the valley of Hinnom;" and "2d., that it does" "positively" "represent a state of future punishment after death." Very modest! In your 13th paragraph, you seem to think I misinterpret the authors I quote or refer to, relative to Matt. v: 22, viz.: Parkhurst, McKnight, Rosenmuller, Heylin, Wynne, Wakefield, and A. Clarke. You appear dissatisfied with the authority I refer to. Well, my dear Sir, I will endeavor to suit you better now, so far as authority is concerned. I now quote from a note on Matt. v: 22, found in the new version or translation of the New Testament, by Alexander Campbell. "The fact is, that the allusions in this verse are all to human institutions or customs among the Jews; and the Judges, the Sanhedrim, and the hell-fire here introduced, are all human punishments."—"The following translation of this verse is expressive of the sense of the original: 'Whoever is vainly incensed against his brother, shall be obnoxious to the sentence of the judges; (the court of twenty-three;) whoever shall say to his brother, (in the way of contempt,) shallow brains, shall be obnoxious to the Sanhedrim; and whoever shall say apostate wretch, (the highest expression of malice,) shall be obnoxious to the gehenna of fire,' or to being burned alive in the valley of Hinnom. This translation is in substance approved by Adam Clarke, and other critics of respectability."

12. Thus our readers may see how very differ-ently my learned opponent talks and writes when honestly endeavoring, in his private study, to give the true sense of Scripture in a new version, and when engaged in a controversy with a Universalist. I trust, my dear Sir, that you will not complain of this authority, and also trust that we shall see no more repetitions of your "modest" assertions that you "have fully proved that gehenna in the New Testament, does not represent the valley of Hinnom," etc.

13. Your 14th paragraph charges me with admitting that the phrase "enter into life," is, in Scripture style, equivalent to entering into eternal happiness or immortal beatitude, throwing the smoke of ambiguity around the phrase, and then immediately flying from the issue formed with you on the subject. By re-examining my arguments, our readers will perceive that I have done neither. I have not admitted, and do not admit, that "enter into life" is ever equivalent in Scripture, to entering into immortal beatitude in the eternal world. So far from seeking to obscure the meaning of the phrase, I studiously avoided all ambiguity, a thing, by the bye, of which I fear you will never be guilty, so long as a double entendre will serve your purpose better. You well knew that heaven, kingdom of heaven, eternal life, etc., were phrases which were vulgarly used and understood in a different sense from their usual scriptural import, and that they would answer for you to play an ambiguous game with.

14. In reply to your 14th, 15th and 16th paragraphs, I remark that the phrase "enter into life" only occurs in three passages in the New Testament, viz. Matt. xviii: 8, 9, and xix: 17, and Mark ix: 43-47, and in all the three passages, evidently means entering into the Gospel dispensation, or Christian institution, and nothing more or less, my learned opponent's modest assertion to the contrary notwithstanding. The only way of coming at the true meaning of the phrase, is to collate all the places where it occurs, with their respective contexts, and compare them with other phrases as nearly resembling it as can be found. The passages I cited "hath everlasting life"—"is passed from death unto life." John v: 24; John iii: 14, "enter into rest," Heb. iv: 3, and others of the same stamp—I do and will maintain are precisely synonymous with the phrase enter into life, Mark ix: 43, 45, 47, and its parallels. This fact is confirmed by the Saviour, Matt. xix: 23, 24, where he gives as the true meaning of entering into life, verse 17, this comment, "a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven"—"for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God," evidently meaning, not that the rich could never enter the abodes of immortal blessedness, but that they would be the last, or least likely of all, to expose themselves to reproach and enter the church of Christ in that generation. This view is further confirmed by a valuable note of your own in the appendix to your version of the New Testament. You say on Matt. xi: 12, "The Scribes and Pharisees claimed for themselves the chief places in this kingdom [of heaven] and were, by their conduct, shutting this kingdom against men. Publicans and harlots, however, in opposition to the influence and example of those men, received the doctrine of the Messiah, and thus, as it were, invaded or took possession of that kingdom, from which the elders and doctors [the rich men] excluded them. Finally, the Gentiles too, by their faith in the Messiah, and their consequent boldness, took possession of this heavenly kingdom." Thus, Sir, by your own arguments, your own authority, and on your own premises, I have met you on the issue, and a glorious defeat is yours.

15. In your 17th p. you again repeat your caricature of what you call my Universalist "dogma." But, Sir, until you see from my pen, or from some Universalist in existence, the idea advanced that repentance and punishment, or repentance and hell are synonymous, I beg of you for your own reputation never to be guilty of another such outrage. Does not so great a logician as you profess to be, know the difference between cause and effect?—between means and end? We do not regard repentance, either as hell, or as any punishment at all; but it may be the result of just and fatherly punishment.

16. On the perusal of your 18th p. I wanted to whisper in your ear, "keep cool, friend Campbell,—keep cool! you will not only feel but do much better if you will." You again introduce here your groundless charge of having a hell with a perhaps in the middle of it. If the reader will again refer to my June letter, published in the M. H. for August, he will see there was no other perhaps than this: I gave three definitions of sheol, and said the word was used Ps. ix: 17, in the 2d or 3d of those senses, or perhaps both. And, Sir, may not a man endure either remorse of conscience or temporal destruction, separately? and may he not endure them both together? Answer no, if you dare. I am glad you inform me your 27th paragraph was given to disprove my position on this subject; for otherwise I should not have known it. Try again, my good Sir. On the closing part of your 18th paragraph I will simply remark, that sneers are not arguments.

17. In your 19th paragraph you say, my "quotations from the Old Testament" [relative to the unquenchable fire, the "fire that shall never go out," etc.] "are not in point," and that "not one of them is of the genus much less of the species before us." I admit, Sir, that not one of them is of such a genus as to prove endless misery, though they are generally of the very species of the texts under discussion, containing the same phraseology generally, and in some instances even stronger. "Their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched." Isa. lxvi: 24, is quite as strong phraseology as "their worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched." Mark ix. But the same thing substantially is meant by both. The phraseology concerning the duration of the fire and the judgments of God mentioned, Isa. xxxiv: 10, is quite as strong as the phrase everlasting fire, Matt. xviii: 8, and xxv: 41. And the very fact that the article the (Greek to) is prefixed to the phrase, confirms my views. It shows that, in the opinion of Jesus, the Jews understood what was meant by the everlasting fire, the unquenchable fire, the gehenna of fire, viz. the same that their ancient prophets had so frequently mentioned. It was a definite subject familiar to them all; and hence his use of the definite article. But if it had been an entirely new subject, never before broached, or new language, never before used and wholly unknown among the Jews, is it possible that the great Teacher of truth, would have used the definite article, and called it the everlasting fire, the gehenna of fire, etc., and never explained what he meant by it? No, Sir, I can not think it possible. And if the doctrine of endless misery had never before been taught, (and certainly the Old Testament does not contain it,) how is it possible his disciples could have understood him to refer to so awful an event, when he used, without any explanation whatever, the very language which the Jews had always used and understood in a very different sense? Can you answer? I may just as logically and more truly affirm, that "The everlasting fire substituted by Jesus for the word hell, is never found identified with," nor remotely hinting at, future punishment; as you do that it is never used in any but that sense. I may then add that you have not and can not produce a single instance in the whole Bible, wherein it is applied to any thing beyond the present state.—And I will again add, that if you should, it would be nothing to your purpose; for we are not discussing the question of future punishment, but of endless punishment. I wait for some evidence from you on the affirmative of the second proposition, before I attempt further proof of the negative.

18. You confirm my version of the "fable," when you admit that you agree with the serpent that Adam did "not surely die" the threatened death "in the day" of transgression, but lived nine hundred and thirty years after his creation.

19. It will be time to reply to your arguments promised in your 21st paragraph when they appear. I will not waste my "spittle" to quench your sun till it rises. If I thought there were any thing worthy of further notice in the paragraphs you think I "pass too slightly over," I surely would attend to them. If they do really contain arguments of weight unanswered, our readers, I doubt not, will see and give you credit therefor. But I assure you that if you deposited any "burning coals" therein, they must have gone out, however unquenchable or everlasting they might have been; for I felt of them and there was no warmth in them whatever.

20. Your 23d paragraph appears to be the offspring of spleen and petulency, or of disappointed ambition in being wholly unable to gainsay the evidence adduced, that the damnation of gehenna, Matt. xxiii, meant the severe judgment and destruction that our Saviour foretold the Jews should come upon them. However "baseless, wretched, miserable, blind and naked" my arguments or opinion, I happen to have the company of the learned and orthodox Theophylact and Bishop Pearce on my side. If you were present at the calamities that befel the Jews, at and just before the destruction of their city, perhaps you could tell whether Jesus spoke the truth in foretelling those woes, and how large a portion of that generation had to be raised from the dead! I hope my dear friend will get in better humor before he writes again.

In all kindness and friendship, I am yours,

SUNDAY AFTERNOON.

A Dialogue between a wealthy Farmer, his son Charles, and daughter Helen.

CHARLES. I do wish, father, that the Universalists would employ a preacher, for it is so tiresome to stay at home all day on Sunday, and have nothing to do and nothing to read. I was almost tempted to go into the woods hunting, and do not know but I should, but I knew you would be displeased if I did.

FATHER. I should, indeed, be displeased to have you spend your Sundays in hunting, and am sorry we cannot employ a preacher; but preachers want money, and you know we must be economical these hard times.

CHARLES. True, we ought always to be economical; but is it not possible to be economical at the expense of justice? Do you not believe the preacher capable of doing much good? Do you not recollect that the one who used to preach here, broke me of the foolish habit of swearing, and by his good advice and affectionate manner, persuaded me to break off many other foolish practices? And if they are capable of doing good, and spend much time and money in preparing for the duties of their profession, ought they to be allowed in hard times, to suffer for the want of employment and support?

FATHER. I acknowledge, Charles, that our former minister was under the necessity of breaking you of habits which, to my shame, I acknowledge I ought to have done myself, and on reflection, I should be willing to pay liberally toward the support of another, but then you know, one alone can do but little towards paying a preacher.

CHARLES. But are there not quite a number who would do something pretty handsome, if there was some one to take the lead, and make a little exertion?

FATHER. I presume there are, but the difficulty is, each one is waiting for the other, and the consequence is, all remain inactive.

CHARLES. And always will, so long as each waits for the other. Now I propose, father, that you go about it, just as if it all depended on you, and see if we cannot have some place where we may meet together on Sunday, and not only have the pleasure of greeting our neighbors, but of receiving some useful instruction.

FATHER. I will think of it, Charles, and not only think, but try and see what I can do. Come, Helen, cannot you read to us, to pass away the time?

HELEN. You know, father, I have been reading several chapters out of the Bible, the only book we have in the house that has not been almost worn out with reading. I would cheerfully read, if we had some other interesting books.

FATHER. Did you not borrow a book of neighbor B., when you were there the other day?

HELEN. To tell you the truth, my dear father, I felt ashamed to ask them to lend me any more books; for you know Mr. B. is not as wealthy as you are, and although they never refuse to lend me a book, I felt that it was not right that I should borrow. I wish you would buy us some good new works; I should then take much pleasure in reading to you.

FATHER. Books cost money, you know, and we can do without them. My rule is, never to buy any thing that I can do without.

HELEN. But, father, you have already more property than you will have any use for, and I can see no use in following up your rule so closely now.

FATHER. True, I have more than I want for my own use; but I am now saving money for you and Charles, for which you ought to be grateful, and not complain because I am trying to save all I can for you.

HELEN. Father, you are cruel in supposing me ungrateful. I am not ungrateful, nor insensible to your kindness; but, really, it appears to me that a part of our portion expended in a judicious selection of books now, while our minds are thirsting for knowledge, would be of much more service to us than were it saved to be given to us as property—would it not?

FATHER. I do not know but you are right, daughter. I will order our friend, the bookseller, to send us a few choice volumes, to try the experiment.

HELEN. I am really much obliged to you, father, and oh, how much pleasure I shall take in reading to you! And Charles, too, I am sure will be more willing to stay at home evenings—will you not, Charles?

CHARLES. Indeed I shall. It will be much more pleasant than to spend my time about the village with companions that are sometimes any thing but agreeable; but even their company is preferable to spending my evenings without books, and my Sundays without preaching.

A SHORT SERMON.

MY FELLOW-INTELLECTUALS—We have all heard of, or read books which were entitled, "Every Man his own Lawyer," and "Every Man his own Doctor." I think a book might be written with greater probability of accomplishing the professed object, if written with vigor and skill in adapting the instructions to the prevalent mental habits of the community, which might be appropriately entitled, "Every Man his own Preacher." At all events, I think that in a very great multitude of cases, you might derive equal, if not greater advantages from your own reflections, than from listening to those made by any other person. And of this I am well assured, that you will listen to the cogitations and reflections of other men with more than usual profit, as well as interest and attention, if you have previously made the same subject a theme of earnest investigation and continuous thought. With an earnest solicitude for your profit and progress in true wisdom* and philosophy, I beg to recommend to your most attentive consideration, what you find recorded in Luke xii: 13-34; but especially verse 15, which, I think, should be thus translated:—

"With much earnest endeavor preserve ye yourselves from excessive (or unwise) desires: for the life (or enjoyment) of no one dependeth on the abundance of his possessions."

Recent and passing occurrences, render this topic, at all times of the very deepest interest, peculiarly momentous. I would to God, that every father in our land would, for the benefit of his children and their associates in the succeeding generation, "lay these things to heart," and from a survey of his own, as well as the popular fallacies and delusions, (of which the present and similar distresses and calamities ought to be the corrective,) learn the importance and the means of preserving his children from the same course of folly and inseparable punishment.

Let each man of you ask himself, if your chief and most satisfying pleasures have arisen from the abundance of your possessions. If not, why indulge the commonly entertained but unwise and excessive expectations from that source, only to end in disappointment, as the voice of your own experience testifies? The words of Jesus are therefore but an echo of what every man might hear in his own bosom, if he would only listen to the monitor within.

Let your expectations from riches and abundant possessions, be in exact proportion to the average of solid and satisfying enjoyment which they yield. This will be wise—will prevent corroding cares, bitter disappointment, and leave room for the love and the pursuit of more worthy enjoyments. Your own serious reflections will lead you, I trust, to a proper and just appreciation of each object of pursuit and promise of happiness; and to these, and to the words of Heaven's own Teacher, I leave you.

Now, if ye consider this subject well, and inwardly digest the results of your experience and reflection, and follow them out into conduct, ye may become wiser than your teachers; and just in proportion to the acuteness and profundity of your own researches, will ye be capable of judging of, or improving by, the prelections of your preacher.—Amen.

MINISTERIAL LABOR.

SCHOOLS.—Every society should have its singing school and Sunday school, and these it should be the business of the preacher to visit frequently—to suggest plans for their improvement, and to encourage the teachers and pupils in them.

In this country where every child attends (or should and can attend) school during the week, Sunday schools should be rather places of recreation and purely religious instruction, than schools for instruction in orthography, reading, and long verbal tasks. The social and religious powers, should here be cultivated in an easy and agreeable manner, and a good library be attached to it. Sacred music should also add its attractions and refreshing recreation, if, indeed, it is not made a principal object in the school. In the selection of the proper books, and proper modes of recreation and study, the preacher can do much towards rendering these nurseries of the lambs of Jesus, all they ought to be.

In the singing school, unless himself well acquainted with music, he can not render himself as useful—but his experience will enable him to offer some valuable suggestions, even here. The introduction of some airs suitable for Conference meetings, or Concerts of praise, and for the Sunday school, he will find useful and expedient—especially as formal teachers of sacred music are too apt to be opposed to the use of such airs.

The visitation of the district schools, for the encouragement of the pupils in good conduct, and application to their studies, should also be attended to more frequently than it generally is by our preachers generally. His influence, arising from intimacy in and friendship with the families of many of the pupils, will make him a desirable visitor to the scholars, and a valuable one to the teacher—who certainly needs encouragement and sympathy in his labors, and respect in his station.

A PREACHER.

IMPROVEMENT OF SOCIETY.

That there is need of improvement in the present social and moral condition of society, is admitted on all hands; but the question is, whether such improvement can be effected? Mr. Combe in his lectures on moral philosophy argues that it can, on the ground that the present state of society does not satisfy the aspiration of our moral and intellectual faculties; as well as the history of mankind which exhibits the race as progressively rising in the scale of moral excellence. The causes of the present imperfect state of society, he assigns to the selfishness which appears to reign so universally, and attributes the past errors of man to his ignorance of himself and eternal nature.

If Mr. Combe is correct in his opinions (and who is prepared to dispute them?) then how important is it, that every friend to moral improvement should do his share in removing the causes of these evils, by aiding in the dissemination of such knowledge as is calculated to expand the intellectual and moral faculties, and thereby make mankind better and happier. We think Mr. C. has clearly shown in one of his lectures that an object so desirable can be effected, if individuals will do their duty as individuals, and as members of society. We here give an extract from it, to which we call the reader's attention.

O. A.

Mr. Combe now proceeded to state some of the reasons which render it probable that human capability of improvement is greater than past experience may at first sight lead us to suppose. In the first place, man is obviously progressive in the evolution of his mental powers. The development of his brain appears to improve with time, exercise and the amelioration of his institutions.—The brains of civilized nations are much better developed in the moral and intellectual regions, than those of savages and barbarians; a fact which Mr. C. illustrated by producing specimens of the crania of a variety of nations in different stages of civilization. In savages and barbarians the animal propensities have an ascendancy corresponding to the predominance of their organs in the brain. Hence, if the moral and intellectual organs could be enlarged, the fitness of men for moral and rational institutions would be increased. There is no ground for presuming that the human brain is incapable of farther improvement; on the contrary the frequent occurrence of very favorably constituted brains shows what it is possible for the race to become; were the best class of brains generally prevalent, we should speedily see mankind acting in the spirit of Christian morality. In the second place, man is progressive in knowledge; and this single circumstance is a good ground for relying on his future improvement. As knowledge advances, the means of acting wisely and advantageously for the attainment of happiness becomes apparent: in ignorant ages, the aggregate of human happiness has always been least. As yet, even the countries relatively most enlightened are really only in the dawn of knowledge. That we have not fully emerged from ignorance, is proved by the mass of uneducated persons everywhere abounding, by the imperfect nature of the instruction given to the people at large, and by the vast multitude of prejudices which still obstruct improvement even in the higher and middle ranks of society. In the third place, experience shows that the temporal condition of man is improved at every advancing step which he makes in the path of knowledge and morality. The history of our countrymen in their successive stages of savagism barbarism, chivalry, and civilization, illustrate this proposition. Assuming, then, that human improvement is possible, we have next to inquire by what means it may be brought about.

The first thing to be done, is to produce a general conviction of the possibility of such improvement; which, in this and the previous lecture, has been attempted. The next, is to give each individual a clear perception of the advantages which will accrue from it to himself. The lecturer proceeded to state some of these advantages. An individual living in the midst of a civilized community, can not subsist in comfort for a day without the aid of his fellow-men, and his happiness is greatly affected by their condition. The opinion is generally entertained that money can command every assistance and gratification; but it can never enable its possessor to advance beyond the attainments of the society in which he lives. No sum in the purse will procure the luxuries and conveniences of London or Edinburgh in a remote provincial town, except by bringing articles or tradesmen from these cities at an expense beyond the means of an individual. In regard to moral and intellectual advantages, the dependence of individuals on the social condition is equally conspicuous. If an enlightened parent wishes his child educated on rational principles, he can not find a seminary suited to his views until a large number of other parents are brought to concur in his opinions.—Nay, enlightened teachers have reported that their schools are checked in the career of improvements by the prejudices of parents rendering it unsafe for them to adopt new methods. Thus also it is impossible to get the hours of labor abridged without the co-operation of large classes of the community; if an individual singly close his shop at an early hour, or relax his professional exertions, he is outstripped by those who choose to devote their whole energies to the gratification of the selfish faculties. If any person entertains higher notions of moral and religious duty than those current in his own rank and age, he will find, on attempting to carry them into practice, that he becomes an object of remark, and not unfrequently an object of hostility and dislike. When an individual perceives the bad effects on health and comfort arising from narrow lanes, small sleeping apartments, and illventilated rooms and churches, and desires to have the evil removed, he can accomplish nothing till he has convinced a vast multitude of his fellow-citizens of the reasonableness and advantage of his projected improvements, and induced them to co-operate with him. The pleasures of social converse—perhaps the most valuable we enjoy—are unattainable in a high degree, except in the society of enlightened and moral individuals. Finally, it is shown by the annals of commerce, that when the ignorant and reckless bring themselves to ruin, the whole community partakes of their misfortunes; of this the commercial distress of 1826 serves as an illustration.*

Individuals being thus so dependent for their happiness on the state of the social circle in which they live, the very first lesson relative to our social duties which ought to be impressed on the minds of the young, is, that the law of Christianity, which commands us to love our neighbors as ourselves, is actually written in our constitutions, individual and social, and is a maxim which must be reduced to practice before we can become truly prosperous and happy as individuals—in other words, that we must so arrange our social institutions and conduct as to render us all simultaneously, and as nearly as possible equally, happy.—And the constitution of human nature appears to be such as to admit of this being done, with unspeakable advantage to all, whenever we shall fully understand its moral wants, and its capabilities. Public affairs ought, therefore, to receive a due share of attention from the whole male adult and active members of the community, for it is only by managing them well that prosperity can be secured to us as individuals; wherever a general interest in these exists, morals, religion, law, government, and all social institutions are seen to be improved.

The extent of the people's power to improve their social condition is very great, if they could only be so far enlightened regarding the constituent elements of their own happiness as to pursue it in a right direction and in combination. The gigantic efforts of Britain in a war afford an example of the prodigious effects, in the form of violence, which we are capable of producing by our combined wealth and mental energies. If our forefathers had dedicated to executing physical improvements and to instructing the people, the same ardor of mind and the same extent of treasure which they squandered from the year 1700 to 1815 in war, what a different result would at this day have presented itself! If they had bestowed honors on the benefactors of the human race as they have done on its destroyers, how different would have been the direction of ambition.

After the people at large are enlightened, and thoroughly imbued with the love of justice and of their neighbors' happiness, our second social duty is to carry into practice, by all moral means, the grand principle of equalizing, as much as possible, the enjoyment of all—not by pulling down the fortunate and accomplished, but by elevating others, as nearly as may be, to an equality with them: all privileges and artificial ranks which obstruct the general welfare ought to be abolished; not violently, however, but gradually, and by inducing their possessors to give them up as injurious to the public and themselves.

CURE OF CRIMINALS.

Punishment is generally too retrospective. The criminal is too generally punished because he has done wrong, instead of punishing him because he yet remains in that frame of feeling which led him to transgress, and which would lead him to repeat the crime, if set at liberty. Consequently, neither the criminal's reformation, nor the safety of community, is sufficiently cared for in such cases.

To explain. Sin is so frequently represented as a sickness—a disease—a malady, in the Scriptures, that we can not be accused of a departure from truth if we consider it in the same light. It is a moral insanity—caused most generally by a deficiency of knowledge respecting its results, or by overpowering passions and propensities, which drown in their maddening whirl of impulses every ray of reason—every suggestion of the moral sentiments. This view no more takes away moral accountability, than in cases where bodily illness is caused by ignorant or wilful violations of the laws of diet, air or exercise.—No more, certainly, nor as much as where all sin is laid at the devil's door, and attributed to his delusions and temptations. I think, therefore, we do not err in considering sin a moral malady—as much as fever is a bodily, or hypochondria, a mental disease so called.

The remedies for this moral malady, so far as it arises from the causes named, are to enlighten the intellect—to abate the temptations which have excited the passions and propensities; and, by frequent exercise, to strengthen the moral powers. These should be continued, until the same habit which now chains him to vicious practices, becomes an ally in the cause of religion, and renders virtue his constant desire, his highest aim, and his greatest joy.

That physician who should limit his care and attendance in every case of fever, to ten days—in every case of consumption or insanity, to two months—and in every case of scrofula, catarrh, or cancer, to ten or twelve weeks—and then dismiss the patient, whatever might be his condition—would be scorned as unworthy the name. Yet in the far worse maladies engendered by moral causes, our practice is to the full as inconsistent and inhuman as the physician's would be in the case supposed. Instead of confining the unhappy convict until he is cured of the disposition that first led him to transgress the laws of God and man—be that necessary period longer or shorter—he is confined an arbitrary period of time, according to the crime committed, rather than to the disposition manifested. In the very commencement of the punishment—of the treatment which is to effect his cure—the judge or jury decides that he shall be continued under it a certain specified period and no longer. If reformed, however thoroughly, before that period, he is still continued under the treatment (unless pardoned)—and if not reformed—yea, if it is morally certain, on the very day his term expires, that as soon as discharged he will repeat his offences, he is nevertheless discharged to prey again on community. Is this measure wise? True—difficulties do exist to prevent accurate judgment of a man's reformation; so there do to determine whether a patient is perfectly restored to health of body or mind—but in neither case should we retain under treatment, those whom we are certain are cured; or dismiss from all care those whom we are certain will immediately relapse if discharged.

How many might have their moral feelings saved from contamination, or restored to proper action—how many criminals, who now live on through relapse after relapse, might at once be restored to community as honorable and useful members—how many valuable lives might be saved from the murderer, and thousands of dollars from the incendiary, robber, thief, and swindler—what ingenuity might be usefully exercised, that is now worse than wasted, with injury and loss even to their owner, were we as eager to reform, as we are apprehend and incarcerate—and were we as judicious in our modes of punishment, as our race have been in devising instruments of torture and of death.

But the reign of humanity is advancing—even self-interest is speeding onward heaven-born benevolence to make punishment what it should be, the means at once of reforming the criminal, and of saving community from his uncurbed disposition to commit evil.

Another evil in our modes of punishment, which we have probably derived from the dogma of endless wrath, is found in the fact that we consider fear and terror as reforming in their influence; whereas they are generally but slightly restraining in their effects. We are gravely assured that God, who can not err, has held up the denunciation of endless woes as the greatest restraint he could put upon man, and, that the fear thereof is the most effectual means that can possibly be used to convert sinners. We follow in the delusion, and endeavor to make men honest by fear of the dungeon and the gallows, instead of instilling into them a love of virtue and principles of rectitude and benevolence.

Punishment may, and should teach its victims, the folly of sin—its inadequacy to yield joy and peace, or true pleasure and profit. But the fear and terror of enduring its pains, may render man more a slave, and a fitter instrument of evil—but can never reform his feelings and motives by instilling knowledge into his mind and goodness into his heart. Man is not only an animal, but a human being. And his moral and intellectual powers must rule him, or he can not be relied upon in virtue's cause. Yet fear is merely an animal passion—the dog and the horse have it as well as we, and though it may answer well to be the ruling motive of a dog, it is a dishonor to man and a contempt to God, to make it a ruler over the offspring of the Deity.

Say a man has a strong propensity to steal. By the fear of punishment you may restrain him from obeying it—and so you may a dog—but do you remove the propensity itself? No—it sleeps, but is not dead. Let an opportunity occur for escaping detection or punishment, and theft is the inevitable result.

The intellectual and moral powers, only—especially the latter—can thoroughly govern man, so as to repress even the desire to do evil. And when it is remembered that every faculty awakens its correspondent faculty by sympathy, how absurd is our conduct. The pulpit showers down God's endless ire on the sinner, to wake in his bosom love to God and to man; and gains a truckling slave in the convert, or a wrathful auditor in the God and man defying and impenitent believer. The physician formerly—for doctors have grown wiser than priests—prescribed fetters, and cold, and damps, and darkness, and flogging, for the insane, to render them gentle, and drove them into sullen, fixed, incurable melancholy, or raving madness. The legislator orders racks, and stocks, and whipping posts, and hanging matches, to make people humane, and regardful of life and property; and is astonished that they become more and more brutal, and under the very gallows get drunk, pick pockets and commit murder. The jailor speaks to his prisoners in a ruffian tone, shaking over them a bludgeon weighty as his curses, to teach his prisoners mildness, benignity and forbearance, and then condemns their obstinacy which will not allow them to act contrary to all the evil passions his example continually keeps alive within them. In nine out of ten of all these cases, the remedy has an effect directly the reverse of what is intended; and it is matter of great astonishment that it does not render ninety-nine out of a hundred worse than they were. Let the preaching and practice of Partialism cease for ever in our prisons and penitentiaries, as it has ceased in a great measure in our Lunatic Asylums—let them become moral hospitals and houses of moral culture—let the nature and object of punishment be duly and frequently explained to its victims—let their minds be filled with correct and useful knowledge, as their hands are with labor—and, when duly prepared by amendment for the experiment, let them be removed to a prison where their moral powers may be tested, still in the absence of temptation—and when deemed reformed, let them be restored to society, with means to live upon until they can go a distance and find employment—and at a season of the year when the severity of the weather will not compel them to rob or steal—and there will be more reformed, and fewer relapse, than at present.

Time will not allow me to relate anecdotes illustrative of the beneficial effects of the modes here pointed out—or arguments in favor of their superiority over present customs—suffice it to say that we are rapidly approaching toward these improvements, and God speed the day, say I. Only let the name and object of punishment be fully and justly understood, and God will find imitators among his children; and the poor degraded criminal, will find brethren in his prosecutors, judges and jailors.

FEMALE INFLUENCE.

The great power of female influence is too well registered on the page of history, and seen and felt in all the affairs of life, and universally admitted, to be doubted by any, or to need proof at this time. Doubtless, the fact that almost all evils, and but few virtuous deeds are recorded on the historic page, united with the acknowledged fact, that nearly every event of importance has its first origin in female influence, led to the malicious saying, that no mischief could be done, unless the devil or a woman was at the bottom of it. Could the veil be lifted from the privacy of human life, and virtuous deeds become as well known as insurrections, murders, wars, and robberies now are, it would be seen that few indeed are the virtuous deeds of men which woman has not either originated or inspired.

If we find her first in the transgression, it was because she was deceived—and even here her influence, for good or ill, began to be made manifest. From thence down to the present time, we trace its broad and rapid stream, often ill-directed, but always active and powerful. The causes of the flood which deluged the earth, are found, in a great degree, in the fair beauty of "the daughters of men." And when we come down to the days of our Saviour, we find him instructed by a mother, and so-laced in the trials and labors of his great mission, by the friendship of Lazarus, and his sisters, Mary and Martha. When his chosen disciples deserted him and fled, leaving him to his fate—even denying him—and when their hearts sunk in utter cowardice and despair—the females of his acquaintance appear to have busied themselves in preparing for his burial, and in watching his sepulchre. In the words of the poet, woman was "Last at his cross, and earliest at his grave."

But time would fail me, were I to attempt a recital of woman's noble and daring deeds from that period to the present. Directed by a pure and liberating faith in God, we see her ministering unto the saints in the church—eeding the messengers of the Gospel on their dangerous journeys—accompanying them as they travelled from city to city, and from one country to another—with them braving persecution, danger, and death to spread abroad the doctrine of life and peace. Coming down to the dark ages, when men poured out their blood like water, animated by a false religion, and cheered onward by the animating voice of woman, the love of the female urged thousands on thousands to the bone-covered fields of Palestine, in the crusades—filled the tented folds of domestic war with the clangor of arms—crowded the lists of the tournaments with steel-cased knights, ready and eager to break a lance, and risk a precious life, in order that they might claim the smile and win the approbation of beauty's lips. Terrible and bloody as were these scenes conjured up by female influence, in connection with other causes, no one can doubt that thus, unwittingly, females rolled onward the spreading wave of civilization to cover over, forever, the dark dungeons of feudal tyranny; and thus hastened forward the glorious era in which we live.

From that period to the present, the philosophic essay, the annalist's page, and the poet's lay, record the power of female influence—ringed though its efforts were with much of evil passion, ambition, and the love of fine and riot in our own sex.

But it is not of these mere results of female influences we would speak—but of the many events and actions of female lives, whereon history is too often silent—presenting an effect, where we wish most to know the cause—or an action, when we most need to be acquainted with the motive. Woman lives best, and is most powerful, in the privacy of life, where the historian's seldom penetrates—in the causes of events, which he seldom deeply investigates, and in the motives to action, which he seldom finds. There, for evil or for good, in her sphere, as the agent of Providence in bringing out the various changes in the affairs of men, and revolutions of society. And whether she shall do good or evil, depends much upon the direction education and knowledge shall give to her energies—especially the moral influences which shall form her motives and strengthen her purposes.

Cultivate her faculties judiciously, to fit her well for the station she is destined to occupy in life as the daughter, sister, wife and mother of man, and give to her a stem of religious faith perfectly adapted to our common nature, and especially calculated to cultivate, cherish, and render active all that is truly amiable, beautiful, and benevolent in intellect and morality, and woman will only be what God made her at first, and intended she always should be, the helpmate of our sex, our equal in life, and our partner in eternity.

"Heaven's last, best gift to man"—

THE RECORD.

Just before I was taken down by sickness I had commenced making out our usual record—that circumstance has delayed several weeks to the delay. I can not do more this week, than give an abstract of the proceedings of our conventions.

CONVENTIONS.—Massachusetts Convention met in Malden June 7th. Br. S. Streeter, Moderator. Brs. C. Spear and A. Bugbee, Clerks. Received the fifth society in Malden, and the first in Waltham into fellowship. Appointed Brs. B. Whittemore, J. Boyden, and J. M. Spear committee of inquiry—Brs. H. Ballou, 2d, T. F. Ing and G. Noyes committee of discipline—Brs. Boyden, Taylor, Paige, and Austin (ministers). George Hill, Boston, A. Baxter, Yarmouth, U. Chamberlain, Malden, W. Watson, Princeton, T. A. Bowen, Adams, and Dexter, Danvers (laymen), delegates to the United States Convention with power to appoint substitutes—O. A. Skinner, Greenwood and Austin a committee of fellowship and ordination—Br. Cobb to prepare the usual letter to the United States Convention—Br. Greenwood to preach the next occasional sermon, Br. Whittemore, substitute—Br. C. Spear to prepare the minutes and write the circular—and Brs. O. A. Skinner, Cobb, Brimblecom, M. B. Ballou, Bugbee, Norwood, Spear, Killam, J. B. Manley and Fernald, to prepare historical statements to be reported at the next session. Printed letters of fellowship to Brs. Charles Galacca, Joseph Skinner, and D. B. Harris; and conferred ordination on Brs. D. B. Harris and Hiram Beckwith. Resolved to attend the removal of Murray's remains to Mt. Auburn. Requested a copy of the occasional sermon by Br. H. Ballou, 2d, for publication. Resolved that the Expositor should be revived and sustained—to recommend the formation of a Sunday school Association—and after much discussion adopted the following report by the committee appointed last year to report on the subject of a theological seminary. The reader will see that the report is not on that subject.

The Committee appointed by the Massachusetts State Convention, at its session in 1836, to take into consideration the subject of a Theological Seminary, and to report at this session of the same Convention, having as far as was practicable, deliberated on the subject of their appointment, beg leave to submit the following report.

Whereas the age in which we live is one in which literature is abundantly patronized; so that learning can be obtained with much greater facility, and at much less expense than in former times; and whereas the improved state of society, in regard to learning, calls for a ministry, especially in our denomination, sufficiently learned in the sacred profession, to meet the wants and expectations of community, it is the opinion of your committee, that, where circumstances render it convenient to establish schools for instruction in those branches of instruction proper for young men, entering the ministry, such institutions are desirable; and that they be recommended to the attention and patronage of our denomination.

HOSEA BALLOU,
LUCIUS R. PAIGE,
HOSEA BALLOU 2d,

Sermons were delivered by Brs. Z. Thompson, H. Ballou, 2d, and M. H. Smith—Funeral services by Br. S. Streeter and H. Ballou. Forty five resident preachers and thirty lay delegates were present, besides ten ministering brethren from other States. Adjourned to meet in Salem on the first Wednesday in June, 1838.

New-Hampshire Convention met in Lebanon, June 20th, in the evening. Br. G. Witherill (layman), Moderator, and Br. Hanscom, Clerk. The Union further says—"Brs. F. A. Hodsdon, M. Ballou, and J. The committee on fellowship and ordination, reported that ordination had been conferred on Brs. H. Jewell and C. S. Hussey, and letters of fellowship on Brs. S. Laws, H. Sampson, and N. R. Wright. Passed a resolution, providing that when a clergyman suspends his clerical labors for any length of time, (while in health), it shall be considered as forfeiting his fellowship in this body. Desired Br. Hodsdon to deliver a lecture, during the session of 1838, in reference to the Lord's Supper. Desired the Clerk to cause the minutes and Constitution to be published in the "Star in the East." Empowered Br. J. V. Wilson to appoint the place of the next session of this body." Resolutions were passed in favor of the Star in the East (since merged in the Trumpet) and the Expositor. Twelve resident preachers, thirteen visiting preachers, and ten lay delegates were present. Circular by Br. Hanscom. Adjourned to meet on the third Wednesday and Thursday in June, 1838, at such place as may hereafter be designated.

Maine Convention met in Turner, June 23th. Br. Drew Moderator, and Brs. Stevens and Rand, Clerks. Received the Somerset Association into fellowship—being the fourth represented in the Convention. Forbes, Standing Clerk—Brs. Drew, Hawkins, and G. Smith, standing committee on fellowship and ordination—Brs. D. D. Smith, Averill, and and Drew to advise societies, etc.—Brs. Gardner, Bates and Woodman, a committee on a theological seminary, who advised a further consideration of the subject by the denomination; (it will certainly be considered long enough after a while, like a long purse without a penny in it!)—Brs. Burr, G. Smith, D. D. Smith, and Drew, (ministers), and C. Holland, S. Winchester, J. Herrick, B. Quinby, D. W. Lathrop, and W. Sampson, delegates to the United States Convention, with power to each to appoint his substitute, or those attending to fill vacancies—Br. L. P. Rand to prepare the minutes and circular, and Br. J. Hobbs to call a meeting in Waldo, to organize a new Association. A resolution was passed in favor of Sunday schools, but the Expositor was not resolved.—Twenty-three preachers were present including Br. Cobb, of Massachusetts, and twenty-seven lay delegates. It is computed by Br. Drew, that there were six hundred carriages on the ground. The large meeting house was almost entirely filled, galleries and all, with women alone—many men being unable to get near to the crowd-surrounded building. Sermons were delivered by Brs. Gardner, G. Smith, Hawkins, Cobb and D. D. Smith. Adjourned to meet in Bangorville, on the last Wednesday and Thursday in June, 1838.

POETRY.

ONE GLASS MORE.

"Stay, mortal, stay! nor heedless thus
Thy sure destruction seal:
Within that cup there lurks a curse,
Which all who drink must feel.

Disease and Death, forever nigh,
Stand ready at the door,
And eager wait to hear the cry,
Of "Give me one glass more."

Go, view that prison's gloomy cells,
Their pallid tenants scan;
Gaze, gaze upon those earthly hells,
And ask, how they began.

Had these a tongue, O man! thy cheek
The tale would crimson o'er:
Had these a tongue, to thee they'd speak,
And answer, "One glass more."

Behold that wretched female form,
An outcast from her home,
Bleached in affliction's blighting storm,
And doomed in want to roam;

Behold her! Ask that prattler dear
Why mother is so poor;
She'll whisper in thy startled ear,
"Twas father's one glass more."

Stay, mortal, stay! repent, return;
Reflect upon thy fate;
The poisonous draught indignant spurn—
Spurn, spurn it, ere too late.

Oh! fly the ale-house' horrid din,
Nor linger near the door,
Lest thou perchance should slip again
The treacherous "One glass more."

Selections from the "Tin Trumpet."

SUPERSTITION—As Plutarch has well observed, is much worse than atheism, since it must be less offensive to deny the existence of such a deity as Saturn, than to admit his existence, and affirm, that he was such an unnatural monster, as even to devour his own children.

Archbishop Tillotson says, "According as men's notions of God are, such will their religions be; if they have gross and false conceptions of God, their religion will be absurd and superstitious. If men fancy God to be an ill-natured Being, armed with infinite power, who takes delight in the misery and ruin of his creatures, and is ready to take all advantages against them, they may fear him, but they will hate him, and they will be apt to be such towards one another, as they fancy God to be towards them; for all religion doth naturally incline men to imitate him whom they worship."—Sermons, vol. i. p. 181.

"Atheism," observes a Christian philosopher, "leaves a man to sense, to philosophy, to natural piety, to laws, to reputation; all which may be guides to an outward moral virtue, though religion were not; but superstition dismounts all these, and erecteth an absolute monarchy in the minds of men."—(Bacon's Essays, p. 96.) In point of fact, the misrepresentation of a deity, leads immediately to the denial of his existence; a result which has not escaped the acuteness of Plutarch. "The atheist," says that writer, "contributes not in the least to superstition; but superstition, having given out sordidous an idea of the Deity, has frightened many into the utter disbelief of any such being; because they think it much better, nay, more reasonable, that there should be no deity, than one whom they see more reason to hate and abominate, than to love, honor, and reverence. Thus inconsiderate men, shocked at the deformity of superstition, run directly into the opposite extreme of atheism, heedlessly skipping over true piety, which is the golden mean between both."

How certainly should we avoid the degrading superstition of demonism, did we but act upon the following position of Archbishop Tillotson:—Every good man is, in some degree, partaker of the divine nature, and feels that in himself, which he conceives to be in God; so that this man does experience what others do but talk of;—he sees the image of God in himself, and is able to discourse of him from an inward sense and feeling of his excellency."—(Sermons, vol. iii. p. 42.) If we thus behold the Deity reflected in our own hearts, no wonder that the religion of the good man should be rational and cheerful, and that of the bad man superstitious and gloomy. How forcibly does the latter recall the passage in Bacon's noble essay—"Of Unity in Religion," where he says—"It was a great blasphemy when the devil said, 'I will ascend, and be like the Highest;' but it is greater blasphemy to personate God, and bring him in, saying—"I will descend and be like the Prince of Darkness." Surely this is to bring down the Holy Ghost, instead of the likeness of a dove, in the shape of a vulture, or raven; and to set out of the bark of the Christian church a flag of a bark of pirates and assassins."

LIGHT—the new. It was said of Burns, that the light which led him astray, was light from heaven; a false and unguarded assertion, for no light from heaven can ever lead man astray. The spiritual new light is a jack-o'-lantern, which sometimes lures its followers into quagmires and pit-falls; or it may be the glitter of gold, and the dazzling lustre of worldly greatness, by which they are lighted to dignities and high places. Of this latter we will cite an instance from the life of Andrew Melville, by Dr. McCre:—"When Cowper was made Bishop of Galloway, an old woman, who had been one of his parishioners, and a favorite, could not be persuaded that her minister had deserted the Presbyterian cause. Resolved to satisfy herself, she paid him a visit at the Canongate, where he had his residence, as Dean of the Chapel Royal. The retinue of servants, through which she had to pass, staggered the good woman's confidence, and being ushered into a room, where the bishop sat, she exclaimed—"Oh, Sir, what's this?—and ye ha' really left the guid cause, and turned prelate!"—Janet! said the bishop, 'I have got a new light on this subject.'—"So I see," replied Janet; 'for when ye was at Perth, ye had but ae candle, and now ye ha' got twa before ye. —That's your new light."

TOMB.—A house built for a skeleton: a dwelling of sculptured marble, provided for dust and corruption: a monument set up to perpetuate the memory of—the forgotten.

TRIALS.—Moral ballast, that often prevents our capsizeing. Where we have much to carry, God rarely fails to fit the back to the burthen; where we have nothing to bear, we can seldom bear ourselves. The burthened vessel may be slow in reaching the destined port; but the vessel without ballast, becomes so completely the sport of the winds and waves, that there is danger of her not reaching it at all.

THOUGHTS ON DEATH.

And is it so? Am I with all the vast and innumerable hosts of intelligent beings which now people this our lower earth, and who gaze around them on the beauties of nature, with such thrilling emotions of heart, in a few days to pass away like a shadow and be known no more forever? With all those tender ties which unite families and societies together, and which render life supportable, be severed eternally? No! It cannot be! Earth is not man's only abiding place; there is an indefinable something in every breast that seems to whisper: "this is not our home;" and indeed everything in the universe of God it would seem at first view taught the same blessed truth. What is there that springs up, buds and blossoms, droops and dies, that does not at some future period again appear with a body such as God is pleased to give it? and why should we doubt the resurrection of man, the noblest work of God? Can not the same Almighty power which first created man of the dust of the earth, cause him a second time to come forth to newness of life and immortality? Certainly! We can not believe that the all-wise Creator ever works without design; neither can we suppose that an infinitely good being could ever design aught but good in all things which he has made. We must therefore conclude he had design in the formation and preservation of man; but if in this life only we have hope, surely, instead of a blessing, he has conferred a curse. But thanks to Almighty God, he has not left us to grope our way with reason and philosophy alone to guide us. No! he has given us proof which is incontrovertible as the eternal words of Jehovah himself, which declares that Christ shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied. How gloomy and cheerless must the tomb appear, had not Jesus dispelled its darkness by kindling the blaze of eternal truth, to light the traveller through the dark valley, and lead him to the port of peace. He has brought to light life immortal, which was before unknown to dying men—they can now commit their dearest friends to the cold embrace of death, with composure, fully believing that they shall again meet them where sorrow and parting is known no more forever. How ought the heart to glow with gratitude and love to God for these inspiring, life-giving hopes! How ought we in view of these to endeavor to live as heirs of this rich inheritance! What a foretaste of the joys of that Canaan of rest may we all enjoy, by cleansing ourselves, and turning away from all known sins, looking unto Jesus for strength and grace to assist us. Let us often contemplate our last great change, never losing sight of the end; but, by serious and devout meditation, prepare to meet death with composure, yea, even with a smile of joy, welcome our passport to the skies!—Star in the East.

The poor pittance of seventy years is not worth being a villain for.

MARRIAGES.

In Syracuse August 13th, by Rev. Mr. Wilkins. Mr. HENRY BARNES, of Detroit, Michigan, and one of the publishers of the "Detroit Free Press," to Miss DIANTHA M., eldest daughter of Rufus Stanton, Esq., of that village.

In Brooklyn, Ohio, August 2d, by C. P. Russel, Esq., of Ohio city, Mr. WILLIAM B. SHIPMAN, to Miss LOUISA JAMIESON, both of Royalton, Ohio.

In New-York, on the 26th ult., by the Rev. T. J. Sawyer, WILLIAM C. ATWELL, Esq., formerly of Bridgeport, Conn., and Mrs. LEBHRASIA AMANDA COLT, of New-York.

DEATHS.

In Deerfield, on the 9th inst., Mrs. SARAH BIDDLECOM, consort of Mr. Thomas Biddlecom, (and mother of Revs. David and Daniel R. Biddlecom,) aged 67 years. She was a member of the Baptist church for twelve years, but her faith in God's goodness increased with her exercise of piety and confidence in him, until she believed it infinite and universal. The virtues and graces practiced while enjoying a limited faith, grew and flourished in the broad sunshine of divine truth, and she lived a Universalist in faith and in deed for the last twenty-five years. Her last years were marked with considerable bodily infirmity, but her lamp of faith burned brightly to the last, throwing its rays beyond the darkness of the shadows in the valley of death, until she sweetly fell asleep in Jesus. Her funeral was attended on the 11th, by Br. Skinner, and a concourse of friends and neighbors forming a procession of about half a mile in length, and filling completely the meeting-house at that vicinity, which was kindly opened on the occasion. Thus has departed a deeply venerated and beloved mother in Israel. G.

In Springfield, on the 22d of July, at her nephew's, Mr. John Youngs, with whom she had resided for several years, after a painful and protracted illness of several weeks, Miss DOLLY YOUNG, aged 61 years. She died in peace and the full assurance of a blessed immortality beyond the tomb. Her funeral was attended on the 23d, in the meeting house at Stark. The glorious consolations of the Gospel in strains of affecting tenderness were administered to the mourners and sympathizing friends by Br. J. D. Hicks of Springfield, from the following words, in John ix: 4. "I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh when no man can work." J. P. YOUNG.

In Queensbury, July 29th, of the consumption, Mr. PALMER JENKINS, in his 71st year. Thus has another believer in the final restitution of all things, gone to participate in the un fading joys of immortality. He bore his last illness with Christian fortitude, and rejoiced in the prospect of soon being delivered from this frail, earthly tenement. He conversed freely on the subject of death and seemed to take an interest in it.

A short time before his death he selected the words of Simeon, Luke xi: 29-32, as the foundation of the remarks to be made at his funeral; and at his request, Br. Phin-chas Hathaway tendered the consolations of the Gospel to a numerous concourse of relatives and friends.

In Bristol, the 7th of May, Miss LYDIA, daughter of Abiel and Mary Hathaway, aged 19 years. In the death of this amiable young lady, her kind family have been called to mourn the loss of one who was beloved by all who knew her, and was endeared to them by the loveliness of her disposition—the excellence of her character—and the sincerity of her affections.

We direct the attention of the mourners to assuage their grief, to the great Disposer of all events whose mercies endure forever. W. QUEAL.

A CORRECT KNOWLEDGE OF GOD, THE NATURE OF MAN, AND OF DIVINE GOVERNMENT, ESSENTIAL TO PRODUCE A FAITH IN, AND PRACTICE OF UNIVERSALISM.

BY REV. S. P. LANDERS, OF PROMPTON, WAYNE COUNTY, PA.

[Concluded from No. 33.]

III. The necessity of an acquaintance with the nature of DIVINE GOVERNMENT, and its adaptation to the purpose for which it was instituted.

When we contemplate the works of nature, we find that every object, from the great orb and king of day, down to the most minute particle of matter the existence of which it is possible for the imagination to conceive, the Creator has subjected to some fixed and invariable law. He has established certain rules for the government of man's moral nature, as well as for the objects which compose the material world. We know that man is subject to the natural laws, and that when these are obeyed, he is rewarded with health and prosperity, and when they are violated, he suffers pain. If he transgress the organic law, he is afflicted with disease; if he violate the law of gravitation, he is brought to the earth with violence, and a limb is broken, or perhaps a life is lost. This body is a mere vehicle of the mind, and it would be folly to argue that the body is thus minutely governed, while the mind, the companion of the body, runs in a lawless course. But as it is not with the skeptic that I am arguing, the present will suffice. The consistent Christian admits that God has instituted laws for the mind, as it is written, "I will put my laws in their mind, and write them in their heart, and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people."

We have remarked, that the Deity possesses boundless love and goodness, and impartial justice, therefore, unless he acts contrary to these attributes, the administration of his moral government must be in unison with his nature. These principles should be the distinguishing features in all doctrines of theology; for if we would promote the knowledge and practice of a religion which has for its end and object, the mitigation of the woes consequent on this life, nothing can supply the place of them. Man has a benevolent nature, and the religion that adds to his happiness and peace, must also be benevolent. We know that all the physical laws, when properly observed, are for our good. The observance of them is attended with the reward of pleasure, while the violation of them is certain to bring pain; but this pain is not an evil since it has a good in view, for by it we are prepared for future success and happiness. As the government of God is in the natural world, so it is in the moral, the observance of each law is followed by its own reward, and the transgression of each, by its own punishment.

Considering the nature of man, and the manner he is influenced to act, it is believed that there is no part in theology more necessary to be understood and taught, for the promotion of Universalism, than the doctrine of rewards and punishments; for it is in this way that the Deity influences and governs his creatures. He has instituted a moral law, and the person who lives in obedience to it, is rewarded with the consciousness of having acted right, while he who transgresses it, is punished with the condemnation of having acted wrong. By this law all are governed. But it will be remembered that our Saviour taught, that there are different degrees of punishment for the same offence, according to the light and knowledge of the offender. "That servant which knew his lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes; but he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few." This is a rule recognized by all wise legislators. Guilt always consists in the design of the offender, and the law of God punishes according to the design the offender had when he transgressed. The wisdom and goodness of the Deity will be more fully evinced in the law, when we take into consideration the nature of man and that government, which, when known and understood by him, will certainly secure his obedience. Every virtue merits, and must receive its own reward, and every crime deserves, and if justice ever has its demands, must be followed by an adequate punishment. This is very important to be taught for the furtherance of Universalism.

As truth always appears more lovely when contrasted with error, it is proposed to mention the opposite of the above doctrine. It is our lot to differ from the multitude on this important doctrine, as well as on many other points in theology. The great mass of the Christian world teach that we may escape deserved punishment by repentance. But if the view we have taken is correct, as we believe it is, to forgive the punishment of a certain offence, is in the highest degree unjust and immoral, for its direct tendency is the perpetration of crime. Every one must see, that to forgive a child deserved punishment, is to encourage the child to do wrong again; but if it is properly chastised, it will break off its offences. The common doctrine of forgiveness, is twin-sister to that of the Roman church. There is this difference in them, however: that while the Protestant church holds that pardon will be granted on confession and repentance, the other church grants pardon on confession of sin and satisfactorily rewarding the priest. They are both based on one principle; and we know that there is no doctrine in theology more licentious in its tendency, or more generally detested, than that of the Catholic church. But the tendency of this doctrine is the same, whether found in the Catholic or in the Protestant church. In the view we have taken of Divine government, there is the same impropriety in withholding deserved punishment, as there is in withholding deserved reward; both being just, and calculated to reform.

But the question now is, how are mankind rewarded and punished? This question will be easily answered, if we keep in mind the teaching of our Saviour, that the informed and enlightened man is more severely punished than the ignorant man is, for the same offence. This being the case, some have been beguiled with the idea that the unenlightened man is the happiest of the two, for he receives less punishment. But who does not see, on reflection, that there is the same unsoundness in thus arguing, that there would be in saying that the blind man is happier than the one who sees, for he never beholds objects disgusting to his sight; or the deaf man, because he is never stunned with the roar of thunder? But to proceed with the answer to our question.

I presume that I shall not be contradicted by any one who has visited and administered to the necessities of the widow and orphan—clothed the naked and fed the hungry—when I say that the person who practices these virtues, with right motives, is rewarded with a peaceful and happy conscience. When he reflects that he has been the means of turning the poor man's sorrow into joy; that by contributing a portion of his store, he has relieved the destitute—dried up the tears of the friendless orphan, or the woes of the widowed mother, he feels within himself a kindling emotion of joy, which wealth or fame can never produce. The thought that he has drowned one sigh by his charities, and poured the oil of joy and gladness into the mourner's bosom, or mitigated the sorrow of his enemies by his kindness, causes more joy in his mind than the possession of worlds. In this way he is rewarded for his virtues. But turn to the miser, on the other hand, whose avarice has pallied all the refined feelings of his nature; whose heart feels not for suffering humanity—whose ear hears not the sigh of the oppressed—ask him where is the centre and focus of his happiness, and you are pointed to his amassed wealth, as the corner-stone of his enjoyment. There he has locked up the affections of his bosom—he is a stranger to all the happiness which surrounds the dwelling of the benevolent man, and lights up his countenance with a smile. His punishment is negative, that is, it consists in being deprived of the reward consequent on benevolent actions. He may enjoy the pleasures of sense, but luxury may have mingled the poison of the opus even in these. Let him who is beguiled with the idea of the pleasures of sin, look once upon the emaciated body, the pallid countenance, the bloated features and crimsoned face of the poor deluded and unfortunate sensualist. Look once more into the scenes of his midnight revel. Is there an enlightened mind in the universe that believes the place of his resort is the seat and habitation of happiness? God be blessed—No. There is planted in his mortal temple the seeds of disease and sorrow. There has been received the arrow of death, that is palsying the ligaments that bind his mind to his body. There excessive sin has benumbed the energies and vigor of that immortal mind, and perverted the use, and poisoned and pallied the pleasures of sense. But O what is the despair, the woe and pain bound up in his body? How is the mind? What is the story of that conscience who ever watches with an eye from which no darkness can conceal, and chastens with a thong which no fortitude can endure? What made Cain cry out in the midst of his guilt and sorrow, "my punishment is greater than I can bear"? What made Caligula tremble, when the red forked lightning shot across the heavens, and the peals of roaring thunder pierced his troubled soul? Ah, it was conscience that rose up before them with a mirror of their deeds, and uttered her monitor voice. That monitor with respect to the transgressor, is omnipresent. It follows him in all his vice, and bites with a fang that is certain to wound. Though he ascend up into heaven—though he make his bed in hell—though he take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost part of the sea, yet that conscience, like the Divinity of which it is a symbol, is yet present, institutes a tribunal in his own bosom, and there arraigns the culprit, utters forth her maledictions, and administers retribution in justice and mercy. Here is actual, positive punishment, but it is in proportion to the light and knowledge of the offender. This view of divine government, is confirmed by the express declaration of Scripture, the page of history, and the experience of all ages of the world.

He who will not admit that "the wicked are like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest," manifests an entire ignorance of the nature of man, and evinces a mind bound up in superstition and tradition. Every creature is most happy while in the element for which it was constituted. Man is not an amphibious animal, that he can be equally as happy in the practice of vice as he can in that of virtue. If he was constituted for one, it is impossible that he should be happy in the other. If man's nature is sinful, conscience would not only chastise him when he did right, but God, who loves his happiness, could not require him to love the Author of his being, or his fellow man, for in the ways of virtue he would be unhappy.

Having proceeded thus far with our subject, we propose to make a few closing remarks on the adaptation of the divine government to the purpose for which it was instituted.

It is, and should be, the first and great object of all governments to reform and make its subjects better, and the more effectually this object is accomplished by any laws, the greater is the wisdom of the legislator of them. It has often been objected to the view we have taken of divine government, on the ground that it does not reform mankind. But the objector should remember that all religious teachers, for ages and centuries past, have altogether overlooked this subject, and have taught that the future and unseen world is the place where all the virtues and vices of man are summed up, and rewarded and punished; and this idea has become so common, that mankind in general overlook present reward and punishment, and seem to think that there can be no pain or punishment without being inflicted by the rod, and no pleasure unless it comes in the range of the senses. Here is a manifest ignorance both of the moral law of God and the nature of man, and it is unreasonable to suppose that men will obey a law which they know very little about. When we con over the history of mankind, we find that their happiness has been very much impaired for ages together, by various evils, the cause of which they have been ignorant of; but when the cause of their unhappiness has been ascertained, they have, in every case, avoided it. The world has been made unhappy by the observance of the rites of a corrupted Judaism, of Paganism, of Catholicism. Cities and communities have been visited with pestilence and famine, but whenever the cause of these evils has been known, it has been avoided if possible. Man is, and always was made miserable by sin, but being ignorant of the cause of this misery, does not avoid it. But when he is made acquainted with the cause of his sorrow, he will avoid it as he does any other evil. It is the business of Universalists to inform mankind, why there is so much want and misery in the world. It is not enough, at this day and age, that we appeal to the Scriptures to prove that man must be miserable as long as he is wicked, but we must explain why it is so, and that it is contrary to our nature—that God has stamped a veto in our constitutions against it. In this work of reformation, we can expect no aid from others, for it is opposed to their system of teaching. But to return.

The adaptation of the government of God to the object for which it was designed, will be more obvious when we proceed further with our investigation. We have remarked, that man is influenced by motives, and since his great object is to avoid pain and enjoy pleasure, that which affords the greatest amount of happiness, is certain to be the strongest motive for him to act upon. To more fully explain the necessity of this, and show how the Deity carries into effect the design of his government, we use a similar illustration to that Dr. Priestly has used on the same subject.

A man has two sons, Peter and John. Peter can be influenced by motives, but John cannot. If the parent rewards Peter for his good acts, it influences him to continue on in the right way. If he punishes him for his crimes, it influences him to turn from them, that he may avoid the chastening rod. But with John it is different: he is not influenced by motives. If his parent rewards him for his virtues, the reward does not influence him to continue in the practice of virtue. If he is punished for his vices, there is no incentive for him to reform; he is not governed at all by motives. But we venture to aver, that there is not a sane mind thus constituted in the universe. There is a perfect adaptation of the divine law to the mind of every intelligent being.

We learn from the above example, as well as observation, that an adequate reward for every virtue, and a just punishment for every vice, are the best means to secure the happiness of mankind. On this plan, and to this end, is the law of God, by which he governs the world. Reader, may I not appeal to you in confirmation of what is here stated? Does not your conscience bear me witness, when I say, that the law written in our hearts by the finger of God, is the basis of all the laws that bind man to man? Who does not see that this law of our nature and the law of the Bible, are one? Who does not see, on reflection, that this law is the means of all the virtue among mankind? If men were the happiest in the practice of vice, the fear of a thousand hells, heated seven-fold hotter than the imagination can conceive, would not deter them from the commission of crime, providing they believed that all such punishment could be escaped by repentance. It is a fixed law of nature that we should love present happiness, and men will follow that course which they believe affords it. Obedience to any law is not secured by the severity of punishment, but by the certainly of receiving an adequate reward for every virtue, and punishment for every vice. Since, notwithstanding the world has been so long taught that the ways of sin are pleasant—notwithstanding the view we have taken of divine government is opposed, as not being calculated to reform mankind—since, notwithstanding prejudice and popular opinion are against our views, it is morally certain that the law and its administration, which we have been considering, are the cause of all the philanthropy and goodness existing among men, may we not be sanguine in the opinion, that one of the best means to promote the knowledge and practice of Universalism, is to explain the true nature, and enforce the observance of divine government? When mankind have a proper understanding of this subject, it is certain that they will live more in the practice of virtue, for here they see that a life of religion and a life of happiness exactly coincide. To practice the one, is to secure the other. "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul"—its rewards are certain—its punishments inevitable—it presents the strongest motive to action—it points to the path of sin as the certain way of death, and to the way of religion as a road to felicity, and says, if you would be happy, "Walk ye in it."

IV. The consequences which will follow, when the knowledge of these considerations shall be known and obeyed.

Here it must be obvious to every one what that person must be, who knows and regards the views advocated in this essay. He can be no other, than what every consistent Christian must be, a good Universalist. He who believes in this religion, contemplates the Deity as the great and good Parent of all the intelligent creation—sees his goodness reaching to, and supplying the returning wants of every creature he has made—regards himself as the child of God, and the object of divine care and protection; and while he thus views his Creator and himself, he feels the emotion in his soul that the Psalmist felt, when he gave utterance to his feelings and said "My meditation of him shall be sweet * * * Bless thou the Lord, O my soul. Praise ye the Lord." When he turns his mind in upon himself, he perceives that his nature bears the impress of the Deity, he loves and adores, he sees that if he would be happy, nature must be consulted, every faculty of enjoyment must be furnished with appropriate objects, and a due proportion of each must be preserved, and when his constitution is properly regarded, he feels that every faculty he possesses adds to his happiness, if held subordinate to reason. When he considers "the perfect law of liberty" which has been instituted for a rule of his conduct, he sees the perfect adaptation of it to his moral and intellectual nature; he feels that while he is sinful, there is no more escape from its penalties, than there is from the appetites of the body, "but in keeping it, there is great reward." The result of this faith will be seen exemplified in all his acts and dealings with his fellow man.

His "hope is as an anchor to the soul, sure and steadfast," lifts the curtain and unveils the darkness of the grave, and carries the mind forward across the isthmus of death to the haven of immortal friendship and immaculate purity. His religious faith he can pray to have fulfilled, for it is founded on the immutable principles of truth and righteousness, and when reduced to practice, is calculated to suppress the animal passions of the heart, calm the stormy scenes of life, make more strong the bonds of amity and friendship that bind man to man—give humility to the proud, joy to the sorrowing, comfort to the mourning, hope to the desponding, health to the morally sick, and life to the mentally dead. Is he surrounded with affluence and ease? aristocratic pride burns not in his bosom, but he regards all mankind as the children of the same great Parent, who "has made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth." The widow and the orphan are the recipients of his abundance. Is he poor? he is reconciled to his lot, and while the world around him is in strife and confusion, contentment is pictured on his brow, and he is virtuous and happy. Is he a father? his religion makes his domestic circle the abode of peace and quietness, and as he regards the present and future well being of his children, he rejoices in imparting to them the true character of that eternal Being, who loves all the family of man. We find him the same in all the vicissitudes and avocations of life, the peaceful citizen. He sacrifices not his principles to secure the smiles and favors of any sect, but whether he acts the part of a statesman or private citizen, his religion is the rule of his conduct and the source of his happiness.

When the influence of these principles shall be felt and known more generally among men, peace and joy will revisit the earth with their benign influence and glory, party differences and sectarian animosities will be stayed, and Christianity in all its original loveliness, and truth with all its beauty and sublimity, will dawn upon a world, and the light of the Sun of righteousness will rise in the East, and reflect its lucid beams from the West, and spread wider and wider till every darkened mind shall be illuminated, and every heart rejoice in the prelibations of immortal happiness. Then will man see a rest in the belief of the truth, in heaven a home for all, in Christ a Saviour of the lost, and in God a Father. AMEN.

A VOICE TO YOUNG MEN.....CHAPTER IV.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

CONVERSATION.

Language is one of the most important gifts bestowed upon man, by a bountiful Providence. It holds a high rank among the peculiar faculties by which the human race are pre-eminently distinguished from other classes of beings on earth. By the aid of language we communicate to each other our thoughts, our inclinations, wishes, hopes and fears—by language we interchange all the sentiments of the heart—soul mingles with soul, and the dearest and sweetest connexions in life are formed. But as every blessing the goodness of God has bestowed upon man, can be perverted from its original design, and made the source of evil, so language often becomes the medium by which great wretchedness is occasioned. "The tongue," says St. James, though "a little member, is an unruly evil, full of deadly poison." This is said in reference to an unguarded tongue. When the tongue is made the instrument of calumny, falsehood, licentiousness, and profanity—when it is made to give utterance to the vile and sinful thoughts of a corrupt heart—it truly becomes "an unruly evil, full of deadly poison!" But a strictly guarded and well-disciplined tongue, is an instrument capable of accomplishing great good! A few remarks, therefore, upon the subject of conversation, cannot be inappropriate to the consideration of the young.

The first important requisite in conversation, is discretion. The old proverb says, "a wise man thinks all that he says, and a fool says all that he thinks." The meaning of this maxim is, that the wise man selects his thoughts for conversation, from the mass that is floating in his mind. Wise men have many improper thoughts, as well as other people; but one trait of their wisdom is, to keep such thoughts to themselves, and give utterance only to such as are proper and useful. But every thing that enters the minds of the foolish—whether proper or improper, wise or simple—runs off from the ends of their tongues; and in this consists one portion of their folly. A safe rule to adapt is, to be cautious to whom you speak, what you speak, and in whose presence you speak. A strict scrutiny in these respects, will become a safeguard that will always keep you within the bounds of propriety and prudence.

As conversation is a means, under proper management, by which the most important knowledge can be obtained, it should be your endeavor to seek out the company of the experienced and the well-informed. The conversation of a wise man, like the gentle showers of the Summer, falls upon youthful hearts with an inspiring and fructifying influence—it sows the seeds of useful knowledge, and lays the foundation of virtues which, in after life, expand into a character rich in every valuable qualification. In conversing with such people, mark the language they use, the manner of their expression, and their general demeanor, that you may acquire a correct and intelligent method of conveying your own thoughts. I would not have you servilely imitate the whole manner and expression of others; but you well know that thoughts can be uttered either in an obscure, broken, unintelligent, and vulgar manner, or in a way that is clear, perspicuous, and genteel. To secure this latter method, great assistance can be gained by observing the manner of those who possess it, and adopting a general course similar to theirs.

To obtain information, your conversation should be varied in accordance with the condition and occupation of those with whom you speak. To converse with the merchant or professional man, upon the mechanic arts—or with the mechanic, on agriculture—or with the farmer, on the rise and fall of stocks, or on the minutiae of commerce, or on literary criticisms—as a general result, your stock of information would receive but little addition. With every individual, I repeat, you should endeavor to lead the conversation to those topics whereon they are "at home"—subjects relating to their particular calling, and in regard to which they are supposed to be well informed. In this manner, from every person, however limited his general knowledge, you can gain information which can be turned to good account.

Confine not your conversation to people of one opinion, or of the same class, sect, or party, either in regard to religion, politics, or any other subject. By hearing different opinions and sentiments advanced and advocated upon the same topic, you have a much more favorable opportunity of deciding where truth resides, and of increasing your general stock of knowledge, than you possibly could, were you to restrict your intercourse exclusively to one party or class. And here let me caution you, to permit not the truth or value of any sentiment you may hear uttered by an individual, to be decided by your prepossessions for or against the party or sect to which he may belong; but solely by the consistency and reasonableness of the sentiment itself—by its agreement or opposition to the dictates of wisdom, and to known and well established facts. From every party and sect, much information that is useful can be obtained, if they are listened to with candor and discrimination.

In company, conversation should not be allowed to stagnate, as it causes all to feel awkward and unpleasant. To obviate this difficulty, if proper topics do not readily occur, let some valuable publication be read aloud by one of the party. Each paragraph may become the subject of general comment, as it is read—every individual who feels inclined, expressing his opinion in regard to its merits. In this manner, a flow of conversation can be kept up, that will be entertaining and useful to all.

Beware in company, of speaking against an absent person. In such cases, your words will seem to be conveyed on the wings of the wind. The individual who is the subject of your remarks, will assuredly hear of them, and you will be extremely liable to become involved in difficulty from your thoughtlessness. By detracting from the merits of the absent, the company will be at liberty to surmise that you are actuated by envy or malice; and thus you may lower yourself in their estimation, instead of the person against whom your remarks are directed. A certain eccentric individual was always observed, at parties, to be among the last that retired. On being interrogated why he uniformly tarried so long, he replied, that "as soon as a man was gone, they always began to talk against him; and, consequently, he thought it always judicious to stay till none were left to slander him." There is too much truth in this suggestion. To speak disparagingly of the absent, is a failing too generally indulged. It should, however, be guarded against, as a practice alike unjust, indelicate, and ungentlemanly. It is doing unto others precisely as we would not have others do unto us.

Be cautious upon what topics you converse. Never introduce or speak upon subjects that are indelicate, profane, or in any way improper. There is no greater indication of a lack of good breeding, than a violation of this rule. Especially avoid indulging levity upon sacred subjects. Religion is a topic too important—the names of our Creator and of our Redeemer, are too sacred—to be mentioned in a light, trifling manner, or to be made themes for ridicule or merriment.

Avoid interlarding your conversation with vulgar sayings and low expressions. Many are fond of indulging in double entendres—in conveying by emphasis or gesture, some indelicate idea, under a form of decent language. This habit should be carefully avoided by every young man who would lay claims to gentility. Anecdotes of a lascivious character, or such as terminate in an attempt at vulgar wit, should never be permitted to pass your lips.

Never be guilty of using profane language. In this respect, young men are extremely liable to err. It seems that some view it as an accomplishment, a mark of gallantry and manhood, to intersperse their conversation with oaths and imprecations. But this is a great mistake. There is no more certain evidence of ill manners, and of familiarity with low company, than the habit of swearing. It shows an evident want of true taste and politeness. Lord Chesterfield, who is good authority on this subject, says that oaths are never heard in the language of a real gentleman. It is true, some who lay pretensions to gentility, indulge in this low habit; but their pretensions are not well founded. This one practice displays their vulgarity as evidently as though the word were branded upon their forehead. Permit me, therefore, to urge the young man whose eye is scanning these lines, to refrain entirely from this base practice. It is not only wicked in the sight of God—not only impolite, dishonorable, and ungentlemanly—but useless, uncalled for, and absolutely silly! If you would be respected by yourself and by others, be not contaminated by that vulgarity which invariably degrades you in the estimation of the discreet and wise. And whenever your companions indulge in profanity, exercise all your influence, by entreaty, persuasion, or even ridicule, to induce them to abandon a habit which ranks them with the lowest of our race. It is hardly necessary to say, that it is exceedingly impolite and indecorous to use profane language in company—especially in the company of ladies!

This the good sense of every intelligent young man will dictate; and he will, therefore, not allow himself to be guilty of such vulgarity.

Do not engross the whole attention of the social circle. You should recollect that others have ideas as well as you—that their desire to express them may be as strong as yours, and that the company may be as highly edified by their conversation, as by the uninterrupted flow of your own thoughts. Remember the adage—"Water running from a bottle nearly empty, makes more noise than in running from one that is full." People will sometimes apply this to those who monopolize a great proportion of the conversation. Whenever the propensity seizes you to talk much more than others, in company, think of the loud sound of the empty bottle; and allow the suspicion to enter your mind, that perhaps those who are compelled to listen, are thinking of it also. This will be a salutary curb, and will be likely to keep you within the bounds of politeness.

Avoid speaking much of yourself and your own exploits, in a mixed company. He who makes himself the theme of his whole conversation, is very liable to become exceedingly ridiculous in the eyes of others. It has the appearance of holding a very elevated rank, in your own estimation—and that of all the subjects that have engrossed the attention of man since the world began, none seem to you so worthy the notice of those in your presence, as your own attractions. A little reflection on the ridiculous light in which you would thus place yourself, will cause you to avoid this display of littleness and vanity.

Do not make others the subject of ill-natured jests. It may for the moment, produce a laugh in the company; but it may, also, send a shaft that will rankle deep in some heart, and become the source of bitter enmity towards you.

When an individual is addressing you, avoid seeming inattentive to his remarks. It has the appearance of holding him in slight estimation, and is equivalent to saying, "I deem you of too little importance to claim my notice."

Beware of entering into loud and boisterous disputation or wrangling upon any topic, in company. If the opinions you may happen to express, are objected to, and you are thus compelled, as it were, to enter upon their defence, do it with calmness and serenity. Keep yourself perfectly cool and collected; and avoid showing the least symptom of anger. Nothing is more impolite, and nothing gives your opponent greater advantage over you, than to burst out into a blaze of rage. Carefully avoid such a catastrophe. If he becomes angry, do you not fail to be good-natured—if he frowns, do you smile—if he resorts to calumny and vituperation, do you return it with forgiveness and kindness. "A good word for a bad one, is worth much and costs but little." You cannot fail to obtain a sensible advantage by pursuing this course. These remarks will apply especially to religious topics. A friendly conversation, or disputation upon controverted points of religious faith, is both pleasant and instructive, when the parties remain in a mild and well-governed state of mind. But if one or both become angry, all pleasure and profit ceases—it becomes a strife of bad feelings and acrimonious personalities, instead of that proper interchange of opinions, whereby truth is elicited. When the feelings become aroused to this disagreeable state, evidence and argument are of no avail; they make no convincing and lasting impression, and the conversation had better be closed at once—for "A man convinced against his will,

Is of the same opinion still."

Never flatly contradict another in conversation. It is much more proper to say, "that, perhaps, is a mistake," than to exclaim, "that is a lie." The former is a more honorable and gentlemanly manner of contradicting a statement, than the latter. When you are compelled to differ from another, in any sentiment he has uttered, do it with expressions of regret that your views call upon you to sustain opinions of a diverse character. This will tend to remove or prevent harshness and asperity—it will prepossess him in favor of the friendly spirit which you exhibit, and cause him to view your sentiments in a more favorable light than he would were you to pursue a different course.

Be not too positive in any of your statements. You will frequently discover yourself wrong, when you feel very positive you are right. Every subject has two sides; and before you form a conclusive opinion, or enter upon the defence of an opinion, be certain that you have fairly seen and examined both sides. A botanist, in publishing an account of a flower denominated "the bee-orchis," described it as having the form of a bee painted upon its leaves. Another writer publicly contradicted this statement, and maintained that it was the figure of a fly that was impressed upon the petal of the flower. In this, however, he displayed the limited extent of his information upon this subject, for there are two species of orchis flower—the bee-orchis and the fly-orchis. Had not this writer been so very positive, he would not have displayed and published his ignorance to the world. I repeat, then, be not too positive upon any subject, or too precipitate in expressing your opinion. Give every topic a thorough examination before you become its advocate.

Permit me here to caution young men against that ungentlemanly practice, in which too many indulge, of speaking in a light and disparaging manner of the female character in general. Some young men seem to imagine it exceedingly wise and knowing, to indulge in these general suspicions. But they invariably indicate a weak head, an unkind, ungenerous disposition, and a wicked and corrupt heart. Such young men should remember that their mothers, sisters, and future wives, are all included in these sweeping denunciations. If they possess any love or respect for them, their lips will be closed to these vile and unfounded calumnies.

ON THE CRITERION OF TRUTH.

No greater sensations of pure delight and gratification can be experienced by intelligent beings, than those which are felt by the philosopher at the discovery of some new phenomenon he had anxiously suspected, or by the student, who is a lover of truth, wherever found, at the detection of error, or discovery of physical or moral truth, which had been long the object of his most diligent search, and most anxious expectations.

Demonstration seems to have an adaptation to certain latent faculties of the mind, by infusing joy and gladness, as naturally as the full expanding, cloudless morning dispels in the fancy the feverish dreams of disturbed slumber. Doubt is nearly allied to error in its influence, by casting a cloud of despondency over the mental vision; and hence the pleasures arising from demonstration, which dispels the mists of uncertainty, and opens to view a rich landscape, over which the eye wanders with pleasure, but whose farthest extent of loveliness cannot be clearly determined.

Loud and boisterous has been the joy which some have manifested at new discoveries, as that of Archimedes, when he discovered specific gravity at the bath. Some, less fortunate, toil out their life in useless, barren researches, alike painful and unprofitable.

Philosophical and mathematical truths, are the most numerous, as well as the least contested, because sought for, as well as demonstrated scientifically. And why not make the researches of moral and religious truth, a branch of science? Opinion would not then be substituted for proof; or the dictum of a learned savant, be admitted evidence. Most of the acknowledged truths of philosophy, are deductions from first principles, or corollaries from self-evident facts, pursued like the ascent up a hill, every step extending the prospect, and encouraging the prosecution.

Truth is naturally pleasing to the mind of man, as the rays of light are to his vision; and hence the restlessness of doubt, and the untiring perseverance with which inquiry is accompanied, and the hope and confidence of emancipation; for if certainty is hopeless, exertion tires, and skepticism casts her long shadows abroad, with gloom; for no morning star ariseth.

"Were all those luminaries quenched at once,
It were not half so sad, as one beighted soul
Who gropes for happiness, and finds despair."

The vast difference between truth and error is so great, that was it not for prejudices existing before we are called on to determine, perhaps we should seldom make the blunders we too frequently do. The form, the modes of life, and the habits of a butterfly, are not more diverse—more distinct from those of an oyster, than is truth from error; yet how many volumes are written, how many eloquent and angry declamations are delivered, to point out the specific difference, and to render it very doubtful which is a butterfly, which is the oyster!

The mechanic, poor and illiterate, whom "dull science has never taught to stray," acts more philosophically, more rationally. Ask him if that pillar leans from a perpendicular, and if so, which way it leans; does he, in determining the fact, compare it with other objects or other pillars, supposed to rise perpendicularly? No; he at once appeals to an unerring standard—to the great criterion, unalterable in its nature, invariably the same: he takes in his right hand the plummet, and pronounces, with the decision of infallibility, and the positiveness of conscious rectitude, "the pillar is not perpendicular, it leans in a certain direction; if you will not believe me, take the plummet and look for yourself."

What the plumb-line is to the pillar, first principles are to the discovery of truth, or detection of error. And that branch of study, be it what it may, which does not admit of demonstration, by an unerring plumb-line, is not worthy of the pursuit of a rational being.

Theology, although called a science, by its not being taught scientifically, is less demonstrable than all other sciences; not because it is impossible to be done, but because it has seldom been attempted in the right way. And what is called the doctrines of Christianity, have at present little more evidence of the truth of any of them, than the learned quirks, the far-fetched allusions, pious declamations, or religious horrors, of controversialists furnish; and whose manner of investigating religious truths, manifests a fear of arriving at any point of certainty, lest the learned bustle should cease, or the dust of argument terminate: all parties thus make skeptics, and then all parties attempt to castigate them; the only thing in which they all agree—viz., chastising infidels and atheists.

The absolute unity of the eternal and ever blessed God, and those everlasting perfections in him, which are clearly discoverable by his creatures as a certain consequence of his oneness, is in all theological disputes, what the plumb line is to mechanical labors. So great is its utility, that our divine Master, whose name we bear, has pronounced it the first and chief commandment, or first principle. No wonder at the dispute, which way the tenet or proposition leans; when instead of using an unerring rule, they compare it to other fancied tenets, supposed to be perpendicular, and neglect the standard of truth.

The properties of the plumb-line are eternal—they are the same as they ever were, and will always continue the same. The acknowledged attributes of the Deity, which are known to us as the effects of his unity of existence, are eternal, unchangeable. Let it therefore be well impressed forever on all our minds, that the attributes of Deity are an unerring standard of the truth or fallacy of all doctrines.

The seemingly perplexing (but highly improper) question respecting the conduct of Deity towards erring delinquents, in a future state, or the perpetuity of crime and misery under the administration of eternal benevolence, is now questioned and defended, like chess players contending for the game, regardless of the means of winning. Regardless of, or forgetful of the only means of laying at rest forever the dispute, they seem to wish to prolong the doubt, by debating on the original meaning of certain words, which have nothing to do with the facts of the case, which are capable of giving evidence on both sides, and do, with equal facility. What should we say of the mechanic, endeavoring to try the inclination of a pillar, who would neglect the plummet, and make use of the string only, liable to be blown aside by every breeze? Why, pronounce him mad, or careless of the fact.

If there is only one eternal first Cause, he is the cause of all things, and his character must be clearly indicated by a contemplation of his works. Do not the present scenes we behold, demonstrate that all the changes through which the earth has passed, "from chaos to this visible diurnal sphere," was solely and entirely meant for the accommodation of man, who was produced when the earth had arrived at a degree of perfection adapted to the wants and pleasures of the new inhabitants? Every succeeding change in the earth, has been evidently for the gratification and support of man, whose pleasures have always kept pace with his numbers and wants. The ignorance with which we begin life, and the faculties bestowed upon us, and means of acquiring knowledge, are evident proofs of benevolent design and wise execution—links of the great chain which necessarily proceeds from one Being, who knows no equal, and is jealous of no rival. We are governed by natural laws, an infringement of which brings pain, and observing which, is pleasure. He has given us faculties to acquire knowledge, which can not begin to be satiated here, and communicated the fact to us for our encouragement to persevere in acquiring knowledge, that a future state of consciousness awaits us, where our faculties may expand forever, and we may acquire knowledge forever. He has given us hope in his mercy, and assurance in his grace; they are all the gifts of the same Being, even of the one living and true God. Do his most wonderful works manifest any ill will to man, or is what we sometimes call his anger, permanent? Does the hurricane rage forever?—does the volcano ceaselessly cause earthquakes?—do plentiful harvests never succeed famine?—are his ways on earth uniform, in this transitory state, and wear a different aspect in the future state? Take the plumb of his eternal perfections as the criterion of truth, and drop the infantile standard of words and phrases. They may amuse the indifferent, or their prolixity blunt the keen sense of inquiry, by a hopeless termination; but in fact, they are like the wires stretched on doors to amuse children—they give the same monotonous sounds, whether touched by the hand of an infant or of an adult.

For the Magazine and Advocate

ST. LAWRENCE ASSOCIATION.

Br. Grosh—In the Magazine and Advocate of the 4th inst., I find myself called on by Br. L. C. Browne, to explain the intentions of the Council of the St. Lawrence Association at its late session, in passing a certain resolution penned by myself, which resolution he thinks will be understood on an exoneration of the accused at the expense of Br. Rayner. In compliance with this call I will give from memory, a very brief statement of the principal facts in the case referred to. 1. Br. Rayner wrote to Br. Jennison, informing him in general terms that E. A. Garfield had been guilty of deliberate falsehood whilst in Troy, last Summer.

2. Br. Jennison handed the said letter to the committee of discipline, to be disposed of by them as they might deem proper.

3. Br. Wallace, one of the said committee, wrote to Br. Rayner, calling on him for specifications accompanied by certificates, suggesting that it might be necessary to forward legal testimony.

4. Br. Rayner replied to Br. Wallace, but did not furnish the proof required, assigning certain reasons for neglecting so to do, among which were the following—He thought such proof unnecessary in a case of ecclesiastical discipline—and further, he did not feel disposed to incur the expense of obtaining legal testimony.

5. In the above state of the case, the same was laid before the Council of our Association, which disposed of the business in the manner as expressed in the resolution before referred to.

Let us look at the said resolution once more, and endeavor to ascertain whether the public could rationally interpret the same in the manner Br. Browne suggests. Article 9th of our Minutes, reads as follows:—"Resolved, that as regards the testimony, yet laid before this Council, it is the opinion of the same that Br. E. A. Garfield is not guilty of the charge preferred by Br. M. Rayner."

I will now endeavor to explain the principles upon which it would seem that our Council voted.—We considered Br. Rayner as the person preferring the charges, and, of course, the complainant, and hence we did not consider him as a witness in the case. We considered Br. Garfield as the accused, or defendant, and hence not a witness in his own cause. The case was one laid before us, without such testimony as we could admit to be proof, on either side. We could, therefore, do no less than to dismiss the subject as we did, by the resolution; not in the least censuring Br. Rayner, nor exonerating Br. Garfield—except in view of the insufficiency of the testimony, laid before the Council—which testimony we considered as not amounting to proof.

Let it then be distinctly understood, that we did not wish or intend to censure Br. Rayner nor yet to exonerate Br. Garfield except for reasons told before. In civil courts, good and honest men frequently prefer charges which they can not sustain by legal proof, and the accused must of course be acquitted, and declared "not guilty," in view of the testimony brought before the Court. If Br. Browne will criticise the terms of the resolution more closely, I think he will hardly be able to discover that its language either implied or expressed, amounts to the declaration, "that Br. Rayner has wilfully preferred false charges, and we will expose him." Our Council has nothing to say against Br. Rayner, neither can it condemn any person until proved guilty.

The propriety of reading the resolution in the assembled congregation, may be explained as follows:—A great number of persons in that congregation were extremely impatient to know the result of the trial pending in the Council. We saw no impropriety in announcing to the anxious multitude the issue of our deliberations, in the most "summary" manner possible, even if the mode was "unusual," as suggested by Br. Rayner.

I will now say a word in reply to Br. Rayner's suggestion, addressed to the committee of discipline of the St. Lawrence Association. As one of said committee I can say that I am willing to do any thing that can reasonably be requested of me, with a view to a full investigation of the "matters alleged relative to E. A. Garfield." Br. Rayner intimates that the committee can come to Troy, and he will endeavor to be at home, etc.—but Br. Rayner need not be informed that it will cost us much more to go to Troy, than it would to get two or three witnesses sworn. If the above explanation is not sufficient, I will try to give further information when called upon for that purpose. F. LANGWORTHY.

Madrid, August 16, 1837.

Brs. GROSH and HUTCHINSON—In No. 31, current volume of the Magazine and Advocate, I saw a communication signed "M. Rayner," touching the proceedings of the St. Lawrence Association held on the 28th and 29th of June last, at Canton, N. Y. In that communication, the writer censures not only the Council and Committee of discipline, but me in particular, using my name no less than twelve times in his communication.

For myself I have ever considered it highly improper, when there was matter of difference between two brethren in the ministry, for them to commit to the public prints their grievances, views, and feelings, before they have ever communicated with each other on the subject of their differences; thereby spreading it before thousands who otherwise could know nothing of it and who are little interested and nothing benefited by so doing.—It corrects no faults of which the writer complains; only excites prejudices, and recriminations. One communication usually calls forth another, until the public become weary and disgusted; and thus retards the advancement of the cause of truth, while it corrects not an error, converts not a sinner, and is of no utility to any one.—The prints serve, when thus improperly used, as a medium through which to transmit to thousands the envy, malice and prejudices which he may have engendered against his enemies.

Nor would I thus have come before the public at this time, had not Mr. Rayner's communication appeared in the public prints, rendering a reply from me indispensable. I say indispensable, because I will never sit in silence and suffer my name thus to be dragged and caricatured before the public, and my reputation thus traduced and slandered—without standing forth in its defence. No, I will defend both, to the last. But to the communication. And—

1. Mr. Rayner, in his third paragraph "disclaims preferring charges" against me, stating that he "did not suppose it to be his province." But why not his province? If he had charges to prefer and could substantiate them by good and sufficient evidence—why not prefer them? This is any man's privilege—why not M. Rayner's? But his letter containing the charge which he here denies, is with us, and was read repeatedly at the Association, and in the presence of an assembled Council. And by the Council, aided by the ablest talents, it was decided that Mr. Rayner was the complainant in the case above referred to.

2. In his third paragraph he says,—"I supposed the committee of discipline for that Association, if the matter should be laid before them, and they should judge an investigation expedient, would take the proper means to effect it." "The proper means." What does he call "the proper means"? The "means" adopted by all Associations were those that committee used. Br. J. Wallace, then one of the committee, after being informed of Mr. Rayner's charge, immediately communicated to me the charge, and in it, said, in a quotation from Mr. Rayner, that "if proof was necessary, call on him and he could prove it." I replied to Br. J. Wallace's letter, that I was not aware of having told Mr. Rayner any untruth, and if he alleged any thing of the kind, to call on him for his proof. Br. Wallace called officially, on him for his evidence in support of said charge. His reply was, "that he did not think it necessary" that it would be attended with some expense—"that he thought his word in this case was sufficient." Such, Br. Grosh, was the testimony which he furnished to the committee as read before the Council—and now complains "that they did not take the proper means." What more could they do than they did do? They called on him for his evidence—he refused to give any;—accordingly, they proceeded to trial with no testimony at all—nothing but his assertions. I confessed to the Council what I told Mr. Rayner—I then went on to substantiate by certificates, from those knowing the facts, and by checks, Bank notes, etc., what I had said. I do not deny telling him certain things recorded in his letter,—but I do deny that what I told him is false. What I told him are facts—I have substantiated them once, and can do so again.

3. Mr. Rayner expresses great surprise that the said Council should proceed to trial barely on his own and my statements, without any one present to gainsay it.—He, himself, made the complaint and urged it on; it was his business to have been there, being the accuser, and to "gainsay" if he thought proper. The fault, if any fault there is, is exclusively his own. Why complain? Why find fault with the Association, Council, committee and me?

4. With regard to his fourth paragraph, I pass it in silence, let the tree be judged according to its fruits.

Finally after passing through his subject as "seemed good" to him, he then proposes that the committee make "due inquiry" into the matters alleged etc.—then adds—"should the above suggested inquiry be instituted, if notified at the time, I will endeavor to be at home and give the necessary references." Indeed!—Would it be really worth the while for three committee men, with myself, to be at the trouble and expense of two hundred miles travel merely to obtain the "references"? For reference? is all he promises—not evidence—but "references."

I can only answer for one, I shall not take the trouble, or be to the expense, barely for a "reference." No—if Mr. R. has any more charges to prefer, let him prefer them—here is the place for trial, I wait with patience their arrival. E. A. GARFIELD.

MINISTERIAL SUPPORT.

HIRELINGS.

I can not promise my readers a very orderly arrangement in these brief articles—my aim is to do the subject as full justice as the number and brevity of my communications will permit.

"A hireling," is a powerful word of reproach, frequently used by Quaker-like opponents to a settled and salaried (not supported) ministry. I will examine its meaning. If it means any one who will receive a remuneration for his labor, every Friend in the world is a "hireling," as well as the paid or salaried preacher of the Gospel.

But whatever those mean who now use it, such was not the meaning of Jesus, from whose language they have borrowed the term. John x: 12, 13—"But he that is an hireling and not the shepherd, whose own the sheep are not, seeth the wolf coming, and leaveth the sheep and fleeth; and the wolf catcheth them and scattereth the sheep." The words I have italicised fully describe what is "an hireling." But the following verse confirms it clearly. "The hireling fleeth because he is an hireling, and careth not for the sheep."

Have our brethren of those denominations who are conscientiously opposed to paying a preacher a salary, no such preachers among them, as Jesus has here described? I have known some, and heard of more!—

Well, they were hirelings, whether they took money for preaching, or not. They might have been hired by lame, power, constant employ in a profitable business, or the prospect of getting money without interest, to loan out to others at a high per centum!—but still they were hirelings. And, on the other hand, have these denominations never known salaried preachers, who would not leave the flock when the wolf came, but who would lay down their lives for the sheep (as John Frederick Oberlin, for example)? Well, those men were not hirelings, but good shepherds who loved the sheep—followers of Jesus and his apostles.

Let, then, the term "hireling" be properly applied—applied as Jesus applied it—and it will form no objection to the salaried support of the Christian ministry—and that a salaried support is all that the Friends and others do oppose, I will show in a subsequent number. I conclude by remarking, in the language of a faithful servant of God, that "I do not preach that I may get money; but I get money that I may preach."

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, D. SKINNER, AND S. R. SMITH, EDITORS.

UTICA, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 1, 1837.

SUNDAY.

I perceive that one of the editors of the Trumpet, is considerably horrified at some of Miss Martineau's remarks on Sunday recreations. He winds up his deprecations with the solemn injunction given to the Jews, under the Old Testament dispensation: "Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy." Now, for one, I also deprecate whatever is intended to bring a day of rest, devoted to public religious worship, into desuetude; for I believe such a day necessary for man and beast, and when properly observed, more beneficial to the individual, and also to families and communities, than any thing that can be gained by its violation and neglect. But is a superstitious veneration for the day, rather than for the objects of its institution, calculated to effect its proper observance? Is it likely that persons who know that Judaism is not Christianity, will be led to attach importance to an observance of Sunday, by Christians, by merely quoting an injunction to observe Saturday, given only to the Jews? I think not. They are more likely, when they discover the fallacy of such arguments, to fall into the error of supposing that we have no other authority, no other reason for observing Sunday, and to reject it altogether.

Do not mistake me. I blame not our brother for endeavoring to prevent young men from disturbing others in their Sunday devotions, and absenting themselves from the pleasures and profits of divine worship in the public sanctuary; but I regret that he did it not more effectually and thoroughly—that he drew rather on the stores of prejudice than of reason. In relation to the extract from Miss Martineau's work, I think he has mistaken its spirit, if not its letter, separate, as he has copied it, from its context. By referring to "Society in America," volume ii, page 340, the reader will find her commenting on the narrow and sour spirit which pervades the popular religious denominations in the United States—the melancholy and even vicious consequences resulting from this perversion and abuse of religion—the formality, ceremoniousness, constrained, anxious and fearful spirit religion is thus made to infuse into all who embrace it under this disguise and the reckless licentiousness its spirit drives those into, who chance to stray beyond its narrow boundaries and fall under its excluding anathemas. Then, on page 341, follows the deprecated sentence, respecting young men riding out of Boston, to breathe the fresh air of the country around. "They have been brought up to think it a sin to take a ride on Sundays. Once having yielded, and being under a sense of transgression for a wholly fictitious offence, they rarely stop there." She continues—"They next join parties to smoke, perhaps to drink, and so on. If they had but been brought up to know that the Sabbath, like all times and seasons, was made for man and not man for the Sabbath; that their religion is in their state of mind, and not in their arrangement of the day, thir Sabbaths would most probably have been spent as innocently as any other day; and the chances would have been much increased of their desiring the means of improving their religious knowledge, and cherishing their devotional affections, by social worship."

Now I can not see any thing in this to warrant the horror expressed at it by our brother—nor any thing different in its spirit from what has always been urged by Universalists. For we have always contended against a Pharisaic observance of Sunday, urging that it is not commanded in the New Testament, and reprobating the slavish spirit engendered by the popular views respecting its violation, and arising from its very rigid observance. That the doctrine of its violation by innocent recreation, without disturbance to any, is a sin, has done great injury to thousands, I have no doubt. The belief that a sin has been committed, and yet great pleasure been enjoyed in its commission, is enough to lead many onward in the career of transgression. And though the sin is only fancied, it is as a real sin to the individual, who frequently goes on, more and more recklessly in consequence—as it were, in bravado of public opinion—until his transgressions are no longer those merely of custom or propriety, but are actual sins.

I remember reading the confessions of a Catholic gentleman, many years ago. He had been taught from early youth, to believe it a great sin not to confess all his evil deeds to the priest. While yet a child, he robbed a bird's nest, which circumstance he deemed worthy of being related to his confessor; but, when the day came, his courage failed him, and he passed it by without confessing it. To the crime of robbing a bird's nest, he now had added what he believed to be the greater crime of not confessing it to the priest. The next confession day approached, and instead of confessing his now more than double guilt, his courage again failed him, and he again added a great crime to his former load. Confession after confession passed by, and guilt was added to guilt, until (I believe) he became a reckless man, and indulged in real crimes—all from having been told that (what was really no sin, viz.,) not to confess any error to a priest, was a very great transgression against God.

I may be wrong in some of the details of this story, for it is about twenty years since I read it, and my eventuality is but moderate; but of one thing I am certain, from experience and observation—it is, that the surest way to make a child a reckless sinner, or a cowardly slave, is to impress upon its mind that actions desirable and innocent in themselves, are forbidden in the law of God, and are sins deserving his wrath, the condemnation of the good, and the reproach of society. The person who would not be deeply injured in moral feelings and mental independence, by such teachings firmly believed, must be singularly, if not very happily constituted.

I have more, of a different cast, to say on this subject, but it will "keep" till another time. The present is as much "copy" as is now wanted!

A. B. G.

RIGIDLY RIGHTEOUS.

"There is a time for every thing," said the wise monarch of Israel—and I am free to confess that when the mind is first released from former constraint, whether salutary or injurious, it has a powerful inclination to run riot, and indulge in many lawless and injurious practices. Thus we sometimes see men released from the fetters of a Partialist creed, run right into deism, general skepticism, or stark, down right atheism; from which (permit me to add) nothing but Universalism is ever likely to save them, by restoring them to their right minds. Thus, too, has it grown into a proverb that no children turn out worse in life, than the offspring of deacons and preachers. The reason is evident. From the very nature of their stations, (conjoined with the superstitious reverence and expectations of society, which supposes them to be "more than common men,") they feel it incumbent on them to make their children "little angels," patterns of piety, prudence and propriety, and make them hypocritical little Pharisees! The day of release from parental authority arrives—perhaps they steal away from it occasionally, or perhaps they out grow it—and all the evil passions that have only been smouldered, not quenched, have now thoroughly dried the combustibles piled above them, and burst out into one raging, ever whelming, all-devouring and ruinous conflagration. The child has not been trained up "in the way it should go," or it would not have departed from it. It has been made "righteous over much," and it destroys itself. There is Scripture warrant for these conclusions drawn from the premises here disclosed.

From these, and a number of similar circumstances which almost every one of our readers may have witnessed, I am led to believe that knowledge and well grounded faith should, as far as possible, be made to precede great changes of any kind—and that Universalist preachers especially should be careful never to pull down, without at the same time, building up. Indeed, if a lurking belief, that Universalism in its best principles is most probably the truth of God, could be made to precede a conviction that Partialism is false, I believe it would be better for the convert.

A. B. G.

MORAVIANS.

So called from Moravia, the country they first settled—or, Herrnhutters, from Herrnhut, in Upper Lusatia, the village which they settled under Count Zinzendorf their early protector and noble convert—or Unitas Fratres (United Brethren), the name they most delight in—have several settlements in America. The only one I am acquainted with is Lititz, in Lancaster county, Pa. Many of the early and some of the present Moravians, are believers in the final restitution, although nearly all are now so fearful of popular opinion as to profess great horror at it. Their church creed is the Augsburg confession, and their government episcopal, while in the form and ceremonials of worship they approach, in some respects, the Catholics—particularly in keeping many holidays and festivals, with joy and mirth, and in the cultivation of music, in which latter they excel any denomination in this country. They are rather formal in their manners, and too rigid in the government of youth—punctilious in attendance on their frequent meetings for divine worship, and mildly devout in their feelings—severe in forbidding fashionable amusements—yet have I heard a profane air, as it is termed, performed on the church organ, in the interval between the public service on Sunday noon; and, in the absence of pupils, whose feelings they do not wish to wound, the teachers of their very excellent female academy, will not hesitate to regale you with richest sounds of voice and piano or harp, in any air you chose to name, on Sunday. A walk for mere exercise or recreation is not forbidden, towards Sunday evening—nor will any female deem it a desecration of the day they deem so holy, to do light sewing or knitting, to prevent her mind from wandering, or keep her hands employed without injury to her mind. The sounds of the violin and flute may occasionally be heard from the dwelling houses as you walk the streets on a Sunday morning—yet in rigidity of ceremonials, and in stern severity of discountenance to every thing like dancing, marrying out of the society, etc., etc., they are behind no denomination with which I am acquainted.

I might add other anecdotes of this singular people, from whom I am descended by the paternal side, but my object is accomplished if I have shown how they regard Sunday and its observance. For other particulars see Buck's Dictionary, Adams' View, and Evans' Sketches of all religions.

HAYNES' SERMON.

If the gentleman who sent us "the Cross and Baptist Journal," containing this sermon, had given us his name and address, we should have better liked his communication in the words following—"Mr. A. B. G., O. H., D. S., or S. R. S., Publish this if you dare, and answer it if you can, or write a counterpart. I believe the Editor of this paper [the Cross and Journal] would publish a reply."

My combativeness, though large, is not large enough to induce me to accept anonymous challenges, or to be dared into doing what I do not otherwise deem proper. Haynes' Sermon has been so widely circulated, so generally read, and so frequently answered, that we should but lumber our columns to give it a place therein. As to writing a counterpart, my self-esteem, though small, is large enough to preserve me from imitating so much slang, scurrility, and mean insinuation without foundation, proof or argument.

But this can be done. I have preached and published a sermon on the same text (Gen. iii: 4), entitled "Universalism not the devil's doctrine," which has probably been but little circulated in the region of the Cross and Journal, and which has never, that I know of, been answered in that or any other Partialist journal. Now if the Editor of the Cross will publish that sermon in his columns (appending such remarks as he may deem proper), I will copy Mr. Haynes' sermon into our columns, with a very few remarks in reply to that portion of it deserving any notice. On receiving notice of the acceptance of this offer, I will forward duplicate copies of said sermon to any address our correspondent may furnish us. In his own bullying language—"To—, Accept this offer if you dare, or answer my sermon if you can." But unlike him, I give him my initials, by which he may know who it is that thus addresses him.

RELIEF SOCIETIES.

The Constitutions and subscription papers of the "societies for the relief of Widows and Orphans of deceased Universalist clergymen," formed in the Central and Mohawk Associations, are now ready for delivery, and transmission to the proper persons. The preparation of them was unavoidably delayed by various causes, until now, when an abundant harvest of every kind of produce is smiling upon the husbandman, and promising plenty to the land. In this most favored and favoring season these subscriptions are sent forth, to test the gratitude of our brethren for the goodness of God to them.—Let them manifest it by liberality to the cause of the widow and the orphan, remembering that "God loveth the cheerful giver"—that "bread cast upon the waters" will manifest its results before long; for "he that giveth to the poor, lendeth to the Lord."

Br. Waggoner will please send for the copies ordered by the Mohawk Association—and the Trustees or Clerks of societies, and preachers, in the bounds of the Central Association will please call or send for copies to this office at their earliest convenience. Those to whom we can send, will receive copies soon by mail or private conveyance. It is hoped all will be active in circulating the subscriptions, and procuring as large annual subscriptions and donations as the ability and liberality of our friends will allow them to subscribe.

A. B. G.

P. S. If any friends in other Associations feel disposed to aid either or both of these societies, we can furnish them with copies—or will receive their individual subscriptions by letter.

A. B. G.

THE UNION FOR SALE.

By the following it will be seen that Br. Price intends selling out. We shall miss him, let who will take his place, for he has proved himself an able and indefatigable caterer for his readers, and a spirited publisher.—Whether he succeeds in selling or not, our warmest wishes for his welfare and happiness are his.

A RARE OPPORTUNITY.

The UNIVERSALIST UNION Establishment is offered for sale. To a suitable individual, (or individuals,) with the necessary capital for an extensive business, it affords an opportunity seldom offered for advantageous investment. The paper has a respectable circulation, (between four and five thousand copies weekly,) is in an improving condition, and possesses rare advantages for an extensive book business in connexion with it.

A want of the necessary amount of capital, with the present proprietor, by which to conduct the business to advantage, both for himself and the cause in which it is engaged, is the only inducement for selling. Address (post paid), "P. Price, No 2 Chatham-Square, New-York."

Tyro is welcome, for I believe he tells the truth in a right spirit; and however unpalatable may be his facts, I trust they will operate like healthful medicines.

AN ERROR.

In looking over some back numbers of the Gospel Banner, I noticed a singular error, which I do not remember to have seen noticed or corrected by any other. In noticing the proceedings of our Central Association, he gets in a part of the proceedings of our State Convention, especially the Circular of the latter by Br. L. C. Browne, which he bestows on the Association. It is a mistake of no importance in that paper and region, and an Editor who has to condense a column or two into a stickful, by simply glancing over it, will readily account for it. Few men can read, think, and write in three different forms of words, at once.

A. B. G.

CORRESPONDENTS.

A few have heard and answered our call for short articles—we tender them our grateful thanks, and hope they will not be weary in well-doing. We hope to hear from others in a short time, also; for we need such assistance constantly. Of long articles we have a pretty good supply in tales, essays, and a few addresses which have been waiting for room some time. We have also sermons from Brs. Manley and Wallace, and a short one from Br. Gregory, which will appear in due time. But of short articles we have very few on hand.

A. B. G.

THE GLAD TIDINGS.

A change has come over this excellent semi-monthly which should have been noticed sooner. From the octavo form, it has been thrown open to the ampler quarto. Its terms are as heretofore—one dollar and fifty cents per annum for 26 numbers, or one year. Editors, Brs. S. A. Davis, Pittsburg, Pa., the place of publication—M. A. Chappel, and L. L. Sadler, Columbus, Ohio, where it is published simultaneously. It is filled with interesting matter, has thus far been well patronized, and we hope will continue to receive an increasing support.

A. B. G.

THE PRIZE ESSAY.

I acknowledge myself deficient in foresight in commencing this valuable and interesting essay week before last, inasmuch as the letters from Messrs. Campbell and Skinner prevented us from fulfilling the promise to conclude it in our last. Let every reader who has not a perfect recollection of what we published of it two weeks ago, hunt up that paper and read over the article, before he reads the conclusion, which we give in this paper.

A. B. G.

STAR IN THE EAST.—The cessation of this very excellent paper, should have been noticed some weeks ago, but in the peculiar situation of my affairs, it was forgotten with a number of other things. It was one of the best papers in our order, and yet failed—not for the want of subscribers, but for the want of paying subscribers—a want that has made several of us publishers rather lean in purse and hollow-eyed in hope. Mr. Carter having sold the list to the Trampet, in such manner as to still have an interest in it, it is to be hoped that all on the list will endeavor to make amends for the past. Br. J. G. Adams, its senior Editor, promises to contribute to several papers, our own among the number—our readers may therefore look out for a rich occasional treat from his pen.

A. B. G.

It is asked, Will you be at the General Convention, in Philadelphia, in September? Reluctantly, but of necessity, I answer, no—but any business may be duly memorandized on a slip of paper, and transacted with Br. S. R. Smith, who will be present, and I trust will be as kind as he heretofore has been in attending to such matters for us.

A. B. G.

The proceedings of the Niagara Association were duly marked for "copy" at the time, and I supposed they had appeared in our paper, till the welcome note of Br. Hammond undeceived me. He will accept my thanks.

A. B. G.

On Saturday morning last, the Hon. Henry Seymour, of this city, long known to the public as an able officer in many public stations of eminence, destroyed his life, by shooting himself with a shot gun, in his bed chamber.—The deceased was a mild, amiable man, but subject to hypochondria, in one of which mental aberrations he doubtlessly (and according to the verdict of the inquest) committed this fatal act. There appears to be a deep felt and general sympathy for his doubly distressed family.

Just received, The Rocky Mountains: or scenes, incidents, and adventures in the far west; digested from the journal of Captain B. L. E. Bonneville, of the army of the United States, and illustrated from various other sources, by Washington Irving.

We have also received a new supply of Miss Martineau's "Society in America," third edition.

AGENTS.

Mr. E. T. Bond, our former agent at Geneseo having left the place is no longer agent. Will J. F. Wyman Esq., please supply his place?

Samuel A. Budd, Carthage, and George Curtis, Oswego, will hereafter act as our agents.

Reports from three Standing Clerks of as many Associations in this State, have been received in answer to my late request. I hope all will report in due time.

POETRY.

HYMN OF NATURE.

God of the earth's extended plains!
The dark green fields contented lie;
The mountains rise like holy towers,
Where man might commune with the sky:
The tall cliff challenges the storm
That lowers upon the vale below,
Where shaded fountains send their streams,
With joyous music in their flow.

God of the dark and heavy deep!
The waves lie sleeping on the sands,
Till the fierce trumpet of the storm
Hath summoned up their thundering bands;
Then the white sails are dashed like foam,
Or hurry, trembling o'er the seas,
Till, calmed by thee, the sinking gale
Serenely breathes, Depart in peace.

God of the forest's solemn shade!
The grandeur of the lonely tree,
That wrestles singly with the gale,
Lifts up admiring eyes to thee;
But more majestic far they stand,
When, side by side their ranks they form,
To wave on high their plumes of green,
And fight their battles with the storm.

God of the light and viewless air!
Where summer breezes sweetly flow,
Or gathering in their angry might,
The fierce and wintry tempests blow;
All—from the evening's plaintive sigh,
That hardly lifts the drooping flower,
To the wild whirlwind's midnight cry—
Breathe forth the language of thy power.

God of the fair and open sky!
How gloriously above us springs
The tented dome of heavenly blue,
Suspended on the rainbow's rings;
Each brilliant star, that sparkles through,
Each gilded cloud that wanders free
In evening's purple radiance, gives
The beauty of its praise to thee.

God of the rolling orbs above!
Thy name is written clearly bright
In the warm day's unvarying blaze,
Or evening's golden shower of light.
For every fire that fronts the sun,
And every spark that walks alone
Around the utmost verge of heaven,
Were kindled at thy burning throne.

God of the world! the hour must come,
And nature's self to dust return!
Her crumbling altars must decay!
Her incense fire shall cease to burn:
But still her grand and lovely scenes
Have made man's warmest praises flow;
For hearts grow holier as they trace
The beauty of the world below. PEABODY.

THE CAUSE OF PEACE.

Important service may be rendered to the cause of peace, by communicating and enforcing just and elevated sentiments in relation to the true honor of rulers.—Let us teach, that the prosperity and not the extent of a State, is the measure of a ruler's glory; that the brute force and crooked policy which annex a conquest, are infinitely inferior to the wisdom, justice, and beneficence which make a country happy; and that the earth holds not a more abandoned monster, than the sovereign, who, intrusted with the dearest interests of a people, commits them to the dreadful hazards of war, that he may extend his prostituted power, and fill the earth with his worthless name. Let us exhibit to the honor and veneration of mankind the character of the Christian ruler, who, disdaining the cheap and vulgar honor of a conqueror, aspires to a new and more enduring glory; who, casting away the long tried weapons of intrigue and violence, adheres with a holy and unshaken confidence to justice and philanthropy, as a nation's best defence; and who considers himself as exalted by God, only that he may shed down blessings, and be as a beneficent deity to the world.

To these instructions in relation to the true glory of rulers, should be added, just sentiments as to the glory of nations. Let us teach, that the honor of a nation consists, not in the forced and reluctant submission of other States, but in equal laws and free institutions, in cultivated fields and prosperous cities, in the development of intellectual and moral power, in the diffusion of knowledge, in magnanimity and justice, in the virtues and blessings of peace. Let us never be weary in reprobating that infernal spirit of conquest, by which a nation becomes the terror and abhorrence of the world, and inevitably prepares a tomb, at best a splendid tomb, for its own liberties and prosperity. Nothing has been more common, than for nations to imagine themselves great and glorious on the ground of foreign conquest, when at home they have been loaded with chains. Can not these gross and monstrous delusions be scattered? Can nothing be done to persuade Christian nations to engage in a new and nobler race of glory, in generous competitions, in a noble conquest for superiority in wise legislation and internal improvements, in the spirit of liberty and humanity?—CHANNING.

HAPPINESS.

Happiness is much sought after, and seldom obtained. And why? Simply because it is sought for in the wrong manner. There are many, very many, that seek for happiness in revelry and licentiousness; in scenes of degradation and vice,—and obtain it not.

Does the drunkard receive pleasure or happiness by his excessive use of liquor? No,—on the reverse; he drinks deep of the bitter dregs of the cup of human misery and despair—he receives the full wages of his iniquity in horror—his days are those of sorrow—and at night he lays down his head on the pillow of wretchedness—he is the refuse of society—and his grey hairs are brought with sorrow to an untimely grave.

Contrast the life of such a person with that of a good man—with that of the venerable Murray—who went about doing all the good he was capable of doing—despised but not despising—he was meek and humble of spirit, and although beset with all the cares and anxieties of a primitive preacher, he enjoyed sweet consolations in trials, he was happy.

MARRIAGES.

In Albion, on the 20th inst., by Rev. C. Hammond, Mr. WILLIAM MUGGET, to Miss CYNTHIA LEE.

In Winfield, on the 13th inst., by Rev. M. B. Smith, Mr. SARDUS BRAINARD to Miss CAROLINE E. EMERY.

In Victor, July 25th, by Rev. K. Townsend, Mr. CHRISTOPHER G. SIMMONS to Miss LOUISA P. HATHEWAY, both of Bristol.

DEATHS.

In Boonville, July 4th, of dropsy of seven years standing, Mr. PELATIAH BALLOU, aged 67 years.

In the death of Mr. Ballou a wife and numerous family, are called to mourn their loss of a kind and pious husband and father. He sustained the reputation of an upright citizen, and a consistent Christian. His religious faith was that of Universalism, which cheered his pathway through life, and she the halo of its glory and comfort, to support him in death. The funeral was attended on the 5th, and a sermon delivered by J. A. A.

In Collinsville, August 10th, of consumption, Miss RHODA E. HORT, aged 28 years.

Intelligent, amiable and virtuous, she lived respected and beloved, and died lamented by all who knew her. Her faith was strong and unwavering in the restoration of all lapsed intelligences to holiness and happiness. If another instance of perfect resignation to the will of God, in death, and confidence in his illimitable grace, is needed to refute the oft repeated assertion that, "Universalism will not do to die by," we have it here. A few days previous to her decease, the writer called upon her, and conversed with her in regard to her departure. She said she preferred staying here if consistent with the will of God, but said she felt that, whether we live or die we are in the hands of the Lord. She had her reason perfect, and conversed cheerfully, until almost the last breath. A youthful female friend standing by her bedside in her last moments, inquired of her—"Are you willing to go?" "Yes," she answered; "I was not a few days ago, but am now—Are you ready to go, H—?" Her friend replied that she was not: to which she responded "I wish you were." To a sister who was bending over her, and whose streaming eyes told a sister's love, she said—"Don't weep sister; Do you not know to whom I am going?" Yes, was the reply. "Then," said she, "dry your tears." A few moments before her departure, while friends and neighbors were assembled around, to take their last, sad, parting view of the living clay, she spoke with much emphasis, saying that she wished all present, both believers and unbelievers to hear that she died a Universalist.

The funeral was attended, the 13th, and the consolations of the Gospel tendered to mourning relatives and friends, and a numerous assembly of sympathizing neighbors, by J. A. A.

In Hamilton, on the 5th inst., Mrs. LUCINDA HUNT, consort of Mr. Eleazer Hunt, aged 65 years. Sister Hunt was a firm believer in the final triumph of God's universal grace. She died of that too common disease, which has not yet elicited that attention and induced that precaution it demands—the consumption. For years has her life been on the threshold of death—but in God was her trust and she went out of the world cheerful and resigned. She has left an aged partner, and several children to mourn her departure, but they may confidently say, theirs is the grief, but hers is the joy. The funeral was attended on the 7th, by a large concourse of sympathizing friends and neighbors—Sermon from John xviii: 11, by Br. Boden.

In Lebanon, on July 27th, Mr. JOHN HENRY, aged 75 years. Mr. H. was one of the first settlers in the town of Lebanon, and by industry and prudence accumulated a good share of this world's goods. He has left a wife and children to mourn his departure from time—but we trust they mourn not as those without hope. Br. De-long being from home, the undersigned was called upon to speak of the kingdom to those that mourn.

The funeral was attended on the 28th ult., and a discourse delivered from 2 Samuel xiv: 14, by E. M. WOOLLEY.

In Nelson, on July 31st, Miss AMANDA WELLS, aged 33 years. In early life Miss Wells united with the Baptist church; but for 7 or 8 years past, has been a believer, hearer and doer of the word according to our holy religion. She selected the text for her funeral discourse, the hymns to be sung, and the minister to preach the word.

The funeral was attended on the 2d inst., and a discourse delivered from Psalm lxxvi: 13, 14.

THE CAUSES OF INFIDELITY REMOVED.....NO. VII.

BY S. R. SMITH.

PLENARY INSPIRATION.

Several causes of infidelity have been already found in some of the existing doctrines of the Christian church—doctrines which neither have, nor can have, any bearing upon the truth of the Gospel, unless they can be shown to be a part of the plan of divine revelation. This, if we are not greatly mistaken, can never be successfully done, nor is it conceived to be possible to set aside the evidence which has been furnished, that the particular doctrines to which we have referred, were not originally comprised in the articles of Christian faith. And there is good reason to believe, that all other ostensible causes of infidelity, respecting the being and perfections of God—his general providence, and the revelation of his will, as recorded in the Bible—are equally unfounded in truth.

Hitherto we have seen the infidel combatting facts, which though actual and palpable, have no relation to his subject. They are the mere accidents of the Christian profession, but formed no share of the original system of revealed truth. And he might as well object that there is no such thing as a sun in the universe, because it sometimes happens to be night, or occasionally a cloudy day. He has not failed to inform himself correctly respecting the latter, and should by all means use the proper means to obtain certain information with regard to the former. For can the unbeliever think—can any man seriously think that he has no greater interest in the question, whether man has a Creator to whom he is bound by ties that death itself can not sever, than in one of mere science? Has he—can he have so deep an interest in any other subject, as in that which assures him that he is under the constant care and guidance of a benevolent Deity, who will support him through the trials of the present life, and after death, crown him with immortality and blessedness? We know not the amount of indifference which men may feel on this subject—but it really appears impossible to doubt what answer every man would give to these questions.

Every one of the subjects connected with the profession of Christianity, and which has had any influence in furnishing the materials of infidelity, is an accumulation made in the progress of the Gospel through the dark ages. They are as useless to the Christian, as would be the ancient baronial castles for defence in modern times. Both may be precious in the eyes of their respective owners, but no man ought to trust his body to the safety of one, or the keeping of his soul to the other—both are falling under the weight of years.

There are certain opinions prevailing among many Christians, which have had their full share of influence, in the production of skepticism or infidelity. Among these, the belief of the actual inspiration of every word of the Bible, holds the first rank. And though far less pernicious in its moral and relative influences, than some of the doctrines which have been noticed, it is perhaps as fruitful as any one of them in unbelief. The opinion that every part and particular of the Bible was written by the inspiration of God, was probably never known to produce despair, insanity, or suicide, whatever task it may have laid upon human credulity. Nor is there any evidence that its belief ever made any man better, or that its disbelief is productive of immorality. And as to any obligation on the part of the Christian, to maintain and defend the inspiration of every part of the Old and New Testaments, none exists. The Bible itself, makes no such demand upon the credulity of any man. And it contains no evidence whatever, that any of the writers of that book—whether priest or prophet, patriarch or apostle, lawgiver or evangelist—ever required such an exertion of faith. All that is asked, is, that mankind should believe that their statements are true. But it requires no special discernment to perceive that inspiration can not be necessary to enable candid and honest men to tell the truth. And it is supposing the Deity officiously performing a work of entire supererogation, to maintain that he inspired men to do what could be done equally well without such aid. The idea that God especially aided with his spirit, in the performance of what any man of common honesty might and would do, in the circumstances described, is to the last degree preposterous.

But lest this should be doubted, let a few examples be taken from both the Old and New Testaments, and it is believed that full satisfaction may be gained in relation to the subject. What inspiration could be requisite to enable the historian to give a circumstantial account of the personal combat between David and Goliath, and of the subsequent battle between the hostile armies of Philistia and Israel? It plainly required no such aid to give the narration, any more than it was necessary to record the encounter between the Horatii and Curatii, or to give a detailed account of the battle of Waterloo. There was nothing supernatural in the case—and even if there had been, it would not require such aid to enable candid and honest men to relate what they saw with their eyes, and heard with their ears.

Take another instance, from the account given in the New Testament, of the apprehension, trial, and crucifixion—and even the resurrection of Christ—and then endeavor to ascertain why the special inspiration of the evangelists was necessary to enable them to relate the facts there recorded. Some of them were eye-witnesses of nearly all the transactions. It surely could not be necessary to those who were present—nor could it be to those who were not eye-witnesses, so long as they had access to all the means of information on the subject. St. Luke was one of the latter, and he expressly tells us, that he derived his knowledge of the facts from the ordinary means—the information of eye-witnesses, instead of deriving it from inspiration. And we would respectfully ask our brethren who are so tenacious of the plenary inspiration of the evangelists, whether we should believe Luke, or themselves?

The history of the accession and reign of the respective kings of Judah and Israel, contained in the Old Testament, and which is continued through a succession of ages, could not require, and evidently did not receive, the aids of inspiration. For, with the exception of the occasional incidents which attest some extraordinary interposition, and making allowance for national peculiarities, the record is in all respects, such as must appertain to every people having a regular government. And we see no reason why every part of the extended history here alluded to, might not be written without the aid of special inspiration. It is not pretended by any one of the writers, that such help was received—and why any one should now find it necessary to honor them with a distinction which they never claimed, is not understood.

There are also in the New Testament, certain passages and disavowals which plainly forbid the ascription of the agency of the divine spirit in all that is there recorded. Such is the request made by Paul, that a young fellow-laborer should bring from a certain place, some books, parchments, and a cloak which that apostle had left behind. Nothing could be more common and natural, than this request. It is one of familiar occurrence in all communities; and it is extremely difficult to imagine either the propriety or necessity of any superhuman aid in its expression. And we are confident that setting up a claim to such aid, for such occasions, instead of doing honor to the divine spirit, and inducing respect for the claims of the Bible, is the very way of all others to produce a very different result. As it has been more than once already remarked, so it may be again—it is one of the ways by which Christians very certainly promote infidelity. For no man, not predisposed by the principles of a favorite hypothesis, can for a moment believe that the holy spirit moved the apostle to request a friend to bring him his cloak! And the consequence will be, what it too frequently is, that too many become skeptical respecting the whole Bible. It is surely enough that inspiration should be given, and there is evidence that it was given, when necessary; but to insist that it is universally applied to the most trifling and unimportant expression, as well as to the great purposes of prophecy, is to defeat the ends for which it is maintained. And the time will come, when the advocates for the actual inspiration of every word of the Bible, will feel grateful that there are Christians who could find and show other and more substantial reasons for the credibility of the Scriptures.

The catalogue of examples might be increased to any extent; but from those given, it will not be doubted that a vast many others might be furnished. But as every one can perform this work for himself, their introduction will be dispensed with in this place. It will be sufficient to say, that all the general history of the Hebrews as a nation—the books called Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles, in the Old Testament—and all the historic parts and epistles of the New—could no more require the special interposition of the holy spirit to enable their respective authors to write them, than such assistance was requisite to the writing of the history of Rome, the American State papers, or the letters of Washington. And it is matter of peculiar satisfaction, to feel assured that this statement, so far from favoring the cause of unbelief, is directly calculated to remove one of the reasons of its existence. And since the inspiration of every part of the Bible is no where, in that book, made the subject of faith, the Christian should be careful so to regulate his creed, as not to incur the imputation of being wise above what is written.

It will probably be asked—and the question should be distinctly answered—if direct inspiration was not required in order to the confirmation of the particular writings named, in what part or particular was it necessary? The inspiration that appertains to the Bible, relates to the subject matter, instead of the style or manner of expression. This is obvious, from a comparison of the general style of composition employed by different prophets. That of the Psalms and of Isaiah, is immensely more lofty and engaging, than most of the others. Yet in all, there are particular parts in which the composition accords with the sublimity of the subject. It was then, the truth recorded which required the inspiration of God, and not the language in which the record was made. The language was one in common use, and each inspired writer was left to use it in his own peculiar way. And in its proper place we shall discover that this was by far the most suitable, both for those to whom the revelation was immediately sent, and for all after generations.

The special mission of Moses, for effecting the deliverance of the Hebrews from Egypt, presents an undoubted instance of a divine interposition. He was expressly inspired for that particular purpose, and in some instances, was instructed what words he should employ, as well as what miracles he should perform. But even here, with the exceptions named, he was left to use such language and forms of speech, as the occasion suggested. And the same remark applies, generally, to the whole of that extraordinary trust reposed in him, for bringing the Hebrews to the land of promise, and for giving them those remarkable institutions by which they were distinguished from all other nations. As a lawgiver, announcing the divine will, he adheres with punctilious exactness to the letter of his instructions. But as a man, he receives the advice of his friends, and speaks and acts as other men may be supposed to do under similar circumstances. And that he does so, is one very important evidence, that when he gave a system of moral rules for the benefit of his nation, they were, what they profess to be, given by inspiration of God.

The messages of the respective prophets, were also by divine inspiration. And the fact that they were actual prophecies of events, which for many successive ages have been gradually developing, is of itself evidence that they were dictated by the energy of the Deity. Man, by the mere unassisted powers of his own mind, is wholly incompetent to the task, which was certainly performed by the Jewish prophets—that of foretelling events with accuracy and certainty. The ample perception of a mind, which grasped a long and an immense concatenation of causes and consequences, is alone equal to such a work. And when we see it performed, we are constrained to believe that the influences of such a mind were felt by the men who looked through the involutions of human affairs, with the precision with which an astronomer, by the help of a telescope, penetrates the regions of space. But this did not affect the terms in which they communicated their predictions to mankind. They still used, and must necessarily use, the common language of their country, in making themselves intelligible to the great mass of the people; and in some instances, they employed others to write down the message which they delivered orally. The prophets were not always under the influence of prophecy—they lived and acted among men, and bore the character and sustained the relations common to other men. And in that character they neither needed nor ordinarily used the inspiration of which, at times, they were the distinguished recipients.

The whole life of Jesus, was one of continued and illustrious mental and moral illumination. From the moment of his public manifestation as a messenger from God, his conversation, his teachings, and his whole conduct, were of a character suited to the great objects of his mission. Every thing in relation to him, is fraught with the most striking and impressive tokens of the accompanying spirit and power of the divine presence. And there are the same evidences of the inspiration of God, in his words and in his works—in his life and in his death. In the apostles, the same general purposes were to be answered, and the work was to be carried on, as by their Master. And it was consequently necessary that they should receive the same divine aid. The gifts of the holy spirit of truth and power, were consequently imparted to them; and they exhibited its influence in the devoted zeal, the moral purity, the unbounded charity, the uncompromising fidelity, and the untiring labors of their lives. And yet, there are indications of something more human in their characters, than ever appears in the character of Christ; and there are times when they are plainly left to the dictates of common sense and common discretion, in the regulation of their conduct.

From these facts, it appears that it is sufficient for all the objects and requirements of Christian faith, to believe that the great principles and doctrines of truth contained in the Bible, were given by the inspiration of God; and that those persons who were made the instruments of their revelation to mankind, were also inspired for that purpose. But the Christian need not maintain the inspiration of every part—every word of the Bible. Because in some cases, it could not be necessary—in others it could not be credited if asserted—in some it is expressly disavowed—and it is in no instance required. And however painful it may be for some professors of the Christian faith, to yield up their belief in the universal inspiration of the Scriptures, they must do so for the sake of consistency. And when they have performed this duty, they will be able to defend, not only a revelation in general, but every part of the Bible, from the assaults of opposers.

In the meantime, unbelievers will discover that the ground of controversy is changed in relation to this subject. And they can neither sneer nor frown upon the Bible, when thus presented to their acceptance, nor successfully controvert the arguments for the inspiration of those truths, which human reason could not and did not discover, and which have greatly improved both the moral and social condition of man, in defiance of the corruptions which have been incorporated with their original principles.

CONSIDERATION OF THE WORKS OF GOD.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

From a consideration of the works of God, we gather facts which are of the utmost importance to the world of man—important, because they intimately relate to its welfare and its peace. In looking abroad over the visible creation, the considerate mind discovers innumerable evidences of the goodness, wisdom, and power of God—evidences, too, which can not be successfully contradicted. Had not God been infinite and impartial in goodness, it is certain that we should not have seen so grand a display of objects, every way calculated to interest and happily a world of human beings, and so completely adapted to the circumstances and situation of man, and so closely in harmony with his different senses, instincts and feelings; but we might have looked for an entirely different construction of the material universe and of the creation of objects, which, instead of adding to our enjoyment, would have made our existence one continued routine of pain—a curse instead of a blessing.

These remarks will apply to the wisdom as well as to the goodness of God; for, had not his wisdom been unerring, he might have failed in the plan of his creation, and precisely the same evils been brought into existence. But, for aught that we can discover in the diversified objects which surround us, God is infinitely wise and good. These attributes are seen displayed in the revolving seasons, and in the rolling year; they are whispered forth by the playful breezes, and by all the orbs and suns that revolve throughout the immensity of space; and if we will but open our eyes, and look around and about us, we shall see their evidences existing in every living and creeping thing—in the physical construction of our globe—in the wonderful and mysterious organization of human beings—in a word, we shall see displayed in every thing that exists, God's wisdom and goodness!

Not only are the goodness and wisdom of Deity manifested in the works of creation, but also his omnipotence. It were folly in us to suppose that God is not almighty in power—it is displayed in "an atom, and in a world"—and when we cast our eyes upward through space, and look around upon this world of ours, we are fully assured, that our Creator and Father is omnipotent—that the thunder of his power none can comprehend.

It is from a consideration of God's works, then, that we discover ample and abundant manifestations of his infinite goodness, wisdom, and power. These facts being undeniably true, we arrive at certain unavoidable conclusions. In the first place, God being unlimited and impartial in his benevolence, he must desire or will the ultimate, endless happiness of his children. In the second place, as his intelligence is infinite and unerring, the means which he will devise for its accomplishment, can not fail. And in the third place, as he is omnipotent—almighty in power—he will effect this great and glorious object.

These and like truths constitute a few of the many benefits which flow from a consideration of the works of God. By it we learn those things which concern us all—we gain a knowledge of the Most High, his glorious character and perfections. It strengthens our hope, and confirms our faith in the Christian religion. It serves in an eminent degree to do away all bigotry, superstition, and intolerance—to purify the mind from all gross superfluities—to give us reverential and devotional feelings, and to lead us to worship that God who is a spirit, in spirit and in truth.

Then let our minds be directed to a study and a contemplation of the works of Deity; and when we read in the volume of his revelation, of the great love which he has for his children, let us look around upon the wide-spread universe, and see this divine principle shining forth with immortal splendor, and diffusing life and joy through all the works of his hands. And whether we contemplate the glorious book of revealed truth, or the rich volume of nature, may gratitude to the great Author of our existence, be ever in our minds, and upon our tongues the triumphant exclamation—"As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord!"

CONFIDENCE IN THE RESURRECTION.

BY MISS ANN BARTLETT.

Spring had returned, and with it all its attendant blessings. The earth, obedient to the laws of the Creator, had arrived at that part of her orbit where she was constantly receiving the genial rays, as they emanated from the great dispenser of light and heat. The little rills that had been prohibited for months from pursuing their course, had now burst their icy environs, and as they meandered along the vale, seemed to welcome the return of Spring. The perennial forest, that had long slumbered in Winter's embraces, had already begun to bud and blossom, that it might again be clothed in beauty. Nature, true to herself, and that knows no abatement, was actively engaged in replenishing the earth with a variegated scene of beauty. The aerial songster was pouring forth notes of praise to its Creator—when death, the cruel spoiler, came, and laid its withering hand on a tender and beloved father—one whom I had long looked to for counsel and instruction. I mourned that death was in the land; but a voice from heaven assured me, that it was the only gate to true felicity: that although sorrow might endure for the night, yet joy should return in the morning. As I wept over the grave of my departed father, I said in mine heart, Shall he not live again? and a voice, as it were the voice of an angel, answered and said, he shall live again—although friends nor physicians could save his mortal body from the grave, yet when Christ appears, this mortal shall be changed to immortality, and he shall be received to a mansion of bliss, where death can no more sever the ties of friendship. And I rejoiced that God, who presides over the destinies of man, did not afflict willingly, but for our profit; that he had prepared a haven of rest for suffering humanity, where pain, sorrow, and death can have no admission. But, alas, death has re-visited our dwelling, and took from our fond embrace our only surviving parent, one that watched over our infantile days with all the care and tender solicitude that maternal love is capable of conceiving. As I gazed upon her lifeless form, the question came forcibly to my mind, Shall she not live again? and the same soft voice that had so recently pointed me to a risen Saviour, answered and said, Thy mother shall live again; this cold and lifeless form shall be reanimated and clothed in the rich habiliments of immortality, that shall never fade—that, when countless ages shall have rolled around, they shall not wax old by reason of age. In the language of an inspired writer, I can say, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which, according to his abundant mercy, hath begotten us again unto a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for us"—and I trust for all. Although God in his providence, has seen fit to sever the cords that so closely bound our hearts, yet will I trust in him. Yes, orphans, although their earthly parents may be torn from their fond embrace, may still feel that they have a Father in heaven, that never will forsake them.

"I'll trust the promise of his word
Till that triumphant hour,
When every creature shall be heard,
Ascribing praise and power."

VALUE OF ACTIONS.

Br. Smith's article on this subject, published a short time since in the columns of this valuable paper, suggested to me, what, I presume, is known to almost every one, viz., the great good that might be effected by proper actions, on the part of the laity of our denomination.

Universalists in general, are a reading and thinking people, and they have in their possession books, pamphlets, papers, etc., which, when put to a proper use, will certainly exert a great and powerful influence in removing errors, and in forming correct views of religion. We can certainly do as much, if not more, for the advancement of truth and righteousness, by private intercourse with opposing brethren, and circulating our papers among them, as we can by any other means whatever. Their prejudices often keep them from attending a Universalist meeting, and from hearing the doctrine, when they will read our papers and books with much satisfaction and profit. In this way the minds of hundreds have been set on a new train of ideas, old things have appeared different, new thoughts have rushed into the mind, and the Bible has seemed to change its language.

These are small things and easily done, and from this fact, many have supposed that the consequences are also small, and not worth our attention. But this is not the case. "In the great chain of events, some links appear to us great and prominent, others seem almost imperceptibly small and insignificant, yet the greatest depend upon the least, and the absence of one of the latter would produce an alteration in the whole depending series. The fate of an empire may depend on the fall of a pebble. To how great an extent has the condition of Europe been influenced by the life of one single individual! And by how many little incidents, from his infancy to the period when he commenced his public career, may his very existence have been effected. Every such incident, then, was connected with the present state of the nations of Europe, and by this, the future condition of the whole world."*

The actions of men in this age, may, and probably will have a moral bearing and influence on the latest age of the world. Therefore, when we act it should not be exclusively for the good of the present age and generation, but for the good of all, in all coming time. The consequences of one individual believing the truth and practising virtue, are frequently very great. A parent very naturally communicates his principles and practices to his children and those around him, and they, in their turn, to their children; and thus they may be communicated from parent to child, and borne down to the latest posterity. Take an illustration of this. Who can estimate the consequences of John Murray's embracing the truth and preaching it here in America? From the simple circumstance of one individual reading "Relly's Union" in Europe, thousands here in America, have been saved from the oppressive chains of superstition and ignorance. How many minds have been set free, by that truth which maketh free indeed! How many have rejoiced in the participations of that truth! And what a liberal and inquiring spirit has been diffused over community; and all these things we trace directly or indirectly back to the small circumstance already named.

I will trouble the patience of the reader with the relation of but one more example, showing that small circumstances are often attended with great consequences. An aged friend of mine was once travelling in Connecticut, and as he journeyed, a well appearing stranger fell in company with him. After the common ceremonies that usually pass between strangers, the conversation soon turned upon religious subjects. My friend being a Presbyterian, held to the doctrine of election, and put forth his strong reasons and Scripture in defence of the same. He was not much opposed by the stranger, but was asked if it would not be a source of great joy to him, to believe that all men would finally be saved? The reply was in the affirmative. Continued the stranger: "Could you not sing hallelujahs for such a work of mercy and grace?" "Yes, I could praise Him with all the powers of soul and spirit, and rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory." "Well, could you not love God?" "Yes, I could love him with all my mind, might, and strength." "Now," inquired the stranger, "what other religion is there in the world that can ever bless mankind?" Here they parted without learning each other's names; my friend going to Hartford, and the stranger to Springfield.

This short interview took place thirty years ago, but it was one not soon to be forgotten. That friend and his family are now Universalists, and the cause is to be attributed, in a great measure, to his interview with the stranger. These few questions constantly revolved in his mind, till his doctrine of election became deformed—there was not that consistency in it which he once saw as one of its prominent and beautiful features—it had lost all its charms, and he could no longer say that he had faith in it. He has seen the value of proper actions on the subject of religion, and he now practices them; and the consequences have been the salvation of many minds from error and delusion.

That friend has seen a great revolution in religious sentiments, such as no one anticipated years ago; he is now aged, but he can truly say, that his last days are his best ones, for the sun of eternal truth beams its light and glory upon his mind. The thoughts that God is his Father, and the Father of the universe, and that all mankind are his brethren, are sufficient to sustain him in the infirmities of age.

Let Universalists adopt the plan of circulating their papers among their neighbors, of inducing our opposers to attend church, and we shall soon see and feel more sensibly the value of actions.

FAITH.

In looking over an old number of the Magazine and Advocate, (vol. 6, No 15, page 117,) I noticed an article on faith, which suggested the propriety of a few remarks. It is there stated that "it is often said, by Limitarians, that Universalists do not believe their own doctrine." This statement is true to the very letter among too many professed Universalists. I know this is so. The reason why I know it, is, because I have positive evidence of it.

Faith is known (not guessed at,) by works. "Faith worketh by love and purifies the heart."

Many there are that say they believe Universalism, and make many pretensions, when at the same time their works tell a very different story. Yes, they affirm they love, respect, and really believe the doctrine; but what is the real truth of the case? The truth is, they tell a falsehood in making the declaration—a falsehood, too, that is calculated to injure the whole denomination. This is often the cause of the mistakes made by our opposers, in judging of our faith.—"For" say they, "they pretend to a great deal of charity and love to all men, when every day, almost, they are guilty of the most shameful violations of these virtues—therefore they have no real regard for them. They pretend to love God with all their hearts; when, at the same time, every thing sacred is held in total irreverence by them." By far too many instances of this description, have come under my own immediate observation; and that, too, among standing members of Universalist societies.

It is farther stated in the article referred to, that "no person on earth understandingly believes the doctrine of endless misery." To this I do not particularly object, but one thing about it is certain; they do believe it, (if I may be allowed to modify a word to suit my own convenience,) realizingly if not "understandingly." Let its hundreds of victims bear witness. I ask pardon of its Rev. Author for the liberty I have taken in mentioning his article. I do it not to find fault; for I agree with him as far as realities are concerned. But there is one thing in particular that I believe ought to be constantly kept in view in these matters—i. e. a distinction between realities and appearances. By this means the minds of many may be undeceived.

UNIVERSALISM IN OHIO.

Br. GROSS—The glorious cause of evangelical truth, is happily triumphing over error, bigotry, and superstition, in this part of the moral vineyard of our Master. I minister stately to respectable and constantly increasing congregations, in the following places—New London, Fitchville, Hartland, Milan, Berlin, and Florence, in Huron county; and in Brownhelm, Amherst, Henrietta, Carlisle, (west part,) and Huntington, in Lorain county. The field of my labors, you will perceive, is very extensive. "The harvest truly is plentiful, but the laborers are few." Will some of our brethren volunteer, and encounter, with me, the mud and mosquitoes of the literal wilderness—to aid in beautifying, by the displays of God's impartial grace in the plan of universal redemption, the moral wilderness? Come on, brethren; and "let the wilderness and the solitary place be glad for you, and the desert blossom as the rose." It is said "that a hint to the wise is sufficient." Is it not to the ardent lover of the cause of universal benevolence? Great pecuniary inducements, it is true, we cannot hold out at present. But the prospects are brightening. Let us have patience, at least, till "the pressure is over," and all will be well. Come, prepared to labor and suffer reproach, (the enemy is strong and malignant,) "trusting in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men; specially of those that believe."

Yours in the Gospel, H. P. SAGE.

BIGOTRY.

I have often thought that of all immaterial things bigotry is the most to be abhorred. Phillips' description of it would seem to justify this conclusion. But I have found one thing in the world that I abhor more, at present—that is, indolence, apathy, total indifference (call it what you please,) to the cause of benevolence and truth. Bigotry has one good quality, abstractly considered, though it is heedless and heartless—i. e. it possesses zeal or industry—while indolence seldom or never moves, and then only to somebody's disadvantage.

A GOOD MAN AMONG THE HEATHEN.

It may be presumed that almost all the readers of this paper, are aware of the arrogance and self-conceit of the Abrahamic race. Like some in our own day, they believed themselves especial favorites of Heaven; and the fruits of this egregious fallacy and spiritual self-conceit were not different at that distant period and in remote Jewry, from those which we witness, from the same stock, in our own age, and among our own people. Saucy-timoniousness, combined with a neglect of "the weightier matters of the law," bigotry or the malignant feelings in every variety of shade, and arrogant presumption in every unseemly form, were then, as now, the fruitage of a sentiment which has its root as much in a perverse moral taste, as in a beclouded understanding, and perhaps more than all, in utter ignorance of the real character of the Supreme—of Him whose sun shines, and whose showers fall upon all—of Him who sent his Son to be the Saviour—the Regenerator and Deliverer—of the world.

One form in which this sentiment displayed itself among the Jews, consisted in a despite, contempt, or hatred of all other nations. The reader of the New Testament is familiar with the phrase "publicans and sinners," or as it would be better rendered, "tax-gatherers and Heathens." Yes! they were the holy people, and all others, though the children of the same Father, were "sinners of the Gentiles"—that is, according to an Hebrew idiom, sinful Heathens.

We need not go beyond the limits of the original records of Christianity, to find among a people "totally depraved, wholly averse to all that is good," as the modern phrase is, or among "sinners," as the Jewish phrase was, instances of characters represented in a more amiable light, or spoken of in terms of stronger approbation, than are some of the Roman soldiers. It was a Centurion—or captain of a hundred—who at the crucifixion of Jesus gave that voluntary, heart-felt and honest testimony, "Truly, this was the Son of God!" It was a Centurion who generously preserved the life of Paul, when a proposition was made to kill him after his shipwreck on the island of Melita. It was a Centurion to whom Peter was sent by the express appointment of God, to make him the first convert among the Gentiles—"a just and devout man, one that feared God with all his house, that gave much alms to the people, and prayed to God always." And let the reader of this paper refer to Luke vii: 1-10, or Matt. viii: 5-13, and he will there find an exhibition of one who had many excellencies, and whose virtues had recommended him to the esteem of some of the more candid, even among that nation which despised all others. It is an interesting little story; and it is well worthy of having its incidents again impressed upon the mind.

Observe, among the excellencies of this "sinner," this Heathen, as the Jews contemptuously would call him, one not too common among the religious bigots of ancient or modern times—humanity.* Of this he gave sufficient proof in the concern which he manifested for the welfare of his menial, slave, or servant. Not so were many of the slaves of the Romans cared for. Too commonly were they treated with cold indifference and cruelty. Generally prisoners of war, they were obliged to labor to excess, to lodge in dungeons, to be loaded with chains, to be punished without reason, and, above all, to be deserted in sickness and

* "So contracted and exclusive in its modes of feeling is the human mind, that if we converse much and long on terrible or afflictive conceptions, and heartily surrender ourselves to the impression of certain appalling facts, it is not easy to avoid becoming sullenly indifferent to the present sufferings of mankind; as if it were of little moment what those are enduring in the present life, who must endure worse in the next. Not such were the sentiments of the Saviour of the world; no insensibility of this kind affected his human sympathies: He thought lightly of no pain or want that attaches to mortality; in firmity, or anguish, or hunger, he cared for and relieved." Fanaticism, page 322.

old age. Yet among a people exceedingly more barbarous than our present race of slave-holders, is an honorable instance of humanity and sympathy. He puts himself to the trouble of employing some worthy men among the Jews, to go to Jesus to intercede for him, as he was an alien, and when he sees Jesus coming, he goes to him personally to ask relief for his slave, who was "grievously tormented."

Again: observe the generosity of feeling which he manifested towards a subjugated enemy. The Jews had been for some time under the dominion of the Romans. Their country was a Roman province, and every where throughout the country were stationed companies and garrisons of Roman soldiery, to keep the people in subjection and prevent rebellion. Those who have read Roman history, well know that the governors and officers in conquered provinces, behaved with oppressive tyranny, with harshness, hauteur, and rapacity. Instead of building synagogues or temples, they were more apt to seize whatever was in them that could be converted into money. But here is an officer who exercises none of this haughty insolence and tyranny, but who sympathizes and assists a distressed people—"He loveth our nation, and hath built us a synagogue."

Again: observe the Centurion's humility. He was a Roman, and thought himself unworthy to address our Lord in person—twice, therefore, did he send worthy men among the Jews, to ask the favor for a stranger. How modest, diffident, fearful of giving offence! When he saw, or was told that Jesus was on his way to his house, he then came forth to meet him; but observe, it was only to entreat to trouble himself no farther, for such exalted ideas had the Centurion of the rank or dignity of Jesus, that he thought himself not worthy that the latter should come under his roof. A rare quality this is said to be among the Romans: among all nations an amiable one.

Lastly: observe the Centurion's faith, or as I should call it, his openness to conviction, or to the force of truth: "I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel." What was the state of matters in this respect, in Israel? The Jewish teachers had adopted the opinion that the kingdom which the God of heaven was about to set up, was to be of a temporal nature—a revival of the Jewish monarchy, with more than all its splendor in the days of Solomon; and the mass of the people—like many multitudes since, in other circumstances—passively imbibed the same opinion. (Of all labors, that of fearlessly and efficiently investigating the truth seems the hardest: is it not?) The kingdom which God did set up, and the Messiah or King whom he did send, were so different from their pre-conceived notions of what they should have been, that neither the blamelessness and beauty of his conduct, nor his speaking as never man spake before, nor the multitudinous and undeniable miracles which he performed, could make any, or but the slightest impression upon this prejudiced and deluded people. Because our Saviour's appearance did not correspond to their erroneous and preconceived idea of the Messiah—because he was not a triumphant prince, a temporal hero and deliverer; but, above all, because he upbraided them with their vices, and preached up repentance and reformation, every testimony that he could give of his divine authority and power, was rejected with scorn. In vain did he feed thousands with a handful of provisions; in vain did he send away diseases with a word; in vain did he make the graves give back their dead, rebuke the winds and the waves, and evil spirits still more unruly and obstinate than they. In answer to all this, they would say: "Is not this the carpenter's son? Does he not eat with publicans and sinners, and with unwashed hands? Does he not even break the Sabbath, by commanding sick men to carry their beds on that day?" Such were the unanswerable arguments of the blind leaders of the blind, against miracles and prophecy!

But the honest Centurion had no Judaical prejudices, and attends simply and with a single eye, to the facts before him. Having had confirmed to him by sufficient testimony, accounts of the spotless life and sublime doctrines of Jesus, and especially of his wondrous miracles, he yields his credence to such evidence. Having heard of his powers to remove diseases, he believes that Jesus can command them to leave the afflicted even at a distance. He believes the power of Jesus over diseases is greater than his own absolute authority over his soldiers. Such was the force of truth in an unprejudiced mind! If Jesus had never met among the prejudiced Israelites, with a single instance of the testimonials in his favor producing a conviction equal to that of the Centurion, need we be surprised at the slow progress of truth in overcoming certain prejudices in our day?

We conclude by noticing the effects of real goodness upon even the most inveterate prejudices. The Jews hated the Romans as a superior foe; and despised them as uncared for by God. Yet behold the elders—the most worthy men among the Jews—petitioning for a Roman, yes, a Roman soldier, and testifying that he was worthy: "So may we disarm the virulence of a party spirit, and conciliate the friendship of those, who otherwise might have their eyes upon us for evil!"

PROBATION.

While no subjects are more frequently discoursed upon by our Partialist friends, than those of free agency and probation, it appears to me that none are less understood. They are both pressed into the support of the doctrine of endless misery—that all-important fundamental in the Partialist creed.

It appears to be taken for granted, that this life is a state of probation—that we are placed here by our almighty Father, for the purpose of furnishing evidence to be brought out on a great trial, which will be held on human affairs, at the "last day"!! "Probation," (said a clergyman who delivered a discourse upon the subject, not long since,) "always pre-supposes a trial—a trial always pre-supposes a sentence—and hence the day of judgment and our eternal happiness or misery, are the necessary results of our probationary state!" The reader will readily see that all this is built upon the supposition that this life is a state of probation. My friend took this for granted. But would it not have been better, had the preacher first established the foundation upon which his superstructure was erected? In my humble opinion, nothing should be taken for granted in the discussion of important subjects, but that which is so self-evident as to admit of no dispute. It is the duty of every man who values consistency, when a system which treats of the dealings of God to man is proposed for his belief, to inquire whether it is consistent with the character and attributes of God, to act as that system represents him. For instance—God is almighty, all-wise, and all-good—consequently power, wisdom, and goodness, are his attributes, (and this need not be taken for granted either, for it is written upon every page in the great volume of nature, in his own hand-writing.) Now, when a system which acknowledges these to be his attributes, represents him as acting in direct opposition to them, one of two things is certain—viz.: either the system is false, or God is inconsistent with himself!! And there is, in this case, but one of two things for us to do—viz.: renounce the system, or renounce the convictions of our own reason! Alas, alas, how many have done the latter! How many have renounced their reason, and sacrificed it on the shrine of systems, which that reason would annihilate as the fogs and darkness of midnight are scattered by the morning sun!

Now, reader, the doctrine of probation, and the doctrine of endless misery, (the result of that probation to countless millions), are fundamentals in a system which acknowledges that God is good and just! How do they harmonize? Where is the wisdom or the goodness of forcing into existence a race of beings for the only purpose of ascertaining whether, in another state of being, they are fit to be made happy or miserable! Is it either wise or good to sport thus with the destiny of intelligent beings—beings possessed of a spirit which must date the duration of its existence co-extensive with the God who created it!

But, say the advocates of this system, "we are free agents—our destiny is in our own keeping—and whether we are saved or lost, depends upon ourselves." This, too, is taken for granted—and it is partially true: that is, it is true that, for a brief season, "we are clad with a little brief authority" over our own actions. "But when the body returns to the earth as it was, and the spirit to God who gave it," our power is at an end, and our future condition must depend on the character of the being into whose hands we have yielded up our lives. Now, if God possesses the character which we have supposed, (a character exhibited in his works every where,) he must delight in rendering his offspring happy—and what he delights in, I suppose no one doubts but he will do. But, if he has only allowed us a glimpse of the bright side of his character—if he has allowed his smiles to light only the brief period of mortal existence, and has reserved his frowns for eternity, then he alone knows what will be our destiny.

But, suppose we are, to a certain extent, free agents—and suppose we have abused our power—we cannot then be punished forever, for justice and mercy punish but to reclaim, and weep while that punishment is inflicted.

Suppose a little child should creep into the fire, would its father, should he stand by while it was writhing in agony, refuse to rescue it, because it was a "free agent," and might have kept out, if it pleased? Or, would such a plea screen him from the deserved stigma of being a cruel tyrant? Surely not. Every parental feeling would revolt at such a character, and would exert every faculty and every nerve, to rescue the little sufferer, and restore it to happiness and to health. Now, if human wisdom, human goodness, and human power would so unite to rescue one little child from misery and death, how much more will infinite wisdom, infinite goodness, and almighty power unite to rescue myriads of intelligent creatures who, but for his goodness, had never existed!

Away, then, with a system which ascribes to God a character which we should be ashamed to bear ourselves. And let us remember that a system which neutralizes the attributes of Jehovah, must be false, however plausible it may appear, or however high the authority by which it is supported.

VIRTUE.

There is no subject in the world which enlivens the mind or enlightens the understanding, more than the subject before us. It emanates from divine wisdom, is taught by all moral and religious beings, and is the very essence of social life. It was the principal object of our Saviour, throughout his short pilgrimage on earth, to promulgate and establish principles pure and undefiled, that happiness might increase as the moral faculties of the mind expanded. What can be more pleasing to mankind than the possession of this heavenly qualification, which flows bountifully from the source of all light, life, and wisdom? Virtue is the source of all happiness—the fount from whence flows all earthly bliss. When we contemplate the vast creation of intellectual beings, what inspires us with more pleasure than the virtuous mind, well stored with knowledge? It spreads around a halo of radiant light, while the smile of conscious innocence plays upon the countenance. What a difference between such a mind, and one that disregards the moral obligations due to the great Creator. When we reflect upon the happiness enjoyed by the virtuous, and the misery endured by those who are abandoned to the most vicious principles, what a contrast! The vicious lie down at night upon a bed of anguish, and awake to the misery of a guilty conscience; while the virtuous never lie down to sleep but to awake to joys unspeakable and full of glory. Oh, what rapturous sensations enliven the mind! How delightful—how pleasant the reflection, that virtue is the harbinger of all earthly comforts. It makes all nature lovely, all associations sublime, all affections endearing. Charity and love spring from this pure crystal fountain, and charm the beholder. Possessing this, we can contemplate Deity, the vast expanse of heaven, the innumerable myriads of angels shrouded in rays of celestial light, the glorious policy of redemption, the grand creation of mankind, a redeemed and renovated world, and the glories of immortality beyond the tomb. The imagination becomes exhausted, while revolving in the mazy labyrinths of futurity; and without virtue, we sink into nothingness before the pure gaze of Jehovah.

THE DEACON'S CONFESSION.

The following is a copy of a letter, verbatim et literalim, written by a deacon of a Calvinistic church, not fifty miles from Moriah, N. Y.

That the reader may see the gist of his acknowledgments, we remark, that the edgings (sides from boards) were brought about twelve miles—were clear stuff, worth at least twenty-five cents; and that the owner came very near chastising his children for using them before he received the deacon's letter. Could the deacon carry them twelve miles, without thinking they belonged to "any body?" Again: in sending the six cents pay, that "this little thing" might not be brought against him at the day of judgment, was he actuated by a love of justice, or by the narrow principle of selfishness and fear, thinking thereby to escape eternal misery? If the latter, he should have sent the full amount, as three-fourths of the little demand remains unpaid, and may be brought against him at that grand assize. After such a confession, was not his admonition to the owner of the boards, who was a Universalist, to prepare to meet his Judge in peace, rather supercilious and gratuitous?

I send this letter by request of some of your readers; and out of due respect for the author, give only the initials. Query—Might not the deacon have taken these "little things" (thinking the end would justify the means) that he might thereby have an opportunity to evince his piety and deep sense of justice, by making satisfaction, and also to send an admonition to the owner to "prepare to meet his Judge in peace"? K. H.

REMARKS.

Truly, this was a season of rejoicing to the souls of many who were present on this happy occasion. The congregations were large and attentive. Strangers were received by our friends in Perry, with a most cordial welcome; and even those of a different faith, seemed willing to extend to us many civilities. By them we were invited to share in those temporal blessings, which kind Heaven had bestowed upon them. And for this manifestation of their Christian charity they have our unfeigned gratitude.

In our Council, harmony prevailed. By the delegates from the different societies within the limits of this Association, we learned that the cause of truth was onward—that bigotry was dying away, and, consequently that our prospects are changing indeed. May it ever be so. May the flood-tide of truth divine roll onwards, bearing away every vestige of a doubt, darkness, error and superstition, until a world of intelligences shall rejoice in the knowledge of God and the Lamb.

UTICA, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 8, 1837.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

The annual examinations and exhibitions of both departments of this excellent institution, took place last week. I had the pleasure of being present on Tuesday evening, at the ladies' exhibition, and on Wednesday afternoon at that of the young men. Of the examinations I saw little or nothing, and am too little versed in some of the branches studied to give an opinion had I been there; but from those qualified to judge, I learn that they were creditable alike to pupils and teachers.

The following is the order of performances at the female exhibition—the music, that of the piano.

Music.—Battle of Prague, J. E. Barker, Clinton.

ORIGINAL COMPOSITIONS.—Earth a Scene of Improvement and Pleasure, C. Willard, Whitestown. Hope, H. Wilson, Vernon. Dreams, H. Halleck, Clinton.—Burning of Buffalo, M. Smith, Williamsville. The "Far West," E. Curtiss, Clinton. Reminiscences, J. E. Barker, Clinton. Knowledge is Power, C. Smith, Williamsville.

Music.—Song, M. A. Knapp, Wisconsin T. French Song, J. E. Barker. "Fairy Favors"—A Dialogue, by C. P. Willard and H. Coe, Conn. "The Spanish Lovers," S. Pond, Clinton. "Dialogue," M. A. Knapp, C. L. Barker, Clinton. Music.—Cottage Rondo, E. Parmelee, Clinton. Song, J. E. Barker, Clinton.—Colloquy Mademoiselle, H. Wilson; Miss Douglass, J. E. Barker. Obligations, Miss Hamilton, L. P. Woodruff, Watertown; Miss Davis, E. Curtiss; Miss Woodbridge, C. P. Willard. Music.—Canadian Boat Song, J. E. Barker, M. Woodruff, H. Wilson. Sportman's Rondo, M. A. Knapp. French Extract, C. Smith. "The Lady of the Castle," E. Curtiss. "Who loves me best?" C. E. Barker. Music.—Duet, M. Smith—J. Owen, Onondaga. Song, M. A. Knapp.

ORIGINAL COLLOQUY.—Music.—Duet, M. A. Knapp—J. E. Barker.

Of these performances I have not room to speak as their respective merits deserve—nor is there much room for special commendation, when all did well. But a few general remarks can therefore be offered.

The original compositions were written in chaste, beautiful and appropriate style. If any deficiency could be named, it would be that the retiring modesty of the writers prevented a fuller manifestation of the depth of feeling which the subjects would naturally cause to breathe in the harmonious periods. They were read with unaffected ease and propriety—the more astonishing, as a densely and uncomfortably packed audience in a sultry evening, not only heated the air, but necessarily caused some noises sufficient to have discommoded and embarrassed older and more practiced speakers. My own taste would have preferred a less subdued tone and a more diversified manner of reading; for however good the model, and however closely followed, an imitation is but a copy after all—and the best education is that which develops the powers according to the peculiarities which individualize and characterize one mind from another. The manner cultivated in accordance with these mental characteristics, will be easiest to the speaker, more enduring, more effective, and more pleasing even if rather inferior, than the most polished artificial manner that can be practiced.

The air of the Free Church having lost its elasticity by the heat, and the breathing of a crowd twice too large for the room, the music of course lost much of its vivacity and spirit-stirring power. Even the insensible, unpalpating and unbreathing instrument was affected thereby. The singers and performers deserve, therefore (and I believe obtained,) the greater credit from good judges (among whom I dare not class myself), for their scientific skill and execution. Were I to particularize, ten to one but I would pick out the simplest air, and the most artless performer, and so ruin my reputation among connoisseurs; so, for my own sake, I beg leave to look wise and say nothing.

In the recitations and colloquies, the naturalness of the speakers, was most manifest. The solemn or serious tone—the tender inflections of the voice—the brisk manner, the arch look—all were in perfect keeping with the sentiments expressed. It appeared as if the audience were gone, and the speakers were actors on the stage of real life. The by-play, particularly, kept up the charming illusion. The debate in the last colloquy was too long, by two disputants on each side, and had the speakers ever peeped into the basement story of the Universalist meeting house in this city, I might have supposed they were caricaturing some of our young Bereans in "sticking to the question" in debate. The "Miss President" proved a *mis*president in keeping order, as some other presidents before her have done. "Who loves me best," by a lisping little girl, aged about seven years, thrilled alternately over every chord of natural affection in the human heart, and closed at last in the full diapason of reverence, adoration and gratitude to our heavenly Father, "who loves us best," and first, and forever! I think I do not misrepresent the long drawn breath of the hearers, as her solemnly cheering tones died away on the listening ear, concluded by her artless courtesy to the pleased congregation. But I must not indulge in these minute descriptions, as the gentlemen deserve a notice on my limited sheet.

The dense, heated and incommoded crowd—many of whom stood during the whole evening, bearing their own and others' burdens—the consequent changes of position and stir of some in the house, and the vacant laughter and brainless, loud but small, chat of some (supposed to be little boys, but might have been large ones) outside of the doors—were drawbacks on the pleasures of the audience; but did not, for a moment, appear to disturb the serenity and attention of our fair entertainers. The evening closed without a single failure or accident to mar the joy with which memory will delight to dwell, in after years, upon the bright and cheering anniversary.

On Wednesday afternoon, the young men of the Institute proceeded with their exhibition, (also in the Free Church) in the following order—the music by the band from this city.

Music.—Prayer by the Principal, Rev. C. B. Thummel. Music.—Prologue, James S. Hart. Oration.—Characteristics of Greatness, J. S. Kibbe. Music.—German Oration—Pride, Jeremiah Karker. Oration.—Happiness founded on Moral and Intellectual Improvement, H. B. Soule. The Yankee's Narration, J. S. Torrance. Music.—Oration—Decay, John Snow.—Oration—Prosperity of our Country, George Lord.—Laudatory Oration of Myself, James S. Hart. Music.—Oration—Duties of American Youth, A. P. Willard.—Oration—American Character, J. T. Goodrich. Colloquy—Podology.—W. H. Griswold, Author, G. Lord, J. M. Elwood, O. M. Sheldon, Lynchers, etc. Music.—Eulogy—Patrick Henry, Joseph Clowes. Oration.—Instability of Human Greatness, P. R. Case. Harangue.—Blessings of Intemperance, H. D. Hall. Music.—Poem—Christianity, J. M. Elwood. Oration—Association, and Valedictory, F. J. Warner. Music.

The pieces, I believe, are all original—the recitations by the speakers themselves, and evinced not only a high order of literary talent, or verbal discrimination and ease; but also a profundity of reflection, analysis, and a range of chastened ideality and justness of feeling which does high honor to their understandings, moral sentiments and affections. If I were to select in a matter where tastes are so various, and where the selection may depend, perhaps, on the subject as much as on the style or manner of treating it—or on the manner of the speaker as much as on either—I would particularize as among the especial where all is very good, the Orations on Decay, the Duties of American Youth, American character,

Association, and the Valedictory, and the principal portions—very nearly the whole of the colloquy. The German oration appeared to be good; but sitting behind the speaker, and his pronunciation of some words not exactly fitting my ear, I lost now and then a portion of it. The Yankee's narrative was rather gross in some of its expressions, for some of the young ears that heard it—I am sorry to say that they were unnecessarily so, as the speaker was fully able to do the character justice without them. Though few, and only slightly offensive, they destroyed the pleasure the numerous excellent jokes and genuine wit and humor imparted. And after all, the fault may have been in myself; for others, older and wiser than I, seemed to relish it much, and approve it highly. So I can judge but for myself: I would rather have my children hear it without, than with those expressions. The subject for examination by the Podologist and Phrenologist, was ably, admirably delineated—one of the best that ever graced a farce or comedy—and whether its merits are to be ascribed to the author or the performer, I cannot determine. One is certainly much indebted to the other, and all who heard it, to both. The valedictory was touching—affectingly so, and I think the solemn injunction to buffet the waters of political strife and public prejudice and error, in search of truth, and to gain it, or perish in the effort, was responded to by every one addressed. But why particularize?—all was good as a whole—much of it very good; for I have pointed out all faults I noticed—even some that others may deem to be no faults at all. And the day closed as pleasantly, so far as the exhibition was concerned, (for the weather was rainy,) as heart could wish—and by this time, those bright eyes, smiling countenances, heaving hearts, and improving minds are far divided—some, until they meet in more enduring joys and affection in their Father's home above.

The house was not so crowded as on the preceding evening, and the air in the house was cooler; but towards evening, those from a distance going out, and no provision having been made to keep some little boys quiet in the intervals between the music, (all they cared to hear,) the young men were not without a little—and but a little share of noise. Should they—as is now suggested by some—hold their exhibition in the forenoon, after this, perhaps even this very trifling evil may be abated. Though as long as a house is crowded, there will be slight occasional bustle and stir.

The vacation will continue until the first Monday in October next.

SLAVERY AN EVIL.

I notice by the Banner that the Massachusetts Convention of Universalists negatived a resolution introduced by Br. B. B. Mussey, of Boston, declaring slavery to be an evil! Is it possible? There must be something in such a vote more than meets the eye. Surely our brethren in Massachusetts can not believe that slavery is not an evil, when they have the testimony of all God's works and revelations, and of all man's experience and reasonings against them. Every Southern man of intelligence unites in declaring it such—history on every page affirms it—every document put forth by our republican governments, from the declaration of Independence down to the bills of rights and the laws of the land, affirm it to be an evil. Jefferson, Madison—indeed all statesmen declare it such. Our revolutionary struggle, and the war we now wage with mental and spiritual bondage, declare slavery to be an evil. It can not be that the resolution above named was voted down, because it was deemed false in its statement. If it was, then are our Massachusetts brethren indeed ignorant like of the principles of Christianity and republicanism, and richly deserve the cutting rebuke which John Randolph, himself a slave holder, once gave to a northern member of Congress who attempted to justify slavery on moral and political grounds—"From my soul I despise any man who will attempt to prove slavery to be right!"

As to the remedy for the evil, that is another subject—and one on which much difference of opinion may well exist. But that an effectual remedy will at last be found and adopted by the South, I can not doubt—nor do I fear it will be the fatal and terrible one which Mr. Jefferson dreaded. As sure as it is an evil, it will be removed—and I do not believe any body of honest and intelligent men can be found to declare it not one—although appearances would seem to denote that the Massachusetts Convention did declare so. NEW-YORK MIRROR.

The last number of this popular periodical has come to us, with the intellectual countenance of our sweetest and best of poets, Mr. Bryant, beaming upon us in its front. His chirography we commend to the notice and imitation of all who write for the press—it will make the heart of the compositor warm with affection towards the Ms. The Yellow Domino, by Marryat is a peculiarly involved and complicated plot—well developed, and full of interest. The description of the rivers Hudson, Mohawk, Chenango and Susquehanna (not with a final h) by Mr. Willis, is well and correctly drawn. It is a pity he broke off with the latter at Owego—he was just beginning to enter the vestibule of its mingled and varied majesty and beauty. Let him travel onward, and he will find it even so. He missed also, a portion of placid beauty, between Binghamton and the Otsego lake. The imposition of some of our citizens passing off the regular stage for an “exclusive extra,” and charging an extra price for it, is patiently borne. Such things are a shame to those who practice them. Taken all in all, we think the Mirror supports very well its ancient and well established reputation—and surrounded as it is with competitors for public favor, it will require continued exertion to keep its place among them. Smith, of Clinton, has received and accepted an invitation to become the pastor of the Universalist Society in Albany, and will remove there in the course of the Fall—probably before the 1st November. This would have been noticed earlier, but that the consummation was so distant—and not so early, but that some of our papers have noticed that his removal would be in September—the present month.

A memorandum of items for the Record has been mislaid; if any thing is omitted, I will be thankful for the necessary information. A. B. G.

UNITED STATES CONVENTION.

The Delegates from this State are, Brs. Job Potter, A. B. Grosh, G. W. Montgomery, and C. F. Lefevre, Ministers; B. Ellis New-York, P. P. Hayes, Poughkeepsie; S. Van Schaack, Albany; E. S. Barnum, Utica; David Brown, Oxford; and William Berry, Homer; laymen. Those who can not attend and can find trustworthy persons who will attend, had better appoint their several substitutes in season. When the delegation meets in Philadelphia, they will have power (by the minutes of our State Convention) to fill all vacancies by selecting such persons from this State as may be present, and as they deem proper.

The names are published, and these remarks made, in order to remind those who may be forgetful in such matters. The time is at hand for action. A. B. G.

BOOKS.

We have often resolved (but for reasons of delicacy, and regard to the cause have refrained from saying) that we must utterly cease from sending any books out on commission. The risk attending parcels, the loss of a chance to sell them at home, our deficiency of capital and the necessity of keeping within bounds, and also keeping our little stock within our entire and immediate control—these and other reasons compel us to refuse from this time forth, sending any books to any person on commission.—

Those who have lately sent us orders, will please write again, and order only what they are willing to purchase.

It is with reluctance we take this stand, but we must do it, or by the embarrassment a contrary course would involve us in, run the risk of “stopping payment.” It would require a capital of many thousands to supply all orders for books on commission—and a heavy profit to meet the loss of having books returned on our hands, after the time for selling them at home had gone by. A. B. G.

The proceedings of the Niagara, Allegany, and Chautauque Associations will appear in our next. I regret that through my inability to think of and remember every thing in its proper time, the two former were not sooner published—especially as, in relation to the first, Br. Hammond has seen proper not only to address me a friendly note, (for which I thanked him in our last,) but also to punish me by a tart public notice of my delinquency in the Herald of Truth at the same time—for which latter I can not feel thankful, deeming it an act of supererogation. One was sufficient—at least until he knew the first would not be attended to. A. B. G.

CONCERT.

The Universalist Musical Association connected with the Universalist society in this city, intend giving a Concert of Sacred Music in the Universalist meeting-house in Utica, on Thursday evening, September 14th. The proceeds of the Concert will be devoted to defraying the expenses of the Choir, salaries of the leader, organist, etc.

Those who have lately attended our meetings in this city, and noticed the improvement of our choir under the efficient care and labors of Mr. Lane, need not be informed that the musical treat here proposed will be worth their patronage; and when we add that several other eminent vocalists will be added to the choir in the concert, we feel certain no lover of good sacred music, well and properly performed by well attuned voices and instruments, will willingly remain absent on the occasion; especially as there will be a full moon about that time, to light them to the feast of sweet sounds. A. B. G.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

DISAPPOINTMENT.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

"The pitcher, broken at the fountain." Eccl. xii: 6.

A child of bright and laughing eye,
With dimpled arm upraised,
Upon a tempting rose, hung high,
With eager wishes gazed.

A gracious zephyr bent it down—
He grasped it with a shout;
But ere he called the flower his own,
Its leaves all scattered out!

A youth a gentle maiden loved,
With truth and constancy;
And every passing year, but proved
His love's intensity.

The very eve that would have made
That gentle girl his bride—
Just when the sky began to fade—
That very eve, she died!

A warrior in the pride of life,
With glory for his boast,
Went forth in steel, to join the strife,
And slay a mighty host.

Before his comrades' rushing steeds,
The vanquished army flies;
That proud one heeds it not, but bleeds
Low on the ground—and dies!

An old man looked upon his son,
Robust in youth and health;
He was his first, his only one,
The heir of all his wealth.

That son disgraced the father's name,
And drank the fiery cup;
Guilt of a darker dye than shame,
Soon filled the measure up!

O! why not give these lessons heed,
Nor future blessings count?
For oft the "pitcher" will indeed,
"Be broken at the fount!"

Shirley village, Mass.

THE WORLD TO COME.

If all our hopes and all our fears
Were prisoned in life's narrow bound;
If, travellers through this vale of tears,
We saw no better world beyond;
O! what could check the rising sigh?
What earthly thing could pleasure give?
O! who would venture then to die—
Or who would venture then to live?

Were life a dark and desert moor,
Where mists and clouds eternal spread
Their gloomy veil behind, before,
And tempests thunder overhead;
Where not a sunbeam breaks the gloom
And not a floweret smiles beneath,
Who could exist in such a tomb—
Who dwell in darkness and in death?

And such were life without the ray
Of our divine religion given;
'Tis this that makes our darkness day,
'Tis this that makes our earth a heaven!
Bright is the golden sun above,
And beautiful the flowers that bloom,
And all is joy, and all is love,
Reflected from the world to come! BOWRING.

PIETY OF THE NEZ PERCES INDIANS.

The following extract is taken from Washington Irving's Rocky Mountains. Some who make the loudest professions of piety would do well to practice some of the virtues of these uncultivated inhabitants of the forest.—After describing the resignation which they manifested while suffering from hunger, to which the whole camp had been unfortunately reduced, the writer says:

"The necessities of the camp at length became so urgent, that Captain Bonneville determined to despatch a party to the Horse prairie, a plain to the North of his cantonment, to procure a supply of provisions. When the men were about to depart, he proposed to the Nez Percés that they, or some of them, should join the hunting party. To his surprise, they promptly declined.—He inquired the reason for their refusal, seeing that they were in nearly as starving a situation as his own people. They replied that it was a sacred day with them, and the Great Spirit would be angry should they devote it to hunting. They offered, however, to accompany the party if it would delay its departure until the following day; but this the pinching demands of hunger, would not permit, and the detachment proceeded.

A few days afterwards, four of them signified to Captain Bonneville that they were about to hunt. 'What!' exclaimed he, 'without guns or arrows; and with only one old spear? What do you expect to kill?' They smiled among themselves, but made no answer. They prepared for the chase with a natural piety that seems to have been edifying to the beholders. They performed some religious rites, and offered up to the Great Spirit a few short prayers for safety and success; then having received the blessings of their wives, they leaped upon their horses and departed, leaving the whole party of Christian spectators amazed and rebuked by this lesson of faith and dependence on a supreme and benevolent Being. 'Accustomed,' adds Captain Bonneville, 'as I had heretofore been, to find the wretched Indian reveling in blood, and stained by every vice which can degrade human nature, I could scarcely realize the scene which I had witnessed. Wonder at such unaffected tenderness and piety, where it was least to have been sought, contended in all our bosoms with shame and confusion, at receiving such pure and wholesome instructions from creatures so far below us in all the arts and comforts of life.' The simple prayers of the poor Indians were not unheard. In the course of four or five days they returned, laden with meat. Captain Bonneville was curious to know how they had attained such success with such scanty means. They gave him to understand that they had chased the heads of buffalo at full speed, until they tired them down, when they easily despatched them with the spear, and made use of the same weapon to flay the carcasses. To carry through their lesson to their Christian friends, the poor savages were as charitable as they had been pious, and generously shared with them the spoils of their hunting; giving them food enough to last for several days.

A further and more intimate intercourse with this tribe, gave Captain Bonneville still greater cause to admire their strong devotional feeling. 'Simply to call these people religious,' says he, 'would convey but a faint idea of the deep hue of piety and devotion which pervades their whole conduct. Their honesty is immaculate, and their purity of purpose, and their observance of the rites of their religion, are most uniform and remarkable. They are, certainly, more like a nation of saints than a horde of savages.'

In fact, the antibelligerent policy of this tribe, may have sprung from the doctrines of Christian charity, for it would appear that they had imbibed some notions of the Christian faith from Catholic missionaries and traders who had been among them. They even had a rudimentary calendar of the fasts and festivals of the Roman Church, and some traces of its ceremonies. They have become blended with their own wild rites, and present a strange medley; civilized and barbarous. On the Sabbath, men, women and children array themselves in their best style and assemble round a pole erected at the head of the camp. Here they go through a wild fantastic ceremonial; strongly resembling the religious dance of the shaking Quakers; but from its enthusiasm, much more striking and impressive. During the intervals of the ceremony, the principal chiefs, who officiate as priests, instruct them in their duties, and exhort them to virtue and good deeds.

'There is something antique and patriarchal,' observes Captain Bonneville, 'in this union of the offices of leader and priest; as there is in many of their customs and manners, which are all strongly imbued with religion.'

The worthy captain, indeed, appears to have been strongly interested by this gleam of unlooked for light amidst the darkness of the wilderness. He excited himself, during his sojourn among this simple and well-disposed people, to inculcate, as far as he was able, the gentle and humanizing precepts of the Christian faith, and to make them acquainted with the leading points of its history; and it speaks highly for the purity and benignity of his heart, that he derived unmixed happiness from the task.

'Many a time,' says he, 'was my little lodge thronged, or rather piled with hearers, for they lay on the ground one leaning over the other, until there was no further room, all listening with greedy ears to the wonders which the Great Spirit had revealed to the white man. No other subject gave them half the satisfaction, or commanded half the attention; and but few scenes in my life remain so freshly on my memory, or are so pleasantly recalled to my contemplation, as these hours of intercourse with a distant and benighted race in the midst of the desert.'

FALSE PATRIOTISM.

"It is a natural and a generous impulse of nature to love a country which gave us birth, by whose institutions we have been moulded, by whose laws defended, and with whose soil and scenery innumerable associations of early years, of domestic affection and of friendship have been formed. But this sentiment often degenerates into a narrow, partial, exclusive attachment, alienating us from other branches of the human family, and instigating to aggression on other States. In ancient times, this principle was developed with woful energy, and sometimes absorbed every other sentiment. To the Roman, Rome was the universe.—Other nations were of no value but to grace her triumphs, and illustrate her powers, and he, who in private life, would have disdained injustice and oppression, exulted in the successful violence, by which other nations were bound to the chariot wheels of this mistress of the world. This spirit still exists. The tie of country is thought to absolve men from the obligations of universal justice and humanity. Statesmen and rulers are expected to build up their own country at the expense of others; and in the false patriotism of the citizen, they have a security for any outrages, which are sanctioned by success."

CHANNING.

DEATHS.

In Victor, on the 25th of August, CAROLINE M., wife of William C. Dryer, and daughter of Thomas Wright, aged 22 years. Mrs. Dryer was very extensively known, and wherever best known most highly esteemed. Possessed of a remarkably meek and quiet spirit, she discharged the duties of a wife, daughter, sister, neighbor and friend in such a manner as to secure the approbation of all.

She bore the pains of a lingering consumption with the fortitude and resignation of a Christian, and met death with a firm confidence in a blessed immortality for the great human family. Her husband, her parents, her relatives, in short all of us have sustained an irreparable loss, a loss which they deeply feel and will ever remember.

On the day following, which was Sunday, the funeral services were performed by the writer, and the immense concourse which attended on the occasion filled our large meeting-house in every part to overflowing. May the blessings of the Almighty richly rest upon the bereaved relatives, and may the excellent example of our deceased friend be long remembered, stimulating all to a proper discharge of the duties and obligations of life. K. T.

In Newark, Wayne county, on the 13th of July, MISS SAMANTHA FORD, aged 22 years.

The deceased was a peculiarly amiable and interesting young lady, and had endeared herself to a large circle of friends, who deeply mourn her early departure.

She bore her sickness with exemplary patience, and her decline and departure were cheered by an unwavering and steadfast confidence in the final salvation of all mankind. This faith robbed death of its terrors and disarmed him of his sting, and enabled her peacefully to resign her spirit to her Creator. After request the writer attended her funeral on the 20th of July, and a large circle of acquaintances and friends united with the sorrowing relatives in performing the sad offices of respect.

May our lives be as blameless as hers, our departure as peaceful, and our deaths as triumphant. K. T.

ANOTHER SOLDIER OF THE REVOLUTION HAS GONE.—In Victor, on the 19th of July last, Mr. JAMES HILL, a soldier of the revolution, aged almost 84 years. On the Sabbath following, a discourse adapted to the occasion was preached by the writer, in the Universalist meeting-house in Victor. May God bless the relatives of the deceased, and enable them to copy all the virtues of their aged relative. K. T.

A SHORT SERMON ON THE SONSHIP OF CHRIST.

BY REV. JOHN GREGORY, MONTPELIER, VT.

"I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God" Acts viii: 37.

Universalists as a denomination, believe in the Sonship of Christ. They are, therefore, Unitarians in this respect. But they do not think it necessary to make it the great point in almost every discourse, to prove what is so plainly set forth in the Bible, viz., that "Jesus Christ is the Son of God." Our preaching, therefore, differs from the preaching of the Unitarians. Their greatest aim is to prove the Sonship of Christ. Ours, that Jesus will make an end of sin, and bring in everlasting righteousness. We think the question whether all men are finally to be made holy and happy, is of all others, the most important subject that ever engrossed the attention of mankind. On it hangs the eternal weal or woe of a world of intelligent beings. I never could see the importance of endeavoring to prove, every Sunday, that three are more than one, and one less than three, and keeping the people in the dark upon every other subject. It is a common remark, that you may sit under the preaching of Unitarians, year after year, and you will not be able to ascertain their true sentiments in relation to man's final destiny. Now men will not always be put off in this way. They are inquiring beings, and will not consent to remain in the dark.

If men are on the broad road to hell, for mercy's sake, cry aloud and warn them of their danger. Speak out with a voice as loud!

"As the eternal thunders of the deep," and wake up the human family from their stupid lethargy! If heaven is their final home and everlasting resting place, oh, let us inform them of that fact, that they may spend their days in happiness and peace.

"Man wants but little here below, Nor wants that little long."

But he will not be satisfied, unless firmly convinced in his own mind that all will be well with him, after passing these shores of time. If there be no such place in the universe of God as an endless hell, and if salvation be the happy portion of every son and daughter of Adam's race, we cannot be too zealously engaged in publishing such sentiments to the world. But these are questions never discussed by Unitarians. They may feel justified in the course they have taken. Perhaps they are, but "we have not so learned Christ." We are commanded to proclaim salvation to the children of men. The angel of God set us an example. "Fear not, for behold I bring you glad tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people." I propose, however, at this time, to test the doctrine of the trinity by the light of revelation.

"I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God." This brief but comprehensive confession of faith, was made by the Ethiopian, preparatory to his receiving baptism. As he was riding in his chariot, reading the Scriptures concerning the humiliation of Christ, he found favor with God, who sent the apostle Philip to be his instructor. Taking for his text the passage which he found the eunuch reading, "Philip preached unto him Jesus." And as they passed on their way, they came into a certain water; and the eunuch said, "See, here is water, what doth hinder me to be baptized?" And Philip said, "If thou believest with all thine heart thou mayest." The answer was, "I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God." The noble man was then baptized. Here we have the confession of faith that caused Philip to baptize the eunuch. Hence, we have the following doctrine, "Jesus Christ is the Son of God."

Many are the instances in Scripture in which Christ is called the Son of God. And in still more instances God, the God of Israel, is emphatically called the Father of Christ. We have no authority for understanding the words Father and Son only in the most proper sense. There is not the slightest intimation in the Bible, but what Christ is as really and personally the Son of God, as Isaac was the son of Abraham. Christ is called "God's own Son," "His only Son," "the only begotten Son," and "the only begotten of the Father." This language settles the point, and places the doctrine of the Sonship of Christ beyond the least possible doubt. Strange, indeed, that professing Christians, are not willing to take these plain declarations of Scripture, without attempting to look up some figurative or allegorical meaning to this language!

Did the prophets of the Old Testament, know anything about the mysterious puzzle of the holy trinity? That God existed in three persons? Let us examine the declaration of Moses. "O Lord God, destroy not thy people and thine inheritance, which thou hast redeemed through thy greatness, which thou hast brought forth out of Egypt, with a mighty hand. Remember thy servants, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Look not at the stubbornness of this people, to their wickedness, nor to their sin, lest the hand which broughtest us out say, because the Lord was not able to bring them unto the land which he promised them, and because He hated them, He hath brought them out to slay them in the wilderness. Yet they are thy people and thine inheritance, which thou broughtest out by thy mighty power, and by thy stretched out arm." In this prayer of Moses, recorded in Deut. ix, God is addressed as one person only. The song of praise, sung by Moses and the children of Israel after passing the Red Sea, shows what ideas they had on the subject before us. "I will sing unto the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously, the horse and the rider, hath he thrown into the sea; the Lord is my strength and my song, and he has become my salvation. He is my God, and I will prepare him an habitation; my father's God, and I will exalt him. The Lord is a man of war: The Lord is his name." Ex. xv. Now if a "man" is but "one person" only, God is here represented as but one person. All the prayers and songs recorded by the prophets are similar to those we have quoted. Consequently, we have testimony that Moses, at least, was not a trinitarian. He knew nothing of a "three-one-God," or a "triune God." The modern "three-one-God," has been invented since his day.

The book of Psalms, contains prayers and songs unto the God of Israel. From them we can learn whether the Jewish church had heard of such a being as "God in three persons." "Give ear to my words, O Lord; consider my meditation—hearken unto the voice of my cry, my kingdom, my God; for unto thee will I pray. My voice shalt thou hear in the morning, O Lord, in the morning will I direct my prayer unto thee, and look up. For thou art not a God that hath pleasure in wickedness, neither shall evil dwell with thee." Ps. v: 1-14. "I will praise thee, O Lord, with my whole heart. I will show forth all thy marvellous works! I will be glad and rejoice in thee. I will sing praise unto thy name, O thou Most High." Ps. ix: 12. In the one hundred and tenth Psalm the Messiah is brought to view, not as a person of the one God, but as one whom Jehovah would exalt. "The Lord said unto my Lord, sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool."

Thus we discover that in every prayer and song of praise, the Deity is addressed or spoken of as one person, only. The Messiah is always mentioned as a person distinct from Jehovah; as much so, as Isaac is mentioned as a being distinct from Abraham. The language of Christ himself, in relation to his dependence on God, is proof positive of his Sonship. "If I honor myself, my honor is nothing. It is the Father who honoreth me, of whom, (said he to the Jews,) ye say that he is your God." John viii: 54. "I can of mine own self do nothing." John v: 30. "The Son can do nothing of himself." John v: 19. "All things are delivered unto me of my Father." Matt. ix: 20. "He hath given to the Son to have life in himself." John v: 26. "I have power to lay down my life, and power to take it again. This commandment have I received of my Father." John x: 18. Do not these sayings of Christ prove to a demonstration that all his sufficiency was by the indwelling, and by the gift of God—and that he received his power from his heavenly Father, without whom he could do nothing?

Again—the language of Scripture proves the Sonship of Christ, by his exaltation. We read—"Who endured the cross despising the shame,"—that "he is forever to sit down at the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens." Likewise that "God hath made that same Jesus, whom the Jews crucified, to be both Lord and Christ." That "God hath exalted him to be a Prince and a Saviour." "Given him all power in heaven and in earth"—and "committed all judgment unto the Son, that all men should honor the Son, even as they honor the Father," who himself says to the Son, "Thy throne, O God, is forever and ever." John saw "ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands," paying honor to the Son of God, "saying with a loud voice, Worthy the Lamb that was slain." And every creature in heaven, earth and sea, was heard to exclaim, "Blessing, and honor, and power, unto him that sitteth on the throne forever and ever." All of which harmonises with Paul's Epistle to the Philippians, 2d chapter, "Wherefore God hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth, and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." In this account Christ is spoken of as a being distinct from God; and consequently the Sonship of Christ is proved, by his exaltation.

No candid, reasonable man, we think, can reflect upon the above and following passages, without being convinced that the doctrine of the trinity is without foundation in truth. "There is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time." "To us there is one God, the Father; and one Lord Jesus Christ"—"The God of our Lord, Jesus Christ." "God who brought again from the dead our Lord, Jesus."

Enough Scripture has been quoted to prove the Sonship of Christ. I would now call the attention of the reader to a few passages which I have selected to compare with the common approved notion of the trinity. I shall quote a passage in the Bible as it strictly reads, and then place in connexion with it the doctrine of trinitarians.

Rom. v: 6. "In due time Christ died for the ungodly."

In due time, "The Most High God," died for the ungodly.

Rom. v: 8. "But God commendeth his love to us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us."

But God commendeth his love to us, in that, while we were yet sinners, "The only wise God" died for us.

Rom. v: 10. "For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son."

For if when we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of "The Supreme Deity."

1 Cor. xv: 3. "For I delivered unto you first of all, that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins."

For I delivered unto you first of all, that which I also received, how the "God of Gods" died for our sins.

Heb. v: 8. "Though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience by the things that he suffered."

Though he were "Jehovah," yet learned he obedience by the things that he suffered."

Heb. ix: 14. "How much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit, offered himself without spot to God," etc.

How much more shall the blood of "The great and dreadful God," who through the eternal Spirit, offered himself without spot to God," etc.

Rev. v: 12. "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain."

Worthy is the "Lord God Omnipotent" that was slain.

We might extend the comparison still farther, but these contrasts will be sufficient, I think, to show you the shocking absurdity of the doctrine of the trinity. Are you not now, rationally convinced of the utter fallacy of that mysterious puzzle? O how glaringly ridiculous does that dogma appear, when contrasted with the holy Scriptures! Come forth ye votaries of a "three-one-God," and throw some light on this subject; for we confess it appears inconsistent and dark to us benighted mortals. Explain to our understanding how three can be only one! Hark! a trinitarian is about to speak. Give ear, O ye men who doubt the glorious doctrine of the "three-one-God," and he will make it appear as plain and palpable to your understandings as the simplest rule in mathematics. "You must not pry into the secrets of the Almighty. This matter of the trinity is a holy mystery, and can only be understood by its believers. Believe in it, and then it will appear plain and consistent."

Well, kind reader, we are as far in the dark on this subject, as we were previous to making the inquiry. What course shall we next take? I will relate a circumstance that I once read, and perhaps before getting through with it, the light of reason will dawn upon our understandings.

A lawyer in making out a deposition, introduced some words in a "mysterious sense," which rendered one of the sentences perfectly unintelligible. On reading the form, the witness exclaimed, "Sir, I do not understand that sentence." "Neither do I," said the lawyer, "but then all good witnesses testify in this manner, and you must do so too, or your testimony will not be received." The witness supposing all was right, and wishing to follow the good old rule, subscribed to the whole form. The court arrived, the deposition was read, and the witness was present. The attorney on the opposite side, suspected some fraud, and requested liberty to question the witness. On being closely questioned, the witness owned that he did not understand that mysterious sentence when he swore to the truth of it. The attorney then endeavored to set aside the whole deposition—pleading that the testimony of a man who would swear to the truth of a proposition, when he did not understand the meaning of the term, ought not to be admitted in any court of justice, and added that the witness ought to be indicted for perjury. But the judge being of a discerning and compassionate character, perceived, as he thought, marks of honesty in the witness, and suspected improper management on the part of the lawyer who wrote the deposition. On inquiring he found that it was by the art and influence of the lawyer, that the witness had been brought into such an unpleasant situation. He admitted so much of the deposition as the witness appeared to understand, but severely reprimanded the lawyer, for the wicked and disgraceful part he had acted.

In a short time the affair was reported abroad, and the witness reproached. He happened to be a member of a church under the care of a trinitarian clergyman, and the lawyer was a resident of the same parish. The minister being informed of the circumstances, felt wounded, and reproached the lawyer. The lawyer replied in a firm but mild tone of voice—"Sir, is it only in the solemn affairs of religion that you allow church members to trifle with God, with truth, and with conscience? I have but followed your example. You first seduced the witness yourself, by leading him to subscribe to an article of faith, in which words were used in a "mysterious sense," the very thing for which you have reproved me. I did it to open your eyes, to the astonishing impropriety of your own practice. But once have I been guilty of such behavior! Can you, Sir, say the same?"

This lawyer might have said to him, in the language of Jesus, "First cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye." The priest compelled the people to subscribe to a mysterious something, they knew nothing about; and the lawyer but acted on the same principle. And on the whole, the lawyer acted as consistently, as do those who force people to acknowledge that they believe in the riddle of the holy trinity, before they are fit candidates for the church! The Lord deliver me from subscribing to a thing that no one can understand!

The illustration, therefore, shows us the shocking impiety of subscribing to the doctrine under consideration. Because no one can understand it; and saying that we believe it, when we have no knowledge of its meaning, and consequently no faith respecting it, only proves that we are inconsiderate, and supremely ridiculous. Oh, were it possible, I would sound an alarm through Christendom, and awaken the attention of my fellow-men to the enormity of a custom by which millions have been seduced—a custom that would sap the foundations of civil justice, destroy all confidence between man and man, introduce universal misrule into the empire of Jehovah, dishonor God, and violate every principle of social order. May God in his infinite mercy, save us from the contaminating influence of trinitarianism!

A VOICE TO YOUNG MEN.....CHAPTER V.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

AMUSEMENTS.

This is a subject fraught with difficulty. Man-kind are furnished with many faculties that are capable of bestowing much amusement; which "sufficiently shows us," says Addison, "that Providence did not design this world should be filled with murmurs and repinings, or that the heart of man should be involved in gloom and melancholy." That it is proper, yea, necessary, for the young to seek occasional amusement, is a subject which admits of but little dispute. The bow must frequently be unbent, to retain its elastic spring. So the body must obtain relaxation from labor, or it speedily wears out—and the mind must be occupied, at proper intervals, with lighter and more diversified topics, than a constant grapple with abstract sciences, and the cares and perplexities of life, or its delicate and wonderful machinery becomes disordered. To be healthy, the body must frequently change its posture—to connue sound, the mind must unbend from its high vocations, and seek rest by a resort to the powers of the imagination.

There is a thought connected with this topic, of which the young should be aware. Amusement cannot be obtained except at the expense of experiencing something of a contrary character. Without weariness you can never realize the enjoyment of rest—without hunger and thirst, you can not know the satisfaction of partaking of food and drink. And be it remembered, that without application to business—without industrious exertion in some occupation which is more or less painful—you can not possibly find amusement, properly speaking, in any thing. It is alone by contrast that amusement possesses attractions. Destroy the contrast, and the amusement is destroyed. How often, in the midst of some scene of amusement, does the wish escape the bosom of the young—"O that I could always remain engaged in these gratifying pastimes!" Alas, ignorant youth! know that were these seasons of amusement to continue without interruption, soon would they become as irksome and painful as labor—soon would they lose all their charms, and be distasteful and insipid! Those who are enabled by wealth to make pleasure, as it is termed, the whole occupation of life, find it far more difficult to obtain amusement, than people in the humbler walks of life. Pleasure is their business, their trade; and it often becomes as onerous and irksome to them, as any occupation does to others. The young should, therefore, remember that they cannot obtain amusement from any source whatever, without they are prepared for it by previous industry, labor, and deprivation. As well can food be grateful to a stomach already overloaded and surfeited.

While it is universally conceded that amusement is proper to youth, the character of that amusement is a serious and important question, in regard to which there exists a diversity of opinion. Such is the infirmity of human nature, that whatever is pleasing and gratifying for a season—made so by previous deprivation—we are liable to indulge in to such excess, that it becomes an evil, generating pain and wretchedness. From the very nature of the subject, the young must be left, in a good degree, to the guidance of their own judgment and discretion, in regard to their recreations. Their parents and guardians can not always be with them in their amusements. They must, therefore, bring to bear that self-control which will restrain excess, or the evil will be upon their own heads. There is as much need of temperance in amusements, as in relation to any other subject. Without a temperate forbearance, the most harmless amusements become the sources of unhappiness. The very circumstance that we have too much of a good thing, makes it good for nothing—makes it an evil rather than a good. Young men should, therefore, exercise caution and circumspection, and much forethought, in selecting their amusements. They should choose those that possess the least liability to lead to excess and ruin—if possible, they should select those which both please and instruct.

"Pleasure, or wrong or rightly understood,
Our greatest evil, or our greatest good."

Card playing is often resorted to by the young, for amusement. Although the act of card playing for recreation, when considered simply in and of itself, is not injurious, yet as its associations and tendencies are dangerous, and as it occupies hours that might be spent more profitably, the practice should be avoided. There is nothing in this amusement that can be beneficial. It affords no useful exercise for the mind—stores it with no valuable ideas—not even admitting of conversation to any extent, except upon the trivial subject of the game. It is one of the most unmeaning, unprofitable, and fruitless employments to which the mind can well be directed. But the great objection to card playing, is its dangerous tendency. An expertness in this practice, is liable to induce a desire to venture a small hazard at the gaming-table, and then a larger and larger still, until a thirst for gaming is acquired, which leads to poverty and wretchedness. I would, therefore, advise young men to avoid card playing entirely. It cannot possibly bestow any benefit upon them; but it can lead them into the most sinful practices; it can lead and has led to the dungeon and the gallows! Who is willing to run this hazard, for the sake of the little amusement this practice can impart?

"Dancing, for those whose occupations are of a sedentary character, such as students and many classes of mechanics, would be an appropriate exercise, if it were not perpetually abused. But by assembling in large crowds, continuing it late at evening, and then sallying out in a perspiration, into the cold or damp night air, a thousand times more mischief has been done, than all the benefit which it has afforded would balance." And besides, as dancing assemblies are usually conducted, they become, to many young men, the nurseries of intemperance, prodigality, and indolence. "It were greatly to be wished that this exercise might be regulated by those rules which human experience has indicated, instead of being subject to the whim and caprice of fashion. It is a great pity an exercise so valuable to the sedentary, and especially to those who sit much, of both sexes, should be so managed as to injure half the world, and excite against it the prejudice of the other half."* As it is, however, young men who wish to preserve good moral and physical habits, should wholly refrain from mingling in those routs, balls, and assemblies, where dancing is continued to a late hour, and where the intoxicating beverage is freely circulated. Amid such scenes, inclinations, tastes and habits of the most deleterious tendency, may be formed—the germs of vices may there be obtained, which lead to utter wretchedness and degradation.

Theatres are another source of amusement to which young men often resort. That theatres might be made instructive—that they might be made schools of morality and virtue—is undoubtedly true. But that they are such, all know to be false. As they are now managed, they become the fountain, the very hot-bed of immorality. Every vicious habit, and every sinful propensity, there finds a stimulant. Lewd songs, lewd dances, gestures and expressions, are constantly brought to the attention of the audience. And it must be, that theatre-going people, of both sexes, are fond of these indelicate exhibitions, or actors, whose interest it is to cater for the public taste, would not dare to indulge in them. Were these immoralities to be indignantly frowned down by the audience, upon every representation, they would soon be banished from the stage. But as long as they are received with evident marks of approbation, these streams of pollution will still continue to send their contaminations into the hearts of thousands.

No young man can be in the habit of attending theatres, without extreme liability to become corrupted in every principle. Dr. Griscom, of New-York, in a report make a few years ago, on the causes of vice and crime in that city, says—"Among the causes of vicious excitement in our city, none appear to be so powerful in their nature, as theatrical amusements. The number of boys and young men who have become determined thieves, in order to obtain the means of introduction to the theatres and circuses, would appal the feelings of every virtuous mind, could the whole truth be laid before them." Rosseau, Sir John Hawkins, Archbishop Tillotson, Bishop Collier, Sir Matthew Hale, Burgh, Dr. Johnson, Lord Kaimes, with a multitude of other distinguished writers, all bear testimony against the demoralizing and highly corrupting influence of theatres. They are among the most dangerous places to which young men can resort for amusement; and the safest course is to abstain from them entirely. The love for this amusement, like that for alcohol, grows imperceptibly, until the heedless youth becomes its slave and its victim. And, therefore, as in regard to intoxicating drinks, the only point of security, respecting the evil influences of theatres, is total abstinence!

Young men need not lack for proper amusement. By an enlightened discrimination, they can find an abundant supply from sources not only innocent, but instructive. Recreations in the open air, for those whose occupations are sedentary—the perusal of interesting books and other publications—the frequenting of well conducted reading rooms, and an attendance at lyceums, and other meetings for public lectures—all afford amusement combined with useful instruction. Social parties, and a frequent entrance into the various family circles of your friends, are prolific sources of innocent recreation. And I can not forbear urging young men (if, indeed, it is necessary to urge them) to frequent, in their leisure hours, the company of intelligent and virtuous females, of the class with whom they associate. Nothing tends more to polish a young man, and to refine his tastes and his manners, than the society of the virtuous of the other sex. In such company, vulgarity and profanity will be rebuked, and a guard will be placed upon the lip and the actions, that can not but exercise a salutary tendency.

In conclusion, I would repeat that, in regard to amusements, much depends upon the discretion, the self-control and good sense of young men. You desire to be respectable, prosperous, and happy. But bear this truth in mind, that you can not become so, except by your own exertions, your own forbearance and discretion. Your interests and enjoyments are vitally involved in the character of your amusements. Deeply fix the resolution in your mind, to indulge in no recreation that is not of an innocent nature, and of a strict moral tendency, and you will exhibit a wisdom productive of immense benefits.

DO WE STAND FOR OUR RIGHTS.

Is it not a fact that most of our public Libraries are liberally supported by Universalists? And is it not also a fact that liberal books are excluded from the most of these libraries? If these are facts, are not Universalists guilty of an unpardonable neglect of a duty which they owe to themselves, to their children and to their fellow-men?

When it is so evident that the present degeneracy of the age, arises from a mistaken view of the character of God, the nature of the Christian religion, and of the real objects of existence, will our own sense of right allow us to contribute to the circulation of books calculated to perpetuate such views, where such books as we believe will tend to root up these errors are prohibited? Ought not every Universalist, every true Philanthropist to contribute a share towards promoting the spread of that knowledge which is calculated to liberalize the mind, instead of aiding in administering a poison where no antidote will be allowed? Brethren, think of these things.

A UNIVERSALIST.

OMNISCIENCE OF GOD.

"Thou God seest me—thou understandest my thought afar off." DAVID.

There is no thought with which we are more familiar, than that of God's omniscience; yet, perhaps, there is none which is less influential upon our conduct. Nevertheless there is not any single truth better fitted to exercise a ceaseless and powerful influence over the whole current of our thoughts, as well as the general tenor of our actions. If we would habitually realize the presence of God, not only as a witness of our external conduct, but also of our inward thoughts and motives—did we habitually regard him as the dispenser of our pains and pleasures, thus testifying his fatherly interest in our avoidance of evil and pursuit of that which is good—would not such thoughts give seriousness to our character and deportment?—would it not make us watch with anxiety what things please him?—would it not give a dignity and importance to our behavior, to which we are strangers without a sense of the presence of our exalted Parent? Is this, or any thing like it, the effect produced by the truth we are considering, on the minds of all who professedly believe it? On the contrary, is it not abundantly evident that with a large proportion of mankind, this truth has no practical influence whatever?—are not many avoiding it as the most unwelcome of all truths?—while all admit it in words, do not almost all deny it in reality? Is not practical atheism the most common of all errors in religion?

Let him who doubts or denies the habitual forgetfulness of God, try to hold him in remembrance during the distractions of only one whole day. Let him try it again and again. As he will assuredly find the task difficult, so may he find an ample reward!

PERSECUTION.

The following letters disclose a course of most wicked and ungodly conduct—mean as cowardly, and cunning as malicious—in a church of professed Christians—toward an innocent and afflicted female. Having been crafty enough to evade the letter of our country's laws, it becomes our duty to arraign them before the bar of public opinion, and unite with their consciences in teaching them that "the wicked shall not go unpunished." God grant that it may lead them to repentance and reformation. Br. Sanford, who furnishes the article, says:

"The subject of the following narrative is a very respectable female, residing in the town of Gainesville, Genesee county, N. Y., and a truly devoted Christian, the wife of Mr. A. B. Cravath, one of your subscribers in the place, who is ranked among the respectable and wealthy of that town. Sister Cravath has long been a member of one of the popular churches of the place, which she attended until she fell a victim to the paralyzing hand of sickness, which of course vacated her seat in the church, when her husband, being of a disposition to provide for his own, and especially for his own household, remained at home also, endeavoring to ameliorate the condition of his tender and afflicted partner; and instead of contributing as largely as formerly, for the support of the priest, he used his spare change in the discharge of the 'physician's bill.' She walked with them in peace and love, and no one was better than Sister Cravath; but neglecting to pay the preacher, called down upon their devoted heads the contempt of the church, although Br. C. had never belonged to them, but for the sake of his amiable companion, attended with her—secured a pew in their house at a goodly price, and was not behind, perhaps, the best of them. But during the protracted illness of his wife, he gave 'attendance to reading,' and the Magazine and Advocate fell into his hands, which was an instrument in opening his eyes. He was pronounced heretical, and his wife suspected of having caught the contagion, and slanderous falsehoods were circulated against her character on suspicion of her having become a Universalist; for not one of the church had even been to visit her in all of her afflictions; and they continued to treat her with one abuse after another, until she was constrained to conclude that the church was not a place of safety or source of consolation to her in adversity, and she asked for a dismission from them, and was denied the privilege of withdrawing."

The remainder of their conduct is fully disclosed in the letter—except that they abused Sister Cravath for entertaining Br. A. Peck in a hospitable manner, when her husband had invited him to their house—saying, "she had done very wrong, inasmuch as she had neglected to kick Br. PECK out of doors!" Is it possible that these people "know what manner of spirit they are of"? Will they find a precept in the Bible requiring a female Christian to kick a man out of doors! And these people call themselves Christians—the followers of Jesus—the imitators of his conduct who had "compassion on those that are out of the way"! But to the letters.

* * Br. Sanderson will please copy them.

Gainesville, Genesee county, N. Y., July 24th, 1837.

Messrs. EDITORS—Although personally unacquainted with you, yet judging from what I have seen of your works, that you are the friends of equal rights, and willing to defend the cause of those who are suffering under the galling yoke of priestly usurpation, I offer no other apology for thus intruding myself to your notice, than that I consider myself a sufferer, and look to you and the public for relief. If, therefore, you will give this article a place in the columns of your invaluable paper, you will confer a favor upon an injured female, who will be ever grateful for your friendship.

In the days of my youth I became alarmed for the welfare of my soul, and fled for refuge to lay hold of the hope set before me, in the bosom of the Presbyterian church, where I reposed comparatively secure, and for many years enjoyed, as I supposed, all the blessings of the church of Christ. After having walked with them in perfect harmony and love for about fifteen years, it pleased God to give unto me to drink of "the cup of affliction," and in consequence of extreme and protracted ill health, I was prohibited from meeting with the church for a considerable time; being advised by my physicians to avoid, as much as possible, all places where crowded congregations might be expected. But being a believer in the doctrines of the church, and feeling the necessity of associating with those with whom I had enjoyed many comfortable seasons during the days of my health and prosperity, as soon as I considered my health sufficiently recovered, I attended public worship with the church; which caused a relapse of the disease, and I was again for some time unable to attend—but at length supposing my health sufficiently recovered, I met with them again, and again was attacked by the disease, attended with fainting and convulsions; which convinced me that it was my duty to abstain altogether from public assemblies. But at length there being a Methodist camp-meeting near my residence, and riding being productive of good effects upon my health, and the day being fine, my husband prevailed upon me to ride with him to the place, and listen to a sermon in the open air, which was attended with no disadvantages.

At length my husband's mother, a member of the same church, called and informed me that the deacon, Mr. Dunning, had told her that the church were about to take up a labor with me on account of my absence from church, and having attended a Methodist camp-meeting, and for speaking against the church. This labor, however, was to be suspended until some of my particular friends should have removed from the place! My husband called on the deacon, and asked for a specification of the charges preferred against me—what the accusations were, and why the labor should be postponed until my friends should be absent. His reply was, that he did not know as the church had any thing against me, but he had heard something said about me, and had thought of coming to see me and talking with me himself, for his own satisfaction. This being done, I told him that my absence from church was on account of ill health, and that all that I had spoken against the church, was, in substance, this:—They had neglected me in my sickness, and the Universalists, or "world's people," had been kinder than they. The deacon expressed himself perfectly satisfied. Some grievous contradictions existed between the deacon and my husband's mother, to which he pleaded not guilty, saying that he had been misunderstood, and said he would settle it and clear the accusations up; but this he never attempted.

Time passed away—we heard no more of the discord for some time, and my husband and I thought all was well. But at length a sister of the church called, and told me that she felt it her duty to tell me what they were doing with me in the church, and requested me not to tell them that she had told me, for, said she, "they will curse me for it." She then informed me that the Rev. Mr. Cook, the pastor of the church, had circulated a report that I had renounced the doctrines of the church, and had embraced those of Universalism; and accordingly my name was to be cast out of the church, who designed to keep the matter secret, and let me know nothing of it until it was accomplished. I being then confined at home by sickness, my husband went to the elder, and requested him to come to our house and see me face to face. He did so, and professed to have obtained perfect satisfaction on his part, and acknowledged that he had circulated the report, and thought it was true, for it was told by a Methodist brother to a sister of his church, and that sister told him; and he agreed to talk with the church, and request them to call and see me for themselves; and requested me to rest satisfied. The church, however, carried on the affair, and a time was appointed for the trial of the heretic, and the parson refused to give the names of those who had originated and circulated the report, saying he would sooner bear it himself. The time of the meeting arrived, and the business was postponed. I was importunate in calling upon the parson for the names of mine accusers, and at length he concluded to give them, when, lo! he stated that the author of the accusation was my husband's mother! who told it to the sister of the church!!! Thus the Methodist brother had, according to the language of the priest, become my mother-in-law!!!

This same preacher circulated reports of the most degrading and slanderous kind against my character, and when called upon for his author, he said to me that he had heard that I was a Universalist, and that was the character of that denomination, and they must bear it, and I must sustain the same character with them. I was not then a Universalist, and so told him, and he said, "since I have talked with you, I see you are not a Universalist, and I am sorry I have circulated the reports." Yet, in a speech to the church on this subject, he said he did not know but he had done wrong in circulating those reports about me, but he did not consider himself to blame for it!

At the time of the above meeting, concluding that the church was an unsafe place for me to continue in, I asked for a letter of dismission, which was denied me; but they requested me to remain with them, saying "the church is small, and we have nothing against you; and you had better not be in haste, for we know not how to spare you." I answered, that I did not wish to walk with the church any longer, which had become full of contentions, and if they would not grant me a letter of dismission, I would withdraw. Elder Cook, finding himself involved in numerous difficulties from which he could not easily extricate himself, gathered up his effects, left the business with the deacon for adjustment, and took his leave of the place.

Many were the solicitations of myself and husband to Deacon D. and the church, for the accomplishment of the business—the subject was mentioned and postponed, from time to time, until at length the church passed a resolution—"That no member of that body should have a letter of dismission therefrom, unless they were going to remove from the bounds of the church." Then I was told that they could not grant my request. My answer to this was, that my only alternative was, then, to withdraw from them. But, said they, "this you cannot do; for you have agreed to walk with us through evil report as well as good." I then drew up a written statement of my feelings, in the form of a withdrawal from the church, which was taken by my husband to a public meeting of the church, and when the meeting was dissolved, or at the close of service, he called the attention of the congregation, and commenced reading it; (having asked liberty to read it at the close of the sermon, which was not granted;) but he had not proceeded far, before the preacher, Mr. Wilcox, (who succeeded Mr. Cook,) interrupted him, and told him to stop, for, said he, "the congregation are uneasy!" and it was said that the article was of so pernicious and blasphemous a nature, that they could not hear it. The priest left the house, and the congregation followed him, some of them exclaiming in the most bitter terms against the blasphemies contained in the withdrawal of Sister Cravath.

I then sent my withdrawal to the clerk of the church, requesting him to incorporate it with the records. But he threw it aside, saying, "it is unworthy of our notice, and we will have nothing to do with it." It has since been returned to me, and I have been frequently summoned to appear before the church, and show cause why I refuse to walk with them. And having been credibly informed that it is the mind of some of them to have me cut off, or excommunicated therefrom, and pronounced a heretic, for the crime of attending on the preaching of the doctrine of "the restitution of all things," I am therefore induced to lay before an enlightened public a brief statement of my case, together with my withdrawal, blasphemous as it is, that the world may judge of its merits, and know that I consider myself free from all connexion with that church, and not amenable to any ecclesiastical tribunal: for "whomsoever the Son has made free, he shall be free indeed." BETSEY CRAVATH.

To the Second Congregational Church in Gainesville:—

However painful to my feelings the measure which I am about to take may be, and however severely my motives for it may be censured, it is one which the peculiar circumstances of the case, the harmony of the church, my own peace of mind, and a just regard for my character, seem to me imperiously to require.

Being resolved to sever the connexion by which I have been so long united to the church, so far as my own act can affect my relation to it, it is due, perhaps, to those who feel an interest in the case, as well as to myself, to state the causes which have led me to the resolution which I have taken.

After uniting myself with the church, for quite a number of years I enjoyed all the satisfaction and happiness which might be expected to arise from a belief in its doctrines, and the practice of the precepts of our religion; and I believe that nothing occurred during that time, which interrupted, materially, the harmony and good fellowship which I flattered myself existed between myself and the members of the church. It would have been gratifying to me if this state of things had continued to exist; but it seems to have been otherwise ordered.

About four years since, in consequence of my extreme and protracted ill health, I was ordered by my physicians, in reference to the state of my lungs, to avoid as much as possible all places where crowded congregations might be expected. Acting in pursuance of this advice, and not from any disinclination to attend public worship, I reluctantly remained absent. Rumors were soon industriously circulated, that my absence was occasioned by other causes. These rumors, increasing in magnitude by continual repetitions, at length engaged the serious attention of the church, some of the members of which called on me to expostulate with me on the subject, but finally expressed themselves satisfied with my explanations.

This matter was hardly disposed of, when I learned that Mr. Cook, (who then had the pastoral care of the church,) as well as many of the members, were engaged in propagating a report that I had renounced my former principles, and had adopted those of Universalism, and that my case was about to become the subject of church labor. Mr. Cook, at my request, called on me before the time appointed by the church for the consideration of the subject, and after some conversation, professed to be convinced that the charges against me were erroneous, and he afterwards made a statement to the church meeting to the like effect—the consequence of which was, that no definite disposal was made of the subject at that time.

Under this state of things, believing that my further connexion with the church would be attended with no beneficial results either to the church or myself, I made application for a letter of dismission. The decision in relation to my application, was postponed from time to time, until, as I am informed, a rule has been adopted by the church, precluding the possibility of granting a letter to any, except those who wish to remove out of the bounds of the church. At present, I am informed, the same rumors are circulated—and in addition, it is added as a charge of serious importance, that I have visited with families who are Universalists, and have received visits from them! This charge I do not pretend to deny, nor affirm. If it be a sin to exchange the common courtesies of life with persons of fair fame and good moral character, merely because they happen to differ with us in religious sentiments, then I must acknowledge my conceptions of the subject to be entirely wrong. And if it be required of me, for the same reason, to treat with coldness and neglect those whom I have abundant reason to esteem and love, I have only to answer, that I have not so learned my duty. And I have yet to learn that the best means of impressing neighbors with a sense of the excellence of our doctrines, is to make a different belief in them, a pretext for shunning their society, or treating them as being without the pale of social intercourse. Nor can I consent longer to remain in a society which makes such requirements of its members.

But it may be said that I have not the power to separate myself from the church consistently with its rules, and that any attempt to do so, is an infraction of the covenant entered into on my part with the church. To these objections I answer, that I consider the covenant binding on me no longer than it continues to be observed in good faith by the members of the church towards me. And that, in circulating and giving credence to reports injurious to my character as a professor of Christianity, and in spreading them, not only through this, but in other towns, without informing me of their existence, many of the members of this church have, as I conceive, broken that part of the covenant by which they promised "to watch over me with meekness and love; and by counsel and prayer to help me forward in the way to heaven." And the steadiness of purpose with which this course of detraction still seems to be persisted in, furnishes sufficient evidence to me, that it is no longer safe for me to remain a member of the church.

I do, therefore, hereby renounce all connexion with "The Second Congregational Church of Gainesville," and declare myself to be, to all intents and purposes, free from its authority and discipline.

BETSEY CRAVATH.

Dated at Gainesville, this 19th day of December, 1836.

REMARKS.

It appears by what I have been able to learn of the case, that the withdrawal of Sister Cravath from the church, was not altogether because they accused her of being a Universalist, or of renouncing her former sentiments, although those, together with the charge of visiting with those of that "sect which is every where spoken against," were the only accusations laid before the church against her; for although she does not profess to be a Universalist, yet she does not oppose the doctrine, nor neglect those who believe it. She is a regular reader of the Magazine and Advocate, and attends the preaching of the doctrine at all convenient seasons, and appears to be a devout worshipper, and is universally esteemed by the most respectable of the community in which she resides—so far at least as I have been able to ascertain. But because her husband was known to be a believer in liberal Christianity, she was suspected, also; and when he withheld his support from the church, they knew that he was out of their power, but began to persecute her. And it seems by the course of conduct pursued by them, that their main object was, after all, to awe her into subjection, and keep her in the church, that they might obtain from her husband, on her account, a little more of that ingredient, the love of which is "the root of all evil." Neither was the manifestation of avaricious principles the cause of her coming out from them, for Br. Cravath has enough, but when they found that the first accusations did not bring her into subjection, they began to slander her character by circulating falsehoods about her, too degrading to mention; and to escape a just retribution, the priest took his leave of the place in rather an unbecoming manner. And there being no legal manner by which she could get redress, the church keeping all things as dark as possible, she was induced to leave them; but this privilege they denied her, and have suffered her case to remain undecided from year to year, that they might watch her with the eyes of their jealousy, until they could find something whereof to accuse her, and finally fix an indelible stigma upon her character, by having an opportunity to publish to the world, that Sister Cravath has been excommunicated from the fellowship of the church of Christ, for immoral conduct. When, lo! after all, the only accusation which is brought against her, is, the foul crime of neglecting to abuse her husband's guests, and going to hear the Gospel preached by those who "publish peace," and "say to Zion, thy God reigneth." Query—Which people bears the nearest resemblance to the followers of the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world, "the Church of Gainesville," or those whom he represented by whited sepulchres, being full of dead men's bones and all uncleanness? Who would walk with a people who would one day be engaged in circulating the most disgraceful falsehoods about him, and the next day say to the belied, "You had better stay with us, for we have nothing against you"? Who would not rather come out and be separate from among them, and touch not the unclean thing? We congratulate Sister Cravath on her emancipation from the chains of Partialism, and the iron yoke of bondage, worn by the devotees of the Presbyterian church, and humbly hope and pray that she may "go forth with joy, and be led forth with peace," and "grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ." And to all who wish to enjoy civil and religious liberty, we would say, "Go thou and do likewise." J. H. S.

REMARKS.

Our cause is evidently gaining ground in this section of our Master's heritage. Many a heart was made glad with a holy joy and a devout gratitude, at our interesting meeting. I can not but believe that much good was done in the name of the meek and lowly Saviour.—

We ardently hope those who came to hear the word of life and salvation, received into good and honest hearts the truths of his Gospel, and imbibed its heavenly spirit, and that they will be merciful and fruitful in good works and thus display the holy influence of their sentiments, to the world, in their daily intercourse with their fellow-men.

Brethren—remember that the works most acceptable to God, are those which bring the greatest joys to the heart, and promote the greatest good of all. Cold indifference is no ingredient in the Christian character, nor will neglect to store the mind with the great and precious truths of Heaven, form one of excellence. No Universalist can live a life too pure, and no well informed one can be too much engaged in the promotion of God's impartial grace. The practical exemplification of these two last particulars, can alone promote the interests of our cause in this vicinity. Go on, then, brethren, and Heaven will approve your exertions; and duty bless, and success crown your efforts. And although there are some who see no merit in your good works, but represent all as performed from wicked, selfish motives, still you will have the approbation of God, and the smiles of a conscience pure before the world. And you will bear in mind that the time has come when that class of Christians, who like the Jews, arrogate to themselves all virtue on earth, and all happiness in heaven, and who represent others of superior attainments in Christian virtues, as performing their duties from evil, selfish motives, will appear in the eyes of an enlightened community, very much as the Pharisees of old did in the eyes of our Saviour—the most insignificant, and the least calculated to advance the interests of society.

Great praise is due our Methodist brethren, who freely gave us the use of their house. This Christian kindness will be duly appreciated by our friends, who will ever reciprocate the good Christian feelings manifested towards us by them! The friends from a distance were hospitably entertained by the brethren in Sheridan, who abundantly provided for their wants. These kind offices and deeds of Christian benevolence are treasured in grateful hearts.

This was truly a time of rejoicing. There were on the last day seven or eight hundred people present.—Harmony and friendship prevailed throughout our deliberations, and in all our meetings. The most cheering news from the different societies respecting the prosperity of our Zion, saluted our ears. The cry for more preachers was gladly heard. It is confidently believed two more preachers may be supported in this county. Surely the field is large and the laborers few.

A. B. GROSH, D. SKINNER, AND S. R. SMITH, EDITORS.

UTICA, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1837.

ASSISTANT EDITOR.

For the purpose of enabling the principal Editor to attend more especially to the improvement of the paper, and of occasionally supplying, as far as may be, the place of Mrs. Skinner and Smith, in the Editorial department, during their absence from this section, we have engaged the services of a gentleman as Assistant Editor, whose labors in preparing communications, generally, for the press, and the production of whose pen in the Editorial department, will, we believe, be very gratifying to our correspondents and readers, as well as highly useful to the great cause in which he, as well as we all, are mutually engaged. GROSH and HUTCHINSON.

EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY.

The Universalists have entered on this field of labor with great ardor and success. It is probable to my mind, that they will be kept in it for many years to come. The opponents of Christianity, though unable fully to conquer Partialist and Trinitarian defenders of divine revelation, have not been fully conquered by them. There always remained to them some fastnesses in the mountains of error, which they could successfully maintain against the weapons commonly used to assail them, and from whence they could sally forth, from time to time, spreading gloom and doubt, perplexity and dismay over common minds. True, to the reflecting and searching Christian, the balance of testimony and argument seemed clearly in favor of Christianity; but still, science presented some obstacles to the common views of the sacred text, and reason and humanity would revolt and stag-ger under the arguments addressed to them against some doctrines in the popular creed. These views and doctrines were indefensible—the Christian could only say, "I believe the others are irrefutable, and I therefore hope these may be so, also, although I cannot tell how they can be; but if the system is true, its parts must also be true." This might pacify, but could not fully satisfy doubts which the skeptic was continually stirring up into clouds of darkness and perplexity.

But the time has come, under the providence of God, when these last strong holds of the skeptic are to be levelled to the ground, or exploded into the air, and when the smoke of the battle waged by him will cease to darken the religious skies. And, under Heaven, Universalists are destined to be foremost in the glorious and blessed work. Partialists have done all they can do, and what in the very nature of things, they can not perform, must be done by others, or infidelity must continue to divide, with Christianity, the empire of reason and humanity.

Br. Pickering's lectures on the evidences of Christianity, are out of the market. They have been followed by Br. Thayer's Christianity versus Infidelity, principally a compilation, it is true, but one freed in general from the objectionable opinions which have so long blunted many of the best weapons aimed at skepticism. Br. Williamson's Argument for Christianity, appeared at about the same time, and leaving the historical testimony, already so ably adduced by others, proved the truth of the great doctrines and precepts taught in the New Testament. Br. Smith's series of articles, (now being published, and destined to appear in book form before next Spring,) followed closely after, clearly showing that the portions of the popular faith so successfully opposed by the opponents of Christianity, were no part or parcel of our holy religion, and that, consequently, skeptics have been beating to pieces, and Partialists been vainly defending, a man of straw! It is a refutation, therefore, of the indefensible parts of the popular system of Christianity, as well as of the skepticism based upon them. Infidelity can only live upon error, and when the carcass of corruption is consumed, the unclean bird and worm must cease to be, or find food elsewhere than in the church of Christ. I mean no disrespect to our erring brethren of either party, nor do I apply these terms to any thing but their systems—thus applied, I believe my language correct—founded in fact and in truth—and affectionately and earnestly invite the attention of both parties to the subject in general, and especially to the works here named. They will find much worthy of their attention, while the feelings of neither will be outraged by abuse, where candor, courtesy and argument alone should be used.

UNIVERSALIST SOCIETIES.

How many Universalist Societies in the State of New-York are provided with society libraries?

How many have Institutes connected with them, where the young of either or both sexes can meet once a week for mutual moral and intellectual improvement?

How many have Sunday schools connected with them, which afford recreation, amusement and the proper instruction to the "young lambs of the flock"?

How many have Bible classes connected with them, where religious inquiry may find exercise and gather its rich harvests, while mutual instruction makes all partakers of the gathered store?

How many have sewing and reading circles, or other social and charitable societies within them, where the females especially can congregate at regular periods, to form acquaintances, and become attached to each other, and thus increase good-will and charity among the congregation?

These questions are asked, that our negligent societies may see how much may yet be done to advance each others' happiness, by very trifling efforts. We certainly are not yet zealous enough in sociality. Our efforts to improve ourselves are too solitary, and, I had almost said misanthropic, to merit the approbation of genuine Universalists; and we are too careless of improving each other's happiness and virtues. At least such is the humble opinion of the writer. It appears to me that our real strength would at once be doubled, without a single addition to our numbers, if every Universalist society in New-York would at once establish means by which every member could become intimately acquainted with the others, and by which each one could be made the helped and the helper of each other on the way to mental and moral improvement. If so, brethren and sisters—parents and children in our Israel, let us double our strength! Oh, what a preparation would this measure be to the conversion of thousands of our opposers, who are watching to see the effects of our principles on us, before they will embrace them themselves!

One word more.—We have societies in which some one or more of the measures here named, have been adopted and practised. I believe there are others who would adopt and practice them, if they knew how to set about it; or were convinced of the great benefits resulting from them. Will some brother give the information? We want (and I want) some such articles, on precisely such subjects. Let no one wait for another to write them—even two or three articles on each subject will not be too much, if concisely and clearly written. And I am confident that thereby will great good be done.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

"Proceedings and Constitution of the Universalist Sabbath school Association; with the Report of the Committee on the best method of conducting Sabbath schools, and the Sermon delivered before the Association." Boston: Abel Tompkins, publisher—pp. 24.

I am indebted to the kindness of Br. Hosea Ballou, 2d, for a copy of this interesting pamphlet. The Report is an able one, and the sermon all we should naturally expect from Hosea Ballou, 2d. The following is a brief outline of the Constitution of the Association:—

Title—"The Universalist Sabbath school Association." Objects—to concentrate the efforts of Sunday school societies—aid each other in their duties—disseminate useful information on the subject—examine and recommend suitable books, and encourage the establishment of schools. Officers—H. Ballou, 2d, President; O. A. Skinner, G. Noyes, Z. Thompson, J. M. Spear, J. M. Austin, M. B. Ballou, Vice Presidents; T. F. King, Secretary; L. R. Paige, Corresponding Secretary; B. Whittemore, Treasurer; B. Reynolds, South Boston, Abel Tompkins, Boston, R. Frothingham, Jr., Charlestown, S. Cobb, Malden, H. Bacon, E. Cambridge, Directors—the whole to constitute a Board of Managers, seven of whom shall be a quorum. Members—regularly ordained Universalist ministers, and two lay delegates from each Sabbath school which shall report its condition to the Association at least two weeks before the annual meeting. Annual meeting—the last Wednesday in May. The Constitution to be altered by two-thirds, and all alterations to be proposed at a previous meeting.

Of the Proceedings we will speak when we make out our next Record—they properly belong to that department of our paper.

"A Reply to the main arguments advanced in a discourse delivered by Rev. L. Beecher, D. D., President of Lane Seminary, Cincinnati, in the First Presbyterian Church in Auburn, on the evening of August 20th, in proof of Endless Misery, and against the Restitution. By Geo. W. Montgomery, Pastor of the First Universalist Society in Auburn." Allen and Lounsbury, Printers—pp. 24.

Some eight or ten years ago, Dr. Beecher moved to Boston, the head quarters of Universalism, as it was called, for the purpose of annihilating this growing doctrine, by crushing its head between the weight of his arguments. He labored faithfully in his vocation—the Universalists requested his lectures on the subject for the press, promising to publish a large edition free of charge to him—but then as now, he deemed them better for the desk than for the press. He toiled hard, and Universalism flourished as well—yea, better than ever. Like the old lady who was determined out of spite, to destroy her neighbor's peach trees, by pouring lie—I mean, lie—around their roots, he was disappointed in finding himself unwittingly made the instrument of advancing the faith he would have destroyed. For met at every point, his perversions exposed—his misrepresentations corrected, and his sophistry and ridicule turned against his own faith, the public said, What manner of doctrine is this; for even the giant Beecher prevails not against it?

Since then Dr. Beecher has let Universalism alone. But some of his Auburn friends, less wise than himself, have again prevailed on the theological giant to take his two-handed sword and his weaver-beam-like lance, and again tilt against the Rock of eternal Truth. And again has he demonstrated the weakness of human might when arrayed against the omnipotence of truth—again will he hoe up dirt to smother the seedlings of Heaven, and they will but grow the better for it, rising in perennial brightness above the rubbish he has heaped around them.

After a hasty perusal of the pamphlet before us, I think every candid mind will give Br. Montgomery the credit of great candor, kindness, and charity—all clothed with the habitual modesty of the man—in exposing so mildly the unprovoked perversions, errors and misstatements of Dr. Beecher. As to the merits due the arguments, they belong to the subject. Even Dr. Beecher must fail when he has a bad cause, and a man much less gifted than Br. Montgomery could scarcely fail to refute the ablest opponent under similar circumstances.

The following extract is selected for its beauty, as much as for its cogency. It is, perhaps, as good a selection as could be made to show the power and ingenuity of Dr. Beecher even in a bad cause, and the equal power and ingenuity as well as ingenuousness of Br. Montgomery in replying to it. The expression, "the ocean, that mighty heart of the earth whose pulsations speak the sublimity of God," is a beautiful, highly poetic expression. There are several others of nearly equal beauty, in the pamphlet. The following is the extract referred to:— A. B. G.

"In the course of his sermon, Dr. B. alluded to the idea, that the murderer would wake up in the resurrection and instantly stand upon the same footing with the most righteous man; an idea, by the way, no Universalist believes or ever did believe. The Dr. objected to this idea, and brought forward an illustration, which, in his opinion, touched the views of Universalists. Two rivers were referred to. One flows along from the plains, pure, limpid and refreshing, until suddenly it disappears from sight around a point. Is it supposable that as soon as it disappears, it will become muddy and impure? Is it not rather obvious that it is as pure after it disappears as previous? The other river pours down from the mountains in thunder; its waters, black with death and destruction, wither every thing in their course. Suddenly it falls down a precipice. Is it supposable that the moment it falls, it will become pure and sweet? The conclusion drawn from this illustration, is, that the righteous man will forever roll onward in his holiness beyond death; while the wicked, beyond the same point, shall rush along in the black waters of vice and pain.

There is truth in this illustration, but that truth will bear upon a fact little pleasing either to Dr. B. or his friends. Had Dr. B. stood by two great western rivers and looked towards the North, he would have beheld the waters of the Mississippi rolling onward in purity—had he turned his eyes towards the West, he would have beheld the waters of the Missouri pouring out in turbidness; and there, within sight, he would have seen limpid waters so instantly becoming impure as to leave a distinct trace of the point of their mingling. And if Dr. B. would only visit the protracted meetings of his New School brethren, he would there find men whose lives were once the black waters of vice, suddenly, by a miraculous agency, becoming pure and fitted for heaven in the opinion of the church. And if such black waters of vice are thus suddenly changed in a protracted meeting, he can not object to some such changes after death.

But so far as the Universalists are concerned, the illustration is pointless. If a river whose waters are black with death, thunders down a precipice, we must not stop there—we must trace it onward until it enters the ocean, and then ascertain what becomes of it. It may flow into the ocean charged with destruction, but does it retain that destruction and become more death-like than ever? Certainly not. It assimilates with the waters of the ocean, that mighty heart of the earth whose pulsations speak the sublimity of God, it becomes purified and fitted to be borne in the reservoirs of the clouds over climes and continents on the wings of the wind, to fall upon the land of the just and unjust. So a sinful man, at death, falls into the ocean of eternity. What becomes of him? "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it." Eccle. xii: 7. Does he return to God to be made worse than ever? "As in Adam all die even so in Christ shall all be made alive." 1 Cor. xv: 22. "Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature." 2 Cor. v: 17. "That in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he might gather together in one, all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth; even in him." Ephe. i: 10. The waters become pure on entering the ocean—the spirit on returning to God, is renovated with the influence of heaven."

AMERICAN ANNALS OF EDUCATION AND INSTRUCTION.—This is the title of a monthly publication, edited by William A. Alcott, with William C. Woodbridge for foreign Correspondent. It is published in Boston, by Otis, Broaders and Co. Each number contains 48 octavo pages. Terms—three dollars per annum in advance—twelve dollars for five copies, and twenty dollars for nine copies. I have seen but a few numbers at various times; but those few numbers have impressed me with a favorable opinion of the work, with very few exceptions. Works of this kind should be more widely circulated than they now are—teachers and school committee men, especially, should be provided with one or more of the best periodicals devoted to education, as well as one or more of the cheaper kind. It is urged that many can not afford the expense—and the plea is strong but not an insuperable one. The district would gain more than ten times the amount of their cost, by supplying every school-house with a copy of two or more such publications for the use of the larger pupils, the teacher, and the trustees or committee. And until teachers are remunerated for their labors with somewhat more than a mere living, the people are in justice bound to supply them with the means for acquiring an increased knowledge of their duties, and the mode of well performing them. As to those public servants, the committee or trustees, surely they should be well instructed in their business—enabled to know the best modes of constructing and furnishing school rooms, and of teaching their inmates—or else be provided with pay for their services which will allow them to provide themselves with such instruction. But to add such publications to the library of each school, (and every district school should have a constantly increasing library,) is certainly the cheapest as well as the most useful mode to effect the desired object. May we not hope, then, that the people will take the matter in hand, and instruct their trustees or committees to subscribe for such works—to study them faithfully—from time to time adopt the suggestions contained in them, and see that such adoption is faithfully and steadily carried onward?

It is a disgrace to the empire State—that part I have visited—to say what is nevertheless true, that I never knew common schools in a lower condition, and their teachers more meanly requited among "the ignorant Germans of Pennsylvania," (as they are commonly termed,) even before any General system of Education was adopted in that State, than they are in this State, at this time. Pity it is this declaration is so very true, and grieved am I to make it; but I speak of what I know and my words are not only those of sorrow, but of "truth and soberness." A. B. G.

NEW SOCIETY.

Br. Townsend, in a letter to the Editors, says—"A society has been formed in Arcadia, Wayne county, under the name and title of the 'First Universalist Society of Arcadia.'

"Our friends in that vicinity, have resolved to erect an elegant brick church, 44 by 56 feet. They have not only resolved, but have selected the site, and proceeded to put their resolutions into practice. The contracts are taken, the work is progressing, and it is expected that the basement will be ready to be occupied for meetings this Winter. The whole church is to be fully completed by the 1st of July next.

"With the consent of the society in Victor, I have preached a few Sabbaths in Newark, in the town of Arcadia. Our meetings have been well attended, and Br. Ackley has supplied my place here, much to the satisfaction of our friends.

"The friends in the town of Arcadia and its vicinity, are worthy of all praise. They have put their hands to the work with a spirit which renders success certain, and I trust that all who are friendly to the cause, in that section, will come forward to the work, give their aid in the cause, and share the triumph of success."

By the same letter we learn, that Br. K. Townsend has received and accepted the invitation of the Universalist Society of Arcadia, to become their pastor. POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

TO A BRIDE.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

Light of thy father's home! Thou vesper star,
That made the twilight of his years so bright!
Thy gentle love—beaming as soft, as star,
O'er wave and flower, as the unsullied light
That streams from heavenly fountains, thro' the bowers
Of citra and of orange, o'er the glades,
And thro' the grottoes dim, where else no flowers
Had smiled—late from its better course had strayed
And given sunshine to a path of shade.

Fair bride! they miss thee at thy childhood's home!
When purple clouds are fading in the sky,
And the red sun first lights the azure dome,
They miss the purer brightness of thine eye!
Thy little feet, with music in their tread,
Now speed our mission to another's heart;
Around his home, the light of love is shed,
And there, alas! has lost its better part;
Surely, his spell had more than magic art!

She misses thee, that enter of thy youth!
Thou star of that dear home, whose lovely peace
Sifts the type of a celestial life, where truth,
And love, and joy, will never, never cease!
Beautiful creation! How her warm, fond heart,
Must grieve to lose thy presence and thy care;
Flowers of one stalk! you henceforth bloom apart;
But Heaven will every broken link repair—
Flowers rived on earth, will bloom together there!

Brightness is ever round thee, dear one! joy,
Such as a heart like thine, disposed to look
On light rather than darkness, will employ
In deeds of good to others, making the book
Of life, rich with many a page of love,
Where thou hast written! Be thy new path bright,
And full of roses! Wisdom from above
Guide thee in truth and meekness, and in light
Over all the dreariness of sorrow's night!

Shirley village, Mass.

THE SCHOOL MASTER.

Look at this picture—a might be true universally. It is a morning in spring. The air is alive with birds, and the odor of flowers; the eye is greeted on every side by the green blades of grass, and the expanding leaf; nature is rejoicing in her youth. Upon a gentle rise of ground, fronting a lake, and shaded by venerable elms, stands a building as peculiar in its form, and as sacred in its uses, as a church. It is the school-house of pedagogy, where he dispenses rules of grammar, rules of decorum and morality, and a rule of life. His disciples are scattered upon the green, awaiting his approach, at their guns or at their studies, upon the benches under the trees. He comes. He is greeted with a universal smile. He wakes on, not before nor behind, but along with his pupils to the house, chattering pleasantly as he goes of their games, or of the morning. Perhaps he discounts of the good reas of God, in creating so beautiful a world for his creatures; or perhaps he is engaged in examining a bunch of flowers, just presented to him by a blushing boy, whose neat dress and classical face already begin to show the empire of mind over matter. Their places are taken not in sneaking fear or in riotous confusion, but politely, as one would enter the house of a gentleman. The morning thanksgiving is said and duty proceeds; for duty began at the door and on the way. Our pedagogue is in the midst of young friends who love him and depend upon him. His heart gives back a sympathy. He learns, himself, while he teaches others. He discovers a new beauty, or runs into a new vein of thought, before he is aware. Mind is glowing about him. The soul is there is mind. The world and its cares are silent. He forgets that there are other beings in the world except himself and his pupils; so absorbing is this communion of minds. He feels with Hazlitt, that the study of classics is a discipline of humanity; it gives man a better view; it accustoms the mind to take an interest in things foreign to itself; to love virtue for its own sake; to prefer fame to life, and glory to riches; and to fix the thoughts on the remote and permanent, instead of narrow and fleeting objects. It teaches us to believe that there is something really great and excellent in the world, surviving all the shocks of accident and fluctuations of opinion, and raising us above that low and servile fear which bows only to present power and upstart authority. The duties close, and free from the rack of business, the concern for stocks and ships, and accidents by flood and field, with a mind happy and elevated by a consciousness of duties faithfully discharged, he may devote himself as taste or inclination way prompt. If any occupation approaches the otium cum dignitate it is this; for occupation, of some sort, there must always be, to keep the faculties healthy and vigorous. Every man, if he knows his own interest, however wealthy or independent, will have some fixed, regular pursuit, that shall employ fixed hours; and then his faculties will be systematized to enjoy rationally the remainder of his time. It is the privilege of the pedagogue that he enjoys this aid. His labors but fit him the better, by governing others, to govern himself; by explaining minutely to others, he gains and fixes habits of minute investigation in his own private pursuits. But, more than all, he has golden views of his profession. He feels that he is giving impulses to the world in the persons of his pupils, though their effect may be seen long after he himself shall be forgotten. Perhaps he may be mentioned after he is dead—the thought makes him grateful—as having assisted in forming the mind of some village Hampden or of the future historian or saviour of his country; but for this he is not anxious.—Knickerbocker.

PLEASURES OF LIFE.

"The beautiful age, for a frivolous being is youth; for the ambitious, maturity; for the recluse, old age; for a reasonable man each age; for heaven has reserved peculiar pleasures for each."

So writes a French philosopher—a real one, too.—His remarks are worthy remembrance. How many on earth are always dissatisfied with the present, but look forward with strong and impatient desire for happiness in the future! Mistaken souls; they might be happy in the present time, could they only realize the value of the present. The young and gay imagine happiness when certain years have passed over them. These years roll on; they look forward still, or else with their young hours back again. But happiness comes not; and the only reason is this, they have forgotten that pleasure may be realized now, and thus life be rendered always happy. We must first learn to be happy with ourselves—to desire our own company in preference to all others, so that we never shall be alone. If we can not do this, then there is a deficiency somewhere within, which needs filling up. They who commune with their own hearts, and strive to be happy by being virtuous and free, will find pleasures all the way along their journey of existence. They will find, as above stated, that for a reasonable man each age is one of pleasure. Will the young think of this?—Star in the East.

A WONDERFUL SIGHT.

A jolly Jack-tar having strayed into Atkins' show at Bartholomew fair, to have a look at the wild beasts, was much struck with the sight of a lion and tiger in the same den. "Why Jack," said he to a messmate, who was chewing a quid in silent amazement, "I shouldn't wonder if next year they were to carry about a sailor and a marine living peaceably together! 'Ay,' said his married companion, "or a man and wife."

When Queen Elizabeth died, 3000 dresses were found in her wardrobe—all very costly and splendid. She wore a new one almost every day and never gave them away. It cost George IV. $25,000 a year for his robes, and when he died his old clothes were sold for $75,000!

DEATHS.

In this city, on the 5th inst., HELEN A., daughter of Thomas L. Kingsley, aged 15 months.

In East Bloomfield, August 20th, JULIETTA M. PIERCE, daughter of Stephen and Lydia Pierce, aged 14 months. The funeral was held upon the same day in the Universalist meeting-house, and an address delivered by Br. O. Roberts.

In Concord, Erie county, August 5th, Miss ORDELIA WOODWARD, daughter of Ira Woodward, aged about 16 years. Sermon by Br. Lewis.

In Verona, on the 11th ult., Miss SARAH MARIA PECKHAM, aged 14 years, daughter of William and Henrietta Peckham. Nursed in the doctrine of the restitution, she bore the sufferings of the consumption with patience, and died without fear, in the hope of future life and peace. Her parents are sustained under this bereavement by the faith of the ultimate salvation of the human race.

A discourse was delivered at her funeral to a large concourse of citizens and friends of the family, from 2 Cor. x: 20. Con.

In Nelson, on July 31st, Mrs. LUCY MORY, aged 70 years. Her husband, Richard Mory, long since departed this life, and was gathered to his fathers and the prophets. He left a large estate to his widow and children—but her eyes are now closed in death, and we trust she has gone to a better world than this. Sermon by Br. Woolley, from Isaiah 1: 10, 11.

THE CAUSES OF INFIDELITY REMOVED...NO. IX.

BY S. R. SMITH.

NATURE OF INSPIRATION.

The reader probably feels desirous, by this time, to know how many causes of unbelief he may yet have to wade through, before he arrives at the subject proposed—the internal evidences of Christianity. And as it is reasonable that he should receive an answer, he is assured, that when the utter fallacy of all the causes of infidelity which originate not in the doctrines of Christianity, but in its corruptions, has been shown, the subject shall receive due attention. We would see the ground cleared of the rubbish, which has been accumulated by negligence or folly, so that however small or incomplete our humble edifice may be, it shall have a foundation which we think secure. Every error that can be removed from the Christian's creed, annihilates one cause of skepticism or infidelity. And hence this examination will be continued somewhat further, because we are satisfied that it may be beneficial to two classes of persons—whose opinions, feelings, and prejudices are the most opposite imaginable—the one, a Christian who believes too much, because more than the Scriptures require of him; and the other, a skeptic who doubts every thing, or an infidel who believes nothing. Neither of these, probably, will approve of this interference with their favorite theories; but still, if the errors of the one produce, as is believed, those of the other, neither ought to complain of an attempt to set both in the right. What has been said thus far, was with that express view—and the same course will be persisted in, so long as there is found a remaining item of any consequence, which constitutes a "loop to hang a doubt on."

One important consequence of maintaining that every word of the Bible was dictated and written by the positive inspiration of God, is—that it involves an objection to the credibility of the Scriptures, in the question, why did not the evangelists record the same facts, and in precisely the same language? It is well known, that unbelievers avail themselves of this, with much apparent satisfaction. Nor is it by any means easy to perceive why, if the divine spirit dictated both the matter and the manner in which it should be communicated, the facts should not be related in all respects alike. But that the several evangelists have not recorded the same facts in all instances, nor, in every case, used the same language, is undeniable. Nor have we ever seen a satisfactory reason for this circumstance, on the supposition that they wrote by immediate inspiration. Parallels drawn from profane history, do not reach the case; they may perfectly illustrate every thing concerning it, except what relates to the agency or energy by which the writers were influenced. The attention of different individuals as men, might be directed to different objects, and of course partial differences might occur in their statements respecting any general truth; but this is no criterion by which the same men must act, when expressly inspired to record a train of given events. It seems most natural to suppose, that they would make the relation with minute uniformity in every particular.

Hence it appears, that if the Christian maintains the positive inspiration of every part of the Bible, the discrepancies in the evangelical history, may be urged as incompatible with such influences. If, on the other hand, he attempts to vindicate these by parallels drawn from secular writings, it may be objected that the cases do not admit of the comparison. Thus, which ever way the advocate of the entire inspiration of the Scriptures turns, he seems destined to take a position calculated to induce the skeptic to reject both the Bible and the creed together.

Under these considerations, we may be allowed to ask—would it not be a favor alike beneficial to the believer so situated, and to the unbeliever, that a system of divine truth, based upon the plainest maxims of common sense, and supported by the testimony of revelation, should be presented—one which neither involves the difficulties above noticed, nor can encourage, even remotely, the objections of the skeptic? Such a system was presented in the last preceding article of this series—in which it was shown that many parts of the sacred writings required no inspiration, and made no pretensions to any; and that where inspiration was obviously given, it related to the matter, or general truth, and not to the manner in which it was communicated. It is believed that this is the true state of the subject, and that it places the Scriptures on their native ground of fitness and consistency, and at the same time beyond the reach of any well-founded objection to the inspiration of their fundamental doctrines. For it leaves every writer of the Bible, at perfect liberty to relate the truths committed to him, in his own peculiar way, and to use such forms of expression as were congenial with his habits of life, or the state of his education.

From these causes, some are more particular than others, even in their account of the same transactions. Some wrote in lofty, some in chaste, and all in the earnest, simple, and unaffected style of honest men, whose chief concern was to state the truth. They never appear solicitous about the result of their statements, and never, in any instance, court the belief of a single fellow-being. The evangelists, especially, relate in simple and unostentatious terms, facts to which they were eye and ear witnesses, or of which they had "perfect knowledge from the beginning." This is the grand reason of all the discrepancies of which we hear so much, and concerning which, those who object to them generally know so very little. And yet, we venture to say that were it not for those very discrepancies, we should hear a much more confident voice of objection against the New Testament, than infidelity has yet dared to raise.

Let it be supposed that the four evangelists are witnesses on the stand, in one of our high courts of judicature. And let it be further supposed, that the presiding judge is one of those who object to the Gospel history, because there is not a circumstantial and verbal agreement in the statement of all the writers. Now let it be also supposed that these four persons bear witness in a given case, as they have done in the New Testament—each one relating in his own peculiar manner, the facts which came under his own observation, or of which he had acquired a full knowledge from unquestionable sources. Would not that judge think better of such testimony, and would he not so inform the jury, than if he had been in all respects precisely the same? No man can doubt this; and it is believed that none will venture to deny, that this is the true course of procedure, as well as the most consistent. And such is the actual and daily course, in which even infidels as well as all other men proceed, in all the transactions of common life. They are constantly doing this, without once finding fault, or so much as suspecting that there is any occasion of complaint. Nay, more—they would resent as readily, and with as much warmth, any attempt at impeachment of the purity of their motives or veracity, under these very circumstances, as any other class of men in the universe.

For shame, then—what is all this noise about some trifling discrepancies in the Gospel history—these pertinacious endeavors to invalidate the testimony of the evangelists! The great and only important subjects which they have recorded, afford no instance of disagreement; nor any pretext on which to suspend a doubt, either of their own integrity, or the truth of their statements. No doubt some unbelievers would be pleased to have had the same account verbatim, from each of the evangelists—they would then have had something to countenance their cavils. But as it is, they must make the best of it, and so keep up their complaints, because, forsooth, it is not more to their liking. We have heard of a petulant husband, who determined to quarrel with his better half, whether she did right or wrong. True, he preferred to have her do wrong, because it kept him in countenance; but still, he could and would find fault, even when she did right, because such was his fixed determination. Such seems to be the disposition of some unbelievers—they have unfortunately acquired the habit of fault-finding with the Bible, and with those who believe in its truth; and they have become too testy and precipitate to ascertain with much care, whether their objections are well or ill-founded.

From the considerations here offered, it seems difficult to imagine any ground of serious objection to the truth of the Gospel history; since uniformity in every particular, is not to be expected where a number of men relate, independently of each other, the important facts of any given train of events. For it is too well known to require proof, that different minds are variously constituted, and that they are, in consequence, differently influenced by the same facts, and same general circumstances. And so great is this difference in mental constitution, that there are innumerable examples in which men draw very dissimilar or even opposite conclusions from the same general premises. The religious opinions of mankind, who appeal to the same records in vindication and support of their respective theories, may be taken as a prominent illustration of this general truth. It is not singular or extraordinary, then, that the various incidents which occurred during the ministry of Jesus, should affect the minds and feelings of his followers in a different manner. It is rather to be wondered at, that there should be so general, and in all important respects, so entire a uniformity in their statements. Each one evidently set down those particulars, which most forcibly impressed, or most deeply interested him, apparently overlooking some incidents which, in turn, struck some other mind as worthy of special regard and consideration. What was omitted by one, is thus naturally and properly supplied by another—and that, without any impeachment of the candor or veracity of either.

We are fully aware that these views are not ascertained by many—perhaps a majority of professing Christians. But surely, as Christians, we are under no moral obligations to believe what the Bible, the only legitimate rule of faith, never requires. And especially, when such belief involves very serious objections, and actually induces many to reject the Scriptures as a system of revelation. It may be, and no doubt is true, that un-as we, may judge with lenity her writings. We have no Juvenile department, so called; but are happy at all times to publish articles calculated to amuse, interest and instruct our little brethren and sisters, and make them early acquainted with "the way, the truth, and the life" of our holy religion. A. B. G.]

"As you have no Juvenile department, I am afraid this will appear rather simple. As I never had the self-confidence to urge the publication of any of my writings, I shall be always as gratified at the suppression of a piece as at its appearance; nor need you fear wounding my feelings by so doing, for it is my motto when I fail, to try again. Nor should I wonder if I always failed, and perhaps you would not if you knew the disadvantages under which I have labored. I have been the victim of disease for 28 years, and it is owing to a recent attack, that the letter I send you is so miserably written, as my strength was not sufficient when I began it. My health is now amending, and I trouble you with this scrawl, partly as an apology for the pooriness of that writing. Perhaps most people would advise me throw aside my pen, since it is evident that I am not qualified to wield it with success. To such I might say, that my superficial knowledge, is not owing to a lack of spirit or diligence, but rather a lack of means. Providence cast my lot in the vale of poverty, and at the age of seven years I lost my father, and fell a victim to severe disease, which deprived me of the advantages of education, other than I might obtain from books alone. After the age of 16 I attended school five months, and this is the amount of my education, except what I attended in the summer season before the age of 7. I read fluently at the age of 4. You may ask what is all this egotism for? It is merely asking charity of you; that is, that you will exercise lenity in judging of me and my productions, and not think that I write to gratify a vain pride. The truth is, I write for pastime, though I feel that my mind is cramped—that to me the fountains of knowledge are sealed."

"Ma" said a little lad of ten years of age, after sitting thoughtfully for some time, "Mr. D. says God is angry with me, and that I shall be tormented in fire and brimstone when I die, if I do not get religion."

Mother. Well, my love, did he tell you what to do in order to get religion?

Boy. Yes. He said I must go to meeting and be prayed for; and then God would not be angry with me any more.

M. Has God ever caused you any misery, that should make you think him angry? Has he not blessed you with kind parents and friends to protect you in childhood, and given you sight, hearing, and taste, to relish all the varied bounties of nature?

B. Yes. But Mr. D. did not say that God would ever hurt me in this world, but when I died, would shut me up in everlasting misery.

M. Well, my child, the Bible says no such thing. Do you not remember how Cain was immediately banished from the presence of the Lord because he slew Abel? How Korah, Dathan and Abiram were destroyed by an earthquake, because they rebelled against the Lord? and Annanias and Sapphira were struck dead for lying, not to men but to God? And now, tell me how you feel when you are revengeful. Do you think you feel as you ought?

B. No, ma, for I ought not to wish any body harm; but when I am revengeful, I always strive to hurt the one I am angry with.

M. You must remember that the Scriptures represent the Deity as being perfect in all his attributes, and if it were true that God is revengefully angry at any one, it would certainly be right for you to desire revenge, when any one ill-treated you. But it is never right for you to be in a passion for then you lose command of yourself, and are very likely to perform some mischief that will cause you sorrow when you come to reflect upon it. And if it were right to do so, you would feel no remorse for it. Beside this, you are always unhappy when in a passion; you are the sport of an evil spirit for the time, who is deceiving you with the idea that you will gain happiness by gratifying a revengeful disposition; when the fact is, there is no real enjoyment in anything that is not pure and good. You will perceive as you grow older, that it does not look reasonable to suppose that the Creator of the universe, who is infinite in wisdom, power and goodness, should create a race of beings constitutionally frail, and then revengefully judge them to endless torture for crimes which he knew they would commit if they were created.

B. Is there no harm, then, in sin? And will not God punish mankind for sinning?

M. Most certainly there is harm in sin, and God will punish men for all the sins they commit; but revenge does not belong to justice but to malice—whereas love and goodness require that adequate, not endless punishment shall be awarded to each crime. He who can not err has declared that though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished; and the Bible joins with all past experience in teaching, that in keeping the commandments of God there is great recompense of reward. Such punishment is for the good of the sufferer—not for revenge. Be just in all you do, be merciful to every creature, follow truth with all men, and never allow passion to take the reins from reason; and you shall have peace of mind, which is better than a feast.

THE PHYSICIAN.

No avocation is fraught with greater difficulties than the physician's. The multifarious and heart-rending scenes he has to encounter in the routine of his professional career, are many and various, and known only by experimental knowledge. Yet, amid all the dismal and soul-depressing series of events, by which his life is characterized, there occurs, occasionally, some action which "lights up a smile on the aspect of woe." When wearied and oppressed by the cares incident to his occupation—when assailed by the contumely of an unfeeling and selfish world—it is then the heart sinks under its burden, and the mind despairs. Still, in these hours of mildew and blight, a ray of consolation is found. The consciousness of having done our duty, will calm the ruffled water of life, and assuage the bitterness of adversity.

Accompany the physician to the bedside of the sick and dying—hear the groans of his patient, the lamentations of friends, the solicitude of relations; behold him watch with never-ceasing care, the critical period which will terminate either in recovery or death. Language is inadequate to convey the thrilling sensations which, at such times, agitate the physician's bosom. All are looking up to him with anxious eyes, and expect from his hands sympathy and relief!

Oh, how often have I then implored the assistance of my Redeemer! I have been willing to lay down my life, many a time, as a recompense, provided I could relieve one soul from death—even that of my most bitter enemy. For if there is any thing that will soften the heart, and melt it down into humanity, that thing is a death-bed scene. All revenge and enmity will be laid aside—the mind be absorbed in the intensity of feeling and and thought—thoughts of death, eternity, and salvation. It is then we are more deeply impressed with the vivifying influence of that Religion which is good tidings to all people. It is of great utility to the distressed, and equally so to the comforter. It is the sine qua non of consolation. All consolatory efforts of the physician would be paralyzed, were it not for the glorious assurance, that we have A PHYSICIAN who is able and willing to restore all mankind from the impurity of the flesh, and clothe them in robes, washed and made white in the blood of the lamb.

A PHYSICIAN.

QUERY—If earthly suffering, which is but momentary, excites such pathos in the breast of us mortals, can it be possible for that Being whose soul and essence is Love, to consign any of his offspring to endless misery?—"Can man be more pure than his Maker?"

South Venice, August, 1837.

ROMANS 1:20.

BY REV. N. DOOLITTLE.

"For the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made."

Every rational human being knows that he did not create himself, and consequently must have had a Creator. In our bodies, which are fearfully and wonderfully made, as well as in the arrangement and operation of the vast machinery of nature, we see evidence of a forming hand and a contriving mind. Contrivance and design evince intelligence. Hence the Being that ushered all worlds and beings into existence, must be intelligent. This being we call God. We adore him as the Creator and moral Governor of the universe. We revere him as the Preserver and Benefactor of all that live. Hence, as the foundation of all pure religion, we believe in the existence of one God. We ascribe to him all possible perfection. We regard him as worthy the everlasting gratitude and homage of all moral beings—by whom and for whom all are and were created.

We look upon the page of nature. There God in fairest characters has written the evidence of his divine attributes. Among the crowning glories of the high and holy one, we recognize power, wisdom, and goodness.

Do you ask proof that God is almighty in power? Contemplate the stupendous globe—its lofty mountains, extended plains, majestic rivers, and mirrored lakes—listen to the rumbling of the earthquake, and the roar of the distant thunder—go, stand upon the shore of the wide-rolling ocean, behold its mighty billows tempest-tossed to the skies—go out in the stillly silence of night, and lift thy eyes to the heavens, the handywork of the great Architect—reflect upon that countless system of worlds which whirl their appointed rounds in the regions of endless space. Surely that Being who reared the sublime pillars of the universe—who spake and it was done—who said "let there be light, and there was light"—who gave existence to all worlds, and life and breath to the innumerable variety of beings that inhabit them, must be infinite in power.

Do you want evidence that God is infinite in wisdom? It is seen in the vegetable world—in the organization of the animal kingdom—in the adaptation of the faculties of each to the end designed; moreover, of each department to its respective elements—in the laws by which each is controlled—also in the order and harmony pervading the planetary system, each orb moving on in that path marked out in the beginning.

"In reason's ear they all rejoice,
And utter forth a glorious voice,
Forever singing, as they shine,
The hand that made us is divine."

Do you ask for the proofs of his goodness? Analyse the constitution of man. See with what infinite skill each faculty is fitted for its use, and made conducive to the happiness of the individual. What abundant evidence is discovered in every department of animated nature, that existence was bestowed upon all, that existence might prove a blessing. How beautifully is this world fitted up for our present habitation. How many objects has God hung out on the fair face of his creation, to excite in our minds emotions of sublimity and delight. He adjusts the striking points of the landscape, and hangs the snowy cloud upon the distant mountain. He alternately clothes the earth in the garments of Spring, in the robes of Summer, the gorgeous habiliments of Autumn, and the snowy dress of Winter. How excellent, O Lord, is thy loving-kindness in the sunshine, in the rain, and fruitful seasons! With an unsparing hand the great and beneficent Parent supplies the returning wants of all in air, earth, and ocean!

Is farther evidence wanted of his power, wisdom, and goodness? Go to the record of his truth. Attend to the sublime teachings of the Son of God, appointed to reveal the moral perfections of his Father and our Father—of his God and our God—to impart that light which nature failed to afford—which sages and philosophers sought, but never found. Mark the energies of that power which in vindication of his divine mission, gave speech to the dumb, sight to the blind, strength to the lame, health to the sick, and life to the dead. Reflect on the potency of that word which enabled the foolish to confound the wise and mighty—which brought the erring and polluted children of men from darkness to light, and from the power and dominion of satan to the service of the living God. Behold the wisdom of God in its adaptation to the moral wants and circumstances of mankind in every clime. That Being alone who gave man his moral constitution, and consequently knew what was in him, must have inspired the word of truth, the Gospel of our salvation.

Be not faithless, then, but believing, Adore and serve the King eternal, immortal, invisible, and only wise. Rejoice in that goodness that dictated the glorious and wonderful plan of redemption.

"The showers and dews in all their store,
Drinking the pastures o'er and o'er,
Are not so copious as that grace
Which sanctifies and saves our race."

What conclusions shall we draw from these premises? Inevitably the following: God being infinitely wise, he knows all things—he ordained the end from the beginning. The end can never be different from his divine determination. For infinite power being a divine attribute, the designs of infinite wisdom cannot be frustrated. The counsel of Jehovah must stand, and he will do all his pleasure. Infinite wisdom would not create without a design. And God being infinite in goodness, his design in giving existence to all sentient and moral beings, must be good, and consequently all must finally be made happy.

But we have a sure word of prophecy: "God having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself, that in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and on earth, even in him." "Who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." The glorious work will be done—let all heaven and earth rejoice!

"No sigh, no murmur, the wide world shall hear;
From every face he'll wipe off every tear;
In adamant chains shall sin be bound,
And hell's grim tyrant feel the eternal wound."

If these things are so—if God has created us, and not we ourselves—if to him we are indebted for all those blessings which have afforded us light, and hope, and joy, and peace—if he designs to guide us through this imperfect world, and finally to purify us from all earthly corruption and moral pollution—to give us a new and heavenly constitution—to crown us with glory, honor, immortality, and eternal life—it follows, clear as light, that it is our duty to love him as our almighty Father, Friend, and Benefactor; because he first loved us—to conform our lives to his most holy will—to perform what he has required, and abstain from what he has forbidden. "If there be any virtue, if there be any praise, think on these things."

"CONSIDER THE LILIES, HOW THEY GROW."—Jesus.

I was lately walking through a field of pasture with a gentleman who pointed out to my attention several patches, in which the leaves of the grass had been picked by the animals which grazed there, while the seed-stalks or stems had been left untouched. This, we both agreed in thinking a provision of Nature—that is Nature's God—to secure the clothing of the fields with grass, so that there might be enough for man and beast. While the leaf is eaten, the seed is preserved to propagate the plant for another year. This observation must have been made often, I doubt not; but with the subject under my eye, and with an intelligent companion, the remark of my friend had all the freshness and force of originality.

I mention the occurrence in the hope that many who read it, may be led into such a train of thought, as shall result in some pleasing and profitable reflections—that many may be induced to consider the grasses, how and why they grow."

7. The following resolution was proposed by Br. N. Doolittle, and unanimously adopted—

Resolved, that in the opinion of this Council, the organization of a society for the relief of the widows and orphans of deceased Universalist ministers, as proposed at the last annual meeting of this body, would fail of meeting the object contemplated; and therefore we deem it inadvisable, under present circumstances, that such a society should be formed.

8. The committee of discipline for the last year made the following report, which was accepted.

Whereas Oliver E. West, at the last session of this body, received a letter of fellowship as a preacher of the Gospel, with the understanding, from information then received, that said West possessed the requisite qualifications—and whereas convincing evidence has been received by the committee of discipline, that said West was at that time unworthy, and destitute of the proper moral qualifications for the ministry, therefore in our opinion fellowship should be withdrawn from him."

9. The committee on letters of fellowship and ordination, reported in favor of granting letters of fellowship to Ichabod B. Sharp, Samuel P. Lauders, and William Rounseville. Report adopted.

* I do not like to alter a resolution, or comment on it, but feeling confident this does not express the meaning of the Council, I notice it. It does not withdraw fellowship from Mr. West, but only expresses the opinion of the Council that it should be done. I believe they meant to do it. What says the Standing Clerk's Record? A. E. G.

Ministers present.—G. Messinger, South Bainbridge; W. M. Delong, Lebanon; N. Doolittle, Oxford; J. S. Sherburne, South Oxford; E. E. Gudd, Walton; T. S. Bartholomew, J. S. Palmer, Brooklyn, Pa.; Archelus Green, H. Green, Virgil; W. Ballard, Cortland; W. Rounsaville, Harford; C. S. Brown, A. G. Clark, Lisle; S. P. Launders, Prompton, Pa.; I. B. Sharp, Pharsalia.

Bebee, A. Hall, Pitcher; E. Tarbell, R. Beadle, Smithville and Greene; K. Hinman, A. Landers, Upper Lisle; E. Gorton, North Norwich.

REMARKS.—Our meeting was truly a joyous occasion—a time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord.—We had a large congregation, the house, especially on the last day, being filled to overflowing. The glorious Gospel of the blessed God was there proclaimed in all its purity and glory; and it rejoiced our hearts to see the fixed attention which was paid by the congregation, to the words of life, as they were proclaimed by the messenger of glad tidings. The duty and importance of Universalists living on the principles of their doctrine, was earnestly and powerfully insisted on. Joy was depicted in every countenance. All seemed to feel the spirit-stirring power of that Gospel which is “glad tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people,” and which brings “peace on earth, and good will to men.” Our Council was conducted with perfect unanimity of feeling and sentiment, and no root of bitterness was there to mar that perfect union and harmony which ought to exist among brethren.

May our common Father and Lord of all bless the means which were then employed for the furtherance of the Gospel, to the extension of Christ's kingdom on earth. Amen. EVERET E. GUILD.

STATISTICS OF UNIVERSALISM.

IN THE STATE OF NEW-YORK—FOR 1837.

To prevent the crowd of documents connected with the proceedings of the United States Convention, I anticipate their publication, so far as this State is concerned, by giving the statistics already in my possession. A condensed account of the statistics forwarded to me by the several Standing Clerks who have obligingly attended to my call for information, has been made out and forwarded to the General Convention; but as the minute information given by the Clerks themselves, will be most interesting and satisfactory to our readers generally, I here publish all the information I have received. Our brethren of the press can choose which they please, when they come to publish the Proceedings of the United States Convention.

I will here remark, that it would be best if the Standing Clerk of each Association would forward to our State Convention, at its annual session, a full statement of every item immediately connected with the history of each Association. Much that will be very interesting to our State Convention, is so in but a very trifling degree to the U. States Convention. Besides, there is not time in the United States Convention for reading a long, minute report from each State Convention. If the plan here proposed was adopted, the person appointed to prepare the annual report to the United States Convention, would have the materials of his task at a day early enough to make out the letter without inconvenience to himself.

I tender my thanks for the assistance derived from the writers of the several letters, from which I have derived the following statements. A. B. G.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.

The doctrine of the final salvation of the whole human race, was introduced to the notice of the religious community in western and central New-York, in the Fall of 1802. Previous to that time, the labors of the few preachers of Universalism who occasionally visited New-York, had been confined to the city, and the region on the east of the Hudson.

In the Fall of 1802, Mr. Edwin Ferris, a minister in fellowship with the General Convention of Universalists, visited, and the following year settled in, the town of Butternuts, Otsego county. The next year (1804) another preacher from New-England, (M. T. Woolley,) settled in Hartwick, in the same county. And in June, 1805, Mr. N. Stacy visited and preached in several places in Oneida and Chenango counties, and formed societies in Whitestown and Hamilton. A society had, in the mean time, been formed in Hartwick, a few weeks previous.

In July, A. D. 1805, a General Conference of Universalists was held in Burlington, Otsego county, at which it was—“Resolved, That considering the present prospect of the growth of Universalism in this country, it is proper to organize an Association; and that application be made to the General Convention of Universalists of the New-England States and others, for counsel, and to organize an Association, should it deem proper.” Messrs. Woolley and Stacy were appointed a committee to present this resolution to the Convention, which approved of the proceedings of the Conference, and appointed Messrs. H. Ballou, W. Farwell, and J. Flagg, to assist in the organization of the Association.

Accordingly, on the 5th day of June, 1806, being the first Wednesday in the month, the committee from the General Convention, the ministers from the vicinity, and delegates from the societies in Whitestown, Hamilton, and Hartwick, assembled in the town of Columbus, Chenango county, and proceeded to organize “The Western Association of Universalists in the State of New-York.”

At this time, the Association comprised but the three societies named; and its limits embraced the whole extent of country West of the Hudson river, in New-York, and the contiguous parts of Pennsylvania. Fellowship was granted to a society in Stamford, Delaware county, and one of the preachers (M. T. Woolley) was suspended from membership at this session.

At the session of the Association in Sherburne, Chenango county, 1814, a request was made and granted, for the organization of a branch association, to embrace the country west of the Cayuga Lake, and extending across the State. This branch was duly organized in August following, and entitled the “Genesee Branch of the Western Association of Universalists.” Societies were now scattered throughout the whole extent of country, from the Hudson river to the vicinity of Lake Erie, a distance of 300 miles. And the Western Association embosomed in its fellowship, fifteen churches and organized societies. But among these, there was not one that owned a meeting-house—and there were but two or three Union houses in which they claimed any particular right. Fellowship had been given to ten or twelve preachers, and nearly an equal number had removed from New-England and located themselves in different parts of the State. Several young men had commenced as evangelists, and some six or eight preachers from the Baptists and Methodists, were now preaching the Restoration.

It was recommended at the session of 1822, to the friends in Jefferson county, and to those of Chenango county and vicinity, to form branch associations in their respective sections. Accordingly in the Fall of 1823, three branch Associations were formed, viz.: the Chenango, the Black River, and the Cayuga Associations.

At this time, notwithstanding the Genesee Branch had existed eight years, the Western Association comprised forty-nine organized churches and societies, thirty-two preachers, and but four meeting-houses, viz., in New-Hartford, Clinton, Otsego, and Madison.

The limits of the Association were now diminished by the counties of Delaware, Broome, and Chenango on the South, by those of Lewis and Jefferson on the North, and Onondaga and Cayuga on the West. Its territorial extent was, however, immense, and still subjected some of the delegates to a journey of one hundred or two hundred miles. By the organization of the three branches this year, about fifteen societies were set off within their respective limits, and nearly the same number of preachers.

On the organization of the State Convention, in 1825, a committee was appointed to fix more precisely the limits of the Association. Their report was made to the Council at the session of 1826. In the mean time, the name of the “Western Association” was changed to that of Central, and its limits fixed to the counties of Madison, Oneida, Otsego, Herkimer, Montgomery, Schoharie, and Schenectada. In the course of the preceding year, the “Hudson River Association” was formed, and comprised the counties adjacent. By this arrangement, the number of societies was reduced to about twenty, and that of the preachers, to twelve or fifteen, within the Central Association.

In the course of this year, (1826,) the “Conventional,” now “Mohawk River Association,” was formed, and comprised parts of the counties of Oneida, Herkimer, and Lewis. And in 1832, by setting off the “Otsego Association,” the Central Association was reduced to its present limits—the county of Madison, and that part of Oneida lying South of the Mohawk river. It now (1837) has fifteen societies, ten preachers, and nine meeting-houses.

S. R. SMITH,

Clerk of Central Association.

ONTARIO ASSOCIATION.

Br. K. Townsend, the Standing Clerk of this Association, says—“The present limits of the Ontario Association, (formerly Genesee,) include all west of Cayuga and Seneca counties—east of Genesee river—north of the south lines of Genesee, Bristol, Livingston, etc.; and on the north is bounded by lake Ontario.” It was organized in 1814 as the “Genesee Branch of the Western Association”—“in 1831, its limits were fixed as at present, and in 1835, its name was changed” to that it now bears.

The number of meeting-houses, etc., within its limits at its organization, is not known—but it must have been few of either. “There are now eight houses for public worship, two more are being erected, and one has lately been purchased. There are also eleven preachers now in its limits. The increase during the past year, has been—of preachers, none; societies, two, perhaps more; meeting-houses, the two now being erected, and the one purchased. Six societies are supplied with preaching the whole time; four, one half of the time, and one, one quarter.” “The number supplied with occasional preaching, is not certainly known—it is considerable, however. Neither can it be ascertained what number is destitute of preaching.”

“There are a number of places where we have a few friends, and where occasional preaching is required—in one place they have preaching one half of the time, where they have no organization.”

“This account does not include the labors of Brs. H. Roberts and Miles, and is undoubtedly below the truth—in other words, there is more preaching in societies than I have mentioned.”

NIAGARA ASSOCIATION.

In giving the information received respecting this Association, I prefer doing it in the words of the Standing Clerk.

Revolution Centre, August 22d, 1837.

Br. Grosh—In answer to the circular, addressed to the “Standing Clerks” of the Universalist Associations in the State of New-York, I shall observe the order marked out by you in your request, and comply with the same as far as possible.

1. The limits of the Niagara Association comprise within its territory, the counties of Niagara, Orleans, and that part of Monroe west of the Genesee river; being 70 miles in length by about 20 in breadth.

2. This Association was formed in the year 1831, at which time it embraced all of Western New-York west of the Genesee river. In October, 1833, it was again divided, and reduced to its present limits.

3. At its organization, there were no churches. There were, however, (I speak now of its present limits.) I believe, three societies and only two preachers, Br. Whitnall and myself. Members and attendants on meeting, not known, but small congregations; in some three or four places, a moderate sized school-house full in good weather.

4. There was only one meeting-house in this Association when formed, and that not used. This was located in Parma. We had no legal claim on any other.

5. The present number of churches is three—one at Clarendon, one at Shelby, and one at Ridgeway; societies ten, and one or two dead ones. Two of the ten are rather sickly—have the ague, but no fever. Congregations every where we can find time to preach, I may say in every school district. Preachers, at present located in this Association, eight—one of whom is superannuated—two that do not preach at present, being out of employ, or not able to support themselves by preaching—one, just commenced, preaches a part of the time—the rest steadily. Members of societies, not known—attendants, not known, any farther than to say very good, a great increase.

6. The number of Universalist meeting-houses is five—Union none.

7. The increase of churches, three; societies, say seven; congregations, not known; preachers, six; meeting-houses, four, since the Association was formed. Increase during the last year, one church, one society, one preacher, and two meeting-houses.

8. The number of societies that have preaching all the time, fifteen; the number that have preaching half of the time, three; and the number that have preaching a quarter, two—the remainder have only occasional preaching.

Our friends in Lewiston have a fine meeting-house, and though not organized into a society, intend to support preaching all the time, as soon as convenient or possible. Yours, C. HAMMOND.

CHENANGO ASSOCIATION.

The report of the Standing Clerk of this Association, is also so full and explicit as to speak for itself. I give it entire.

Br. GROSH—In accordance with your call on the Clerks of the several associations for information, I make the following report.

The Chenango Association was organized in August, 1823. It then included the territory embraced now by the Susquehanna Association. It now includes only the counties of Chenango, Delaware, and Broome. It originally included within its present bounds, but five societies and six preachers. It now has fifteen societies and ten preachers.

The Society in Oxford is composed of sixty members—have a meeting-house, and employ a preacher all the time. Bainbridge, one hundred members, own one-half of a Union house, have preaching one-half of the time. New-Berlin, thirty-three members, own one-half of two Union houses, (Great Brook and White Store,) have preaching one-quarter of the time. Columbus, thirty members, employ a preacher one-quarter. Norwich, members dependent saith not—preaching occasionally. Second Universalist Society in Norwich, ninety members, have erected and are now completing a meeting-house, have preaching one-quarter. East Pharsalia, forty members, have preaching one-quarter. McDonough, forty members, preaching one-quarter. Smithville and Greene, seventy members, preaching occasionally. Vestal and Union Society, thirty members, employ a preacher one-quarter. Hamden, employ a preacher one-quarter. Walton, twenty members, preaching one-quarter. Otsego, twenty members, preaching one-quarter. Preston, twenty-three members, no preacher. There is a society in Stamford, Delaware county, how many members I know not; they have occasional preaching. There are many believers in various parts of Delaware county, who have occasional preaching in their respective neighborhoods, but have not yet organized into societies. The sum total of the members of the above societies, I am of opinion, does not embrace more than one-third of the believers in the Abrahamic faith within the limits of this Association.

On the whole, our denomination was never in a more prosperous condition in this part of the heritage, than at the present. Never has there been the time when our friends were more awake to the importance of being perseveringly engaged in the advancement of our cause, than now.

N. DOOLITTLE.

Oxford, September 8th, 1837.

OTSEGO ASSOCIATION.

I am indebted to Br. M. B. Smith, the Standing Clerk of this Association, for the following particulars. They are less definite and full than could have been desired, but he promises in another year to make himself more intimately acquainted with the rise, progress, present state, and future prospects thereof, and then give a more explicit statement.

"The Otsego Association was formed out of parts of the Central Association, in September, 1834, and is bounded on the north by the Mohawk river, on the west by Madison and Chenango counties, on the south by Delaware county and on the east by Albany and Schoenectady counties." A meeting-house in Cooperstown, and another at Richfield Springs, have been erected since the Association was formed. [Query, and a Union house at Newville?] "The First Society of Universalists in Otsego, (Fly Creek,) own a meeting-house, and have preaching one-quarter. The Second Society, (Cooperstown,) a meeting-house, preaching all the time. East Richfield, meeting-house, preaching one-half. Fort Plain, meeting-house, preaching the whole time. Burlington, one-fourth of a Union house, preaching one-quarter. Cedarville, meeting-house, preaching one-half. Hartwick, no house, no preaching. Otsego, no house, preaching some. Warren and Springfield, unknown. Middlefield, unknown." The number of preachers at present residing in this Association, is believed to be six—making a total of six preachers, ten societies, and six meeting-houses—probably more of each rather than less.

NEW-YORK ASSOCIATION.

The following full and explicit statement was reluctantly condensed in my report to the United States Convention. It is here given in full, as it appeared in the Universalist Union.

DEAR BROTHER—I avail myself of this opportunity and take this method to respond to your call upon the Stated Clerks of the various Associations in this State, for information relative to the condition of our cause within their respective limits.

The New-York Association embraces within its limits the following counties: Ulster, Dutchess, Sullivan, Orange, Putnam, Westchester, Rockland, New-York, Kings, Queens, Suffolk, and Richmond, together with so much of the State of New-Jersey as shall find it agreeable and convenient for the time being, to act in concert with it. It was formed on the 10th of June, 1835, by division of the Hudson River Association, which had hitherto embraced its territory. Owing to its great extent, it was found necessary to divide, and a special session of the H. R. A. was held in New-York for that purpose, on the day before-mentioned. The number of societies now within the Association is eight, viz.: New-York 2, Newark, N. J. 1, Mt. Pleasant (Sing Sing) 1, Peekskill 1, North Salem 1, Poughkeepsie 1, Southold 1, and Huntington 1. Of these, 6 have churches. The Society in Poughkeepsie occupies the court-house of Dutchess county. That of Mt. Pleasant is destitute of a church, but occupies a large school-house, or such other place as may be most convenient.

The churches are owned exclusively by Universalists, with the exception of that in Peekskill, which, I think, is a Union house; but much the greater part of it belongs to our friends.

The number of preachers within the limits of the Association is six, viz.: C. F. Le Fevre and myself, New-York, L. C. Marvin, Newark, N. J., S. J. Hillyer, North Salem, I. D. Williamson, Poughkeepsie, and Thomas Miller, Southold, L. I. During the past year two churches have been erected, and one preacher, I. D. Williamson, has removed within our limits. Of our societies, four enjoy the constant services of their respective pastors, viz., the two societies in New-York and those of Newark and Poughkeepsie; and to this number will probably be added immediately, that of Southold. The society in North Salem has the services of Br. Hillyer one-half of the time; the other half he spends at Long Ridge, in the town of Stamford, Ct. The society in Huntington, has hitherto had preaching about one-quarter of the time, but will probably have more at the completion of its church, which will take place before the General Convention. The other societies are at present supplied only by occasional preaching.

Besides the societies now mentioned, we have many active and valuable friends, scattered over the whole territory of the Association. At many places preaching has been had, at some regularly for a considerable period, at others only occasionally, and at others still only a few times, or perhaps but once or twice. For instance, we have friends at Brooklyn, Hempstead, Babylon, Riverhead and Oysterponds, on Long Island; and in the counties along the Hudson there are many villages where our faith has been preached and received into good and true hearts. In those neighborhoods Br. Hillyer has travelled much, and would be able to give you more definite information than is in my power.

Altogether, our cause is more prosperous within the limits of this Association, than it has ever before been. Our congregations are generally steadily increasing in numbers, and would not suffer in point of respectability and worth in comparison with those of any other denomination.

Perhaps I ought to mention a small congregation of Dutch Universalists at a place called the Ponds, seven miles from Patterson, N. J. They are the descendants of the early Dutch settlers in that neighborhood, and now speak their native language, though most of them also read and speak the English. They are a worthy class of people, and seem strongly attached to the faith once delivered to the saints. A few of them have been Universalists for some years, but most of them would date their acquaintance with the doctrine within three or four years. They have a very convenient room on the second floor of a large school-house, where they have often enjoyed occasional preaching.

At Hightstown, N. J., on the rail-road, about half way between New-York and Philadelphia, there is also an interesting congregation. They own a church, and generally have preaching about one-quarter of the time. Neither of these societies is in fellowship with this Association, but as they are embraced in the limits of nobody in our connexion, I have taken the liberty of mentioning them.

There are many other items of information that I might furnish you, but I presume they would not be of such a nature as to contribute anything to the object you wish to effect.

I am, dear brother, very respectfully yours,

THOMAS J. SAWYER,
Standing Clerk of N. Y. Association.

"THE AGE WE LIVE IN."

However trite the remark may be; howsoever often commented upon by the tongue and the pen; we, certainly, live in a remarkable, a peculiar age. It is a period of agitations and revolutions, strange and mighty in the moral, intellectual, and political worlds—at least in the sphere through which our observation extends. A rushing together of discordant elements; a strife and a jarring of hostile principles; a blending together of things opposite and incongruous; a thirst for innovation; an impatience of restraint; a wild and reckless daring, are eminent characteristics of the present day. There is much truth mingled with much error; a spirit of bold investigation, and a timid shrinking from the results of that inquiry; high philanthropic action, and a pitiful cowering to the popular will; sound rational conviction, and a stifling of that conviction under the specious garb of "non-committalism." Banners are erected, bearing the mottoes of almost every sect, party, and theory under the sun, and men are rallying around them, lifting up and mingling their voices in Babel-confusion, each vociferating in defence of the particular tenets of his particular creed.

As we have said, "there is truth mingled with much error," and dark though that error may be, we cannot but joy for the truth, for "it is mighty and will prevail." Of all these agitations it is the prime-mover, the essence, the master-spirit. Never, perhaps, but once, since order, harmony, and beauty leaped from the unbreathing chaos, have there been to work such great principles of moral power; such glorious schemes for good; such a spirit of inquiry; such a breaking of fetters; such an opening of prison-doors; such a riving of mental bondage, as at the present time. Many of these things are but commencing to operate. We hear the distant murmurings, the faint voices as yet; but they are the murmurings of the vast and terrible sea, the uplifted voices of the mighty and unchained winds!

The great principle of "Love"—of "doing unto others as we would be done by," is becoming the inciting motive to action, and although there may be a blending of right conviction and wrong ideas; of glimpses of duty and crudely devised methods of performing it, which tends to an ultraism too often injurious to a good cause; and a spirit of denunciation highly inconsistent with the law of Christian charity; yet we believe these wilder convulsions will settle down into calm and steady purposes, and the atmosphere be the purer for the storm that has passed through it.

The great addition which science has made to our stock of knowledge, is a remarkable feature of the age. Here, too, great good evolves from apparent evil. There are many who consider this as eminently an age of infidelity, who look upon every recent philosophic discovery, every new lesson learned from the book of nature, as so many existing influences, so many forged weapons for the overthrow of the Gospel. They have seen the treasures which have been heaped sparkling around us, they have supposed science and Scripture to disagree, and have thrown the great weight of these truths on the scale of the infidel and the skeptic. But we, and we hope the Christian world generally, are beginning to perceive that the word of God wars not with his works; that every new breathing of nature but brightens the chain which links earth and sky; that every new discovery adds to the battlements of that Religion whose foundation is the rock, and whose pinnacle is bright with upper glories.

This "spirit of the age we live in," then, will cause the Christian philosopher to reflect and moralize. He will go back through the channel of history, and tracing effect to cause, we think it will appear to him, to be one of those eras in the annals of the world, when the great designs of Providence glow out with more than common legibility upon the moral firmament, and cast new light upon the many dim objects around us. We will wait, trustingly, for the removal of the evil, confident of the ultimate triumph of the "eternal principles" which are involved with it. There may be present gloom around us, the mist may be thick by the mountain's base, and thick over the vallies' depths, but it will pass off and disappear; the clouds may seem even darker above our heads, but they too will roll away, for even now, through the broken rifts and the opening folds, light, light and truth are streaming and bursting down from the serene and everlasting heavens.

VISIT TO NEW ENGLAND.

Every one knows the sacredness which the mind naturally attaches to the place of our birth, the land of our nativity, the scenes of our early childhood, the ground where we sported in our youth, formed our first attachments in life, our first acquaintance with the world, and received our first intellectual, moral and religious culture and direction. Aside from the attachment to kindred friends and acquaintances still remaining on the ground, there is a strong inclination, after our removal therefrom, and location and attachments elsewhere, to visit and revisit, again and again, the sacred and consecrated spot, around which so many tender recollections cling, so many endearing reminiscences still cluster, and live over in memory, those halcyon days that are gone no more to return.

We have just returned from a visit to the East, to the spot where we first drew the vital breath; to the parents, still living but far advanced in years, who gave us birth, and to the few remaining kindred and early acquaintances, whose places are not yet deserted. Till now we had not found a convenient opportunity for so doing, for six years. We left home on the 15th of August, accompanied by our family, and proceeded, via rail road, to Saratoga Springs, and thence by stage to Springville, Vt., where we had the happiness of finding our friends, (the parents and friends of Mrs. S.) in usual health.—Here we tarried a little over a week, visiting in the mean time a brother in Cavendish, and attending the Vermont State Convention of Universalists in Rockingham.

The pleasure of attending the State Convention was an unexpected but not less agreeable treat, having heard nothing of it till we arrived in the neighborhood. It was a source of peculiar gratification, there to meet with old and long tried friends with whom we were acquainted in the days of our youth, and to whom we had preached the Gospel of reconciliation some twelve or fifteen years ago, still worshipping the God of Abraham, and "leaning upon the top of their staves." Here, too, our hearts rejoiced to meet former and still faithful brethren in the ministry of reconciliation, their hands now upheld (like those of Moses by Aaron and Hur) by numbers of young and promising brethren who have put on the whole armor of God, and taken the sword of the spirit, it, have entered the field of the Gospel ministry with that zeal and firmness which, when united and persevered in, can not fail to promote the cause of Zion and spread wider, and still wider, the triumphs of truth through the land. We enjoyed a large and excellent meeting at Saxon's village, in Rockingham. The music was excellent, and the preaching happily adapted to the occasion.—We spent Sabbath in Springfield, and preached to a large congregation of attentive hearers in an elegant and commodious brick meeting house which had been erected since our last previous visit. The society here is respectable, both for numbers and wealth, and would be able to sustain preaching the greater part of the time, if they could find a suitable preacher, not engaged, in whom they would feel united. At present they are destitute of a stated preacher. But we hope they will ere long, be blessed with one who shall stately go in and out before them, and feed them with knowledge and understanding.

On Saturday, 26th, we left Springfield and proceeded to Westmoreland, N. H., my native town, where we had also the happiness of finding our friends all in usual health. Here I preached on the Sabbath, to a large and attentive congregation, in a large and elegant brick meeting-house, erected seven or eight years ago as a Congregational or Orthodox meeting-house. At the same time this house was built, another house of worship, belonging to the same denomination, and standing but little more than a mile from it, was greatly enlarged, refitted and elegantly finished off. The Orthodox society became divided on purely local considerations, (the mere location of their house of worship,) each party had a good meeting-house, and each party settled a preacher, though both parties, when united, were hardly able to support one preacher. The consequence was, that after the excitement which occasioned the division, had subsided, the two societies were compelled to unite and support one preacher to preach alternately, on every other Sunday, in each of the two houses, leaving one or the other of them necessarily vacant every Sunday. The Universalists having no house of their own, but having contributed largely towards the erection and completion of both houses, from the same local partialities, now resolved on having preaching of their own, and accordingly they have occupied lately, either house which they chose.—They now have preaching half of the time in the new brick meeting-house, and are apparently increasing, both in numbers and strength.

On the 6th and 7th of September, the Cheshire Association of Universalists was holden at this meeting-house, and a numerous and happy meeting, both of ministers and laymen, and a season of refreshing from the presence of the Lord was enjoyed. Such is now the favorable aspect of affairs in our native town.

On Saturday, September 2d, we proceeded to Salem, Mass., where we had an appointment to preach on the morrow. Our passage thither was somewhat variegated. We travelled from Keene to Nashua, N. H., by stage coach; from thence by steam-bow down the Merrimac, to Lowell, Mass.; from thence to Boston by rail road, and from thence to Salem, by chaise, where we arrived about 10 o'clock, P. M., and were cordially greeted at the hospitable mansion of our well known Br. N. Frothingham, with whom we tarried till Monday morning.—Salem is an ancient, peaceable, orderly town, remarkably quiet for as important a seaport and commercial place as it is, having killed off in its youth, all its witches and wizards, those great sources of inquietude wherever they exist.

Here is a large and flourishing Universalist society with a very spacious meeting-house, and excellent and well organized choir of singers, a large and most interesting Sunday school, and every thing interesting and inviting to a devout and religious Universalist. Br. Lemuel Willis, now of Washington, N. H., has been the favored and successful pastor for the last eight years, under whose ministry the society has arisen to its present prosperous and flourishing condition. Since his removal, on the first of June last, they have been destitute of a regular pastor, but supplied from Sabbath to Sabbath by neighboring and visiting ministers. We pray the Lord of the vineyard to send them a pastor after his own heart to water and cultivate this flourishing vine.

On Monday we visited Boston, the commercial emporium of New England, made a few calls on brethren and friends, visited Cambridge, and accompanied by Brs. T. Whittemore and L. R. Paige, went to view the shades of Mount Auburn, of which we will speak more particularly in another place. Returned to Boston in the evening, and after spending the night at the hospitable dwelling of Br. S. Streeter, took our leave of Boston, and accompanied by Br. and Sister Streeter proceeded by rail road to Lowell, and thence by stage to Keene, and arrived at my father's in Westmoreland about 9 o'clock same evening.

After attending the Association there, before named, we proceeded on Thursday evening to Brattleborough; from thence took stage on Friday morning, and reached our own dear home in Utica, a little past noon on Saturday, with our family all in comfortable health, and devoutly thankful to kind Providence for his bounty and protection.

N. B. Br. S. R. SMITH will not be expected to preach in Clinton on the first Sunday; a number of circumstances rendering it inconvenient for him to do so.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in October next, by Br. W. H. WAGGONER in Clinton.

TOKENS.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

Thou, on the throne of Heaven!
Who'rt bidding stars speed forth with light and song,
What token hast thou given,
To lead thy children hopefully along?

All tokens hast thou given;
Buds to the tree of Fall, stars to the night,
Rainbows to clouded heaven,
And to the polar skies, a mystic light.

Sunshine to earth's decay,
Awakening winds to early hours of Spring,
Music to dawning day,
And life, and light, and joy to every thing.

A Lamb without a spot,
Slain on the altar for our sinful race—
What tokens have we not,
Father of love! to speak thy boundless grace?

The following was furnished for the Budget of the Utica Berean Institute. It is with great pleasure we avail ourselves of permission granted, to transfer it to our columns. A. E. G.

OUR HOME.

Low sinks the glorious god of day
Behind the western hill,
And gorgeous are the gold topped clouds
That yon cerulean fill;
Pile after pile of splendid haze,
Floats o'er the rising moon,
And thousand diamond sparkling stars
The ample space illumine.

See how they bend with strange delight,
To look on this fair earth,
Which sleeps in beauty like the flowers
To which the day gives birth.
Beneath these glorious orbs of night,
Who would not wish to roam,
And read in living characters
Of our eternal home?

At home, in heaven, our God hath said,
The weary soul had rest,
And every grief-worn child of earth,
Shall pillow on his breast.
Yet 'tis not sun, or moon, or night,
That hath such promise given,
'Tis written in God's holy word—
'Tis entered in heaven.

LINES WRITTEN IN AN ALBUM.

There are glittering gems in the far-off east
And flowers of the laughing June there be;
But the one deth the storm-wave darken soon
And the other will fade in the ray of noon.

There are budding joys on the youthful brow,
But they wither and drop ere long, I trow;
And the strains of Hope, and its siren words,
Grow feeble and still on the spirit's chords.

... of a wizard power,
... in the evil hour.

... if the vesper that Friendship wreath;
... wisher and prayers which the deep soul breathes;
... can guard thee ... thee, when harm is near,
... And watch o'er thy rest?—they are written here.

They will bid thee trust in the sorrow-time,
They will bid thee look to a purer clime,
And thou'lt cling to Wisdom's words, as gold,
When the eve grows dim and the heart feels cold.

When the chanting of Hope meets not thy ears;
But the stary music of upper spheres;
When the world seems a very little thing,
And thou art away, on an angel's wing.

IMMORTALITY.

There is probably no occurrence in the lifetime of a human being that softens the heart, excites the feelings, and produces so deep an impression on the mind, as the loss of relatives and friends by death. While standing around the cold and lifeless remains of one that we have loved and valued, and with whom we have participated the thrilling delights of social blessedness, and mingled in the endearing relations that bind man to his fellow, the tender sensibilities of our nature melt, and the most unbending firmness of the philosopher and the stoic yields to the subduing influence of emotions that reason has no ability to control—we drop the tear of sorrow and regret, as the thought flits across the mind that we shall meet the beloved object before us no more in this world.

How dear to the heart, at such a moment, is the hope, that although the dust returns to the earth as it was, the spirit shall not perish under the petrifying fogs of annihilation, and sleep the perpetual slumber of forgetfulness, but shall return to God who gave it, and participate in those pure, perennial joys that bloom in fadeless and unchanging glory in that holy and happy state in which there shall be no more pain, neither sorrow nor crying nor death. And how doubly dear a well confirmed assurance, that we shall there meet our relatives and friends in the enjoyment of every good that a God of infinite benevolence can impart.

However we may labor to persuade ourselves, when health fills our veins with vigor, and friends smile rejoicingly around us, and prosperity glides our pathway of life with joy and gladness, that the present is all about which man ought to or need concern himself, yet when adversity casts its blight over our prospects, or friends lie before us in the cold embrace of death, or disease premonishes us that the clouds of the valley will soon cover all that is mortal about us, the heart recoils at the thought, that “All our hopes and all our joys,

Are prisoned in life's narrow bound.”

And the mind instinctively reaches forward to a state beyond the grave in which this mortal shall put on immortality, and the vicissitudes and sorrows of this life shall be exchanged for the unchanging beatitude of perpetual bliss and edness.

It is then that the believer enjoys the supreme felicity, that a firm faith in a future and happy existence is calculated to inspire. It is then, that, with the apostle he can exclaim, Oh, death where is thy sting? Oh grave, where is thy victory? And in the fervid transports of a grateful heart can add, Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ.—Southwestern Evangelist.

Selections from the “Tim Theophrastus.”

ATHANASIAN CREED—Character of, by a bishop.—“A molley monster of bigotry and superstition, a scarecrow of shreds and patches, dressed up of old by philosophers and popes, to amuse the speculative and to alight the ignorant; now a butt of scorn, against which every unfledged wilful of the age essays his wretched efforts, and before he has learned his catechism, is fixed on infidel for life.”

In Bishop Watson's proposed bill for revising the Liturgy and Articles, the omission of the Athanasian Creed was one of the principal improvements; and, long before his time, Bishop Burnet had not scrupled to pronounce its forgery of the eighth century. We know from the authority of Dr. Haberdon, that the pious, George III. refused in the most pointed manner, to make the responses when this creed was read in Windsor Chapel. Dr. Mant, quoting from Dean Vincent, says, “this creed is supposed to have been framed from the writings of Athanasius. It was not, however, admitted into the offices of the Roman church, at the earliest of the year 939, in which it has continued ever since, and was received into our liturgy at the time of the Reformation.” (Mant's Common Prayer, p. 57.)

In spite of the damatory clauses at the conclusion of this theological puzzle, the Ignominia per ignem, it seems that Christendom did very well without it for 600 years; and, probably very few of the rationally devoted would complain if it were placed in the same situation for 600 years to come. It was saying of the Dutch General Wurtz, “that when men shall have once taken out of Christianity all that they have foisted into it, there will be but one religion in the world, and that equally plain in doctrine, and pure in morals.” The Scriptures warn us against “teaching the doctrines of men as the commandments of God;” or, as Paley has said, “imposing under the name of revealed religion, doctrines which men can not believe, or will not examine.” When objections are made to the Mosiac account of the creation, as being inconsistent with the modern state of science, it is indignantly urged that Moses did not undertake to expound astronomy or geology to ignorant shepherds, but that he spoke popularly, and adapted himself to the comprehension of his auditors. And yet, when any attempt is made to popularize our liturgy, by the omission of any such objectionable portions as the Athanasian Creed, we hear a Pharisaical cry of impiety and profanation, and are solemnly warned that to remove a single stone, however cankered or superfluous is to endanger the whole edifice of the church. Strange! that we may suppress truth and yet not expunge a forgery. Strange! that we may adapt the liturgy and formularies of religion to the ignorance of the age, and yet not adjust them to its knowledge!

This incredible creed, which it is above all things necessary to hold, may be defined, like Aristotle's Materia Prima, as “ne quid, nec quale, nec quantum, nec aliquid eorum de quibus Ens denominatur.” Nevertheless, there are golden reasons, which may induce a profession of belief in it. Mr. Patten, a cousin of Whistable, was so much averse to it that he always omitted it from the service. Archbishop Secker, being informed of his recusancy, sent the archdeacon to ask him his reason. “I do not believe it,” said the priest.—“But your metropolitan does” replied the archdeacon. “It may be so,” rejoined Mr. Patten; “and he can well afford it. He believes at the rate of seven thousand a-year, and I, only at that of fifty.”

MARRIAGES.

In Antwerp, on the 9th inst., by Rev. A. Wood, Mr. ROBERT GREEN, of Edwards, St. Lawrence county, to Miss MARI BARKER, of the former place.

In Springfield, Otsego county, N. Y., on the 10th inst., by Rev. J. D. Hicks, Mr. DANIEL SPRINGER, to Miss ELIZA OSTRONDER all of that place.

DEATHS.

On the 30th of July last, at his residence in the town of Venice, Mr. CHARLES LESTER, aged 63 years, 8 months and 17 days. Br. Lester had long been a firm believer in the pleasing faith of universal reconciliation, and when summoned to depart, it buoyed him entirely above the fear of death, and caused him to go home rejoicing in the assurance of meeting a ransomed world in the fadeless climes of immortality. His funeral was attended on the first of August, and the consolations of the Gospel presented to the afflicted relatives, and a large concourse of sympathizing friends, by the writer.

H. P. SAGE.

In Western, Oneida county, on the 24th of March, of consumption, Rev. JAMES GOWDY, of Pompey, in the 67th year of his age. Father G. in early life became a worthy member of the Calvinistic Baptist church, and was seventeen years a preacher of that limited faith; but being convinced by diligent search of the truth of Universalism, he embraced it with his usual ardor and intelligence. He soon after requested, and was granted, a letter of fellowship from the Western Association of Universalists at New-Hartford, in June, 1813, and until his death remained a zealous advocate of that faith.—The happy influence of his belief was exhibited in his life and in his last illness, which was borne with Christian fortitude and patient resignation. He looked on death as a messenger from heaven, to conduct him to mansions of bliss. He has left a worthy aged companion and several children, together with a large circle of relations and friends to mourn his departure.

But may they never mourn as those

That mourn without a hope;
But freely say “I will be done,”
Which eadeth the parent home.

In Brighton, Lorain county, Ohio, last April, 28th, Mrs. MARY KINGSBURY, aged 61 years, cousin of Dr. James D. Kingsbury, and daughter of Henry and Mary Converse, formerly of Edmeston, Otsego county, N. Y. Although afflicted with a protracted and distressing illness, during which she was called to mourn the loss of an infant child, and to encounter the enemies of her faith; yet her fortitude never forsook her until the hour of life had fully expired. Such was her confidence in her divine protector, that she seemed “to rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory” as her dissolution gradually approached.—Being fully persuaded that neither death nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature should be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. She calmly waited her Master's call with pious resignation and holy joy. The funeral was attended on the following Sunday by a numerous concourse of sympathizing friends, to whom the consolations of the Gospel were tendered by the writer from these words.—“This mortal must put on immortality.”

We are happy in being able to assure her numerous friends and relatives at the East, that she died as she had lived a firm and steadfast believer in the final holiness and consequent happiness of all God's intelligent offspring. She has gone where we shall soon follow.

“Where love, where boundless friendship rules—

No friends that change, no love that cools.”

ASSOCIATION, AND THE VALEDICTORY;

Delivered at the Annual Exhibition of the Clinton Liberal Institute, August 30th, 1837.

BY F. J. WARNER.

The ingenuity of the present age, is proverbial. The four elements of the ancients, have been exhausted to furnish materials for the labor-saving, utilitarian spirit of the age. Did this economy confine itself to matter, to the material world, we had less cause for wonder; but it must needs meddle with subtle mind, making it an instrument as subject to mechanical power as the machine that, at every turn, turns out a button-mould or a nutmeg. Hence we see machines for writing, machines for calculation, and countless machines for learning, or, rather, for knowing without the trouble of learning. But ingenuity itself stands aghast, and the whole myriad of Yankee patents evaporate, when modern philosophy draws from her mystic arcana the notable science of Mnemonics—the science of memory! a science making memory a locomotive automaton, working in the harness of arbitrary rules—as docile as the well trained charger, as energetic as the bound of the tiger, and as firm in its grasp as the folds of the anaconda! Philosophers have long since ate, drank, slept, and dreamed by rule, but 'tis reserved for modern perfection to remember by rule. Innovation, for itself, is not to be deprecated. Few are worse for experiment, though it is a long, and often a hard road to come at truth; but when immortal mind is made the subject of the nostrums of quacks and the patchings of tinkers, the scale of being is indeed descending to a common level with dull, senseless matter.

But we remember—how do we remember? and why does each effort to forget, but fix the object more immovably in the mind? 'Tis not by arbitrary rules and the tattered demalion's picture-book, but by association. Association is intuitive—it lies in one word—name. Name—what is it? Why a name, to be sure! a representative without a constituent—a dress without a wearer—a shadow without a substance—a phantom, a thing of gossamer, weightless, worthless—

The child's delight, the school-boy's star—
The hero's wreath, the statesman's goal!

So says vaulting ambition, vaulting still for—deeper defeat! So sour the grapes, we ne'er can reach! But is name but a flickering taper borne by fairies, to tempt man to 'scape his own shadow and grasp at space itself? Let our halls of legislation, the hero's garland, and our own loved independence, answer. Think not that I stigmatize our fathers as being ambitious, but they loved the name, freeman—they scorned the name, slave. If name be so soulless a spectre, so feeble a magnet, whence its power to polarize the earth? whence this chain, which the research of philosophy and the analysis of reason have failed to sever? Ah, there is magic in name!

At the mention of Philosophy, what first think you of? Quick as thought, you see a sedate Lilliputian extracting moonshine from cucumbers—a Franklin taming wild lightning, or, with Vulcan, forging thunderbolts—a Galileo scanning the phases of Venus—an Archimedes with his lever, turning this ponderous globe; and a Newton marking the fall of an apple—not the golden apple of discord—but an apple whose core contained the spell that solved the mystery-bound universe—or "actually untwisting the gold and silver threads of a polished sunbeam."

With what is the name student associated? Perhaps with a youth, pale and care-worn, with thoughtful brow and anxious mien; gleaning the choice gems of antiquity to deck, in after years, his laurel wreath—weighing every truth in the scales of reason, and probing every theory with keen analysis—whose soul is "yearning for the GREAT BEYOND," where TO BE USEFUL IS TO BE GREAT: but much rather, with a brainless dandy, as boisterous as the wild hurricane; as effeminate as the sickly mushroom; too dignified to work, too wise to learn, and whose highest capacity is to quote the sounding names of "CLASSIC GREECE AND ROME," while scarcely knowing the governor of his own State, or the history of his own country beyond the legends of his grand-mother! Let Genius blush, that the name student be fraught with associations like these.

In the name, sister, what that is lovely, what that is beautiful, what that is innocent, is not associated? Where else is harshness rewarded with gentleness—where else is cold neglect or cruel contempt reciprocated with the warm throes of innocent love, than in a sister's bosom? Sister! hast thou a brother? what are the associations that entwine around his name? Has that brother left this beautiful world, for one more beautiful still? then how does every garment he wore, every path he frequented, and every note he chimed, exhale with the sweetest incense from the altar of mutual affection?

War—hark! hear you that clarion's blast—the shrill fife, and the tramp of the charger! How the brass cannon speaks! how grand these fields of waving plumes, and floating banners, and keen, polished bayonets! with what skill they ply the tools of death! Now phalanx is crushed by the cold iron of phalanx—see the bursting shell and exploding magazine, fill all mid air with the torn limbs of foes! Why, at the mention of war, does the ploughman stop in his furrow, to glance at his rusty firelock, and the silver-haired veteran, with instinctive impulse, cease fondling the loquacious stripling, to shoulder his crutch, and manoeuvre as of old, when in the face of real foes? Why, then, glows his countenance with youthful fervor, as he dwells on the scenes of other days? 'Tis but name, weightless as evanescent, with mystic association, lighting up the dull fires of memory, and blending the past and present in harmonious union.

We shudder at a tale of cold-blooded murder. To name a midnight assassin, is to awake vengeance from her slumbers. Where but one individual is the poinard's victim, though it be the listless "infant of days," even-handed justice seizes her sword, and the murderer falls. If, then, one individual murder be so fraught with horror, how comes it that we look with calm composure, yea, with eager curiosity, on the field where thousands are hearing the last groans of expiring nature? Why does the cold, clotted blood of one human butchery, start the firmest nerves, and that of thousands fill with cherished curiosity? Why were the house-tops of Charlestown and Boston, black with human beings, gazing on the carnage of Bunker Hill as eagerly as on the stage of a theatre during some exciting play? Curiosity did much, but association more. With the issue of that day, were associated cheering liberty or soul-destroying servitude. Their sen sat in blood—it rose next morn, and with genial rays that might almost reanimate the slumbering dead, shone upon men confident in the prowess of their own arms against Britain's voracious lion, and happy that the sacrifice then made, though dear as their own heart's blood, would prove a rich legacy to posterity. The associations of even prospective liberty were a welcome compromise for the toils endured, the warm blood shed, and bosom friends lost on that eventful day. We, their posterity, can but thank them for their sacrifice, and while we talk of liberty, talk of independence, and associate therewith the causes that begat, and the patriots who achieved them, prove ourselves not unworthy their rich bequest.

FATHERS OF THE REVOLUTION!—I see none here!—I call up your ashes from their peaceful slumbers, to witness that we are not ungrateful. Though dark be the cloud that hangs over us, the chiming of bells and cannon's voice on a nation's jubilee, shall tell our grateful associations as we read upon thy tomb the inscription of the Spartan band: "TRAVELLER, GO TELL TO LACEDEMON, THAT WE LIE HERE IN OBEDIENCE TO HER SACRED LAWS."

FELLOW-STUDENTS—the urn of fate is shaken, and our turn has come at last—we must part! Mature age has its vicissitudes and changes, so have prattling childhood and buoyant youth. We cannot always sport around the cherished playgrounds of home, nor always be guided by the fostering hand of instruction. The time must come when our own energies, intellectual and physical, must be our support—when our own arm must buffet the wave, and bear us o'er the billow, or we sink beneath the surge. We go hence, supported by no titled dignity. For us no A. Bs., M. Ds., D. Ds., or L. L. Ds., rear their consequential front to bid the world do us reverence. Your success in life rests not on the narrow base of a piece of rattling parchment, eight by twelve! These, the helpless and effeminate only need. As means they are convenient—as ends, worthless. You are ground in no four year's tread-mill of collegiate discipline, that makes a man from the veriest dunce! For you dangles no gaudy badge to catch the gaze of the wondering multitude. But what have you—what need you, to go forth and meet the rude world as it is? You have minds trained to think for themselves—minds that shrink not from investigation—intellectual alembics that distil theories not the less critically, because popular, and from the rubbish of superstition and bigotry, bring forth truth, pure as fountains of celestial nectar. More than all, you have ENERGY OF CHARACTER. Whether the peace-giving labors of the husbandman, the arduous duties of professional toil, or the nerve-trying political arena, call you hence, energy of character, alone, can secure you success.

Think not you go hence to train the woodbine and the honeysuckle. "Flowery Arcadia exists but in the poet's imagination." Think not—wish not always to roam o'er the lily-decked meadow, or paddle the light barge on the bosom of the glassy lake. 'Tis not the calm sea that makes the skilful mariner, or times of uninterrupted peace, the renowned hero or statesman." Storms, rocks, and quicksands must perfect the helmsman's skill, the crimson rivulets of the battle-field dye the hero's laurel, and the tumultuous clash of party conflict, nerve the statesman's arm to guide secure the ship of State. With firmness, then, launch into the stream of moving, acting life—not with the phrenzied madness of Sappho from the Leucadian steep, but with the calm resolve and fixed purpose of Cesar on the banks of the story-told Rubicon. Stem the torrent of public opinion—dash aside the waves of public opinion—'tis truth for which you swim—secure it, or sink (if it must be so) in the attempt. 'Tis better to sink striving for truth, than swim supported by sickly buoyancy for popularity. Unswayed by party policy, and uncontaminated by sycophantic cringing for popular favor, with integrity and independence of principle—relying on your own single energies and the arm of your Creator, you will stand—stand at the post of truth, of justice, of honor, of right—stand firm as the Tarpeian rock, though the very Capitol be shaken to its base—stand undaunted in your purpose, though the moral and political worlds quake like old Etna on the shoulders of her groaning Titans.

FELLOW-STUDENTS! Our term has closed—the day wanes, and we must part—part from scenes endeared by long acquaintance—from scenes fraught with associations most peculiar—need I add, agreeable?—let your own bosoms answer! We leave our fair competitors to tune again the piano, and chant their morning song. We leave Clinton, with its mystic charms, for the wild and adventurous scenes of active life. We leave our school, around which center our warmest affections, our most heart-felt wishes; and in after years, howsoever chequered may be our fate, oft on the wings of retrospection will we flit back to those walls, where parental love and parental admonition gave a keener relish to the variegated paths of science—where fond memory will love to linger, and grateful association entwine her fairest wreath. We leave our social circle and confiding converse, to be remembered but as the fairy dreams of sleep—pleasing, because sweet—sad, because past.

How much like Spring are happy school-days! Beside the pretty violet, grows the sturdy and repulsive thistle. Beneath the "sear and yellow leaf of Autumn," lie flowers in embryo. Spring returns, and they bloom and exhale in fragrance. Like them, will not our school-days, too, return? Will not a teacher's monitory voice, and the gay response of a classmate, again linger on our ears? Echo answers—never! They will live again! they will live in memory! live in the magic of association! live in the tenderest ties of boon companions, bound together by the silken cords of sympathy! they will live in the bright vista of the past, to cheer the dark and doubtful future!

Fellow-students! we part from each other, probably to meet no more this side the grave. Fare-you-well—you go on a journey not to be retraced—success and happiness attend you—and may the light of Nature and Revelation shed around your pathway, the cheering rays of UNIVERSAL LOVE.

HAPPINESS FOUNDED ON MORAL AND INTELLECTUAL IMPROVEMENT.

BY H. B. SOULE.

Happiness is every where admitted to be the great aim of human existence. "All men pursue good, and would be happy, if they knew how—not happy for minutes and miserable for hours, but happy, if possible, through every part of their existence." This consideration leads us to inquire whether happiness, like every other good, is not founded on some sure and permanent basis.

A candid retrospection of the past, and an impartial survey of the present, clearly demonstrate to us, by exhibiting to our minds the miseries and calamities which men among all classes and in all ages of the world, have suffered, and do still suffer, that happiness depends not solely on external circumstances of fortune, on fame or titles of distinction, nor on deportment in any of its ramifications. All observing minds have long ere this discovered, that although happiness is the ultimate purpose of the endless variety of vocations and pursuits of men in this world, none who have had recourse to terrestrial objects, only, have ever been completely successful in the great and universal enterprise. Happiness, to most men, is only prospective. They look forward with deep anxiety, and in their obsequious imaginations behold it but just before them; yet, in all their meanderings and anfracturesses through this life, they are never able to approach it.

Some found the hope of happiness on sordid wealth. But wealth, in itself, has no such value; and it not unfrequently vanishes from before the vision of its disappointed and unhappy possessor, like the dew from before the bright emanations of the rising king of day. Indeed, let a man's fortune be what it may, he is unhappy so long as he depends solely on that for his enjoyments. The rich man is rendered miserable by abundance, and the poor man by penury. In short, the concomitant of wealth is misery, and a peace-destroying desire, the companion of poverty.

Others, to secure their "being's end and aim," indefatigably seek the transient vapors of earthly fame, or strive after the paltry honors of petty distinction and unmeaning titles. That such are pursuing an illusion of the brain, a phantom of the disordered imagination, which directly tends to overwhelm them in the hopeless vortex of human misery, they need but behold an Alexander, a Charles the Twelfth, and a Bonaparte, the three most famous and yet most infamous and miserable characters of the human race.

That happiness rests not on the single consideration of conduct, is evident, since the motive which prompts the action, and not the action itself, is the criterion by which its merit or demerit is determined. Indeed all these things, though concentrated in one individual and acting there in perfect concert, without some other thing to direct them to laudable and proper ends, would, instead of forming a sure foundation of permanent and lasting enjoyment, suspend their wretched victim over that cavern yawning wide, at the bottom of which, the "oblivious pool" of degradation "impatient waits" his fall, whose sluggish waters seldom or never impart the breezes of joy or the hope of deliverance.

To be happy, then, man must have something more than mere riches, fame, politeness, and all their concomitants.

On what, then, is happiness founded? On moral and intellectual improvement. Without morality, a man cannot be happy; and without intellectual improvement, he can be but imperfectly happy. The mere moral man, it is true, is free from that remorse and compunction which are the inevitable consequences of immorality; but he is also free from the enjoyment of many of the sweetest and most exquisite pleasures resulting from the practice of morality, by an incapacity to justly appreciate them. The more refined his moral taste becomes, the more beauty and excellence will he discover in this ennobling virtue. The happiness, therefore, which he experiences before any improvement of his moral faculties has been made, is a kind of negative quality—an insensibility of either pleasure or pain. Morality requires to be cultivated and exercised, before it will yield a full harvest replete with rich enjoyments. But the happiness which springs from this source, may even the sweetest felicity that can be derived from morality in its highest state of refinement, can be rendered still sweeter by besprinkling it with the delightful spices which in rich abundance grow on the celestial plant, intellectual improvement. Behold the philosopher scaling the vast ethereal concave, and traversing the immeasurable wilds of ether, to gaze upon the heavenly orbs as they wheel their stated courses round—to kiss the pale cheek of night's smiling Queen, and to feast upon the bright glories of the supernal worlds. See a Franklin, with the grasp of his herculean mind seize the vivid lightning, and bear it off in exulting triumph, while his capacious soul is enraptured with the music of the deep, harsh bellowsings and quick successive peals of Heaven's vast artillery, which in awful sublimity and grandeur tremble through the ambient air, and wake up the slumbering earth. Behold the poet, too, visiting with one quick glance of his mental vision, all the delightful scenes within the precincts of the wide universe, and feasting upon the quintessence of their beauties and delicacies. These are pleasures to which the unlettered are strangers. These are fruits which no other plant produces. The more improved, then, man's intellect becomes, the more nice and delicate will be his mental enjoyments.

But shall we infer from this, that intellectual improvement supercedes morality? No—but rather er that they are inseparably connected, and must, in order to the accomplishment of their purpose, act in perfect unity and harmony. Innumerable are the instances in which men of the most brilliant talents, highly cultivated, have been miserable through their lives, from the want of morality to guide them to proper and legitimate ends.—Even Lord Bacon, whose universal genius raised him to an elevated seat in the temple of fame, and whose giant mind found nothing insurmountable, by dishonesty made himself miserable, or, in the language of Pope—

"See Bacon shine,

The wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind."

And Aaron Burr, whose character justly bears the brand of everlasting infamy upon its ignominious front, is evidence indubitable, that parts and intellect can not, without morality, procure to man either lasting happiness or unfading honors. We need only look around us to be satisfied on this point. Every person knows some within the small sphere of his acquaintance, whose wretched and lamentable situation, clearly evidences this truth. Every attempt, therefore, to obtain this great object, which erring man may make, that is not done on the principles of this virtue, must inevitably prove futile. It would be as vain and useless for man to expect to be happy without morality, as to expect to be completely so, without intellectual improvement. The two must co-operate, and when this is the case, man's terrestrial happiness is in its zenith.

Finally, it is moral and intellectual improvement alone, that enables man to appreciate the full grandeur and proper tendencies of the blessings with which he is surrounded. These, united, form that inexhaustible fountain whose crystal waters, gurgling from the summit of the celestial hill, plentifully and continually irrigate the joyful soul, bearing her through all the earth, to regale upon nature's choicest gifts—lifting her above to revel on the luxuries of splendor and magnificence, so profusely scattered throughout the infinitude of space, and carrying her into the depths of futurity to foretaste the joys of uninterrupted felicity and immortal bliss. If, then, man would participate in the rich banquet which kind nature has spread out before him—if he would be what his Creator designed him—in a word, if man would be happy, he must be good—he must be LEARNED.

"FATHER, YOU MUST NOT USE THAT NAUGHTY WORD."

Reader, I have an incident to relate, which may teach us all a good lesson—first, by showing us the necessity of enforcing our precepts by example, and, secondly, by reminding us that children are more observing than we are apt to suppose, and hence that their future well-being depends much upon the example set them.

A friend of mine in this city, detected a little boy of his, only about four years old, in the use of a vulgar word, and supposing he had learned the word from some vulgar boys, reprimanded him rather sharply, and charged him never to use the word again. A few days after, in conversation with some friends, the father made use of the identical word himself, and much to his mortification, the little child, who remembered the schooling he had received, said, "Father, you must not use that naughty word."

My friend in relating the story to me, declared that he never felt the force of a reproof more strongly in his life; and I venture to say, he will never need another for the use of the same word.

REFLECTIONS ON OUR TWO SETS OF TEETH.

As when a man who is digging in the earth, is joyfully surprized when he meets with a beautiful shell, or a hid treasure, so with like emotions does the reader of dry scientific works stumble upon such a beautiful reflection as the following. It occurs in a medical work by Dr. Burns, a Scottish physician; and, perhaps, it was because of the infrequency of such in medical works, that it was noticed at all. In a sermon or theological treatise it might have passed without particular observation.

The author had been speaking of our milk teeth giving place to another set, larger, stronger, and better adapted to the increased size of the jaws, and he thus proceeds: "In this curious process, which strongly displays the wisdom of God, we are early taught the perishable nature of our frame. But it is also a pleasing reflection, that dissolution is succeeded by a state of greater perfection."

Yes, pleasing, indeed! "This mortal shall put on immortality"—"this corrupt shall put on incorruption." A. N. S. S.

MINISTERIAL SUPPORT.

HOLINESS OF THE PROFESSION.

"What, take money for preaching the Gospel?"—Such is the horror-stricken cry of many a Universalist, whose swaddling bands of superstition have been just so far loosed as to allow him to cast off the faith, but not the feelings of his forefathers. The preacher is no longer "more than a common man—thank God, he has got over that slavish, superstitious notion!" Well, and why is the preacher's employment, and studies, and labors, more than the duties of another man? Even admitting that many of them involve the subject most important to all—why are his labors to be esteemed so very uncommon, that even a common man (as the preacher is) can live barely by performing them, without any other support? The lawyer, the physician, the schoolmaster, the mechanic, the printer, even the Editor of a religious periodical whose subject is the same as the preacher's—all these must be paid, and often well paid (at which I rejoice), but the preacher, who is "no more than a common man," is expected to live in a very uncommon manner—to labor all his time for others, without being paid for it, and to feed and clothe himself, his family and his cattle (if any he has), without any wherewithal to do it! Surely this is the conduct of neither religion nor common sense!

"But," says one, "I am in favor of giving our preachers a living; I am only opposed to having them get such great salaries, and growing rich." No one need fear such a result for many years. But why should not a Universalist preacher as well acquire property beyond a mere living, in an honest and decent manner, as the Universalist lawyer, the Universalist physician, the Universalist farmer, the Universalist mechanic, or any other Universalist? It is admitted that he is "no more than a common man"; why, then, should he be excluded so uncommonly from laying up a provision for sickness, or old age, or for his wife and children when death calls him from caring and providing for them? Why, if he is but "a common man," and no better or greater than common people, should he be treated in this uncommon manner? The profession or the practice are perfectly absurd and unjust—one or the other; for none but "a very uncommon man" would be used in such an uncommon manner. If ministers are men, like others, let them be treated as other men are—pay them in the same manner for their services—give them the same advantages and facilities proper to their station and employment, and in all things treat them reasonably, religiously and commonly.

CIRCULAR.

The Hudson River Association of Universalists, to the disciples of Jesus—the believers in "the faith once delivered to the saints."

Brethren—the flight of time has brought around another of those joyous periods when the children of the blessed God are permitted to assemble in sweet convocation, to unite their sympathizing hearts and voices in the worship of the Father of spirits. Our God has kindly granted to us to experience another of those happy and interesting occasions, under circumstances which rendered our meeting pleasant, even beyond anticipation. The weather was as beautiful and favorable as we could have desired; and the eye, beaming with the light of the holy fire within, and the heart, replete with the purest joys, were but in unison with every thing of nature around us. The friends among whom we met, exhibited that same generous, hospitable, and fraternal spirit, for which they have already become proverbial; and we could not help feeling that if there was any spot where free-hearted kindness could be said to have a home, it was among the hills of Duaneburg. The deliberations of our Council were conducted in a spirit of undisturbed harmony.—Realizing that as children of one Parent, and consequently brethren, we were all equally dear to Him, and should be so to one another, no feelings of bitterness or unkindness were allowed to give birth to aught that might interrupt the perfect harmony of all our proceedings.

Among the minutes you will observe a resolution to hold three Quarterly Conferences, between this and the next annual meeting of the Association. Will our brethren, among whom these Conferences may be located, attend faithfully to them? They are intended for good; and they can be, and they should be, rendered productive of good. Let the sluggard slumber and sleep; but let it not be heard that a Universalist Conference lost aught of its usefulness, through the inactivity and unfaithfulness of its friends. You will perceive that a committee was appointed for the purpose of making a report relative to the formation of a society for the relief of orphans and widows within the bounds of this Association. As the committee do not report until our next session, no remarks will be made here in regard to the subject; but it is recommended to your earnest and profound consideration, that your delegates may be prepared to act in relation to it when it shall be brought before them.

A resolution was passed urging preachers within the Association, to use their exertions to carry into effect the resolution of the New-York State Convention respecting the defrayment of the expenses of delegates to our public bodies. This is a subject which belongs not to the preachers alone, but to the people. It is a subject which must receive attention. The prosperity of our blessed cause requires that our Conferences, and Associations, and Conventions, should be well attended. To attend them, requires in the course of a year, a considerable sum of money; as delegates are compelled to travel, in many instances, a great many miles from home, to be present at them. Ministers are hired and paid for preaching only. Their salaries, which too often afford but a scanty support for their families, are paid, when paid at all, for this alone. And few are able, without inconvenience, to incur the extra expense necessary to enable them to attend our general assemblies. And for whose benefit are these assemblies held? Most emphatically for the benefit of the people. Then, is it generous or just, that from a salary, perhaps but a poor recompense for preaching alone, they should be compelled to draw for means to attend bodies whose object is the good of the whole people? It is impossible in a circular to say more than a mere word on this subject; but let our brethren, each and all, reflect upon the matter seriously and candidly, and consider if they think it hard for them to pay an extra sum for sending delegates to public bodies, whether it be not still more hard for the delegates themselves to furnish that sum. Certainly, a whole society could more easily defray these expenses, than one or two of its members.

You will observe that one brother, Phineas Hathaway, was received into fellowship; and another, Br. Zenas Cook, was admitted for ordination. May the God of salvation prosper these two brethren who have been inspired to raise the Gospel standard; and grant that their labors may be productive of consolation to many a bleeding heart, of benefit to man, and glory to their divine Master.

There is one subject which has been repeatedly urged on your attention, and which must again be brought before you—it is the sending of delegates. What have become of those societies which were unrepresented in Council, at the session of our Association just passed? Are they alive, or dead? awake, or sleeping? Prosperous, or suffering in adversity? in a state of progression, or retrogression? Who can tell their situation?—Not a delegate appearing to declare aught respecting them—not a person to represent their interest as members of the Association—what has befallen them? can it be that they have forgotten their Redeemer and his glorious cause? can it be that they no longer take an interest in the advancement of the kingdom of him whose holy name they have taken upon them? Brethren, these things should not be thus. May God grant that another annual meeting of the Association shall witness that you are faithful to the interests of the cause you have espoused, by sending delegates to represent them there.

With the exception of the deficiency in representation all things were as we could have wished. The neat and beautiful house erected and dedicated not long since, by the society in Duaneburg, was filled with an attentive and devout multitude of those who had come up to hear the word of the Gospel of Jesus.

The singing was indeed excellent—and the animation with which it was conducted gave testimony that the heart as well as the tongue were engaged; and instead of the mere form, the singers exhibited the living spirit of worship. The preaching was in the fullest sense of the expression, "calculated to improve and instruct the mind and the heart"—and the concluding addresses were beautiful and affecting.

May God add his blessing—and grant that the already large and flourishing society of Duaneburg; one of the best branches of the Association, which, as a whole, is in a more prosperous condition than it ever was before; may not only be confirmed, but that its members may be augmented through the influence of the Gospel of truth.—It can not be otherwise than that good was effected; for till human nature becomes reversed and changed, it never can resist the holy influence of such a spirit as the one exhibited in all the proceedings of the Association on this occasion. It was indeed a foretaste of those pure and sublime joys which dwell at the right hand of our heavenly Father—of that fraternal and harmonious union of kindred spirits before the throne of the Eternal, which our holy faith hath taught us to expect; and in the contemplation of which "we rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory." A VOICE TO YOUNG MEN.....CHAPTER VI.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

DRESS.

The primary object in dress, is to afford covering and comfort to the body, and to add to it a comely and pleasing appearance. These are the only essential reasons which render apparel necessary, and are the only proper purposes for which it can be assumed.

There are two extremes in dress, into which people often run—slovenliness, and foppery. It should be the study of every young man to avoid both these extremes, as a like violation of that good taste and that self-respect which they should ever cultivate.

Slovenliness in apparel, is exceedingly unbecoming to all, but highly so to youth. It plainly evinces a lack of energy, of spirit, of taste, and of a proper pride of appearing decently. There is nothing that more plainly indicates slothfulness and a want of bodily and mental vigor, than carelessness in respect to apparel. A young man of this appearance will be viewed as of little worth or promise. There is, however, a wide distinction between appearing in a slovenly manner, and appearing in garments of a coarse texture, or that have been injured by use. A man may be arrayed in clothes of the finest quality, and of the most costly value, and yet from the careless manner in which he assumes them, and the filth he allows to collect upon them, may appear slovenly and unbecoming. While he whose garments are poor or threadbare, may appear even genteel, by the care and neatness he displays in their appearance. It is not to be supposed that people of different occupations can dress in the same manner, or appear with the same neatness. Some employments are of that nature that the garments, despite the utmost care, soon become soiled; but even in such occupations, you can easily distinguish between the slovenly and the tidy. There is no employment in which there can not be a certain degree of taste and care displayed in the dress. I would not have the mechanic or the farmer, engage in his business, starched and ruffled—this would be out of taste and propriety; but each, of every calling, should have garments corresponding to the peculiarities of their employment. And it would be an equal destitution of propriety, to appear in company, or in the house of worship, with clothes soiled and defaced by ordinary occupations, if you can consistently part with the means to procure those that are more suitable. Allow a sense of propriety to dictate in regard to these things, and you will hardly fail of acting properly.

Equally to be avoided is the other extreme of foppery. This is a passion, an inordinate love for dress. The head of the fop seems to be filled with little else than fashions, colors, and figures. But of all failings, this rage for dress is one of the most simple and unmanly. That little children should be pleased with bright colors, and pretty figures, and glistening spangles, is not a matter of astonishment. But that those who have grown to the stature of men, and who have the appearance of men, should still continue children, and allow their minds to be engrossed by the frivolities of infancy, is truly surprising, and much to be regretted. It is one of the most unerring indications of a weak intellect, narrow capacities, and a mind barren of every valuable qualification.—Whenever you behold a man running nearly crazy after the extremes of fashion, and arraying himself with all the frippery of a doll, you may, without hesitation, set him down as one who has little claim to manhood except his form. And, indeed, he seems to view himself in a similar light—he appears to found all his pretensions to manhood and respectability, on the adornment of the outward person; on the cut and texture of his clothes—at the same time allowing the mind to be choked with the weeds of ignorance, or overrun with the brambles of pride, vanity, and haughty selfishness.

Young men, never aspire to the name of a fop. Let all that is manly and noble in your minds, arise in utter detestation of such a character. He is an object of the ridicule even of children of ordinary minds. Never permit yourselves to believe that your rank in community, will depend upon your dress—or that your worth will be estimated by the cost, quality, or fashion of your garments. The fop may weigh you in this balance, and from these things decide upon your value in his sight. But, believe me, people of discernment—the great mass of the thinking in society—will judge of your merits on different grounds. They look beyond the productions of the sheep and the silk-worm—their opinions are not colored by logwood and indigo—their views are not shaped by the tailor's shears! They penetrate beneath these outward embellishments, and look at the moral and intellectual worth of the individual. They fully coincide in opinion with the poet, that "*Worth makes the man, and went of it, the fellow—

The rest is all but leather or prunella.*"

Dress is a poor criterion by which to judge of the worth of a man. Who does not know that the simpleton can dress in the same manner as the wise man—and the knave as the honest and virtuous? And if dress is the only rule of judgment, how can the one be distinguished from the other? You are not so weak as to suppose, that by your dress, you can deceive those who are acquainted with your character. If you are known to be vicious and depraved, you may array yourself in the most costly and fashionable apparel, and yet you can not cover your wickedness. When an acquaintance meets you, his judgment is not in the least blinded, nor his memory blunted, by your dress—he immediately exclaims, mentally, "there goes the young man who spends all his income in revelry and dissipation—there goes the intemperate and licentious young man, or the gamester, or the thief!" Of what avail are your fine garments in such cases? But when your character is good—when community are aware that you are industrious, temperate and virtuous—plain and neat garments will not lessen their estimation of your worth, but will rather have a tendency to increase it.

"It is an indication of a youth void of understanding, to be wholly occupied about the decoration of his person, and the display of external pomp and accomplishments. There is an attention to the decencies of dress, which is conducive to the well-being of society. But there are many with whom the adorning of their persons, is the principal source of self-satisfaction, and the chief business of life. Man is an intelligent being. He has glorious faculties to exercise. What can more strikingly indicate a want of that wisdom by which such a being should be distinguished, than to have his faculties absorbed and his ambition satisfied, with the transient varieties of external attire? Besides, how contemptible is the distinction which is merely superficial. The bee that gathers treasures from every flower, has not the finest coating. The eagle, that soars on majestic wings, to the birth of the morning, has not the most glittering plumage. It is the butterfly, that idly flutters on the passing breeze, which the fopling emulates. The care of the body is more with him, than the care of the mind. With usefulness and virtue, with knowledge and reason, to engage him, behold him the slave of a color, or a fashion, placing his glory in that in which inferior minds may often vie with him, and flowers and plants excel him. Such a young man, whom dress alone occupies and delights, will be claimed by folly as her legitimate child. Wisdom rejects him. Intelligence sighs over him, as a young man void of understanding."*

The more gaily and fashionably I am dressed, says the young man, the more readily am I smiled upon by the ladies. This remark, as a general rule, is unfounded, although it may be true in some instances. But of what value can that young lady be, or of what worth her esteem, who judges of the character of her company solely by their dress? Suppose you could obtain such a young lady for a companion, would she be a prize worth the seeking? I am confident that the great majority of young ladies, prefer plainness and neatness in the dress of their male associates, to the extremes of the frivolous fop. Says a modern writer, "take this as a secret worth half a fortune to you, that women, however vain they may be themselves, despise vanity in men!"

Let neatness and economy be your study in dress. You should not be so far behind the fashion as to be odd, nor one of those who are the most forward in seeking and adopting its changes; but should conform to the general style of those of your age and rank, in the community where you reside. It was a remark of Dr. Franklin, that "our own eyes, at most, only cost us a pair of spectacles; but other people's eyes cost us all our gay dresses and splendid carriages." This is true in respect to the great majority of the world. But the wise and the independent youth should dress to please his own eyes, and to suit his own taste, rather than with an absorbing and slavish desire to please the extravagant fancies of others. In the former case, he would act as becometh an intelligent and free man—in the latter, as one in a degrading bondage.

Your great inquiry should not be, how many new suits can I obtain in a year? but it should rather be, how long, by proper care, can I preserve my old suit, and cause it to appear neat and respectable? Prudence, economy, and good taste call upon you to avoid in dress, both slovenliness and carelessness on the one hand, and extravagance and folly on the other.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

REASON.

Reason is one of the best gifts of Heaven to man. It enables him to decide between right and wrong, truth and error. Destitute of it he is but a brute. All the gold of Peru, or the diamonds of Golconda can avail him nothing—no other blessing can alleviate his situation. Though he possesses the perception of a Newton, or the imagination of Milton, if reason does not guide him as he passes over the uneven surface of human existence, his life, pregnant with a thousand ills, is a continual scene of wretchedness. Why is it then, that so many Christians denounce it as unworthy of dependence? Because it denounces their creeds. No one will wage war against reason unless reason wages war against him. It is only when it pronounces his doctrines weak as the baseless fabric of a dream, that he thinks it is delusive and highly detrimental to the interests of religion. That we shall receive eternal happiness or misery merely as a reward or punishment for a few years of obedience or disobedience—that infinite consequences result from finite causes—is as unreasonable as the legends antiquity, and every rational man should blush to contend, that, for a few violations of his law, an infinitely good parent would consign his own offspring to hell's fiery prison, where one faint, glimmering ray of comfort can never come, or one pure and holy aspiration never arise; but where they would be compelled to violate this same law throughout eternity! Reason lives in perpetual enmity with all such horrid and polluting views as these, and their advocates too often entrench themselves behind the cob-web of mystery to hurl their envenomed shafts.

He who despises reason despises the gift of God. All our faculties were given us to use, and no one ever injures us when it is not abused. The man who reasons upon subjects of comparatively trifling importance, and not upon religion; the most momentous that ever engaged his attention; is as wise as the mariner who uses his chart and compass when he navigates some small stream, but casts them aside when he launches upon the trackless ocean, saying the waters are so vast they may lead me to the wrong port. Reason delusive!—O sad mistake—fatal error; insanity, suicide and murder—the stake, the scaffold and flames—the holy brotherhood, the horrible inquisition and all those damning tortures by which persecution has glutted her vengeance upon the blood of heretics, rise in fearful array against thee, and curse thy memory! Thou hast filled eternity with every imaginary apparatus of torture and sent those victims who, in anticipation, have endured its cruel pains, mourning to their graves!

But pure Christianity is reasonable. That our present happiness or misery depends upon our faith and practice, or unbelief and disregard of its precepts, is reasonable. That a good parent seeks the greatest good of his offspring, and that the greatest good of man is his eternal happiness, is reasonable. Hence, its hopes are reasonable.—Again, hope is compounded of faith and desire, and man can not possess faith without a reason.

How important it is that we should listen to the dictates of reason. Do calamities befall us? It teaches us not to repine, for discontent only aggravates our condition. It says they are the well intended chastisements of our kind, heavenly Parent, who wounds but to heal, kills but to impart a better life. Then, as we value wisdom, as we value our own happiness, or as we regard the welfare of others, let us ever endeavor to be reasonable—reasonable in all our opinions, in the performance of all our duties, and in all our requirements.

BIGOTRY OF THE AGE.

When we look abroad upon this widely extended country, and consider the diversity of religious opinion, the bigotry and even superstition which is yet so prevalent, we have no reason to be surprised that Universalism has not yet arrived to an eminence with that doctrine by which it is so strenuously opposed. We have read of ancient superstition and prejudices, of Heathen idols, and widows burnt upon the funeral piles of their husbands; of mothers throwing their children to the ravenous beasts and crocodiles, and imagining thereby to appease the anger of their gods: volumes have been written and commented upon, of the bigotry which formerly prevailed; and volumes can yet be written of the bigotry which even yet, to this day, prevails, and which would tell a tale that would make thousands of religious bigots blush, who are continually thundering from the pulpit, the doctrine of eternal damnation. How vast a number are there of enlightened and intelligent individuals, ornaments of society and their country, who inhibit their religious views merely from parental prejudice, without ever taking time to consider whether those views are right or wrong! How many thousands of divines are, week after week, dispensing eternal misery to their fellow-creatures, and attributing to their God a character blacker than that of the vilest monster that ever lived on earth! They teach us that God is good to all—that “his tender mercies are over all his works”—give us the Bible for our guide—that very Bible which tells us that “as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall be made alive”—yet treat with scorn and derision, the bare idea that God will save all his children. Beautiful consistency indeed!

The Catholic priests keep the Bible from the reach of their people, lest they should see their ignorance and turn Protestants. So with a majority of the professors of religion, they will not allow their children to attend a Universalist church, or read a Universalist periodical, lest they should see their error and become Universalists. which, as they style it, is not so respectable or popular!

Our religion is called the doctrine of the devil—eternal misery, that of Jehovah. It needs but a glance to tell us which of the two doctrines has been nicknamed. Universalism renounces the devil, and gives to God, our Creator and Benefactor, all the world, not leaving a single creature. Eternal misery claims the devil, the enemy of God and man, and gives to God but half of his own.

It has been asserted that Universalists should not be credited when under oath, as they do not stand in fear of punishment after death. This may be thought by some, to be too preposterous to make it worthy of notice. Yet when such assertions are made by men of enlightened understandings, it would almost seem as if the darkness that enveloped the early centuries, was about to close upon us. But thanks to the labors of the venerable Murray and his followers, the cause of Universalism is spreading rapidly throughout our land, and its trumpet shall be sounded through every mountain and valley upon the habitable globe; and the character of God, as exhibited by the immaculate representative of Heaven, shall appear in its true light to every creature; and men will not have cause to say with the poet—

“O for a lodge in some vast wilderness.”

UTICA, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1837.

DR. WALLER AND MR. DODS.

A friend in Portsmouth, Va., has recently favored us with a copy of a pamphlet just published in that place, containing a correspondence between Br. J. B. Dods, of Provincetown, Mass., and Rev. Dr. William J. Waller, of Portsmouth. Br. D., it appears, was on a visit to Virginia, for the double purpose of visiting his connexions residing at Norfolk, and preaching the Gospel to the destitute, having been invited thither to preach two funeral sermons on the death of some of his personal friends and acquaintances. Having preached a few discourses in Portsmouth, opposite to Norfolk, and drawn considerable congregations to hear him, it seems Dr. Waller became somewhat alarmed for his craft, and lest the people should cease to buy his shrines, he began to cry out lustily, “Great is Diana of the Ephesians!”

He made a rude but covert attack on Universalism and its advocates, in an evening lecture, which was attended by a number of Universalists. They being, several of them, friends to Dr. W., felt themselves aggrieved by the abusive language he had used; and Br. John Council addressed a note to Br. Dods then at Norfolk, requesting him to come over to Portsmouth, and with the brethren there, endeavor to obtain an explanation of the Dr., and either a retraction of his charges and abusive language, or an attempt to sustain them against Universalism and its advocates in a public oral debate. Br. D. complied with the invitation, and accordingly addressed a letter to Dr. W., demanding of him either one or the other of the above alternatives.

The next day the Dr. replied to him by letter, acknowledging “the respectful style” of Br. D's communication, and saying he felt obliged in “Christian courtesy” to reply to it; and then (strange as it may seem after this acknowledgement), throws himself upon his dignity (!) and refuses to give the required explanation, to make any retraction or to meet Br. D. in oral debate, to sustain his own ground or refute that of Universalists.—He says this would be “too great a condescension for a minister of the Lord Jesus.” Verily, his ideas of the Lord Jesus must be drawn from a source very different from the New Testament. According to that good book, the Lord Jesus “had compassion on the ignorant and those who were out of the way.” He met the sinner and the errorist, both of high and low degree, plainly and familiarly expostulated with them, showed them their errors and vices, and sought to win them to truth and duty.

He never threw himself upon his dignity to excuse himself from these solemn duties.

The Doctor next proceeds to make a great display of the small smattering of Latin which he had obtained in his youth, or rather had borrowed in adult years without giving credit for it, and attempts by quotations from Heathen Poets to sustain the doctrine of the eternity of hell torments against the words of the "faithful and true Witness," and the "more sure word of prophecy"—the language of the New Testament. Of all the ludicrous attempts of orthodox Doctors to accomplish that purpose, his appears the most ludicrous and supremely pedantic.

Br. Dods replies in very good taste and judgment, exposes the Dr.'s pedantry, cowardice and Heathenish sentiment, and in his P. S. intimates that the correspondence will be published unless Dr. W. will give some satisfaction for his abusive treatment of Universalists.—The Dr. becomes alarmed, writes again, attempts to smooth over his pedantry, makes a bad matter worse, charges Br. D. with officiously espousing other people's quarrels without their authority or consent, closes by refusing to receive any further communications from Br. D., and attempts to justify himself, by quoting the language of Nehemiah to Sanballat—"I am doing a great work so that I can not come down," etc., etc.

Br. D. replies to his last as it deserves, shows the destitution of honest principle which the Dr. has exhibited throughout the affair, or rather that he had been influenced by very bad principles, even those of his own creed and Heathen tradition, tells him some home-truths, gives him some salutary admonitions, and closes the pamphlet by stating some facts about the Doctor's garbled quotations from Scripture in some lectures which he afterwards delivered against Universalism, or for the purpose of proving endless misery.

The whole makes a pamphlet of about 20 pages, and has been published and freely circulated at Portsmouth, Norfolk and vicinity. It will do good to the cause of truth. Indeed, all such rude attacks as the one Dr. Walker made on Universalism, will help, in the end, to build up, instead of pulling down the doctrine which is "every where spoken against." We have enlightened friends in Virginia, who are not to be brow-beaten into silent and quiet acquiescence with abuse and the unsupported assumptions of self-righteous, spiritual dogmatists.

TO REV. A. B. GROSH.

Dear Brother—I am seriously apprehensive that something has produced an inflammation of your organ of combativeness. I trust the disease, if it exist, will yield to proper treatment and not become chronic. You will readily judge that the forementioned apprehension was excited by your remarks in the last "Magazine and Advocate" respecting the Massachusetts Convention of Universalists. I have always entertained so much respect for the venerable Fathers and judicious brethren who compose a majority of that body, as to believe they were capable of managing with discretion and propriety such subjects as were properly brought before them. And I must confess my surprise when I read an intimation of your belief that they had done what you did "not believe any body of honest and intelligent men" would do. And verily I could not account for your impetuous and headlong attack upon them, except by supposing there was a violent inflammation of the organ aforesaid.

But, seriously, Br. Grosh, your fears were unnecessarily excited. The Massachusetts Convention has done no such thing as you apprehend. The paper in which the falsehood was first published, is of such a character, that I did not consider it necessary even to contradict it. But since it has found its way into two respectable periodicals, (the Banner and the Advocate,) a contradiction may not be improper. I can not withhold however, an expression of my surprise, that this false account should have been apparently believed, on the faith of a paper having no sympathy with us, but bitterly opposed to the doctrine in which we rejoice, when a true account of the matter has been published in one of our own most respectable periodicals. Why not believe friends rather than enemies? Why not believe those who know the facts, rather than those who do not? or if they do, choose to misrepresent them. And when deceived by an enemy, and afterwards set right by a friend, why not make the correction, instead of condemning friends on an enemy's accusation? I repeat that the story is false; and that a true statement has been made in opposition. I need not therefore go into particulars, I shall only add my testimony that the Massachusetts Convention is not guilty of that thing whereof it has been accused.—And I have not the least doubt that the person who first carried the report to be published knew it to be entirely and utterly false.

So much for the subject. By way of improvement let me remark, that much ink might be spared, if editors of all papers would take reasonable pains to ascertain facts in cases of supposed delinquency, before issuing bulls of condemnation. If this course were adopted, my brother, how much trouble might be avoided, in the shape of accusations, contradictions, explanations, retractions, apologies, professions of satisfaction, and so forth.

Yours fraternally,

LUCIUS R. PAIGE.

REPLY.

TO REV. L. R. PAIGE.

Dear Brother—Calm your apprehensions, and read my article again, when the chill has ceased to creep over your frame, and your hair to stand on end, and you will see that it is not the result of combativeness, save as startled veneration and conscientiousness called that faculty to action. I, too, have much respect for the "venerable Fathers and judicious brethren" of your State Convention, but not so much as to deem it impossible for them to err. But I did not intimate my belief, but my doubts that they had done what I believed no body of honest and intelligent men would do; for I only said that "appearances would seem to denote," etc. And even this followed the doubting—"Is it possible? There must be something in [i. e., some reason for] such a vote, more than meets the eye. Surely our Massachusetts brethren can not believe," etc. Indeed, the whole article shows I had doubts of the charge, and that, even admitting the fact, I still hoped there was some way of accounting for it, which would fully exonerate the brethren from all dishonesty and ignorance in their actions. Read my article again, Br. Paige, when your eyes no longer look through the magnifying mists of apprehension, and you will be satisfied that your simple denial of the charge would have set me right, and saved each of us a letter on the subject—a saving so desired by you in your letter itself!

For the rest of your letter, I add—I received the charge not from enemies, but from a friend, as you will see by my article; and as for believing "those who know the facts," I have done so as soon as they gave me something to believe. What more will you have? I have now also published the earliest correction that has come to my knowledge—so what mean your remarks on this subject? they surely can not apply to me.

I might add a word by way of improvement, for the edification of those who give a lecture where a simple denial is sufficient, but I forbear. For your information kindly given, I am truly thankful, and by it relieved.

Fraternally yours,

A. B. GROSH.

TO REV. T. WHITTEMORE.

Dear Brother—The foregoing might suffice as a general reply; but courtesy to you, and the tone and spirit of your remarks call for a special notice. I deny making a "trust at the honesty and intelligence of the members of" the Massachusetts Convention. And as to my article being "uncalled for" and "unbecoming," I presume I have a right to differ from you in opinion. I am connected with the denomination. Its actions affect my feelings and character. I, therefore, (very properly, I think,) feel myself called on to express my doubts, and hopes, and even condemnation, if necessary, respecting any act of any of its public bodies, when I deem that act improper or wrong. And while I am one of the Lord's freemen, I will do it.

I gave you my authority for my article, thereby showing that I had not then (as I have not yet) seen the correction of which you speak. I am not, therefore, conscious of deserving the magisterial note you have inflicted on me in addition to Br. Paige's fraternal letter. Did you correct Br. Drew in that manner? I hope not, for his sake and your own. Read, then, my article, and read Br. Drew's—remember that he, as you say, "was led into the error by an irresponsible paper," and I by a highly responsible one—and then answer it to your own conscience, why I am treated as a criminal—as "unbecoming" in my conduct, etc.—while Br. Drew is (and properly, too; for he was as innocent as myself) spoken of as merely being misled. Regretting that when you deemed it necessary to correct my honest mistake, you could not do it in a more equal spirit, I remain yours in the spirit and affection of the Gospel,

A. B. GROSH.

RELIEF SOCIETIES.

The following communication, from a worthy brother, tells some bitter truths in a plain spoken manner. As I wish to follow it with a few remarks, I give it a place here.

SOCIETIES FOR RELIEVING THE WIDOWS OF UNIVERSALIST CLERGYMEN.

Messrs. Editors.—I observe occasionally in your paper appeals to the charitably disposed among our brethren for aid in supporting these societies. Now for one, I can see no more necessity in forming societies for relieving the widows of ministers, than of doctors, lawyers or shoe makers, unless it is true that Universalists do not care enough about the prosperity of the cause to pay their preachers enough to enable them to lay up something for the benefit of their families; and if this be the case, I do not see the justice in taking from the most liberal, money to support a man's wife after he is dead, in order that he may preach for nothing all his life time, to those who are too stingy to pay him for his services.—Besides, it appears to me that if this system were generally adopted, it would encourage many to enter the ministry who have not sufficient energy of character to lay up property in any other way. I must acknowledge I am prejudiced against societies of this character, and perhaps too much so, but really it appears to me, that, if Universalists were to devote their extra funds towards supporting the cause in their own immediate vicinity, and pay living preachers instead of postponing the payment till after they are dead, our cause would be more prosperous. Another thing, those who pay their preachers have a right to have some choice who they employ, and the consequence would be, men capable of becoming useful, and those only, would find employment, and others would be compelled to resort to some other business, better suited to their talents. But let the habit of "preaching for nothing and finding one's self" continue, and the families of all share alike, after the preachers are dead, and we shall soon have a set of useless drones for a ministry. Perhaps it may be said that preachers should be willing to sacrifice every thing for the good of the cause; but this is a mistake, preachers are under no more obligations to make sacrifices than laymen, and those who have no spirit enough about them to demand for their services enough to support their families, independently, are in my opinion unfit to teach others.

I do hope our friends will duly consider the evil effects of running into these societies, and rather provide an honorable compensation for living ministers, than hoard up a fund for the benefit of dead ones. A LAYMAN.

REMARKS.

I have but little room for remarks, and must therefore be brief.

1. The "unless" is true in part. From various causes few Universalist preachers receive more than a bare scanty living in remuneration for their labors. And I believe there are but few of them that could not earn more, were they to devote the same talents and industry they employ in preaching the Gospel, to any other occupation. Now, this being the case, there is a deficit in their compensation, which even Relief societies will scarcely make good. If "A Layman" will devise means whereby the laborer in the Gospel can be supported as his labors merit, without these societies, I will join with him in hearty opposition to them.

2. There is little danger that those "who have not energy of character" enough to take care of themselves, will enter on the toilsome and poorly required labors of a Universalist preacher, merely that their families may be supported after they themselves have been worked and starved to death. Such persons know (or will soon learn) that they have chosen a profession ill adapted to those devoid of energy of character—and that almost any other pursuit will be more gainful.

3. The remedy proposed is an excellent one—the only one that can render Relief Societies unnecessary. Let all who are opposed to such societies, put it in force with all their might, and God speed them, say I. Let "PAY THE LIVING PREACHER," be their motto—the principle of their action; and let all who do not partake of their prejudices support the widows and orphans of the poor departed, until the first are able to render Relief Societies unnecessary. The latter part of this paragraph, is, in my opinion, not a necessary consequence. "Useless drones" generally care more for themselves while living, than they do about what may be the condition of their families after they themselves are dead.

4. I differ from "A Layman"—it is not a mistake that "preachers should be willing to sacrifice every thing for the good of the cause"; but it is a mistake to suppose that laymen are not also bound to make the same sacrifices that preachers are. There is this difference—at the first, the preacher is obliged to make the sacrifice in order to make the doctrine known; and after that, those who believe should ask no sacrifices at his hands, but those in which each one of them is willing to go with him, step by step, in proportion to his abilities—be they moral, mental, physical or pecuniary. But at present, this is not the case. Generally, preachers are required to make the greatest and most frequent sacrifices. I know men who would now be worth twenty or thirty thousand dollars, if not more, had they devoted their talents to law, medicine, politics or merchandize, with the same untiring energy and constant industry that they have devoted to the labors of the ministry. They knew it—or, at least, believed it, as all who know them believe it. And yet they have sacrificed all this prospect for a support which, with great saving, has not allowed them to lay up as many hundreds—yes, not as many tens of dollars. They feel as if they had acted with "spirit," for the times needed it—and as if they had done their duty, for without such sacrifices, the cause would not be as prosperous as it now is. They are poor—they are growing old—some of them will leave helpless families behind them. Even if well paid now, they could leave but little behind them; for it requires many years to save considerable from even a good salary. They ask these Relief Societies—they appeal to the public in their favor, for the sake of their families, and I do hope their appeal will not be in vain. Let "A Layman" look at our Fathers in our Israel, and ask himself whether they did more than their duty—whether they were deficient in spirit—and whether they were unfit to teach others? Yet had they refused to preach unless they were paid salaries large enough to support them and their families, where now would be Universalism in the United States? And had Paul demanded enough to support him, instead of working hard at his trade until the Gospel was established, he would scarcely have preached the Gospel at all.

But to conclude. So far, preachers are the largest annual contributors to the Relief Society in the Central Association. One of them to my knowledge sacrificed several hundred dollars a year for several years, to the good of the cause, though a man with a large family, and but a small property. Others have humbly imitated his generous devotion. Such preachers, not useless drones, ask a cordial (not a grudging) support of the relief societies, until, at least, our societies render them unnecessary by fully remunerating their preachers.

MESSRS. CAMPBELL AND SHEPHERD AT ODDS.

Our readers will recollect that Mr. Shepherd of the "Primitive Christian," has for a number of months, been striving to engage us in a news paper war with him on the question, whether immersion in water is essential to Discipleship, or necessary to make a Christian; and that he strenuously contends for the affirmative of the question. By the September number of the "Millennial Harbinger," edited by Mr. Shepherd's great master or oracle, we perceive he is likely to have business enough in his own household on this subject. He will surely have to call his master to account for heresy. Mr. Campbell says in his paper of this month, in answering a female correspondent, "There is no occasion, then, for making immersion on the profession of the faith, absolutely essential to the Christian—he that infers that none are Christians but the immersed, as greatly errs, as he who affirms that none are alive but those of clear and full vision."

We leave Brother Shepherd to settle the account of this heresy with Br. Campbell, as best he may.

D. S.

THE KNICKERBOCKER.

We received the July, August and September numbers of this periodical, together, and intended to have given place to an article concerning it, in our last, but were prevented from so doing, by the crowded state of our columns. The late arrival of the two former numbers, rendering a critical notice of them rather unseasonable, and having but glanced at the latter, our remarks will be more general than specific.

We read the introductory article, upon "Scandinavian Literature and Antiquities," in the September number, and were much interested in the perusal; particularly, of that part which alludes to the undertaking of "the Royal Society of Northern Antiquarians." We trust this praiseworthy object will succeed, and meet with co-operation and support from the learned and wealthy, in both hemispheres. The lines upon "the American wild Rose," are, like their subject, sweet breathing, and are a patriotic refutation of the English traveller's remark, "the rose is a flower entirely unknown to the new world." We were pleased with the article, entitled "Edward Fane's Rosebud," not alone on account of its intrinsic merit, but because the style of it seems to us, so like that of our favorite, "Elia." This is only an idea of our own, however.

Having perused this number but thus far, we can say nothing of its remaining contents; but, from what we have seen, we think the well earned reputation of the work is creditably sustained.

The Knickerbocker is a welcome guest at our table. We like it, not only for its high literary excellence, but for the tone of liberality which, generally, runs through its articles, notwithstanding, we have something in futuro, in regard to the papers upon "Religious Chatterbox," which appeared in the July and August numbers.

A word or two, in relation to the late delinquency of this periodical. It is, perhaps, not known to the public generally, that when the present proprietors took hold of the work, it was in a declining state, and has been raised from that state by their activity and enterprise.—They have spared neither pains to render the work worthy the acceptance of the public, nor generous encouragements for talent to occupy their pages. Their "out-goes" were great, their "incomings" comparatively small. In the midst of all this came on the "pressure," which sits so like an incubus upon the business operations of the day. The Knickerbocker, like some other publications, with a vast number of subscribers, and "a deal" of just dues, uncollected, was obliged to labor through a heavy sea.

These facts should elicit the kindest indulgence of the paying subscribers to this work, especially as much of this embarrassment was accumulated, in catering for their gratification, and the hard head of "the times," being laid upon all, should teach us to be lenient to each other. The non-paying, "patrons?" know that "effect follows cause," the public, therefore, will naturally look to the cause of this delinquency.

In conclusion, we hope this work will prosper, and that so fair a fabric of our national literature, will not be suffered to decay and fall, through neglect, and want of patronage. To the Knickerbocker, its Proprietors, Publishers, Correspondents and Readers, "Benedicite."

* We would remind many of our readers, that a portion of these remarks are not alone applicable to the affairs of the "Knickerbocker."

ASSOCIATIONS.

The proceedings of several of these bodies are on hand, but have been crowded out. We shall make room for them as soon as possible, consistent with what we deem the necessary variety of our columns.

Several obituary notices are yet on hand, for which we shall find room in our next.

Another letter from Mr. Campbell to Mr. Skinner, (but not in reply to Mr. Skinner's last,) has been received, and will appear in our next.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE DEVOTEE.

Thou with the pallid brow
And sunken eye, give o'er,
No more thy wasting spirit bow,
To nature's mystic lore—
The spoiler's wizard wiles
Round midnight tapers play;
No with bright hopes of fame, beguiles
But to secure his prey.

What will it boot thee, tho'
Thou fathom the abyss
Of knowledge; to aspire to know,
Is death to earthly bliss—
'Tis madness to set free
The feverish, struggling mind—
To think, alas! is but to be Alone amongst our kind.

Oh fritter not thy prime,
In wisdom's stern pursuit—
We scarce begin her steps to climb.
'Ere all life's powers are mute;
Then doomed dreamer, haste
From thy dark tomes away—
Nor thus in lonely vigils waste
Thy being—wilt thou? say!

"Go! dark-souled earthling, hold.
Low fellowship with brutes—
This spirit thou canst never mould
To sensual pursuits;
Think'st thou thy sky-bent wing
To limit in its flight,
Or from empyreal realms to bring
It back to mundane night?"

"Mistaken mortal—go!
While aught of truth remains
To be developed here below,
I'll spurn all mental chains;
And ask no higher bliss,
Than intellectual here—
To fit immortal mind in this,
For a much higher sphere." Rurus.

From the Trumpet.

LIGHT IN A DARK PLACE.

A young gentleman, who had repaired to Andover, Mass. to commence his preliminary studies for the Christian ministry, has had his attention arrested by the doctrine of Universalism, and in an address before an association of the students—has avowed his conversion to that faith. We obtain our information of Br. J. A. Gurley, of Methuen, from whose letter we give the following extract.

Br. WHITTEMORE—"I send you the closing part of an address delivered in Andover, by a young brother lately converted from the doctrine of endless misery to universal salvation, by the name of Timothy G. Senter. He came from Portsmouth, N. H. a few months since, a strong believer of endless misery, and entered the Latin School preparatory to becoming a public advocate of it; but being led to a close examination, the result was as might be expected. It is his intention now to prepare himself for the more excellent ministry of reconciliation which giveth life; and I have no doubt from the good report I have heard, and a personal interview with him, that he will be abundantly successful, should Providence spare his life. I will only add, that having been selected by his fellow students to deliver an essay before the Philanthropic Society connected with the School, he took that opportunity to renounce his former partial views, and to declare his conviction that "God is indeed good unto all, and that his tender mercies are over all his works,"—which created "no small stir." Yours, in the faith that works by love. JOHN A. GURLEY.

THE EXTRACT.

Since I first came into this place, my mind has been caged in regard to religion. I entered this School preparatory to preaching the partial favor of God; but in search of arguments in Holy Writ to strengthen my mind in the doctrine of endless misery, I found instead thereof, the doctrine of impartial grace revealed in too plain characters to be denied. You will not, I trust, charge me with hypocrisy, in this plain avowal of mine; if I were a hypocrite, I should certainly not proclaim my sentiments in this place.

The first principal objection which I have to the doctrine of endless misery, is, it is not the doctrine of the Bible—has no countenance there—is not of God, but of men. It is contrary to the true character of the Deity, as displayed in the works of creation, and in the Book of inspiration. It dismantles him of all comeliness, and makes him changeable and partial. It is a contradiction of itself, and its influence is to cast gloom upon all who embrace it. It corrodes pure affection, destroys the happiness of man, and deprives him in his last hours of all hope of a blessed immortality. It professedly admits the supremacy of God, but practically denies it, and allows that man has the power to sway him in his designs. It makes God a liar, and his word of none effect. It is possessed of no comeliness or beauty—it is without form and void, a tottering fabric which must and will soon fall to the ground—the sooner the better for the peace of the world.

"You will perhaps say 'I read my Bible strangely.' It is my custom to read one passage, comparing it with others of like import, till I am satisfied of its true meaning. You will say that 'I have read Universalist works.' I answer with truth, that I never read a book of the kind in my life—save the Bible. You will perhaps say that 'I have been influenced by Universalists.' I respond, that this Book alone has been my guide, and I feel a spirit within me, which says, 'proclaim the salvation of all men, spoken of by all God's holy prophets since the world began.'

"Brethren—this be assured is the doctrine of God, of Christ, and his apostles. Search the Scriptures and not the notes of Doctors, and you will find it so. Embrace and cherish it I beseech you, for it will make you wise unto salvation. Before you condemn your speaker for thus addressing you, think well of these things and search the Bible carefully.

"I have used plain language I am well aware, but what I have said I have deemed my duty to proclaim. If I am wrong, may I find the better way; if right, still persevere."

Andover, July 26, 1837.

ADVERSITY—Is very often a blessing in disguise, which by detaching us from earth and drawing us towards heaven, gives us, in the assurance of lasting joys, an abundant recompense for the loss of transient ones. "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth." Many a man in losing his fortune has found himself, and been ruined into salvation; for though God demands the whole heart, which we could not give him when we shared it with the world, he will never reject the broken one, which we offer him in our hour of sadness and reverse. Misfortunes are moral bitters, which frequently restore the healthy tone of the mind, after it has been cloyed and sickened by the sweets of prosperity. The spoiled children of the world, like their juvenile namesakes, are generally a source of unhappiness to others, without being happy in themselves.

MARRIAGES.

In Philadelphia, Jefferson county, on July 2d, by J. G. Latimer, Esq., Mr. J. H. WEEKS, to Miss LAURA M. BOWEN, all of that place.

At Mohawk, Herkimer county, on the 29th inst., N. HENRIAM HALLOCK, of the firm of N. Hallock and Son, Utica, to DOROTHY GOLDEN, daughter of John Golden, of the former place.

DEATHS.

In this city, August 31st, EPHRAIM, only son of Edmund Munson, in the 7th year of his age. In the wise providence of God, this family has been severely afflicted with illness. The mother was removed by death, only six weeks before her child followed her. The sole surviving parent was lying very low with the same illness, at the time his son was removed, as the son had been when the mother was called away—and the two other children have also been ill, one nigh unto death. Mr. Munson has borne all with the fortitude of a man, and the resignation of a Christian blessed with the consolation of universal and impartial grace.

At Sandy Creek, Augustus WARREN, in the 63d year of his age. Long will his name and virtues be cherished by all who knew him; and salutary will be the lesson those learned who visited him in his last illness—for he died rejoicing in the faith and hope of Universalism. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourning relatives and friends, at the request of the deceased, by W. STAS.

At the residence of her son, Dr. Mason G. Smith, in Perry, Genesee county, N. Y., on the 5th inst., Mrs. SARAH SMITH, aged 65 years, relict of the late Jedediah Smith, formerly of Osego, N. Y. The deceased was in early, ardent, and sincere believer in the doctrine of a world's redemption. Being gifted with strong intellectual powers, and having been for many years indefatigable in the study of the Scriptures, and familiar with the writings of the earliest and ablest supporters of that doctrine, she was able to maintain and defend her belief, with a fluency and copiousness of Scripture illustration, and force of logical deduction, seldom equalled. During a protracted illness, her faith was unwavering and towards its close, her anxiety was great, "to depart and be with Christ";—which she believed with the apostle to be "far better."

In Perrysburg, Ohio, Mrs. ABNEY LADD, wife of David Ladd, in the 46th year of her age. She died as she had lived, in the glorious hope of the Gospel of Christ. Just before her funeral, which took place on the 2d inst., a paper enclosing a rose was taken from her bosom.—It had been placed there by some friend unknown, who had inscribed on it the following lines—a just tribute of respect to the amiable and worthy deceased, and of consolation for her sorrowing but not hopeless partner.

"Thy leaves are all withered, thy fragrance is gone,"

On the bosom of her who reared thy sweet form;

But her spirit has fled, with her God to repose, Unsoiled and bright as the newly-blown rose."

In Columbus, Chenango county, on the 5th inst., Mr. THOMAS SPURR, aged 62 years. His faith in the restitution remained unshaken to the very last, and by his death an aged father in Israel is taken from many affectionate relatives, and from the community which respected his virtues, and now hold his worth in sacred remembrance.

His funeral was attended on the 6th inst., by a large concourse of neighbors and friends, and the consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the afflicted family, who mourn not as those without hope.—Com.

At Richfield on the 19th ult., after a lingering illness, Miss ROSAMUND BROWN, daughter of J. and S. Brown, in the 15th year of her age. Though in the morning of life, she had drunk of the waters of eternal life, and died in the firm faith of a world's salvation.

Her funeral was attended on the 20th, at the Episcopal church (Monticello) when the hope founded on the fulness of the Gospel of Christ, was presented to the mourning relatives and a large audience of sympathizing friends.

In youth and beauty called away,

From parent's pride, and sister's love;

Her Father called—why should she stay?

Nor join the ransomed host above

T. J. S.

In East Cleveland, Ohio, on the 19th ult., in the 57th year of his age, COL. WILLIAM C. TURRELL, formerly of Bridgewater, Susquehanna county, Pennsylvania.—He had long been an unwavering believer in the resurrection of all men to immortality and eternal life. He was perfectly submissive in sickness, and happy and resigned in death. He made the arrangements for the funeral services, and desired that a Universalist clergyman should be obtained to preach on the occasion. Mr. T. was highly esteemed by all who knew him, as a man of talents and respectability. His funeral was attended by a large concourse of people, and a sermon preached on the occasion from John v: 28, 29. Mr. T. was the father in law of Br. Hecox, who has lately removed from St. Lawrence county, N. Y., and who is residing with the family of the deceased at East Cleveland.

J. WHITNEY.

In Bridgewater, Susquehanna county, Pa., on September 11th, Mr. ZINA ROBERTS, aged 35 years. His disease was a violent fever, and lasted about three weeks. During his lucid intervals he spoke in the most forcible manner of the consolations afforded by Universalism.—In his dying moments it was his only theme, having been, to use his own words, "his comfort through life, and now, in view of death, his greatest consolation."—From youth up, he sustained an unblemished character, and of him it may truly be said, he had no enemies.

The funeral was attended in the Baptist meeting-house in Monroeville, and the consolations of divine truth were ably and solemnly presented to a large concourse of relatives, friends and acquaintances by Br. Bartholomew, from Ps. xciii: 4. May his aged parents, and bereaved wife and children be abundantly blessed in remembering his virtues, and believing in reunion with him and all mankind in our better home above.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION

From the Millennial Harbinger.

No. 10.—Mr. Campbell to Mr. Skinner.

Bethany, Va., August 22, 1837.

My dear Sir.—Your letter No. ix. not having yet arrived, and I being on the eve of departing from home, as intimated in my last, in order that the discussion may go forward, I proceed to offer a few reflections on the 2d proposition, the first having been as fully discussed as it can well be without the second: for already have you been speculating on the words everlasting and forever, as they are sometimes found in the sacred Scriptures. See your letter No. vii. p. 389.

2. The second proposition is thus drafted by yourself. "Do the words olem, aion, aionios, etc. when applied to the punishment of the wicked mean duration without end?" You deny—I affirm.

3. I ask, Why should they not? Why should they mean duration without end when applied to the happiness of the righteous, and not duration without end when applied to the punishment of the wicked? It can not be from the force or meaning of the words themselves: for if they at one time mean duration without end—if they fairly have that force and power in any case, they may have it in another, unless there be something in the nature of the substantive with which they are connected absolutely prohibitory of that signification. If it is admitted (as I think it is by you Sir—nay, your own proposition declares it,) that they do, when applied to the happiness of the righteous, mean duration without end; it would be whimsical in the extreme to ask for a special law limiting their meaning when applied to the punishment of wicked men. Why in the name of reason should aion, for instance, when applied to happiness mean endless, and when applied to punishment mean ending? Do, Sir, in the plenitude of your benevolence for us who believe in punishment after death, give us your reasons numerically arranged, why aionion bliss should be endless, and aionion misery ending? The secret which you are about to disclose will be, of course, either in the substantive or in the adjective. If in the adjective, by what authority or by what secret charm, or rather by what inspiration does it instantly mean endless duration when it is followed by the word happiness, and as instantly mean limited duration when prefixed to the word punishment? But if the meaning of the adjective was found in the substantive, and if the reason is not in itself, but in its associate, why should we have any dispute about the meaning of the adjective, inasmuch as it is a perfect cypher without value? Thus if you put 1 before a cypher, it means 10; but if you put 1 behind a cypher, it means 1-10th, while by itself it counts nothing. Thus having no meaning in itself, its prefix or suffix gives it sense: so with you, olem, aion, aionios, when prefixed to happiness, mean endless millions; but prefixed or suffixed to punishment, only mean parts of millions or ending millions. Truly your logic, as well as your cause, is of a singular daring, and in its aspirations to the clouds treads upon hills and mountains of argument as though it moved over the sandy plains of the desert. A mammoth would feel himself as much impeded by a cobweb as a bold Universalist by all the laws of language.

4. Not so bold and courageous as you, Sir, I argue that if olem, aion, aionios, independent of the noun-substantive in construction, have any meaning when prefixed to happiness, they have the same meaning when prefixed to punishment. In one word, when Christ says, "These shall go away into aionion punishment, and the righteous into aionion life," the aionion means as long or as short in the one case as in the other. Eternal punishment and eternal life are with me two eternals of equal dimensions. I ask you, then, Sir, for what reasons the one should be an ending and the other an endless eternal? Be kind enough, Sir, here also to enumerate your reasons, that I may count and weigh them!

5. I could neither flatter nor provoke you to enumerate those other words which represent future punishment, to which aionios, or its fraternity have been prefixed. I shall therefore have to do it myself. We have them—

1st. Aionios kolasis, everlasting punishment, Matt. xxv: 46.

2d. Aionion olethron, everlasting destruction, 2 Thess. i: 9.

3d. Aionios krisis, everlasting damnation, or condemnation, Mark iii: 29. This is defined to be the consequence of an unpardonable sin—a sin never to be forgiven.

4th. Aionion krima, everlasting judgment, or punishment, Hebrews vi: 2.

5th. Aionion pur, everlasting fire, Matt. xviii: 8, xxv: 41. "The everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels."

6. Here are no less than five words applied to the future state of wicked men, to which aionios, is an adjective. We have endless punishment, endless destruction, endless damnation, endless judgment, endless fire. These are then to be superadded to your first three, sheol, hades, gehenna, and to tartarus, also. Thus your three have already, in my hands, become nine—sheol, hades, gehenna, tartarus, kolasis, olethros, krisis, krimi, pur. How logical, then, is your first proposition which selects three out of nine!!

7. We have aionios, endless or everlasting, applied to five only out of the nine, because two of them are Hebrew, and one of these (sheol) is not indeed in its nature aionios. But not one of the words in your second proposition has ever been found in construction with any of the three terms in your first proposition!!! I emphasize on the word aionios, because it is of the three the only epithet that could be expected in the Greek Testament; because it has all the pith and marrow of the Hebrew olem, and the Greek aion, in it; and because we have this word applied to "life" forty-five times in the New Testament. For while we have the phrase "everlasting life" only once in the Old Testament, we have aionios zoe, ("eternal life") forty-five times in the New!

8. We have indeed aion with prepositions used adverbally, as eis ton aionia, having with a verb the same power as aionios with a substantive. This word aion, in various forms is found one hundred and three times in the New Testament; and when relating to time alone, or simple duration, is usually, if not always, rendered for ever, or with a negative particle never.

9. This term has frequently in construction the force of an adjective, as when we say, "The blackness of darkness is reserved for certain wicked persons for ever," it is equivalent to "Eternal darkness awaits them." Both Peter and Jude thus use this phrase; so that the future punishment of wicked men may with propriety be said to be exhibited under the figure of eternal darkness, outer darkness, or the blackness of eternal darkness.

10. But I fear I shall soon tread on your toes: for I am here obliged to observe that the only word that expresses simple duration without end in the New Testament is aion the roots of which are aei, and oon, being, always existing. The adjective formed from it, more naturally than any other word in Greek, expresses the always being or duration of the substantive with which it stands in construction. While other adnouns or epithets speak of other qualities of the things defined, this word regards simple existence, being, or duration alone. Thus incorruptible, indissoluble, indestructible, imperishable, are associated with the elements of things, their peculiar organization, constitution, or composition; while aionios, enduring, always being, has respect to their existence itself, or simple duration. Immortal, incorruptible, indissoluble, indestructible, imperishable, denote two or more ideas, and only figuratively, and secondarily or inferentially express eternal being, while this epithet regards simple duration, and literally expresses endless existence. When speaking of deified dead men, or of corruptible beasts and their images, an Apostle would say, "The immortal God," "the incorruptible God;" but when he speaks of God with regard to his eternal being, as in Romans xvi: 26, he calls him the aionion, "the everlasting God." Nay, indeed, when he conceives of him in reference to mortal and corruptible creatures, and speaks of his absolute eternity, he places this before all other epithets, as in 1 Tim. i: 17. "Now to the King eternal, (aionios) immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honor," etc. This places the true meaning of this most lofty of all adjectives, in its proper relation. For the self-existence, the always being, the eternity of God, is, of all conceptions which we can form of him, the most sublime.—Incorruptible, indissoluble, immortal, etc., are taken from things of yesterday, as it were; but this admirably corresponds with him whose incommunicable name is I AM. Oon is the living or active participle of this said verb I AM: so that aion has the whole divinity in it as respects the most lofty and sublime of all his names and attributes.

11. The rancor with which this adjective is assailed by all Universalist partizans is in the ratio of its pre-eminence. I have here, Sir, some recollections of your bold assertions concerning this word in your February letter, and shall therefore lay down my pen and see what you have alleged against it.

12. I perceive from the perusal of said letter, that more than two-thirds of it consists of criticisms and dissertations upon the words indicative of duration, or such as you would have the reader to regard in that light. These are tastefully interlarded with a few introductory compliments to myself—such as, "Your constant and overweening, yet fruitless efforts throughout your reply to Mr. M."—"You are unable to adduce a particle of evidence in favor of this assertion."—"There is no possible ground on which you can raise even a plausible argument in favor of the endless perpetuity of punishment."—"Your unfairness and disingenuousness."—"The God-dishonoring and soul-withering system of endless punishment."—"You evidently saw the impossibility of fairly maintaining your position, and therefore to invalidate the force, etc., you state."—"One false position requires several more to sustain it."—"This declaration was evidently made when driven to a most distressing strait," etc., etc. There is one excuse, Mr. Skinner, for this very complimentary and debonair introduction:—You wished to try my nerves, and see how much I could bear while at the threshold of the discussion. Perhaps too, your indignation was at fever-heat because of my exposition to Mr.

Montgomery of the nakedness of your benevolent system in its attempts to expel from the universe "that horrid doctrine," as you call it, that God will punish sin.

13. You will think that I am about to retaliate when I tell you that your dissertations on Greek terms are more like an irony or a satire on criticism, than a sober, grave, and literary inquiry into the meaning of words: but, I assure you, Sir, that there is no vengeance in this declaration, but a desire to induce you to reconsider your reasonings, or rather your hazardous and unauthorized assertions about the meaning of words.

14. In my letter to Mr. Montgomery, after quoting his language on the words incorruptible, endless life, incorruption, and immortality, with his question, "Are these words applied to the punishment of the wicked?" I answer, "No, nor to the happiness of the righteous, nor to simple duration at all. Two of them are substantives, and therefore can not be used as epithets, viz. "immortality" and "incorruption;" and the other three apply to beings or material substances in reference to simple indissolubility; not one of them could properly be applied to a simple state of being, or to happiness or misery: for although the word "endless" might seem to be an exception, when the original word is considered it is not. It only figuratively signifies endless, as any one may see who will examine either the etymological import or the common use of akatalutos in Greek writers." This answer became the theme of your first letter, so far as my letter to Mr. M. was concerned. Your whole effort is an attempt to prove that these words are applied to the happiness of the righteous and to simple duration. And, strange as it may appear, you have not adduced a single passage from the Bible where the words immortal happiness, incorruptible happiness, endless life happiness, immortality happiness, ever do occur; nor a single passage where immortal duration, incorruptible duration, endless life duration, immortality duration, occur. But you attempt to show that these words and their fraternities have respect to "the resurrection state and the ENDLESS PERPETUITY thereof," evidently, therefore, they must have some applicability to happiness and simple duration!!! This is your head and front and conclusion philological in proof that these words do belong to happiness and simple duration.

15. Every word, then, that has respect to a state, will logically and grammatically properly apply to the persons in that state. If I say of the married state, "It is a delightful, blessed state," it is equivalent to saying that Mrs. Femina is a delightful blessed wife, and that Mr. Homo is a delightful and blessed husband! All this may be; but it follows not, by any rule or law of nature or of logic, that what may be true of a state, or person, or thing in the concrete, or in a particular circumstance, is an attribute of any one of them. For this plain reason, Sir, there is not an atom of logic or philology in the five-sevenths of your February epistle. You are all the while laboring under the delusion THAT WHAT MAY BE TRUE OF THREE, FIVE, OR SEVEN THINGS IN THE CONCRETE, IS TRUE OF EACH OF THEM IN THE ABSTRACT.—Thus Paul speaks of an immortal, indissoluble, imperishable, incorruptible body, because that body may be happy; therefore he writes of immortal, indissoluble, imperishable, incorruptible, duration and happiness!

16. But after describing the resurrection state, you ask, "Can any enlightened person," etc., etc., "read Paul's description of a state of glory honor, power, incorruption, immortality, imperishableness, indissolubility, indestructibility, etc., and then honestly say he believes these terms have no APPLICABILITY whatever to the happiness of the righteous or to duration?"

17. "No applicability whatever." What a subtle changing of the question, or what an imposition on one's self and the community! "No applicability whatever"! That is not the question in debate. Why, Sir, I would not say that fearlessness, contentedness, peacefulness, delightfulness, joyfulness, sociableness, communicativeness, have no applicability whatever to the happiness of the righteous. But why do you talk of the happiness of the righteous in the resurrection state, seeing you say there will then be no wicked in the universe!

18. To have no sort of applicability, direct or indirect, proximate or remote, concomitant, precedent or subsequent, is one category; and whether any of these words can be epithets of happiness or of duration—applicable to happiness or duration, is quite another category. For example, we say that LONG, SHORT, PERPETUAL, etc., apply to duration; for they make sense with that word; but who ever heard of incorruption duration, or indestructibility duration? Besides, Sir, there is in the word IMMORTALITY, and in all the others, an idea of duration; and to apply them to duration would be to define a thing by itself!—as, for instance, a rose rose, a lily-looking lily, an opposing opponent. So ends this chapter of your logical logic!

19. Your comparison and affirmation that "felicity is applicable to express happiness" is out of the reach of criticism. Matters of criticism must always have something plausible about them.—To show that felicity is applicable to itself, and that one can make it an epithet of bliss, is a shift which peculiarly belongs to Universalism. But, perhaps, you did not perceive the sophism in proving from the words, "I am in a state of complete felicity," that you change the subject of comparison from the state to the person; and thence infer what belongs to the one belongs to the other!!

20. You proceed to the Greek language, and give us definitions of AKATALUTOS by Donnegan and Grove in proof—of what!—That it expresses an attribute of duration or of happiness! They define by the word, eternal, everlasting, endless! Nay, indeed; but by the words "not loosened or destroyed, indissoluble, indestructible, firm, stable, binding." And with their definitions you argue that is one of the terms that more than AIONIOS, or any other, signifies eternal. Strange that your own authorities should not have given as its first, middle, or last meaning, eternal, everlasting or endless!! To help you, too, this word occurs but once in the New Testament. What a splendid subject of debate against AIONIOS, which occurs in the New Testament SEVENTY-FIVE TIMES, translated by the words ETERNAL, EVERLASTING, and FOREVER; and by no other!!

21. You next define APHTHARTOS, which is found eight times in the New Testament; and most learnedly quote Donnegan, Grove, and Loveland as lexicographers, defining it, "imperishableness, immortality, incorruptibility, and incorruption;" and yet not once by the words eternal, everlasting forever, endless!!

22. Then you submit APHTHARTOS, which occurs SEVEN times. Donnegan explains it, INCORRUPTIBLE, IMMORTAL, ETERNAL. Here we have got the word ETERNAL for the first and last time in your select terms, and here it is the THIRD and most figurative meaning according to your authority.

23. "Last of all, the woman died also!" You give us ATHANASIA, which occurs THREE times, and which your Loveland defines "exemption from death or dissolution, immortality." Which of these four terms you will put into your third proposition, when you undertake to furnish "a word that expresses duration without end, not applied to the future punishment of the wicked, or that assures us that God, angels, or saints shall have duration without end," I wist not; but I advise you to choose AKATALUTOS, because it occurs but once, and will afford most ground for debate!

24. These four words are found in all the New Testament nineteen times, and your authorities give us ETERNAL once as the third meaning of APHTHARTOS; but unfortunately for this single ETERNAL APHTHARTOS, Paul places it after AIONIOS, and shows that in his critical skill it differs from it most subordinately:—"Now unto the King eternal, AIONIOS, immortal, APHTHARTOS, the only wise God," etc., 1 Tim. i: 17. Thus, Sir, the Apostle gives the negative to your ONCE eternal against the SEVENTY-FIVE TIMES we find eternal, everlasting, or forever, which, in the judgment of ALL TRANSLATORS and LEXICOGRAPHERS, is the true and proper meaning of AIONIOS. I say ALL translators and dictionary-makers, for there is not one on earth that I have ever seen or heard of, that does not give ETERNAL or EVERLASTING as the first and most natural literal and obvious meaning of AIONIOS. I have now lying around me all the great authorities, Siskius, Schrevelius, Thesaurus Græcæ Linguae, Robertson, Parkhurst, Greenfield, etc., etc., and all these superadded to your list, give UNLIMITED DURATION, ETERNAL, EVERLASTING as the proper meaning of AIONIOS.

25. Eternal, endless, everlasting, etc., be it observed, like all other words, are used figuratively. I often speak of my everlasting solace, my endless labors, my ceaseless cares, etc. But who thence infers that these words have no higher signification with me, no proper and unfigurative meaning, errs, as that person errs who would say because "everlasting" is applied to an order of priesthood, to hills and mountains, etc., therefore, when applied to things beyond time or after death, it means a limited time, or a short duration?

26. These are not the words that belong to time only in a figurative sense. In their literal sense they are only applicable to God and that world which is itself eternal. Hence God, in both Testaments, is called the everlasting and the eternal God. The future state of the righteous is by Jesus called "eternal life," and the future state of the wicked, "everlasting punishment." But as yet we have only introduced this manner and offered a few reasons why we allege that AION and AIONIOS, as well as their Hebrew and English representatives, should, when they are used in reference to objects connected with another world, whatever these objects may be, be uniformly understood in the sense of that world to which they belong. If to the present world, they are used figuratively or in a part of their signification; but when used as in relation to the eternal or future world, they ought to be understood as the world to which they belong is understood.

All which is respectfully submitted by your friend,
A. CAMPBELL.

No. 11.—Mr. Skinner to Mr. Campbell.

Utica, N. Y., September 22, 1837.

1. MY DEAR SIR—Yours of the 22d ult., has just arrived. I hasten to reply.

2. I had fondly flattered myself, that how much soever you might be inclined to exercise your ingenuity and tact in evading or attempting to invalidate the force of my reasoning and arguments, that the game of palpable sophism, open perversion, and downright distortion of my language and meaning, had been given up, and would not again be attempted by you—that if not the gravity and dignity of the Christian minister, at least the decorum and affability of the gentleman, would have been maintained. Not only our professions, and the position we occupy before the public, but the solemnity of the theme under discussion, and the deep and thrilling importance of the subject, should demand candor, honesty, and Christian fairness between us. It has been a source of deep regret to me, and I know it has also to the readers of both of our papers, that there has been too little of the open, fair and generous spirit of the Gospel in this discussion thus far; and I am sorry to see that the letter now before me, makes apparently no nearer approximation to this spirit.

3. In your 3d and 4th paragraphs you demand why aion should mean endless when applied to happiness, and ending when applied to punishment, and repeat the question in various forms, as though I had given those definitions of aion. But this you knew that I had never done. Because I deny that aion, when applied to punishment, means endless, does this prove that I give ending as its definition? Because I say of a great man, he is not infinitely great, does this convict me of saying he is a little man? But worse than this: in your 11th paragraph you accuse me and my system of "attempts to expel from the universe 'that horrid system,' as you [1] call it, that God will punish sin!" Have I ever denied—have I not uniformly maintained—and does not the very proposition under discussion, necessarily suppose that God will punish sin? Is this, my dear Sir, Christian candor and fairness on your part? I do fervently hope in future communications to have no further occasion to notice these things.

4. Your letter now before me, although it contains some arguments, does not, in my opinion, answer that part of my first letter relating to the subject, nor meet the merits of the question at issue, and for the following reasons: 1. You undertake to show that aion must mean naturally and primarily endless duration from its radical derivation, without any attempt at proof, and I think without any possibility of proving, that either radix, or root, from which it is derived, is ever used in the New Testament to signify endless duration. 2. You assume or take for granted, that aionios, when applied to life in the New Testament, uniformly, or very generally, signifies endless, which is not conceded, nor do I think it can be proved. 3. You assume without argument, and assert without proof, that the five passages you quote where aionios is applied to punishment, destruction, condemnation, etc., all relate "to the future state of wicked men," and mean "endless punishment, endless destruction," etc.; whereas you have a great labor to perform before you will be able to make that appear. 4. You have made no effort to prove from the nature of punishment itself, that it is, or necessarily must be endless; but this must be done before so ambiguous a word as aionios can be allowed any force towards establishing its endless duration. But this I am confident you will not be able to do till your locks are grayer than I suppose them to be at present.

5. I will now go into an examination of the radical derivation and meaning of aion and aionios. For I deem it useless to spend time about the Hebrew olam, it being by both of us conceded that it is the exact synonyme (at least scripturally) of these two Greek words. You maintain that aion is the only word in the New Testament, which expresses simple duration without end. If this be correct, I am confident that simple duration without end is not expressed in the New Testament. Your reason is, that it is derived from aei, always, and oon, being, or existing—always existing.

6. Now as oon is nothing more nor less than the present participle being, from eimi, to be, it follows of course, that duration of being is not expressed by this root of aion, and therefore, whatever force the whole word may have in expressing duration, must be derived entirely from the adverb aei, which we translate by always. An examination of all the passages in the New Testament, where aei occurs, will be the best criterion by which to judge of the meaning of this root of aion. It occurs eight times, as follows:

7. Mark xv: 8—"And the multitude, crying aloud, began to desire him to do as he had aei (ever) done unto them": i. e., uniformly since he (Pilate) had been governor. Acts vii: 51—"Ye stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart and ears, ye do aei (always) resist the Holy Spirit; as your fathers did, so do ye": i. e., ye do continually, habitually, resist, etc. 2 Cor. iv: 11—"For we which live are aei (always) delivered unto death," etc.: i. e., constantly, at all times, liable to death. 2 Cor. vi: 10—"As sorrowful, yet aei (always) rejoicing": i. e., continually. Tit. i: 12—"The Cretans are aei (always) liars": i. e., habitually. Heb. iii: 10—"They do aei (always) err in their hearts": i. e., uniformly, habitually. 1 Pet. iii: 14—"Be ready aei (always) to give an answer to every man." etc.: i. e., at all times, continually. 2 Pet. i: 12—"Wherefore I will not be negligent to put you aei (always) in remembrance of these things": i. e., constantly. These are all the places where aei occurs in the New Testament, and in not one of them does the word signify endlessly, or apply to any period beyond this state of being. And if neither of the two roots signifies endlessly, it is useless to attempt to prove that aion has the radical meaning of endless duration. Judging from its radix, we should conclude the word was used to express, not endless being, as you suppose, but continually, or continuous being, without any necessary reference to duration: and such is really the fact concerning it.

8. By an examination which I have just made of the Greek Testament, I find aion, the substantive, thus formed from aei and oon, occurs one hundred and twenty-seven times, (instead of only one hundred and three times, as you have it.) It is rendered etcr, seventy-one times; never, seven times; world, thirty-six times; worlds, twice; evermore, three times; ages, twice; eternal, twice; world without end, once; course, once; and left untranslated twice. It occurs in the singular number sixty-five times, and in the plural, sixty-two times. It is never translated eternity in the New Testament, and in most cases, would make nonsense if it were.

9. Suppose we try a few instances. Col. i: 26—"The mystery which hath been hid from the eternities (aionon) and from generations," etc. Eph. ii: 7—"That in the eternities (aioi) to come, he might show," etc. Eph. iii: 11—"According to the purpose of the eternities (aionon)," etc. Eph. ii: 2—"According to the eternity (aionia) of this world." Matt. xii: 32—"Neither in this eternity (aoni) nor the coming." xiii: 22—"And the cares of this eternity (aionos)," etc. Verses 39, 40—"The harvest is the end of this eternity; (aionos;) so will it be in the end of this eternity (aionos)." Rom. xii: 2—"And be not conformed to this eternity (aioni)." 1 Cor. ii: 6—"We speak—not the wisdom of this eternity (aionos;) nor of the princes of this eternity (aionos)." 2 Tim. iv: 18—"To whom be glory to the eternities of eternities (ious aionas ton aionon)." This form of the double plural, or plural twice repeated, occurs twenty-one times, and is used as the most intensive form of the word, and is a circumstance sufficient to prove that the word does not of itself radically, legitimately, or properly imply endless duration. A proper eternity is one, undivided, indivisible, unbeginning, unending, and can have no PARTS. The translators of the common version, evidently paid very little attention either to the number (whether singular or plural) or to the form of the word, (whether substantive or adjective,) as they frequently change the number, and also render the substantive by an adjective, and the adjective by a substantive. But could they do this with a word radically signifying eternity!

10. The adjective aionios, formed from aion, occurs in the New Testament, according to my enumeration, (and my numbering agrees with Scarlett,) only seventy-one times, (instead of seventy-five, as you have it.) and is rendered eternal, forty-two times; everlasting, twenty-five times; ever, once; and world, three times, (though you say, paragraph 19, it is rendered by no other word than eternal, everlasting, and forever.) It is applied to zoe, life, forty-four times; thrice to fire; thrice to times; (chronon aionon;) thrice to glory, and once each to punishment, destruction, condemnation, judgment, things unseen, house, salvation, redemption, spirit, inheritance, him, (meaning Onesimus,) habitation, God, consolation, power, weight, covenant, kingdom, and Gospel.

11. In Scarlett's translation of the New Testament, the adjective aionion is retained, or rendered aonian. The reason he gives for this, is, "Because there is no word in the English language which fully expresses what that word in its original sense implies. Had it been lawful to have coined a new word to express aionion in English, perhaps agical, or age-lasting, would have been near it." In further remarking on aionios, he says, "The word expresses duration, or continuance; but it is sometimes of a short and sometimes of a longer duration. Paul, writing to Philemon concerning Onesimus, says, 'perhaps he was separated for a while that thou mightest have him aonianly.' This certainly could mean only during the life of Onesimus. So also Jude (7) says, 'Sodom and Gomorrah were destroyed, and set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of aonian fire.' Though this fire lasted upwards of 2000 years," [or from the time of Abraham to the days of Philo Judæus, in the beginning of the second century.] "it is now extinct.

12. "But," continues Scarlett, "that aionion does not mean endless or eternal, may appear from considering that no adjective can have a greater force than the substantive from which it is derived: thus black cannot mean more than blackness; white cannot mean more than whiteness—if aion means age, and its plural ages, (which none either will or can deny,) then aionion must mean age lasting, or duration to the age or ages to which the thing spoken of relates. That this is the meaning of the word in the Septuagint, will not be disputed by any one that recollects the everlasting covenant of circumcision, (Gen. xvii: 13,) the everlasting covenant of Priesthood, (Numb. xxv: 13,) the everlasting statute of the day of atonement, (Lev. xvi: 34,) etc., etc. The aionion covenants, statutes, etc., are waxed old and have vanished away. When the reader meets with the phrase aonian God, he will understand thereby that God reigns through all the aeons or ages, whether past, present, or to come, and aonian spirit is the spirit of God, which has presided over the church in all ages or aeons."

13. "Aonian life, in the largest view of it, is the life which God hath given us in Christ, according as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, (Eph. i: 4; 1 Jno. v: 11,) or the life which is conveyed from Christ to all the sons of men in the course of the ages of his reign. (Rom. v: 21; iv: 23.) But in its more confined sense, aonian life is the life of the believer in the present, or millennial age, which is the peculiar portion of God's first-born or church, and which they alone enjoy." (Jno. v: 24; xvii: 3; Matt. xxv: 46.) "Aonian judgment, Heb. vi: 3, the Editor [Scarlett] thinks is the judgment of the Aarabic aon, or age, which is past, under which the priests gave judgment according to the law. (Lev. xiii: 13; Numb. v: 15, 16; Exod. xxviii: 30.) Aonian Gospel, is the good news of reconciliation to God, through Christ; which will continue to be preached through the aeons, until every creature, whether in heaven or earth, visible or invisible, is reconciled to God. (Col. i: 16-21.) And then the promulgation of the Gospel will cease. And as there was a period when the aeons began, so a period will come when they will all have an end."

14. The aionios zoe ("eternal, or everlasting life") of the Gospel, almost always, if not uniformly, signifies the continuous spiritual life of joy and peace which believers enjoy, which pertains peculiarly to Messiah's kingdom. In not one instance in all the New Testament, does the phrase necessarily, unequivocally, and exclusively apply to the immortal and endless state of glory hereafter. So much for your "loftiest of all adjectives."

15. From the foregoing facts and authority it clearly appears that aion, and aionios, neither radically, (or by their roots,) nor naturally, by their construction, nor scripturally, nor commonly, by their usage, signify endless duration. That although in their secondary, or accommodated, or as you would call it, their figurative sense, they may be applied to subjects that are endless, and so signify endless when thus applied, yet whenever this is the case, the subject necessarily fixes this modification of meaning to the words, and not they to the subject. That when applied to life itself, they do not signify endless duration, much less then can they signify endless when applied to punishment, destruction, condemnation, judgment, or fire, the only words you can find them connected with where you even pretend that punishment is spoken of.

16. You ask why these words should not mean duration without end, when applied to punishment? This question, Sir, is not for me to answer. The affirmative of the proposition is yours. And as you ask why they should not, I ask why they should? Can you assign any reason? Is there any thing in the nature of punishment which necessarily supposes it will be endless? What is punishment—an end? or a means? If it be an end, it was designed by the Creator of man when he gave existence to our race; and will you seek to thwart the end Jehovah has in view? Is endless damnation, then, the chief end of man—the end for which our race, or any portion thereof, was created? You will not, you dare not affirm it. It would be a libel on the character of God, transforming him into a worse than fiend. If punishment be not an end, but a means to an end, then it cannot, from its very nature, be endless: because, if endless, it could never accomplish the end which as a means it was designed to accomplish. The laboring oar, Sir, is in your hand—prove that punishment or misery is necessarily or from its nature and design, endless, and I yield. But as yet you have made no effort to prove this, or even to prove that the passages of Scripture you cite, where aionion is connected with punishment, etc., have any reference whatever to a future state of being.

17. A few passing remarks on some of your paragraphs, and I close. You seem to desire information towards the close of your 3d paragraph, whether the adjective gives to, or derives from, the substantive its meaning. Answer: In some cases both have a bearing in modifying the meaning of each other—e. g., we speak of a wise man and the wise God—a good man and the good God. We understand the words wise and good in a finite or limited sense when applied to man, but in an infinite or unlimited sense when applied to God; and yet we do not understand either a foolish man, or a foolish God; a bad man, or a bad God. Aionios in construction with a substantive, is to be understood in a similar way as wise and good in the above instances. Your 5th paragraph. As I have not been, so I do not design to be, “either flattered or provoked” to do the business that properly belongs to you. If you add to the testimony as you have in your 6th paragraph, where you speak of endless punishment, endless destruction, endless damnation, etc., as though these were already proved, three will not only become nine, but very soon ninety-nine, in your hands. You need not fear treading on my toes. (See your 10th paragraph.) If you will only keep your feet off of divine truth, and forbear to tread the testimony of Scripture and candor under foot, I will not complain. Universalists have no “rancor” against the adjective aionios. It is perfectly harmless to us; and we are confident that long after the merciless dogma of endless misery, which is now clinging to aionion as its last plank of hope, shall have sunk into the ocean of oblivion, the plank itself shall triumphantly ride above the ocean for many a happy age.

18. Accept my thanks, kind Sir, that you have not opened the vials of your “vengeance” upon me for my “irony or satire on criticism.” (See your 12th paragraph.) Such lenity is worthy of all commendation. From your 13th to your 18th paragraph, inclusive, you labor very assiduously to show that I have subtly changed the question in debate, and imposed on myself and the community, by assuming that what is true of a state in the abstract, is true of each individual belonging to that state in the concrete. I deny the justice of this charge. I have used no subtlety nor sophistry at all. I have simply stated the honest convictions of my heart, and what I deemed fair conclusive reasoning and scriptural argument in the case; and refer our readers again to my first letter for re-examination. Does not the great and infallible Teacher declare, that “they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage: neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection”? Does not Paul declare that “all shall be made alive in Christ,” and then tell in what manner they shall be raised, viz., in incorruption, glory, power, and spirituality? Will you say Sir, that what is true of one is not true of all in the glorious state? Or will you say that any that are raised to incorruption, glory, power, and spirituality, and are the children of God, equal unto the angels, and can die no more, will nevertheless be miserable? Will you deny that all such will be perfectly happy, and endlessly happy? If so, then settle your account with the Bible, and not with me.

19. In your 10th and 17th paragraphs, you have (probably undesignedly) conceded two important facts, viz., that “immortal, incorruptible, indissoluble, etc., denote two or more ideas,” of course, then, they are altogether more copious in their meaning than aion or its derivative aionios can be, yourself being judge: and also that there is in all these words an idea of duration, which, in your reply to Mr. Montgomery, you were seemingly fain to deny.

20. What you say from your 19th to your 23d paragraph, inclusive, more properly belongs to the third proposition than to the second. One question is enough at a time. I will, therefore, only remark concerning your 19th and 20th paragraphs, that my own authorities would not give as the definition of akatatulos, or aphtharsia, any word so ambiguous or indefinite as eternal or everlasting. The same reason might be offered why eternal is the last word employed to define aphthartos. I am alike indifferent to your affected sneers and ridicule, and your kindly proffered advice in your 22d paragraph. Why do you infer, paragraph 23, that Paul considered aphthartos, 1 Tim. i: 17, subordinate to aionios? Why, forsooth, because he places aionios before aphthartos in that verse! Verily, this is a most singular reason. But, Sir, how do you know but what Paul began with the lowest epithet and rose to the climax, increasing in sublimity as he advanced? If your reasoning be correct, then Paul must have considered invisibleness a quality of the divine being, altogether more important than wisdom; for after calling him the “eternal and immortal,” he calls him “the invisible and only wise God!” This “shows that in his critical skill,” wise differs from invisible—“most subordinate!” I suppose, however, that the apostle threw in these terms just as they happened to come into his mind, without reference to the greater or lesser importance of the adjectives.

21. All the great authorities lying around you in such profusion—translators, lexicographers, et cetera, who have given “eternal or everlasting as the first and most natural, literal, and obvious meaning of aionios,” have, in my opinion, thereby evinced their wisdom, and shown that they could render it by a word nearly, though not quite, as ambiguous in the English Bible as aionios was in the Greek. Had they rendered it by the word endless instead of eternal or everlasting, I should have thought them all wisacres indeed. The unsupported assertions of your 25th paragraph, are of a piece with much that you have before written. However, as you say in it you have “only introduced the matter,” I fondly cherish the hope that your future assertions will be accompanied with a corresponding weight of evidence.

22. You will oblige me by sending a proof or a copy of your next to Richmond, Va., whither I expect to go to spend the winter, ere your next will have time to reach me here. I am truly and most respectfully your friend,

D. SKINNER.

AN ARGUMENT FROM NATURE.

It was one of those beautiful evenings in May, when the sun had disappeared behind the hills, and the western horizon was displayed half-illuminated by the effulgent beams of day, that I was wandering alone in the fields near where the beautiful Susquehanna glides towards the wide Atlantic. The vale was spread out before me in that beautiful season, covered with green—the moon was rising in the far East, with all her majestic grandeur—the rays of the sun were yet perceptible in the ambient air—the heavens appeared in cloudless splendor, displaying their ten thousand twinkling luminaries—the bright ethereal blue of the sky was not entirely extinct, but as far as the eye could extend, encompassed me with unsurpassed beauty—in short, all nature was decked with her most beautiful garments. Nought was heard save the rustling of the leaves of some small and splendid trees which decorated the plain that surrounded me, the howling of a restless dog, the sound of a distant waterfall, or the singing of the pretty whip-poor-will—nought to disturb the tranquillity of the mind. The stillness and peculiarities of the scene, aided in disposing the mind to contemplation.

My attention soon became particularly engaged in viewing the firmament, which contained an innumerable multitude of immense bodies, glittering like drops of water in the sunbeams. Aided by philosophy, I was led to consider them not merely as so many twinkling luminaries, but as worlds almost infinitely larger than our terrestrial ball, and only small in appearance on account of their inconceivable distance. I enlarged the idea, and looked upon them as only a step towards the farthest of those revolving orbs, which float in the infinitude of space, supported by the law of mutual attraction, when the horrifying thought arose that man, puny man, was the most intelligent creature in the universe—that intelligence could not exist independent of matter, and that there was no being who harmoniously wheeled these rolling spheres in their stated courses! Reason was dethroned, and a future state of conscious existence seemed a mere speculation of crack-brained fanatics. I viewed man as existing in infinite progression, and the changes of matter as an eternal succession of effects without a cause, or causes uncaused. By this time the veil of night covered the fair face of nature, and atheism, darker than Erebus, reigned in my benighted mind. I was about concluding that even being was only in fancy, when reason regained her throne, and convinced me that the existence of motion proved that of a mover, and laws, a law-giver. I again beheld the countless millions of suns and systems, so perfectly and symmetrically adjusted, and whose beams so brilliantly be-deck the spacious vault of heaven, and quickly perceived evidence of existence of a first Cause, who was infinite in wisdom, unbounded in power, and unlimited in goodness.

Reader, whenever atheism clouds your mental brow, and the terrors of annihilation, like a paralyzing incubus, hang around your imbecile head, seat reason at the helm, and it will be a chart to direct and a compass to guide you across the stormy sea of life.

SYMPATHY.

Amid the conflicts of adversity and misfortune, nothing on earth is so valuable or fraught with so much consolation, as a sympathizing friend. Comparatively speaking, one word from a heart that feels, is worth worlds. It is a gem that only shows its intrinsic excellence when brought in contact with suffering. It is that pearl of great price which wealth, honor, and fame can never purchase. It is the offspring of a grateful heart—the genuine impulse of love to all mankind. 'Tis a balm to the wounded spirit—an oasis to the benighted traveller in the desert.

“NONE OF US LIVETH TO HIMSELF”—PAUL.

The interests of men are so interlaced, that none of us can live to ourselves; our happiness is so far dependent on others that none of us can. But more than this: none should live solely for their own gratification; we should consider all our faculties and opportunities of beneficence as so many calls to devote them to the service of our heavenly Parent, in promoting his grand purpose, the improvement and happiness of our fellow-beings. The power and the opportunity to do good, bring along with them obligation and responsibility. Common sense approves of or indicates this connexion between power and obligation; and if we fail to discover a beam in our own eye, we can readily enough descry the speck that is in our brother's eye. Let us, then, admit the principle, that a power and an opportunity of doing good create the duty. Let us try to feel this obligation and we will be contributing, according to the wisdom and the good-will of our endeavors to advance our race, to be useful in our generation, to secure for ourselves a rich reward in our own bosoms, and a welcome when we are called to meet our Master: "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter into the joy of thy Lord." MINISTERIAL SUPPORT.

SALARIES.

If any man should be free from pecuniary cares and vexations, it should be the preacher of the Gospel; for, in addition to those numerous cares which all flesh is born to endure, as the sparks fly upward, he is to devote his entire time to the cares and sorrows of others. Is a funeral to be attended? He must drop every thing, and prepare to obey the call for his services. Is a marriage ceremony to be performed? Again he must cease to attend to his own business, and prepare to mingle with joyousness in the happy circle. Are the sick to be visited? He must leave his own home, and minister to the wounded spirit and the diseased mind. And how can he do this, as it should be performed—how can he feel the mourner's griefs, when his own cares fill his mind to overflowing? How can he rejoice with the glad-hearted, when he feels that coming Winter is unprovided for, and his children need food and covering suitable for them? How can he enter into the feelings of the languishing and dying, so as really to minister to their fears and sorrows, when his own rise up before him, in the pressing cares of life? Yea, how, even, can he preach to his flock "owe no man any thing but to love one another," when before his mind's eye the baker's, butcher's, tailor's, shemmaker's, farmer's, carpenter's, merchant's and doctor's bills cover the face of his sermon in contradiction to its arguments—and before the eye of his body, sit all these very men to hear his precepts contradict his daily practice?

It follows, then, that a minister's support should be both ample and sure. Ample enough to enable him to represent the beneficence of his society in his attentions to the poor, and the hospitality of his society in his entertainment of the travelling brother. And certain enough to raise him above want and neglect of his duties on the one hand; or dependence and servility on the other. Gifts, as I will show, should not enter into the account—they are irregular and uncertain. A salary, only, can be made equal and certain, if secured, as it always should be by a number of able individuals becoming responsible for its prompt regular payment.

The six last named were visiting brethren.

Five sermons were preached on the occasion.

K. TOWNSEND, Standing Clerk.

REMARKS.

As the Constitution of this body is somewhat lengthy, I have not offered it for publication, but note some things of general interest, wherein it differs from our former regulations.

It makes the Standing Clerk, when present, always the Clerk of the Association, with the power of appointing his own Assistant.

It requires candidates for letters of fellowship to apply to the Standing committee on fellowship, at least 3 months before the annual session.

It empowers the committee on ordination to ordain, or cause to be ordained, any candidate who shall reside within the bounds of the Association, shall have had a letter of fellowship twelve months, and faithfully discharged his duties as a minister of the Gospel.

It requires the committee of discipline to notice all cases where ministers in fellowship do not devote at least one-half their time to the duties of the ministry—to inquire into the causes of such delinquency, and report to the next session of the Association, to the intent that if they have thus discontinued without sufficient cause, their letters of fellowship may be recalled.

It also requires, that all charges against a ministering brother, be made in writing, and that the person complained of, be furnished with a copy.

In case of a proposed alteration, the subject is to be presented in the form of a resolution. If it pass by a majority, it is then to be published with the minutes, and again submitted to the Council at its annual session—when, if it again pass, the Constitution is to be altered or amended accordingly.

PROFESSOR THOLUCK.

It appears, by the following singularly ambiguous letter—or rather translation of a letter—from Mr. Tholuck, that Mr. Kurtz and others are likely to succeed, by some means or other, in convicting Professor Sears (late of the Hamilton, now of the Newton Baptist Theological Seminary,) of falsehood. The contest has raged long and violently between the parties, and the Universalists, believing that the truth is on the side of Professor Sears, took sides with him. I still believe Professor Sears' clear, full, disinterested, and unambiguous testimony on the subject, in preference to the following very ambiguous and suspicious translation by Mr. Kurtz, (one of the parties in the controversy,) of Tholuck's letter, obtained second-handedly. From the strong and long-continued straining and twisting on the subject, I have been rendered suspicious that foul play was on foot, and some of the expressions in Mr. Kurtz's preface, and in his translation, but confirm my suspicions. But read the whole article, as we find it in the New-York Evangelist, where it is credited as below.

From the Lutheran Observer.

THOLUCK'S OPINIONS—DESPATCHES FROM GERMANY.

We mentioned the week before last, that we had received a packet of letters from Germany, some of which we deem of sufficient importance to lay before our readers in an English translation.

The first is a letter from the learned and distinguished doctor and Professor Tholuck, of the University in Halle, which has been sent us in reply to a few remarks we made in a communication to the Rev. Doctor and Superintendent Richter of Barmen, (near Elberfeld, in Wupperthal, Prussia.)

We stated in our letter to friend Richter, that the Universalists in this country, claimed Professor Tholuck as a believer in their system, and sought to give popularity to their heresies and eclat to their sect, by proclaiming him to the American public as a Universalist; that we indeed knew that he was not a Universalist—certainly not in the American acceptance of the term—and had therefore publicly contradicted the assertions of the Universalists. But notwithstanding they continued to claim him, and had quoted from the writings of Prof. Dwight and Prof. Sears, and even produced a letter from Prof. Tholuck himself to invalidate what we had affirmed, and hence a few lines from him (Prof. T.) on the subject, would be quite acceptable. It was as stated in answer to this, that Prof. Tholuck transmitted the subjoined communication.

[Translation.]

Halle, November 21st, 1836.

To the Rev. Mr. Kurtz, Baltimore:

MY DEAR FRIEND KURTZ—In consequence of the intelligence communicated to me by our dear friend Richter, I hasten without delay to send you an exposition of my views respecting Universalism and Rationalism. In reference to the latter system, such an exposition from me will scarcely be deemed necessary, inasmuch as my whole life has been a declaration against it. I daily experience the opposition and enmity of those who adhere to this system. As you however regard it as necessary, I herewith declare to you, that the doctrines of the Trinity, the deity of Christ, the atoning efficacy of his sufferings and death, his future advent, etc., are in my view sacred and undoubted truths, in the defence of which I have jeopardized my reputation for learning; in like manner I firmly believe as revealed truth in hereditary depravity, the existence of apostate spirits and a devil, and the existence of holy angels, who have appeared on earth in the service of God. And now to revert to Universalism, or the doctrine of the restoration of all things; a certain Mr. Sawyer, of New-York, a Universalist, wrote to me in a friendly way, inquiring what we German theologians think of it? This took place in the year 1835. I replied: that this doctrine is spread among us to a considerable extent; still however, according to my knowledge, there are but few theologians who firmly believe in it. Respecting Neander, I know certainly that he told me, that he does not venture further than to entertain a hope, which hope however, by no means amounts to certainty. Such men as Hengstenberg, Olshausen, etc., have declared themselves decidedly against it. In relation to myself, I remark, that I believe in the sin against the Holy Ghost, and this alone is evidence that I do not believe in Universal Restoration; I simply believe that for many there will be means of salvation provided beyond the limits of this life; as, for example, for those heathen who, without any fault of their own, remained (unenlightened) uninformed of the plan of salvation through Christ. This is taught in Rom. ii: 12; 1 Peter iii: 19; iv: 6. It has always appeared to me, that there are certainly several passages in the Bible which give support to the doctrine in question, which, if preached, must without doubt exert a very mischievous influence. I allude to 1 Cor. xv: 28; Rom. v: 18. There are however very many other passages which are opposed to the doctrine.

Thus much, beloved friend, simple and without circumlocution, you may publish it.

In Christ our Lord, yours. A. THOLUCK.

Now, will the reader please to notice the following circumstances.

1. Mr. Kurtz says he knew Mr. Tholuck was not a Universalist "in the American sense of the term." Who can assure us that Professor Tholuck's denial is not wholly confined to Mr. Kurtz's definition? What follows would seem to imply so; for,

2. Professor Tholuck is made to say that he believes "in the sin against the Holy Ghost," and that "this, alone, is evidence that" he does not "believe in universal restoration." Is it? Then it is evidence that I do not believe in universal restoration; for I believe most firmly in the sin against the Holy Ghost, and so does every Universalist whom I know! But suppose Mr. Kurtz to have written a distorted statement of our views, making a denial of this sin a distinguishing feature of our system, and then called this raw-head-and-bloody-bones of his own creation, "American Universalism," and "Universal Restoration, as held in this country"—suppose this, and Professor Tholuck's intended denial loses all its ambiguity; but what becomes of Mr. Kurtz's case?

3. Professor Tholuck no where (even in this translation by an interested person) declares, that he does not believe that all men will eventually be saved—or that he believes in endless misery to be endured by any portion of mankind. What he does say, may be reconciled to his belief in some modification of Universalism; and what he has elsewhere stated, if Professor Sears may be believed, (of which I have no doubt,) can not possibly be reconciled with a total and unqualified denial of this sentiment. It can not be done.

Will it be said that Professor Tholuck says, that Universalism, "if preached, must, without doubt, exert a very mischievous influence"? Mark how carefully the expression is italicized as the strongest expression of his letter, and the very expression becomes sufficient to create a doubt whether the letter is really a denial of his (Tholuck's) belief in Universalism. As to his fear about preaching Universalism, the Tunkers, Mennonites, and many of the Moravians, and others, who are undoubted believers in final universal salvation, express precisely the same fear; and some of them, for that very reason, deem themselves perfectly justified in giving ambiguous, seeming denials of their faith, (like Tholuck's declarations in the letter before us,) when questioned respecting their views on this very subject. In piety and general religious honesty, they are not inferior even to Tholuck, whatever may be his learning—why, then, may not even Tholuck resort to such evasions, rather than seem to countenance a faith he deems so very dangerous, if preached?

But even this seeming denial is limited to the particular kind of Universalism which may have been described to him by Mr. Kurtz, and of which he speaks. Mark his words—they do not embrace the belief in universal salvation generally. Not at all. "The doctrine in question," is the phrase he uses; and I suspect it was such a system as no "American Universalist" ever believed.

As to Tholuck's being unable to reconcile the Bible with itself, on the subject of human destiny—his fears respecting the open and public promulgation of "the whole counsel of God"—or of his own views in this matter, we have heard before from Professor Sears' published letter. It is nothing new. But there is one thing the public has not yet seen—viz., PROFESSOR THOLUCK'S SERMON IN DEFENCE OF UNIVERSALISM. It is in the possession of Professor Sears. He has abstained from publishing it, only because Professor Tholuck did not deliver it in public, neither did he wish the sentiment known to the world. Professor Sears promised, however, to give it, should defence of his own character render it necessary. See his letter to me in the Magazine and Advocate, vol. vii, No. 15, page 117. That time has come! Professor Sears is confronted by a letter from Professor Tholuck himself, calculated in the estimation of the community, to cast upon the former the stigma of deliberate falsehood, or of unaccountable stupidity and misapprehension. That sermon, or a counter letter from Tholuck, (which can not be obtained for many months,) only can save him from one or the other of these charges—and we fear it will be the former—in the estimation of the self-styled Orthodox.

In conclusion. Universalists need care but little as to the result of the dispute. Whether Tholuck, or any other man, or all Germany, believes or disbelieves Universalism, is but a trifle in the scale with divine testimony. We have the latter in our favor, and we may safely challenge the whole world to gainsay what "God has spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began," and what he has more strongly testified to us, in the mission and teachings of his Son and the holy apostles, and confirmed by the concurrent testimony of his works and providences. But that Universalism is the orthodoxy of Germany, is irrefutable. Every intelligent immigrant confirms it, and even Tholuck musters but a few great names apparently against it; while his letter to Dr. Sawyer testifies, not only that many believe it, but to the purity and piety of their lives—particularly of that eminent servant of God and friend of man, Henry Young Stilling. So far as the question between Professor Sears and Mr. Kurtz is concerned, we are satisfied with these facts—and so far as the truth of Universalism (i. e. the final salvation of all mankind, the only kind of Universalism we know of,) is concerned, we are "ready at all times to give a reason of the hope that is in us," by an appeal "to the law and to the testimony."

A. B. G.

GEORGE COMBE.

This gentleman (not the Mr. Coombs, of London, a travelling Phrenologist, who is the guardian of the Kentucky giant; but George Combe, Esq., of Edinburgh,) has been invited, by the promising and wealthy, but yet infant University of Michigan, to accept the Professorship of Mental and Moral Philosophy in that institution. Our correspondent is one that knows whereof he affirms, and whose information may be relied on. I have to apologize to him and our readers for keeping the gratifying intelligence so long confined to his letter—it was not intentionally withheld.

It may be doubted whether Mr. Combe will accept the invitation, but coming from an institution which is expected soon to be one of the best endowed and most promising in the United States—coming so soon after the unwise rejection of him as a candidate for the Logic Professorship in the University of Edinburgh, and coming, too, from an infant State of the Union, it certainly is a deserved and excellent compliment to this distinguished and excellent man, and is no less creditable to the Regents of Michigan University, while it furnishes presumptive proof of the estimation in which he and Phrenology are held by this congregation of freemen in their first efforts to promote the cause of Education. But to the letter of our correspondent.

A. B. G.

GEORGE COMBE, ESQ.

You, yourself, Br. Grosh, and I presume many of your numerous and respectable readers, will be very glad to learn that an endeavor will be made to procure for the youth of our country, the professional services of this distinguished individual, which were not accepted of in behalf of the rising generation of Scotland, by the civic authorities of modern Athens, perhaps better known as the loom of Auld Reekie. George Combe is not unknown to the Regents of the University of Michigan, and some of them who hold him in the highest esteem as an interpreter of nature's laws, especially such as relate to man's duties and happiness, are fondly indulging the hope that the repulse which he received in the capital of his native country, upon application for the Chair of Logic in that city, may be one link in the chain of circumstances which may finally determine him to these western shores, and fix him as an ornament and a luminary in the University of Michigan. Some of the Regents known to the writer, have declared his works as unsurpassed in talent and in usefulness, by any works of human composition; and they believe that, perhaps, there is not another man living, who would be equally useful to the youth of this country, as Mr. Combe would be in a Chair of Mental and Moral Philosophy. With such a state of feeling in reference to the talents and usefulness of Mr. Combe, in the minds of those who have to administer the affairs of our infant but highly promising University, you can easily conceive that no effort, likely to be successful, to procure his distinguished and enthusiastic services as a Professor, will be neglected. In the prospect of Mr. Combe's becoming a denizen of this free country—of a country where there are thousands of unfettered hearts ready to receive his somewhat novel, perhaps startling statements of philosophic and edifying truths—in this prospect, I know you will rejoice. I presume every man who knows his writings and who has a family or a son to educate, would rejoice to have it in his power to send to such a teacher.

Mr. C. has been written to, and if the prospect of his coming brightens, I shall be glad to herald to you his approach.

RECENT ATTACK UPON PHRENOLOGY.

We perceive that Dr. JAMES M'CUNE SMITH, a colored gentleman and a graduate we believe, of Glasgow University, has been edifying the citizens of New-York, in an attack upon Phrenology, and if we may credit the reports of anti-Phrenologists, has "completely uprooted the supposed facts upon which the high pretensions of the system are founded"—at least we presume, those which have sprung up since the "uprooting" operation of Dr. Sewall.

In the language of the Editor of "the Colored American," this doughty champion, "had a difficult task," (probably,) "he had not merely defective principles to combat, but fictitious pretensions which have no tangibility (!) to take hold of!" This must have been a "difficult task"—to "uproot" that which has, or had, no tangibility!—we can account for it now, upon no other principles but those of "Animal Magnetism."

Again, "the high wrought superstition (!) of his audience was against him" but "however unpopular (!) the side of the question taken by our young friend" was, it appears "he sustained himself with honor," etc. Indeed he deserved it—who would not, for "uprooting" intangible "supposed facts" and beating through such a mist of prejudice as has existed in favor of Phrenology.?

Seriously, we know not what "reason" or "philosophy" may have been adduced by this gentleman, or what "conclusive demonstrations" he may have made, but if he has by these means, overthrown the system, we believe that he has grappled with tangible facts and encountered stern argument. With the demonstration by which Phrenology has shone upon our minds we support it, and cordially yield our assent to its principal doctrines; we can not withdraw that support, until convinced that we are in error by counterbalancing and nullifying demonstration.

In that case, our opposition to Phrenology would be that it was false, and not that it was "a system tending to infidelity"—for a falsehood is no real support to any system. If true, we do not believe that it does "tend to infidelity." We believe it to be true, and we are no infidel. It speaks to us too minutely of "the handy work" of the Creator, for us to be an atheist—it is too plainly another truth blazoned upon the page of nature—it looks too much like another teacher, reconciling the great questions of moral evil, and rendering harmonious all God's beautiful creation. Revelation blends too well with it for us to be a Deist—when we study it we still acknowledge in the words of the written volume the truth of the doctrine that the Lord "forms the light and creates darkness, makes peace, and creates evil" and we see no disagreement between that Gospel wherein "Life and immortality are brought to light," and the science which reads

"The soul's vast features that shall tread
The stars, when earth is nothingness."

In conclusion, we would say, that we are glad to perceive in the intellectual arena, a young man of the talents, natural and acquired, of Dr. Smith. We trust that no obstacle may hinder him from "pressing on" until, as has been predicted of him, he may have made "the Moral, Literary and Physiological world ALL HIS OWN," but let him remember—that others who have deeply searched that world, probably to a much greater extent than himself, have gathered therefrom the doctrines of Phrenology. Let him examine closely, and see if there be not tangible evidence in its favor—and let his motto be that of its greatest and most illustrious champion, "Res, non verba, quæso,"—things, not words, I seek.

SUNDAY.

A few weeks ago I commented on an article by Br. O. A. Skinner, one of the Editors of the Trumpet, in relation to Miss Martineau's remarks on riding out from Boston on a Sunday. I supposed he misunderstood and wrongly condemned her remarks. I think he does so still, at least in part. For, instead of speaking of riding out as a mere amusement, she connects it with "exercise" and "fresh air;" and advocates it only for those whose hard labor and close confinement during the week, render it beneficial to them. The Sunday afternoon's sail, is connected with "religious conversation." The whole is closed with the regret, that such as do these things, yet deeming them sinful, are not taught "that religion is in the state of their mind, rather than in the arrangement of the day;" and the declaration, that then they would most probably, spend their Sabbaths "as innocently as any other day," and feel an increased desire for "the means of improving their religious knowledge," etc.

But in one sense I erred in supposing him mistaken, and in saying he drew on the stores of prejudice. That error was caused by my belief that he viewed the institution of Sunday as a Sabbath, in the same light that I do. This I now think was a mistake, and the parent of the rest. If so, it is, perhaps, better that we understand our respective views of the subject itself, rather than each other's opinions respecting another person's views of it.

Br. O. A. Skinner seems to regard the question in the same light, as he calls on me for a definite statement of my views as to the intention of the day, the mode of its observance, etc. Though I view the subject itself, as but a minor one, and my opinion of it, as mine, as still less important, yet I am willing to grant his request, and will do so soon.

Before I close this article, however, I would deprecate such sneers as that of the "perfect Miss Martineau" as ungenerous to her or myself, or which ever way it was intended to apply. I presume no one claims perfection for her in any improper or false sense. For myself, I find many errors in her late book, and some in her former works, and will not defend either her, or any one else, or any opinion, further than I deem it defensible.

Permit me also, with all respect for Br. S's candor, to hint that it is possible she would be judged of more leniently by some of our Eastern brethren, if she was not a Unitarian—or if she had not been monopolized by that denomination—or, again, if that sect had not drawn upon themselves the mingled contempt and enmity of Universalists, by their sycophantic policy-seeking, and bigoted, unfair opposition to Universalists? It appears to me, that her connexion with them is named as a sore thing, and that it is too much attempted to make them responsible for what she says. Possibly Br. S., himself, is slightly tinged with the same prejudice. Will he examine? So much for Miss Martineau's opinions on the subject—in another article I will attend to the subject itself.

HAMILTONIAN SYSTEM.

This system of teaching languages appears to be founded in nature, and if so, must be preferable to all others. It is based on the axiom, that "Grammar exists in the language, and not the language in its grammar." From this it is inferred, that some knowledge of a language and its idioms should first be obtained, before the principles involved in it can be well understood and practically applied. Accordingly, the teacher reads a verse of the Gospel by St. John, repeatedly, pronouncing slowly and translating literally, each word, singly. The pupils alternately read the same verse, as nearly as possible in the same manner, the teacher correcting errors, as they occur. The repetitions are gradually diminished, and finally the pupil reads and translates alone. This occurs at about the fourth lesson. In eight lessons, of about one hour and a half each, the whole Gospel of St. John, (containing about 20,000 words, or about 8,000 different words,) is read easily, and translated literally as read.—the pronunciation improves in like ratio. For instance—the first lesson embraces about 17 verses—the second, 59, and so on to the last, which embraces about 260 verses. Thus far I speak of what I know from my own experience and observation—a class of eight persons principally of those connected with this office, having just completed the first eight lessons of the course in this manner, and with this success. There are in the course, six sections of about eight lessons each—in all, fifty lessons. I will speak of the rest when the course is completed; want of room, not of confidence in the system, prevents me from saying more at present. Certainly a system which, in eight lessons, will fix the literal meaning, and much of the pronunciation, of 8,000 different words, in the memory, can not be undeserving of a fair trial.

The interlinear and analytical translation is never used in class, nor should be by the pupil between lessons, except in cases of insuperable difficulty. On this rule he will find it but seldom needed, though eminently useful when needed.

I would add, that Mr. Hamilton possesses those much needed qualifications of a teacher—unwearied patience, urbanity, readiness in aiding the pupil, and an anxiety that his pupils should profit as much as possible by his instructions. His partner, Mr. Costello, is probably fully capable, also, of performing his portion of labor.

"THE OASIS,"

Is the title of a new work of a literary character, recently started in Oswego. It is published monthly, in imperial octavo form, 16 pages per number, by HOLL and HENRY, at the office of "the Oswego Commercial Herald." Terms, $1 50 in advance, or $2 after the issuing of the third number.

Although there are many periodicals existing and springing up in different parts of the land, yet there are but a few publications of that nature in western New-York, so that we are glad, amid the barrenness of fruit and flower, to find this new "Oasis." Watered by the streams of public favor, and bearing upon its bosom the productions of wit and genius, we trust that it will long, greenly and brightly flourish. To MESSRS. NELSON and RANDALL, Editors, we tender our best wishes.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

A few of those indebted to us have heard our pleadings for immediate assistance—we feel very thankful, indeed, for what they have done, although it falls far short of furnishing the relief we need. May we not treat, then, that others who are yet in arrears, (even if it be only for the present volume,) will hasten also to our relief. We know this is a disagreeable subject to our readers—but we can assure them that the pain of reading a dunning article every few weeks, is not greater than the pain of writing it; and is nothing compared to the necessity that calls us to write it. Let every one help us all he can, and as soon as he can, and we will pen a te Deum laudamus instead of a "pay us what thou owest."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—We would be ungrateful indeed, did we not fervently thank numerous correspondents for their welcome and truly excellent favors. Just at this time they are doubly welcome, as we have occasion to work ahead, by preparing copy for several weeks at a time. This we could not do, had we not been so favored by them. All will appear in due time—soon after we can publish the numerous proceedings of our public bodies. The Sermon by Br. Messinger will appear soon.

THOUGHTS AT A GRAVE.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

"The rose
Sprung modest, on bowed stalk, and better spoke
Her graces, than the proudest monument."

Bryant.

No graven stone is here to speak thy charms,
Thou sleeping maiden! slab, nor column tell
Thy deeds angelic, how thy mission sped,
Or when it ended; naught save one meek rose,
The pure, bright emblem of undying love,
Waits at thy grave to tell thy destiny.
Thou hast a speech, sweet flower, quiet and soft,
To hold forth buried loveliness; and thou
Dost whisper tenderly of her who sleeps
Beneath thy shadow—how her graces sought
Like thee, thou wilding rose, the holy shade
And unobtrusive places to unfold
Their meek and heavenly beauty; and her heart
Filled with the truth of Jesus, brought his love
And message of glad tidings, to the poor
Within their cottage homes; and scorning not
The sinner's dwelling, entered in with peace
To scatter richly on his broken altar.

Fair sleeper! thy whose fluttering lips discoursed
Such sweet, entrancing music of thy grace
And beauty—they who praised with fawning words
Thy dark, soul-speaking eye—thy tinted cheek,
That told the tale of all thy heart's young hopes,
Its sorrows and its joys—thy form, thy step,
Floating with life and brightness, like the train
Of radiant spirits that traverse the air
And "dip their pinions in the painted bow"—
Ah! the bright throng of gay deceivers, they,
They have forgotten thee! But in yonder cell,
There pines a weary captive, whose bent ear
Has listened painfully, to catch the tone
Of thy celestial voice, that oft had cheered
His long, lone hours; he still remembers thee!
On yonder snowy couch, is stretched a form
Worn by the still, corroding touch of Death!
The hollow cheek flushes at every step
That enters with the soft bright melody
Of thine, and the large lustrous eye is turned,
Anxious to meet thy glance of sympathy.
Ah! that pale sufferer forgets thee not!
No heart of sorrow, that has e'er been soothed
By word, or look of thine, can soon forget
Thy goodness, or forbear to mourn thy loss.

Shirley village, Mass.

THE BRIDE'S FAREWELL.

"Why do I weep?—to leave the vine
Whose clusters o'er me bend,—
The myrtle—yet, oh! call it mine!
The flowers I loved to tend,
A thousand thoughts of all things dear,
Like shadows o'er me sweep,
I leave my sunny childhood here,
Oh, therefore let me weep!
I leave thee, Sister! we have played
Through many a joyous hour,
Where the silvery green of the olive shade
Hung dim o'er fount and bower.
Yes, thou and I, by stream, by shore,
In song, in prayer, in sleep,
Have been as we may be no more,
Kind sister, let me weep!
I leave thee, Father! eve's bright moon
Must now light other feet,
With the gathered grapes, and the lyre in tune,
Thy homeward step to greet.
Thou in whose voice, to bless thy child,
Lay tones of love so deep,
Whose eye o'er all my youth hath smiled—
I leave thee! let me weep!
Mother! I leave thee! on thy breast,
Pouring out joy and woe,
I have found that holy place of rest
Still changeless—yet I go!
Lips that have lulled me with your strain,
Eyes that have watched my sleep!
Will earth give love like yours again?
Sweet mother! let me weep!"

BREATH—Air received into the lungs by many young men of fashion, for the important purposes of smoking a cigar, and whistling a tune.

THE "SURE FOUNDATION" OF RELIGION.

I was told of a child who stood in the middle of a grass-plot, with its arms by its sides, and listening with a countenance of intense expectation "to hear God's tramp on that high blue floor." Who would care to know what Christian sect this child belonged to; or whether to any?—I was told of a father and mother, savages, who lost their only child, and were overwhelmed with grief, under which the father soon sank. From the moment of his death, the solitary survivor recovered her cheerfulness. Being asked why, she said she had been miserable for her child, lest he should be forlorn in the world of spirits; he had his father with him now, and would be happy. Who would inquire for the creed of this example of disinterested love?—I was told of a young girl, brought up from the country by a selfish betrayer, refused the marriage which had been promised, and turned out of doors by him on her being seized with the cholera. She was picked up from a door step, and carried to the hospital. In the midst of her dying agonies, no inducement could prevail on her to tell the name of her betrayer; and she died faithful to him, so that the secret of him whose treachery we are abhorring is dead with her. With such testimony that the very spirit of the Gospel was in this humble creature, none but those who would dare to cast her out for her fall, would feel any anxiety as to how she received the facts of the Gospel. Religion is safe, and would be seen to be so if we would set ourselves to mark how universal are some few of men's convictions and the whole of man's affections. While men feel wonder and the universe is wonderful; while men love natural glory, and the heavens and the earth are resplendent with it; while men revere holiness, and the beauty of holiness beams at times upon the dimmest sight, religion is safe. For the last reason, Christianity is also safe. If the beauty of its holiness were never obscured by the defilements of human passion with which it is insulted, it is scarcely conceivable that all men would not be, in some sense or other, Christians.—Miss Martineau.

A RULE WITHOUT AN EXCEPTION.

It is often said, there is no rule without an exception—but there is one rule to which I never knew an exception. I never knew a respectable person that did not behave with decency in a place of public worship.—Virginia Free Press.

Selections from the "Tin Trumpet."

ARGUMENT—With fools, passion, vociferation, or violence; with ministers, a majority; with kings, the sword; with fanatics, denunciation; with men of sense, a sound reason.

ART—origin of. We are struck with an admiration almost amounting to awe, when we contemplate a noble building, a fine statue, or a grand painting, and feel a pride in our species when we term them the noblest productions of human art; but such objects have a still more sanctifying effect if we suffer them to raise our thoughts to Him who made the artist, and benevolently endowed him with faculties of which the exercise can bestow such pure delight, not only on his contemporaries, but on a long succession of generations. The races of spectators who have been gratified by the beautiful products of Grecian art, form, perhaps, but a tithe of those who are to succeed to the same pleasure, for celebrated statues are almost immortal—they can only perish at least with the civilization that has enshrined them. The humblest work of nature, as well as the most perfect one of art, are alike exalted by tracing them to their divine original.

FRIEND.—Some there are, who with an apparent zeal, vindicate their friends from all their little pécadilloes, whitewash them as carefully as they can, and then knock them on the head by lamenting their addiction to some gross impropriety. This resembles the conduct of the Roman priest, who, when an ox was not completely white, chalked over the dark spots, and leading him up to the altar, made him an immediate sacrifice.

MARRIAGES.

In Antwerp, September 17th, by Rev. Mr. Persons, Mr. FOSTER L. HARVEY, to Miss HARRIET PALMER, both of Watertown.

DEATHS.

In this city, on the 22d ult., of consumption, after a lingering sickness of many months, SALLY, consort of Elijah Spencer, and daughter of Rev. William Underwood, in the 44th year of her age. She was truly a woman of sorrows and acquainted with grief. About a year since, she buried a daughter who had always been in feeble health and subject to frequent and distressing fits. The constant confinement and anxieties of the mother on account of her daughter, connected with her own feeble constitution, were severely trying to her patience and fortitude, but like a true Christian she bore them all with meekness and submission, and by an eye of faith that looked beyond this transitory and sorrowing world, joyfully anticipated a better world to come. She found the glorious doctrine of a world's salvation to be her support and comfort in death as it had been her stay in life. Her funeral was attended on Sunday, 24th ult., at the Jerusalem church in Litchfield, and a sermon preached on the occasion from 1 Cor. xv: 20, by D. S.

At Cape Vincent, Jefferson county, N. Y., August 7th, after a distressing illness of two weeks duration, ELIZABETH JANE, aged 10 years, daughter of Mr. Justin Cook, deceased, and Mrs. Martha P. Cook, late of Boston, Mass. The funeral services were performed on the following day, by the writer of this notice. Mrs. Cook in her afflictions enjoys those consolations, which the Gospel so richly affords believers in seasons of sorrow and adversity. I. BRITTON JR.

In Sherburne, August 17th, an infant son of Erasmus D. and Elizabeth M. Hayward, aged 9 days.

Thus fades the opening bud of hope,
Which death's cold hand has riven;
The silver cord of life is broke,
The spirit's fled to heaven. I. H.

In Bridgewater, on the 22d ult., Mrs. CLARISSA REYNOLDS, consort of S. H. Reynolds, and youngest daughter of Oliver Babcock, aged 29 years. Thus in the morning of life she has been called from a fond husband's embrace and a large circle of affectionate relatives, to pass that barren from whence no traveller returns. But if virtue and love are a preparative for life and death, for both she was eminently prepared, and we trust that her many virtues are embalmed in the hearts of all who knew her.

Her funeral was attended on the 24th, and a discourse delivered to the mourners, and a large concourse of sympathizing friends.

May the afflicted find consolation in the Gospel of peace, and the Father of all, in his own due time, bind up their broken hearts. T. J. S.

In Bridgewater, on the 23d ult., AMY G. LARKIN, aged 3 years. Her funeral was attended on the 23d, and the consolations of the Gospel tendered to the mourning family and friends. From this dispensation may they learn wisdom, and in the Gospel find a balm for every wound. T. J. S.

In Marshall on the 16th ult., of fever, WARREN WALKER, aged 24 years. No sooner had he received the crown of manhood, and worn it with conspicuous honor, (for all who knew him respected him,) than he was cut down. The funeral was attended on the 18th, and a sermon preached to the mourning relatives, and sympathizing friends and neighbors, from Samuel xii: 22, 23, by J. BODEN.

In Unadilla, Livingston county, Mich., on April 27th, last, JOHN FREEMAN, son of Daniel and Fanny Person, and grandson of Rev. C. G. Person, aged two years, two months, and eighteen days. N. S.

In Upper Lisle, August 23d, of consumption, AARON DAY, aged 59 years. He was a good husband, a kind father, an exemplary member of community, and a Universalist in charity and faith. The funeral was attended on the 25th, and a sermon delivered from Isaiah x: 19, 20, by C. S. BROWN.

In Macdonough, September 17th, of inflammation on the brain, FLISHA BERRY, aged 14 years. The funeral was attended by the writer—text, Acts xxvi: 8. C. S. B.

A VOICE TO YOUNG MEN.....CHAPTER VII.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

GENERAL Demeanor.

The standing which young men will occupy in society, and their future success in life, depend much upon the demeanor which they exhibit to the world. To understand the manners and conduct of a gentleman; and to practice them, is one good step toward permanent respectability. By this I do not mean an aping of the frivolous words, and phrases, and actions, of certain fashionable ones, who would give the cue to public manners, and decide upon gentility; but an acquaintance and familiarity with those principles of propriety and suavity, which ever characterize the conduct of a true gentleman. To obtain the esteem and good-will of your fellow-beings, one important means is, to treat them in a gentle, agreeable and respectful manner, as far as their situation and merits will allow, and to conduct with propriety in their presence. A few observations, therefore, on general demeanor, can not be inappropriate.

Gentility, in the true acceptance of that word, is of great importance to young men. True gentility is not that which exhibits itself only in a bow, a simper, or the formal expression of a compliment; but it is that kindness in the heart and that sense of propriety, which enables you to make yourself agreeable, and to conduct with decorum, in whatever company you may mingle. Too little attention is paid to gentility by many, who, it would seem, should not be deficient therein. In the city of New-York, many of the people are in the habit of inviting to their dwellings, the ministers who assemble every Spring to attend the anniversaries of the great religious societies, which concentrate in that city. But these hospitable entertainers often found, much to their surprise and regret, that the manners of many of their clerical guests, were not strictly genteel. Furniture and carpets ruined by a coating of mud, a plentiful sprinkling of the expectoration of the pipe, and of the juice of tobacco, and the relics of half masticated quids, were the return which too many received for their kindness. The evil eventually became so oppressive, that a few years since, on the approach of one of these anniversaries, precautionary notices were inserted in the public prints of New-York, calling upon the clergymen who might attend, to avoid repeating these instances of ill breeding! Surely it would be supposed, that the good sense of these gentlemen would have screened them from these improprieties. What can be more impolite than to stride into a well-furnished apartment, with the feet loaded with mud, and in this condition sit down and extend them upon a chair or a sofa? How destitute of common decency, to fill the apartment, when others are present, with the suffocating fumes of tobacco, or defile the mouth with that loathsome weed, which would nauseate the stomach of the swine, and scatter the filthy saliva upon the carpets, the furniture, the jams of the fire-place, and even upon the dresses of the company! Every young man who would be considered as possessing good manners, should avoid these and all like practices. They indicate a total ignorance, or an entire disregard, of the dictates of common propriety.

A swaggering, braggadocio air and manner, is very rude and ungentle. Some young men seem to imagine that this is the proper way to appear of consequence in the eyes of others. But herein they greatly mistake. High swelling words, and haughty, bombastic airs, instead of creating respect, invariably excite the ridicule and contempt of the discriminating. People who examine and try such bubbles, generally discover beneath this outward bravado air, an empty mind, and a cowardly yet cruel heart. If you endeavor to swell yourself into consequence, your fate, without doubt, will be that of the frog in the fable, which essayed to expand to the size of the ox. "If," says Quarles, "thou desirest to be truly valiant, fear to do any injury; he that fears not to do evil, is always afraid to suffer evil: he that never fears is desperate, and he that always fears is a coward. He is truly valiant who dares nothing but what he may, and fears nothing but what he ought." In company, your carriage should be distinguished neither by swagger upon the one hand, nor extreme bashfulness on the other. You should occupy the medium ground of these extremes—you should be calm, self-possessed, complacent, and agreeable, as far as possible—prepared to receive or give those attentions that are called for by circumstances.

Politeness to ladies, should never be forgotten or neglected on any occasion, or in any circumstances. To illustrate, I will mention an occurrence which lately took place, to the knowledge of the writer: In the early part of the Fall of 1836, a few ladies residing in the lower part of the city of New-York, accompanied by some female friends visiting the city, were caught late in the afternoon, by a severe shower, while walking in the suburbs of the town. While in this condition, far from their residence, exposed to the rain, which was falling in torrents, a train of cars approached on the rail-road from Harlem, filled with men inside, but with abundance of room on the outer seats. The ladies hailed the driver of the horses, and requested a passage into town. But before he could reply, they were answered by a general and vociferous—"No—no—drive on—drive on!" from the gentlemen within—and on they went, leaving the ladies to their fate! Figure to yourself the condition of the parties, and then ask yourself whether there was a genuine gentleman within those cars! There could not have been one, or he would have raised his voice in behalf of females in this unpleasant condition. Let these circumstances be remembered, as an instance where great impoliteness was displayed.

Politeness demands that a gentleman should incommode himself to confer a favor upon a lady, or an aged or weakly person. In company, therefore, or in any assemblage, never continue sitting, while females or the aged are standing unprovided with seats. In stage-coaches, or other conditions where females are compelled to bear you company, avoid all vulgar or immodest language, all delicate allusions—they would be both impolite and ungenerous. A female correspondent, in writing to the Editor of the Spectator, (No. 242,) says—"I had the fate of meeting with a rude fellow in a stage-coach, who entertained two or three women of us (for there was no man besides himself) with language as indecent as ever was heard upon the water. The impertinent observations which the coxcomb made upon our shame and confusion, were such that it is an unspeakable grief to reflect upon them. It would certainly be worth your consideration to look into the frequent misfortunes of this kind, to which the modest and innocent are exposed by the licentious behaviour of such as are as much strangers to good breeding as to virtue. Could we avoid hearing what we do not approve, as easily as we can seeing what is disagreeable, there were some consolation; but since in a box at a play, in an assembly of ladies, or even in a pew at church, it is in the power of a gross coxcomb to utter what a woman can not avoid hearing, how miserable is her condition who comes within the power of such impertinents? and how necessary is it to repeat invectives against such a behavior? If the licentious had not utterly forgotten what it is to be modest, they would know that offended modesty labors under one of the greatest sufferings to which human life can be exposed. If one of these brutes could reflect thus much, though they want shame, they would be moved by their pity, to abhor an impudent behavior in the presence of the chaste and innocent." In circumstances like these, where people of both sexes are casually brought into each other's company, the gentleman can readily be distinguished from the ill-bred and unmannerly, by his respectful attentions and deference to the ladies.

An affable and sociable disposition, is another important component of the general demeanor. A sour, morose disposition—a stoical indifference exhibited towards those in your presence—are the most certain means of becoming disliked and neglected in turn. He who displays great hauteur in his conduct—who refrains from conversation, except with a select few—who answers a remark addressed to him, only by a cold and formal inclination of the body, or by a monosyllable—will soon be left to his solitary grandeur, to amuse himself by his own communings. He will be avoided as an ice-berg, that freezes up the flow of social feeling. A disposition of this character is to be avoided.

To be condescending and social in your intercourse with society, is an effectual method of obtaining general good will. Politicians understand this principle of human nature. Hence it is not uncommon, upon the approach of an election, to behold candidates for office, who had before been distant and very reserved in their intercourse with the common people, become suddenly exceedingly affable and social. None are so poor or so rough, but they can be spoken to, and shaken heartily by the hand, their families inquired after, and an interest manifested in all their affairs! And, it is to be feared, that too often, by these means, the aspirant accomplishes his purposes. Now the disposition which, in such instances, are hypocritically exhibited, I would have you always cherish in your heart and manifest in your conduct. The man who is good enough for you to shake hands with, and converse sociably with, previous to an election, is worthy of the same attentions afterwards. Banish all haughtiness—be condescending, and affable, and social—bestow proper notice and attention upon all with whom you mingle, and you can not well fail to occupy a good standing in their estimation.

Kindness is another characteristic of the general demeanor, which should be cultivated. There is no trait in human nature more lovely and captivating, or more highly calculated to win regard and esteem, than a kind disposition. To be obliging and accommodating, as far as lies in your power, to your neighbors and those with whom you have intercourse, will obtain their friendship and affection—and not only so, but will secure their assistance when you stand in need of it. It is related by a certain writer, that "two neighbors, one blind and the other lame, were called to a place at a great distance. What was to be done? The blind man could not see, and the lame man could not walk! Why, the blind man carried the lame one: the former assisting by his legs, and the other by his eyes." Here was a reciprocity of good offices, mutually beneficial. In the "Hotel des Invalids," of Paris, an asylum for the wreck of the Imperial armies of France, it is said that an old blind soldier is often seen holding a book for a companion who has lost his arms, who reads aloud for the edification of both. By this mutual kindness, the misfortunes of both are, to a great extent, remedied. "Mankind are so much indebted to each other," says Duclos, "that they owe mutual attention."

However prosperous may be our present condition, we are all subject to misfortune, and may, ere long, stand in need of the assistance of others. And in this condition, who the most readily and promptly receives the aid of his fellow-citizens; the man whose former life has been characterized by a niggardly, uncharitable disposition—whose ear had always been deaf, and his hand closed to the supplications of distress—or he who has been generous, open-hearted, kind, and benevolent? This inquiry is immediately answered in your minds. In community, the man of shining talents is admired—he who is upright and honest, is respected—but the kind, obliging neighbor is loved! He is surrounded by a host of friends, without having an enemy.

The power of kindness in overcoming opposition, and in subduing enemies, is immense. It is related that a father, who had a stubborn and refractory son, resorted to every severe measure in his power to reform him, but without avail. In vain he again and again applied the rod—the only perceptible effect was to harden him in his wilfulness. At length the father became discouraged—in his despair the rod dropped from his hand—he burst into a flood of tears, and bewailed the stubborn sinfulness of his child. Instantly the heart of the son was pierced as with a dart of fire—with quivering lips and streaming eyes, he exclaimed, "Whip me, father! do whip me as much as you will; but don't cry!" Behold the power of kindness. The boy who could look with unflinching nerve upon the uplifted rod, was subdued into submission in a moment, by a gush of tender affection! Hence we perceive the wisdom and philosophy of the Saviour's commandment: "Love your enemies." Instead of retaliating upon your enemies, and endeavoring in all ways to injure them, which would cause their hatred to burn still more fiercely, love them—exhibit toward them no emotions but those of kindness and good will. A perseverance in this course, will most certainly destroy their enmity, overcome their opposition, and gain their friendship. It is upon these sound principles that the public ambassador of the Gospel of the Redeemer, who has an enlightened view of his duties, and who appreciates the true spirit and intent of the Gospel, depends, in turning the sinner from the error of his way. He displays the love of God—the impartial and boundless beneficence and kindness which exists in his bosom towards all his creatures—and depends far more upon the influences of this display of goodness in arresting the transgressor in his course, and reforming his disposition, than upon the threatenings of the law. The massive ice presents a stubborn resistance to the assaults of man to remove it; but under the influence of the genial warmth of the rays of the sun, it freely and gently melts and disappears. It is said of the celebrated Bishop Cranmer, that whoever did him an injury, was almost sure of receiving some favor from him. There was true philosophy in this course.

"Nature has given man a full suit of armor against his foes—an armor easy to be worn, and ready at hand. It is the panoply of kindness. This is a sure protection against rage and violence, and revenge. It not only defends him who wears it, but subdues his adversaries. Physical force may be resisted—cunning may be met with cunning—but there is no withstanding the power of kindness. He who keeps this armor bright by use, need not fear the threats, or the fury, or the malice of others. He would not be more safe were he enclosed in walls of brass. The ill-will of an enemy can not be torn away by the tempest of violence; but it can be melted by the bright beams of kindness. 'If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing, thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head.'"

Good humor, is a disposition which young men should endeavor to infuse into their general demeanor. He who is sour, ill-natured, and petulant, is a pest to himself, his friends, if he has any, and all with whom he mingles. He is liable to gain the dislike of all, and his company is avoided, as a kind of fire-brand, calculated to set into a blaze every thing around him. But by cultivating a spirit of good humor—which is easy to be pleased, overlooks trifling vexations, and infuses upon the countenance a complacent smile, instead of a dark frown—you will have a source of self-satisfaction, your presence will be agreeable, and your company will be sought after. It should be your endeavor to avoid all outbreaks of anger and rage. Anger is much like a magazine of powder—if permitted to ignite and explode, it will most surely blow to atoms your own happiness, for the time being, and also be very liable to injure that of the persons near you. During paroxysms of anger, words are uttered and actions performed, often of the most ridiculous and reprehensible character, and of which you will afterwards become most heartily ashamed. The advice given by Athenodorus the philosopher, to Augustus Cesar, is of great value: "Remember, Cesar, whenever you are angry, that you neither say nor do any thing, before you have repeated to yourself the twenty-four letters of the alphabet." This admirable rule, or something of a like character, should be adopted by every young man, as a kind of safety-valve, that will permit the first rush of angry feelings to pass off, before they induce any improper action.

I cannot refrain from again urging young men to frequent the company of virtuous females. It will impart gracefulness, urbanity, and polish to their general demeanor—a purity, modesty, and propriety to their conversation and manners—which they can not obtain elsewhere. No man, except he possesses feelings of a brutish nature, can fail to become more exalted and refined, by often mingling in female company, where modesty and enlightened virtue prevails.

In conclusion, remember that "gentility is neither in birth, fortune, manner, nor fashion, but in mind! A high sense of honor—a determination never to take a mean advantage of another—an adherence to truth, delicacy, and politeness, towards those with whom you mingle, or may have dealings—are the essential and distinguishing characteristics of a gentleman."

A SKETCH FROM REAL LIFE.

BY MRS. S. L. WHISTON.

That "true happiness is not dependent on outward circumstances," is a very common remark. Still, the eagerness which we evince in the pursuit of wealth, power, fame, and the vanities of fashionable life, would lead an observer to believe that we were insincere in making the assertion, or that we did not realize the truth of the remark as we ought; at least, that it produced no very beneficial effects on our conduct. I have seen many instances where the truth of this proverb was verified. I will mention one.

In an occasional round of visiting, we called at the cottage of an old couple, somewhat bowed down with the infirmities of age, but who were still enabled by diligence and perseverance, to perform considerable labor. Their habitation was built of logs, rather roughly put together, but there was an air of neatness and comfort in and about it, that we look for in vain in many well-furnished and costly mansions. The interstices between the logs, were filled with a kind of clay or mud, to render it warm, and the inside neatly white-washed. In one corner were ranged three or four shelves, in lieu of a closet, on which were placed a few dishes in the most perfect order; in the opposite corner of the room stood a bed; near the centre, on a small pine table, white as the driven snow, was placed a pitcher filled with wild flowers, which, the old lady informed me, grew in a wood near by. These, with three or four chairs, and some cooking utensils, completed the furniture of this humble dwelling. After resting ourselves, we were invited to walk out and see the garden. There we saw a great variety of vegetables in a fine state of culture; there was not a spot of land where the hoe or spade could make an impression, but some useful plant reared its head to reward the untiring industry of the husbandman. The produce of this garden, the old man informed us, together with what little his wife was able to earn with her needle, constituted their means of living.

Mr. and Mrs. S.—had formerly known more prosperous days; they had started in life with a competency, and the prospect of laying by something to support themselves, independent of labor, in old age; but circumstances beyond their control, had deprived them of their property, and three-score years found them penniless—without a home—but not entirely without friends. One of these had given Mr. S. the rent of the spot he now occupied, for a limited number of years. He lost no time in idle lamentations, but immediately set about making things as comfortable and convenient as possible. When the weather would permit, he wrought in his garden; the rest of his time was employed in repairing the house; and they both assured us, that they had never enjoyed more real happiness, than since they had been reduced to what the world calls poverty. "What," some of my readers may ask, "was there in this miserable abode, calculated to produce happiness?" I answer, there was industry, frugality, contentment, love, an unshaken confidence in that Being who orders all things aright, and the hope of future felicity beyond the confines of this uncertain world, in that "better land," where there is no disappointment to mar our happiness—no poverty to dread; but where we shall revel in the unbounded riches of an almighty Father's love, throughout the undiminished period of eternity.

DEATH.

All must die. Every form, however lovely, and every flower, however beautiful, must be severed by the relentless hand of death. The bud as it begins to expand, is frequently nipped by the chilling frost—the rose as it opens wide its blossoms, is laid low by the withering rays of a scorching sun, and the firm and towering monarch of the forest, which has withstood the relentless blasts of a hundred winters, is prostrated by death's stern and unyielding grasp. Now the vegetable kingdom spreads her silken carpet over the fair face of nature, and teems luxuriant with life and beauty; and anon the searing frost of autumn comes, and her green foliage fades and dies. Death is constantly busy. Yesterday, as it were, we sprang from nonentity; to-morrow, he deprives us of earthly existence. To-day, health blooms upon our cheek and vigor nerves our limbs, but soon disease may prey upon us, and swiftly bear us to the cold and silent tomb.

To the proud and ungrateful infidel, how humiliating, gloomy, and disconsolate is the thought—how sad and solemn is the reflection, that he must die—that master and servant, man and brute, alike must lie upon a common level—that he is as a bubble thrown upon the swelling surges, to float for a short period upon the sea of time, and then to be eternally extinguished! But how different it is with the humble and grateful Christian. Though conscious that swift as "A fast-fitting meteor, a fast-flying cloud,

A flash of the lightning, a break of the wave,
He sinks from his rest to his home in the grave," yet he has a hope that cheers his spirit, dissipates his sorrow, dispels his doubts, and causes gratitude to rise to God like incense from the altar. He believes that after he shall have passed the dark vale of death, he shall meet the whole world in another, and a better and happier state. Reader, may you ever possess this hope, that you may be joyful in life and triumphant in death. J. T. G.

CHANGE.

Times change—man changes—the world changes, and each but tells how soon another change may come. From the fickle fluctuations of our own bosoms, to the agitations of society, the convulsions of kingdoms and the dread crash of empires, change is inscribed as the common lot of all, a lot as indubitable as fate! Minutes tell of changes in our own bosoms; weeks, of newly organized communities, and months of changed kingdoms! But is all change? is there nothing firm, nothing stable? Man is not firm, for he is a thing of passion, the dupe of the receding chains of self-interest—the cloud-capt mountains are not firm, for one struggle of an earthquake may upturn their lowest depths! What then is firm, what is stable? on what is not found the startling inscription, change?

The stars change not! Emblems of universal love—glittering gems, laughing in the clear blue sky, they change not! For six thousand years they have shone clear and bright in the blue drapery of heaven, while diadems have faded, crowned heads fallen and sea-girt empires crumbled to atoms! There they have stood twinkling and smiling to look down upon little earth, and see the things that call themselves men! things that look into the mirror, and feel that earth is almost too poor, too small for their foot-stool—things that love to impose upon their kindred men, and point the festered finger of scorn at those of their fellows whom they fancy a step below themselves—things big in their own consequential dignity, and who grin sarcastic smiles at all who chance to be behind them in intellectual attainments! Well may the stars smile, or rather weep to see little earth and its little inhabitants!

Smile on ye stars, forever smile;

In sweet employ taste love and bliss—

Chant wild your notes—then pause awhile

And think of earth—an earth like this!

The committee appointed at the last session to devise the best means for collecting a library of Universalist books, embracing all, or as many as can now be obtained relating to the subject, reported that they had made but partial progress, and begged that they might have leave to report at the next session. Granted.

Reports from the Corresponding Secretaries present, were heard, and the Society adjourned to meet in Boston, Mass., on the third Wednesday of September, 1838.

THOMAS WHITTEMORE, President.

T. J. Sawyer, Secretary.

SECRETARY'S REPORT.

The Secretary takes pleasure in saying that the interests of the Society have been sustained during the past year, although he regrets that so few of its members are as zealously engaged in the promotion of its principal objects as could be desired. Some valuable additions have been made to its library, but there are many periodicals, and some few books of our own country, which it does not yet possess. The hope is confidently entertained that publishers and others, who have it in their power, will not be backward in contributing to the Society's library.

It is also very desirable that the Corresponding Secretaries should, as far as possible, furnish the Secretary, or the Society at its annual session, with as full a statement as may be, of the condition and prospects of Universalism in their respective limits. A history of the rise and progress of our cause in the various sections of the country, would be a contribution of great utility to the Society, and the Secretary recommends the subject to the consideration of the members generally, with the hope that another year will greatly enrich this department of the library.

During the past year some attention has been paid to inquiries relating to the opinions of a few distinguished individuals on the subject of the endless misery of a part, or the final salvation of the whole human race. Several letters addressed to the Secretary by L. R. Paige, and which have appeared in some of our periodicals, show very conclusively, it is believed, that Bishop Hurd entertained the opinion that all men will finally be saved. Hitherto he has not generally been claimed as a Universalist, but no well-grounded objection can be preferred why his name should not take its place by the side of some other English names universally conceded to belong to our cause. To Mr. Paige the Society is under obligations for the careful and candid manner in which his inquiries were conducted, and the result must be highly gratifying to himself and every believer in the faith of a world's salvation.

From a reading of Dr. Samuel Parr's works, the Secretary has not been enabled to satisfy himself that this distinguished scholar was a Universalist, although many passages in his writings can perhaps be explained on no other hypothesis. His biographer and the editor of his works, seems very plainly to assert his departure from the beaten track of popular opinion relative to the government of God, and although this is not the proper place to enter into any details, I may be permitted to quote one remark of his biographer relating to this subject. Mr. Johnston says, "In fine, he (Dr. Parr) was tolerant toward all those who differed from him, and a protector of all those who suffered for conscience sake. He wished to place all the religious duties and feelings of man in a perfect reliance on God through Christ, in that theocracy which looks to immeasurable happiness, which makes evil itself a part of good—of that good which by a slow and certain progression, invisible to us, is gradually ascending its highest ratio." At some future time I design to present the various facts on which a probable judgment may be founded, relative to Dr. Parr's actual opinions, and though it cannot be proved perhaps that he was a Universalist, very good evidence can be furnished, I believe, that his faith in endless misery was little more than nominal, if indeed it be entitled even to that character.

The Secretary cannot allow this opportunity to pass without calling the attention of the Society to the persevering exertions of some advocates of endless misery in this country, to screen Professor Tholuck, of Germany, from the heinous charge of believing with Paul that God is the Saviour of all men. The success of these exertions, it must be confessed, is hardly adequate to their strenuous and persevering character. A letter has been published in several, perhaps all the Limitarian periodicals of the United States, from the pen of Prof. Tholuck himself. He is obviously unwilling to be known as a Universalist, and quite as unwilling to avow himself a believer in endless misery. He says—"In relation to myself I remark, that I believe in the sin against the Holy Ghost, and this alone is evidence that I do not believe in Universal Restoration; I simply believe that for many there will be means of salvation provided beyond this life; as, for example, for those heathen, who without any fault of their own (unenlightened) uninformed of the plan of salvation through Christ. This is taught in Romans ii: 12; 1 Pet. iii: 19: iv: 6. It has always appeared to me that there are certainly several passages in the Bible which give support to the doctrine in question, which if preached, must without doubt exert a very mischievous influence. I allude to 1 Cor. xv: 28; Rom. v: 18. There are, however, very many other passages which are opposed to the doctrine."

It is not a matter of great importance to Universalism whether Prof. Tholuck believes the doctrine or not, though I must say, that if the testimony of Prof. Sears and some clergymen of the Lutheran Church in this country, may be relied upon, and they have certainly enjoyed opportunities of knowing, the Professor has heretofore avowed a belief in the final salvation of all men. But without prosecuting this subject farther at the present time, I shall content myself with expressing the hope that whatever may be the result of investigations in which I design immediately to engage, the veracity of Dr. Tholuck and others concerned may not be implicated in the slightest degree, and that we may be able to account for the apparent contradiction now existing between them, by supposing some misapprehension, to which we are all liable, to be unsuspectedly and innocently indulged.

The Secretary has extended his foreign correspondence during the past year very materially, and he flatters himself that the results will be most gratifying to the Society. In England he has found a very ardent friend and a most valuable corresponding Secretary in the person of Rev. David Thom, of Liverpool, to whom the Society is much indebted for information relating to our cause in the mother country, and through whom the Secretary has become acquainted with several other gentlemen, who will not fail to contribute much to the promotion of the Society's objects. Every year, it is believed, if proper exertions are made by the officers and members of the Society, will add to its usefulness and interest.

Finally, brethren, we have much reason to be encouraged in this undertaking. We are permitted to behold on all sides the stately goings forth of divine truth and love, and it becomes us to mark its progress, and if possible to preserve the records of it to future generations. The time is coming when the humble notices of the progress of the faith once delivered to the saints, which this Society is designed to make and keep, will be regarded with an interest that is not now felt—when our children and children's children will delight to peruse the records which it is our privilege now to treasure up. May our zeal increase for every good word and work, that we may do our duty faithfully, and enjoy the approbation of our own consciences, and what is far better, the approbation of our heavenly Father.

A GRAND-FATHER'S LETTERS TO HIS GRAND-CHILDREN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

LETTER X.

In my last letter I submitted to you what appears to me to have been the meaning intended by Jesus, in the opening of his discourse on the Mount. The erroneous notions which his countrymen entertained of the kingdom which God was about to "set up," and in relation to the sources of happiness, I have endeavored to ascertain, and have given you the result of my researches and cogitations. If Jesus were again to appear on earth, and were he again to address men on the same subjects, would he not have nearly the same erroneous conceptions to combat?—would he find his estimates of happiness generally adopted? You know the answer. Put the question to yourselves, whether your opinions and sentiments bear a closer resemblance to those of the Jews, or to those of Jesus. Do this frequently, and never rest contented while you find the principles which regulate and characterize your conduct, different from those which would meet the approbation of divine Wisdom, and gain the smile of your heavenly Father. Be not conformed to this world in its estimates of felicity, but be ye transformed. It will require much thought and much effort ere ye can adopt the sentiments of Jesus. And if, at an advanced age, ye are able to say that the current opinions and maxims of the world have less influence over your conduct than have the maxims of Jesus, ye will have been more fortunate and successful than has been one of your best friends.—Think of these things. Pray to have the "mind that was in Christ Jesus." Consider him. Learn of him.

You have frequently heard me eulogise in no measured terms—with warmth, perhaps some might say with enthusiasm—the "Analogy of Natural and Revealed Religion to the Order of Nature," by Bishop Butler. I have frequently maintained that to a thorough understanding of this work, a reader must bring as much undistracted attention and as much acuteness of intellect, as to the mastery of the first book of Euclid—perhaps more. Some of you would sit down more hopefully to get over a second Pons Asinorum,* than to convert into language of your own some of the paragraphs from Butler, which I have prescribed to you as an exercise. A portion of that mental acuteness and profundity which were exercised in the composition of this work, are called for in the reading of it—and for this I highly value it. I mention this work at present, because I have been much pleased of late with some notices of it which I have met with. I trust they will conduce to make the work a still higher favorite with you than before. Lord Brougham, himself a giant in intellectual stature, says of this work, that it is "the most argumentative and philosophical defence of Christianity ever submitted to the world." Henry Martyn, of missionary memory, says—"I found Butler's Analogy useful in encouraging me to self-denial, by the representation he gives of this life as a state of discipline for a better."

There issued from the press of the Harpers, about the end of the year 1835, or beginning of 1836, a work which has only lately fallen into my hands. It is probable that you have read it long ago; but if not, you will do well to endeavor to procure it soon. The work I allude to, is "A Life of Washington, by James K. Paulding." It is written for the youth of this country, and in a style well adapted to the comprehension and capacities of those for whom it is intended. The parents and the youth of this generation, are indebted to Mr. Paulding for this well-executed attempt to introduce to their notice the life, virtues, and character of so valuable an example for youth. The author's expectation will not be disappointed, inasmuch as his labors will be "useful to the rising generation of his countrymen, by holding up to their view the character and actions of a man whose public and private virtues equally furnish the noblest as well as the safest objects for their guide and imitation. The author has done much to recommend his work both to parents and children, by his very appropriate, tasteful, and affectionate dedication. It reads thus:—"To the pious, retired, domestic MOTHERS OF THE UNITED STATES, this work, designed for the use of their children, is respectfully inscribed by the Author." I know that this dedication alone will give the work "favor in your eyes"; for your excellent mother is one of those to whom the work is inscribed, and ye delight in every thing calculated, in the best degree, to do honor to her, and to her virtues, wherever they may be found. When my eye first fell upon this dedication, with all the freshness of earlier feelings, a rush of filial gratitude, reverence, and affection for my long-lost mother, thrilled along the cords of my heart. So, in years to come, will it be with you!

Could I be at your side while you were perusing this excellent manual for youth, I should desire you to pause not unfrequently, that we might reflect and converse upon the details presented to us. I leave to your imaginations to supply this impracticable companionship, and to put into my mouth such remarks as you think would be likely to issue therefrom, if present with you "in the body." To a few remarks suggested during a cursory perusal of the work, I here solicit your attentive consideration. When I read the following reflection upon the consequences of our alliance with the French, during the revolutionary struggle, I said, If I could satisfy myself that this lesson would be deeply imprinted—inerasably engraven upon the minds of my children, and all youthful readers, I should grudge no labor to assist in putting the work into the hands of every youth in the United States. The sentiment, in the words of the author, is this: "One of the ill consequences almost always attending a reliance on the assistance of others, is a remission of our own exertions. Self-dependence, united with a firm belief in the justice of our cause, and the consequent aid of the Being whose great attribute is to side with the right, are the best foundations for success in every honorable pursuit." Echoing this lesson of wisdom and experience, I would say to you, my dear children, place your aims and objects of pursuit loftily yet wisely, form your plans with a proper regard to the dictates of prudence and policy, and having done so, look only to your own exertions for success. Yield not to INDOLENCE—that besetting or well-circumstanced sin, (euperistatou amartian,) Heb. xii: 1—slack not in your efforts. Labor vincit omnia—that is, all difficulties yield to wisely-directed labor. Trust not to patronage, allies, or friends: they will be more ready to help you when they see you able and determined to help yourselves. If you should forget every other lesson which I have attempted to instil, forget not this. It may—it will be the foundation of your greatness and happiness, for great efforts from great motives, is the best definition of a happy life.

Washington's mother is said to have remarked, that a good boy generally makes a good man. After reading Paulding's account of the treason of Arnold, you will be ready to admit the converse of this proposition. He has traced Arnold's actions and fate to obliquities of youthful character, uncorrected by age. Observe for yourselves, and then mark if the result of your observation incline you not to agree with Paulding, when he says:—"He who is despised or hated by his school-fellows, will seldom live to be respected or beloved by men. The bud that is caulked by the worm, produces no full-blown rose; and the worthless child becomes the villain man."

In my last letter I gave you my views of those characters whom Jesus, our divine Teacher, has pronounced happy. Please turn to that letter, and read what is said of the meek and their felicity. When these remarks were penned, I had not read Paulding's Washington. You may imagine my surprise at the coincidence of his expressing thoughts regarding Washington's happiness, very similar to those in my paraphrase of the verse referred to, and also in Magazine and Advocate, volume vii, page 52. Associated with the character of Washington, you may more readily bear them in remembrance, than in their former connexion. Paulding thus introduces the chapter which contains the history of Washington at Mount Vernon, after having retired from the arduous post of the Leader of the American Army. "The good man carries his happiness with him wheresoever he goes, for it is the inmate of his bosom. Its source is in the consciousness of virtue, and the approval of Heaven. This is the only sure basis of independence, for it places us above the world and all its accidents, which are otherwise beyond our control. I have generally observed that men of eminent purity of life, and distinguished for the exercise of the higher virtues, were happy and blessed in the possession of what they most desired. They were, perhaps, neither rich nor great; but if they were not so, it was because they coveted neither. But they possessed what they valued far above these—a serenity and quietness of mind; a calm, contented acquiescence in the bounties of Heaven, whether bestowed or withheld. If they were not great, they were honored by the esteem of others; and if subjected to misfortunes and reproaches, it was apparent to all, that they enjoyed what is above all things most precious—a composed, cheerful, and resigned spirit, a divine contentment, such as placed them far above the influence of all this world can give or take away, and clearly proved that virtue is not without its reward even in the extremity of its hardest trials. If ever man possessed these means of happiness, it would seem to have been Washington." Yes, we doubt not that into that rural retreat at Mount Vernon, Washington carried with him a spirit full of serenity, cheerfulness, and composure. Not so much from the success of his arms, and the consequent blessings of independence to his countrymen, do we think his happiness arose, as from the respect, the approbation of his own mind on account of the nobility and purity of the motives from which he acted, and the absence of all meaner, baser feelings of avarice or ambition. You know the patriotic feelings which were predominant in his character, and that, as Commander of the Army, he must have suffered, not gained, as to pecuniary matters, all his allowance being only the payment of his necessary expenses. In all circumstances ye may enjoy the same happiness—even the consciousness of acting from high and worthy motives!

Yours,

For the Magazine and Advocate

HINTS TO UNIVERSALISTS.

Universalism is that view of Christianity, which represents God as the Father of all his intelligent creation, and ascribes to him no act inconsistent with that relation. It represents Jesus Christ as the divinely appointed Saviour of all mankind.—It attributes to God our Father, no design, and its assurances are, that He will permit no event to transpire, incompatible with the purification and holiness of all by Jesus Christ. It teaches consequently, that there is beyond the Jordan of death, a state of immaculate purity, a heaven, a home for the spirit of the children of frail humanity.

Its practical teachings are, that if we would be happy, we must be virtuous. It warns us to avoid iniquity, because "the way of transgressors is hard." It invites us to observe the commandments of our Creator, because "in keeping of them there is great reward." It does not allow that the virtuous are miserable, nor the sinful happy.

This system, then, gives the most rational account of the relation man sustains towards his Creator, and, with the admission that God is equally good to all, the most consistent view of salvation by Jesus Christ. It blesses, cheers and consoles with a hope unknown in any other form of Christianity. Its teachings in relation to present happiness, are in accordance with the dictates of reason, and corroborated by the experience of every one.

We may now venture the assertion, that Universalism as a system of religious faith and moral duty, has higher claims to the attention and belief of an intelligent community, than any other supposed representation of Christianity. In reply to the inquiry—Why has it not more generally prevailed? I answer in general terms, that God has designed that the present state of man should be progressive in whatever relates to his happiness.

To be more particular, I observe that the opposite of Universalism, the doctrine of endless misery, became universally prevalent in the Christian church during an age of ignorance. I refer to the period intervening between the sixth century of the Christian era till near the time of the Reformation. During this age of almost general ignorance in Christendom, the doctrine of endless misery prevailed almost universally. It acquired an almost permanent establishment as an article of Christian faith. From that period to the present, it owes its retention and prevalence as an article of Christian doctrine in part to the same cause. But not so much at the present time; for probably at the present day, popularity is its main support.

That the doctrine of endless suffering obtained general prevalence in the Christian church in an age of ignorance, is a fact susceptible of the clearest proof. It owes its present popularity, then, to this cause. It is adapted to an age of darkness, ignorance and superstition.

Universalism advances with human improvement, knowledge and the light of science. It is adapted to an age of intellectual culture and moral refinement. An individual possessed of clear and correct views of the character of God, of just ideas of his moral government, and who properly appreciates his own rank in creation, in regard to his origin and final destiny, is better prepared, in consequence of these views, to prosecute intellectual pursuits with vigor and final success. That faith in the doctrine of God's impartial and efficient grace, is calculated to refine our moral feelings, rendering us more kind and benevolent, is a truth which few with the proper means of information, will deny.

If we consider the influence of Universalism in promoting human happiness, and in enabling man to act in accordance with the dignity of his nature, as a moral and intelligent being, we find that it is, indeed, "worthy of all acceptance." It is suited to all ages and conditions of life. It is not in the least calculated to mar the true happiness of existence. Its believers well know, that so far as they feel its influence, it serves to render them happier. Is not this system, then, well worthy our firm and steadfast support? Ought we not uniformly to recommend it to our families, friends and acquaintances? All who know that this doctrine is essential to true happiness, will answer these questions in the affirmative.

Do Universalist parents and other believers, who have the care and education of youth, act wisely and consistently, then, in permitting their youthful charge to acquire their religious education, (if they have any,) from those persons who decry the doctrine of Universalism. It is somewhat remarkable that persons who love the truth, will countenance their youthful relatives and friends in frequenting those places, where they believe hurtful, baneful error is inculcated with zeal and perseverance. Consider, my friends, the peace-destruoying influence of error, contrasted with your own happiness, the effect of a belief of truth, and I am confident, you will not neglect to affectionately invite the youthful members of your households, to accompany you to those places of public worship, where you believe God is honored as the Father and Saviour of all. You will not let the trivial circumstance of the inconvenience of the place, or the paucity of numbers, prevent your performing this obvious and important duty.

Do you desire their respectability in the world? Do not, then, above all things, learn them to appear to be what they are not. And it should be remembered that the doctrine of endless misery owes its present popularity, not to its truth, nor to any thing else valuable, but to its introduction in an age of ignorance. Its popularity is now, without doubt, on the wane.

Universalism, on the contrary, was never more prosperous than at this period. And I apprehend that the time has already gone by, when an individual need fear the loss of respectability by becoming known as a consistent believer in this doctrine. True, we are less numerous than those Christians who differ from us in faith. But numbers are not always the criterion of respectability. May all Universalists who read this article, properly appreciate the doctrine they believe, and they will be more thoroughly convinced of its importance to the happiness of their fellow-men.

MINUTES

Of the proceedings of the Murray Association of Universalists for 1837.

At a meeting of the Murray Association of Universalists, convened at Westfield Medina county, Ohio, on the 26th of August, 1837, it was voted that Br. Eber Mallary serve as Moderator, and Br. D. Tenny, Clerk, pro tem.

Voted, That all the members present from different parts of the Association, be invited to take part in the deliberations of the Council.

Appointed Brs. A. E. Kelsey, J. Jones and J. Simmonds a committee of arrangements for public services.

The committee on circuit preaching reported that our cause is in a prosperous condition, within the limits of our Association; but that they have as yet, been unable to carry into effect the purpose of this body, regarding circuit preaching. They were discharged from further attention to the subject.

Adjourned to meet at the close of the afternoon service.

Met according to adjournment, and appointed Br. J. Whitney, Standing Clerk of the Association for the ensuing year.

The committee of discipline reported no cause of complaint. Report accepted.

Appointed Brs. D. Tenny and J. Whitney, clerical, and Joseph Sage and Eber Mallary, lay delegates, to attend the Western State Convention at Fredericktown, Knox county, on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in October next.

The following preamble and resolution was presented and laid upon the table till the next meeting of this Association.

Whereas, it is difficult for many of our preachers to attend the meetings of our Association without a suspension of their meetings at home, it is therefore

Resolved, That the meetings of this Association be held on Wednesday and Thursday, instead of Saturday and Sunday, as they now are.

Adjourned to meet at 8 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Remarks.—Brethren, under the smiles of Providence we have been permitted to pass through another annual meeting of our Association, and but one circumstance was calculated to embitter the cup of our joy. Br. Hull, who is now in Westfield, was attacked severely with a bilious fever some seven days before the meeting, which prevented his attendance, we are happy to state, however, that he is gradually recovering. Our meeting was well attended, especially on the last day, and the people seemed to manifest the deepest interest in our services and deliberations. You will perceive that we have made preparations to attend the Western States' Convention, and it appears to be the desire of our friends in this section, that the subject of a new convention should be first acted upon in the council of that body. This course which is recommended by Brs. Strong and Davis in the 28th number of the Tidings, would, perhaps, be most likely to harmonize discordant feelings, if any exist, and preserve the unity of the spirit among us.

UTICA, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1837.

THE ENJOYMENTS OF EARTH.

What would be the joys of humanity in its best estate, if it was not for the doctrine of a blissful immortality? Parents—companions—brothers, sisters and friends—they must depart through the portals of death, one after another, leaving us to feel the aching void their absence creates. Wealth—fame—wit—beauty—knowledge—what can these all avail without the hope of again meeting those, to whose happiness our possession of these earthly goods ministered, and the promotion of whose happiness was all that rendered them goods to us? Ah, how little intrinsic virtue is there in any possessions—how much in their use to make others happy? "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou only hast the words of everlasting life"—life, not death—life from and of heaven, not misery and spiritual death in hell. Surely—surely a want of faith—of strong, enduring faith in the assurances of the Gospel—an apprehension of the miseries too often preached as a component part of the goodness of immortality—something like these causes must have operated in the production of the despair named in the following brief yet touching illustration of my remarks. I cut it from a secular paper of the day, leaving the credit and date as I found it. Yet I fear it is a common case—noticed seldom, because the sufferers are less gifted than the one here named. Poor—poor girl! A. B. G.

From the Baltimore Gazette.

WASHINGTON CITY, September 6, 1837.

The season being warm, and yet not sultry, the consequence is an unusual influx of travellers of both sexes who have chosen the autumnal solstice, or something approaching it, to visit the capital of the country.

Much of the fashion and beauty of the North are with us; and the South and West have not "been slow" to furnish their quota of attraction. In promenading Pennsylvania Avenue to-day, I recognized several Helena's and Hermia's, who at previous sessions have added life and gaiety, and I had almost said glory, to Metropolitan society. Many were happy; and whilst some indulged in the laugh and the jibe and the innocently intended criticism on the spectacle that was presented, there was one, whose needs and languor, as she listlessly leaned on the arm of a fond and doting father, told but too plainly that she was the victim of human suffering.

A few months since, I saw this same "daughter of beauty" in this city, as happy as the unrestricted lark, and as gay as the gossamer within the Paradise of the Peri. Health then bloomed on a cheek that is now blanched and care worn, and hundreds were ready to bow and worship at the shrine of her matchless beauty and virtue.

Fortune had smiled on her birth, and wealth poured forth its treasures to promote her happiness. Education had ripened a mind of the happiest structure into perfection, and a free intercourse with the more refined circles of society, aided by travel, had imparted to her the possession of all the graces. In earlier days she had visited Europe, and witnessed the fashionable dissipation of courts, and lords and ladies; and notwithstanding her plebeian origin, she had won the admiration of the aristocracy—of all who form a just estimate of female excellence in accordance with the virtues and beauty of the candidate for honest admiration. But to day, how changed! The bloom of health no longer glowed on her cheek; cheerfulness had departed; and she who gave delight to all, now languished on the parapet of the tomb, and wept, and sighed, and prayed, for that solace and repose, which is found beneath the cold clod of the valley.

"Alas! poor Kate is crazed."

I inquired of a friend of the family, the cause of the affliction of the sufferer, and was told her story in a few words. A few months since a mother, to whom she had clung from the cradle to woman's estate, was suddenly seized with illness, and after a few hours suffering, paid the last great debt of nature. In the beautiful language of Mr. John Quincy Adams, the mother had suddenly fled from "gloom to glory"; and left a husband and only daughter to linger in melancholy over the recollection of her virtues.

The father scarcely survived the shock; it was too severe to be sustained by the daughter. Immediately after the demise of her mother, she yielded to the bitterness of despair. For a short period she was an uncontrollable maniac. Within the last few weeks, she has ceased her ravings, and maintains a most sullen and interrupted silence. No art, address, or effort, can induce her to utter a syllable; and like the mute in the Foundling of the Forest, she gazes vacantly on all the objects that surround her.

THE BIBLE.

In these days, when so many are endeavoring to depreciate the literary and moral merits of the Bible in the minds of those who have to look up to others for a standard, it is refreshing to find testimony borne to the merits of that Book of books by such men as Newton, Milton, Locke, Lardner, Addison, Washington, Dr. Rush, Wirt, and others, whose characters in literature and morals, are far—very far above those of any infidel whose name has ever met our eyes or ears. When these giants in intellect and morals are properly compared with Messrs. Paine, Volney, Voltaire, Gibbon, Hume, Owen, Carlisle, (now said to be converted to Christianity,) Taylor, and others, the latter dwindle into comparative nothingness. They only appear large, when no large men are by. Talk of philosophy being opposed to the Bible!—Take the greatest astronomer—the greatest metaphysician—the greatest poet—the greatest geologist—the purest writer of the language—the greatest philanthropist—the greatest moralist—the most profoundly learned man in all of Jewish and Pagan literature relating to the rise and progress of Christianity—the greatest promoter of useful knowledge among the common people, that England (and probably the world) ever produced, and what did they say of the Bible with all their learning and philosophy? They believed it—its faith was their faith—its hopes their consolation—its Deity was their God.—And when the very fathers of science and literature could believe in the Bible, surely it ill becomes those who have scarcely even a smattering of either, to rail out against Christianity as barbarous, immoral, and opposed by science and philosophy! When the eagle, who can look at the sun without blinking, can perceive no spots on its surface inconsistent with its objects, surely moles and bats render themselves ridiculous in calling it a congregation of dark and chaotic vapours! On the ground, then, that men of literature, and science, and philosophy can not believe the Bible, let our opposers first bring forward skeptics who will compare to those here alluded to (viz. Newton, Locke, Milton, Buckland, Addison, Howard, Johnson, Lardner, Brougham,) and then we will attend to a settlement of that question with them.—Till, then, we deem it neither unphilosophical nor unlearned to assert the truth of Christianity.

But I began this article for the purpose of introducing an abstract of the Hon. Mr. Southard's testimony in favor of the good book—backed by that of Joseph R. Chandler, Esq., of Philadelphia, the writer of the abstract, himself no mean judge of literary or moral merit.

MR. SOUTHARD'S ADDRESS.

A friend who was at Princeton, (N. J.) on Tuesday, (September 19th,) informs us that he had the pleasure of listening to the address of the Hon. Samuel L. Southard, on the occasion of the commencement at the college in that place. The subject selected by the distinguished orator, was "The literature of the Bible;" and all that such a noble theme could require was supplied. We trust that at an early day we may look for a printed copy of the address. We are assured that it will tend to send the student and the writer to that fountain of good thoughts and good words. Aside from the divine origin of the Scriptures, they are priceless with reference to literature; always awakening a train of thought in those who may think, and rewarding perusal by an inspiration beyond the power of all other books.

A friend informs us that the address was one of those happy efforts that finds a response in the breast of every man, whose feelings have not been blasted by an intercourse with the vices of the world. The subject after the manner in which it was enforced by the speaker, will leave an impression on the minds of those to whom it was addressed, as well as on those of many others, as salutary as it will be lasting. Who that heard his eloquent and earnest recommendation of an attentive study of the Scripture, for evidences of their having proceeded from a divine author, for the interest that is attached to their history, they, after the sacking and burning of cities, the devastating of countries and the scattering of the people to whom they were entrusted, having come down to us safe and unaltered, when almost every other work penned by human intellect has been lost, or if any trace of it is preserved, it is some mean sentence to tell of its existence—who that heard this, and the reference made to the prophecies and their fulfilment, and that burst of eloquence which portrayed the glory of the people chosen of God when Jerusalem stood in all its splendor—the destruction of the temple—the wandering, scattered tribe of Judah, that has no home on the earth—the final gathering together of these persecuted, despised people, and the rebuilding of the ancient city—but felt as if the revelations of that volume needed nothing more than what has been fulfilled to confirm their awful truth. And then, when the language of our translation of the holy Scriptures was brought before his hearers, as the only good specimen of the purity of our language—the best study for style—for simplicity, and manly strength of expression—for the language of passion—for every emotion that can move the heart.

Mr. Southard spoke of the character of Moses, his opportunities for instruction, the people among whom he lived, and then of the ten Commandments, which have been a law to Jewish and Christian world ever since.—They must have had a divine origin—the intellect of Moses could never have conceived such stupendous principles for the government of mankind—these laws were compared with the moral codes of all the Heathen philosophers, etc.

We trust the address is soon to be printed.

PRAYER.

Prayer is the language of the heart, the hidden motion of the soul, its act of deep communion with its Maker. And who is there that has not prayed? There may be those who condemn it, who jeer at it, but they should remember that it is not alone the formal act of bending the knee and repeating a set form of words—but it is the high and holy desire, stealing from the bosom's inmost recesses and going up to "the Father of our spirits." Has such an one never known the time when all looked dark?—when the rainbow was gone and the flowers had faded? or when hopes were in the tomb and around was a waste of blighted memories?—or when communion with his fellows seemed cut off, and he a banished and persecuted one?—or when the soul was desolate within, and the world looked cheerless without? And has he not prayed then? did there not rise from his heart-depths a breathing for something better and surer, aye, a breathing to God for light, peace and a blessing?

It is a solemn rite that has admission every where.—By the couch of the new-born babe; and oh! what birth-herald so appropriate?—by the marriage-altar; and what better bridal gift than the Almighty's blessing?—by the bed of the dying; should we not hold communion once more in the language of faith, while the spirit yet lingers, with things, which, to that spirit are soon to be those of sight?—by the lowly bier; for who next may lie there?—and surely it is fitting to commune with the Creator when he has spoken so near us—in the morning's light; Father, praise, that light has come!—in the evening's shade; Father, thy blessing on our sleep!—on the pebbly strand when the chafed boat waits our departure; on the hearth of home when long years have brought us back—in the breathless hush before the fight; in the anthem's swelling peal of victory—where the battle booms over the surging deep; where peace rests on the silver waters—on the mountain's top, in the awful realm of snows; at the fountain's gush in a desert-land—wherever we go, whatever our lot, whatever the circumstance may be, when the weary spirit would rest and the stricken heart be glad—to prayer, to prayer!

Its aspirations are limited to no bounds, confined to no country—not alone to the stoled priest at the altar, and "the great congregation" beneath the proud arches of the temple—but its incense wafts as purely from the lone shades of the forest and the humble cabin, as when its influence thrilled over the hearts of the thousand worshippers—not alone to the shrines of the free, and the blessed fanes of Christendom; the red Indian kneels by his wigwam-door to talk with the Great Spirit, and who can say that "the acceptable sacrifice" is not offered by the deluded one, even in the temples of Vishnu and Brahma?

Whatever ideas we may form of God from beholding the glory, wonder, and ever-varying beauty of the external world, we love to approach him as a Father, to pillow on his bosom as a Friend. We know that "the Lord hath his way in the whirlwind and the storm, and the clouds are the dust of his feet"—we know that he "bringeth forth Mazzaroth in his season, and guideth Arcturus with his sons"—we know that "he bowed the heavens and came down, and darkness was under his feet"—that "He speaks and it is done, he commandeth and it stands fast," we acknowledge him, we trust with solemn awe, to be "the King eternal, immortal, invisible," "the Judge of all the earth"—yet, when we bow down and veil the brow at his foot-stool, he speaks not through the storm and the cloud—his voice comes not in the swelling winds and the great thunder—for the pavilion of light is opened up—and "the Comforter" has shed its holiness around—the earthquake has passed on, the whirlwind swept by, and "a still small voice" breathes peace to the troubled soul, and an unseen hand wipes the tear from the weeping eye.

Is it not a consoling thought, then, amid the toil, and tumult, and sorrow of this hurrying world, when harshness and neglect have jarred the fine chords of the soul, when bright prospects have grown dim, and sore hopes are falling around us, and desolation and darkness are settling thickly upon our path—is it not a consoling thought, that He who holdeth life, and chance, and destiny—who setteth in play every spring of action—has permitted us to come to him, to pour into his paternal ear the sorrows that are ready to burst our hearts, and to implore the aid that shall "keep our sinking spirits up"? We are told that He "is Love,"—are we afraid? There are no thronging servitors to keep us from the court of his presence, for "He is not far from every one of us"—will we not come freely? We will; trusting Him in youth's spring-time, in manhood's hour of pride, and when our aged feet are tottering feebly down to that valley "where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest." GRAPES.

The following valuable hint from the pen of the Editor of the Philadelphia United States Gazette, is too good not to be circulated; notwithstanding that our object in this paper should rather be, to disseminate other than horticultural news. He is speaking of a splendid horticultural exhibition, held last month, in the city of Brotherly Love, at which dahlias of every hue from white to black were exhibited in all profusion in the form of immense star, pyramid, eagle, etc., and not to be forgotten, a pumpkin, (one out of many nearly as large,) weighing 238 pounds, and measuring eight feet six inches in circumference. It would serve to make more pie than all our type put together! But to the grapes!—and the mode of raising them in crowded villages and cities. A. B. G.

While recurring to the articles of the late exhibition, we may mention a few bunches of grapes, left by Dr. Sharpless of Arch-street. They were of a very delicate class, but we mention them less with regard to their excellence, than to say that they are an additional evidence of the capabilities of every house lot to produce grapes. Dr. Sharpless placed the cutting of the vine, from which these grapes were raised, in a little corner, a few feet square—presenting neither sun, nor space, for grape vines—but he conducted the vine to the top of his building, three stories high, over which he erected an arbor, upon which the vine, having worked up to that height, was allowed to expand. On the second year after setting out the slip, one or two bunches of grapes were taken from the vine, which had, in that time, attained such an eminence; and this, the third year, the vine produced upwards of seventy large bunches of fruit.—What encouragement is here for any one, and every one, to set out a grape vine. They cost nothing. Mr. Zollickoffer, at the corner of Pine and Sixth streets, long since conducted a vine to the roof of his house, and was thus enabled not only to sit, but to sleep under his vine and to make some excellent wine from its fruit. And any body may do the same thing, and have as much fruit of the kind as is desired, if he will only set out the vine and let it grow—no matter whether the person owns the house he lives in, or not. Let every one plant a vine, and the people will move from vine to vine, just as they now go from hydrant to hydrant.

AUTUMNAL SUNSETS.

Have our readers in this vicinity, noticed the appearance of the heavens these few evenings past, at sunset? For our part, we have witnessed colors in the firmament, more splendid than ever decorated an Eastern palace, or glowed in dreams of "fairy-land." Just at the going down of the sun, there have shot athwart the western sky all beautiful hues, strange and gorgeous, emerald and crimson, and varied tints, as if the robes of angels had been thus flung over the battlements of the far heavens, or else

"The home
And fountain of the rainbow were revealed."

It may be owing to a peculiarity of our own, that the scenes which we have witnessed have such an effect upon us—for, reader, Br. Grosh, in introducing us to your notice, hinted at our ideality, and probably ere this, you have discovered that it is not our least prominent characteristic—it may be, I say then, a peculiarity: yet I believe that no one can look unmoved upon these things—can look, without feeling a thrill at the fountain of the heart, and an aspiration of the soul rising up, as it were, to mingle with the bright rejoicing worlds above him, and to bathe in the flood of glories. We love to look upon all things of this nature—the green earth in its morning gladness—the waters in their beauty, sleeping beneath the moonbeam—the eternal altar-fires of heaven—the sun, "when he cometh forth as a bridegroom from his chamber, and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race"—and the heavens, when they appear to us with such splendors as these—oreven when spread above us in their own unclouded loveliness. We love to look upon all these things—they "beggard description," but we can bid others behold them too, that their souls, like ours, may drink in delight from the very fountains of joy—may rejoice that "the Lord reigneth"—that the spirit may grow calm in contemplation of his works, and that when we go forth again to the toil and struggle of life, we may do it with feelings chastened and refined—with passion quelled and sin rebuked, by the beauty and the purity we have looked upon. DEDICATION.

The new Universalist church in Baltimore, was dedicated on the morning of the 24th of September. The dedication sermon was preached by Br. Thomas, assisted in the services by Brs. Whittemore and Le Fevre. In the afternoon, Br. L. S. Everett was installed pastor of the church and society—sermon by Br. Le Fevre, installing prayer by Br. Thomas, right hand of fellowship by Br. Drew. In the evening a church of about fifty was recognized—sermon by Br. Whittemore, after which the eucharist was administered. This is supposed to be the largest meeting-house in the denomination, being 90 feet long by 70 wide—having 133 pews on the lower floor and about fifty in the galleries. The basement is made also into a vestry. The whole cost of the church, land included, is $25,000.

Five preachers were present from five different States, viz.—Brs. T. Whittemore, Massachusetts; A. C. Thomas, Pennsylvania; W. A. Drew, Maine; C. F. Le Fevre, New-York; L. S. Everett, Maryland.

TAYLOR'S DIEGESIS.

Br. S. C. Loveland purposes republishing his examination of this standard skeptical work, in the Watchman, "with corrections and additions." We rejoice at it, as at the time his articles first appeared in the Star in the East, we had so much on hand, we could not easily copy them. We shall try to lay them before our readers in the improved form, as soon as we can find room, believing that some may see them who need them, and be led to perceive that the apostle of infidelity is either grossly ignorant of what he professes so boastfully to know well; or that he is a wilful deceiver. His admirers may choose either character for him, as pleases them best.—Our own belief, based on what we can learn of his life, is, that he is neither wholly rogue nor fool, but a spice of both—in other words, a little crack-brained, and a little unprincipled, and the rest, self-deceived.

His book is, we believe, one of the main pillars of modern infidelity, and we trust that the truth, well directed, will batter it to fragments. Those who have been confirmed in their disbelief of Christianity by reading "Taylor's Diegesis," should read the examination of it by Br. Loveland, and thus perhaps to their "bane" may find an "antidote." Eps.

THE SISTERS OF CHARITY.

Humanity belongs to no sect exclusively, and the most rigid opposers of monastic life, or Romanism in general, will not deny the just tribute of admiration, won fairly by the general benevolence of the sisterhood here named. I am one of those who esteem it a vice rather than a virtue, to disobey the manifest design of God in our creation and endowment. And I believe that monasticism is at war, not only with the social feelings of man in general, but with the great command given by the Creator at the beginning, and, by establishing a false standard by which to measure chastity, calculated to lessen reverence for the divine institution of marriage. But though I deem the sisters of Charity in a grievous error in much of their theoretical religion, and in a great error in their practice so far as seclusion from society and disregard of domestic ties are concerned, I am not disposed on that account, to detract from their well-earned praise in other respects. Nor in paying them a tribute of praise for their benevolence to the sick and abject stranger, that knows no home and has no friend but Heaven and the charitable, would I wish to exclude from admiration and praise, those who devote their lives to ministrations of good in the family circle—in the performance of all social and domestic duties, as well as in visiting the sick, and sheltering the houseless child of want, generally.—The truth is, we should endeavor to regard virtue, not as consisting merely in the performance of some great and merely occasional works of mercy, but as consisting in the faithful discharge of every duty of life, whether high or low, great or trifling, constantly recurring or only occasional.

But to the sisters of Charity, and their noble deeds in New Orleans, during the present alarming ravages of the yellow fever in that city. A. B. G.

FEVER IN NEW-ORLEANS.

The subjoined letter was not written with any view to publicity, but as it exhibits a bright spot in human character, while it sets forth almost unparalleled suffering, we think it will be acceptable to our readers. It is a disposition of Divine Providence, that in the darkest scene of human life Christian virtues should shine with redoubled splendor. Those who have not seen a yellow fever hospital, can not judge of the horrors of such a lazar-house; those who have, may judge also of the force of Christianity which sustains the resolution of females to minister to the wants of the wretched, dying inmates of that house of death. How low, how degraded, may our natures become by crime!—how exalted, how heavenly may they be rendered, when religion sanctifies our resolutions.—United States Gazette.

"Letters from New-Orleans, of 22d September, by express mail, brought us the intelligence of our dear sister Mary Ann's death, of yellow fever—several of our sisters have it, and we fear much that more will be taken, yet in all, the will of God be done. They are overpowered with duty, and hired nurses can not be procured, although from forty to fifty dollars per month are offered. Their work is a glorious one. I wish we were near to help them in their night watches. The good bishop wrote to me that we must all pray for them, as they are all kept busy in attending the sick. They have in the hospital from 15 to 25 deaths daily—and the want of persons to assist in nursing, makes our dear sisters feel it the more sensibly. Do pray for them, reverend friend, and beg of all to do the same. Sister Mary Ann begged to be remembered to all her friends, that they might pray for her. She was perfectly sensible, and asked for a pen and paper to write to me, and began a letter, but the traces of her deathly hand can scarcely be read, except the word, farewell."

THE OCEAN.

Likeness of Heaven! agent of power!

Man is thy victim, shipwrecks thy dower;

Spices and jewels from valley and sea,

Armies and banners are buried in thee!

What are the riches of Mexico's mine?

To the wealth that far down in thy deep water shines?

The proud navies that cover the conquering West—

Thou fling'st them to death with one heave of thy breast!

From the high hills that view thy wreck-making shore,

When the bride of the mariner shrieks at thy roar;

When, like fangs in the tempest, or mews in the blast,

O'er thy ridge-broken billows the canvase is cast;

How humbling to one with a heart and a soul,

To look on thy greatness and list to thy roll;

To think how that heart in cold ashes shall be,

While the voice of eternity rises from thee!

Yes! Where are the cities of Thebes and Tyre?

Swept from the nations like sparks from the fire:

The glory of Athens, the splendor of Rome,

Dissolved and forever—like dew in thy foam.

But thou art almighty—eternal—sublime—

Unweakened—unwasted—twin-brother of time!

Fleets, tempests nor nations thy glory can bow;

As the stars first beheld thee, still chainless art thou!

But hold! when thy surges no longer shall roll,

And that firmament's length is drawn back like a scroll,

Then, then shall the spirit that sighs by thee now,

Be more mighty, more lasting, more chainless than thou!

POETICAL ROQUET.

WRITTEN ON THE LAST DAY OF AUGUST.

Thou art gone, Oh! glorious Summer, with thy sunshine and bright flowers;Thou hast left the hearts that lov'd thee, with thy merry, laughing hours;The pleasant sounds that dwelt with thee, will soon be heard no more,

And the sky wears not so bright a blue as yesterday it wore.

Thou hast not met a lingering fate like some consumptive one,
Whom thy beauties all decay, before the race was done;Thy leaves are still almost as fresh as in their early prime,
Yet thou hast passed away from earth, Oh glorious summer time,The glossy maple leaves begin to wear a tint of brown,
And now and then a dying one comes slowly sailing down;But thou art dead—thou wilt not see thy lov'd ones all decay—
Oh! thou hast faded gloriously, sweet Summer's latest day.

TRUTH.

The philosopher knows the value of truth—searches for it, meditates upon it, or communicates it to others. The wise man exhibits it in his life and actions. Truth, wisdom, reason, virtue, nature, are terms which equally designate what is useful to mankind. The uniform tendency of truth is to enlighten man—the most enlightened are the most reasonable—the most reasonable feel more deeply than others the real interests and motives they have to be virtuous. Without the study of nature man can never know the relation he bears, nor the duties he owes to himself and others—deprived of this knowledge, he can have neither firm principles nor true happiness. The most enlightened are the most interested in being the best men—great talents should lead to great virtues. He who does evil is blind—he who is unregulated is deprived of reason—his conduct proves that he mistakes his own nature, is ignorant of what is due to himself and others, of the value of self-esteem and of the esteem of those around him—he is not an enlightened man. If he be insensible to the offices of benevolence, to the approbation and kindness of his associates, he differs in nothing from brutes—if he do not see that his vices lead to his own destruction, he is not an intelligent being, whose great aim is self-preservation—if he do not know and appreciate the inestimable advantages of society, and the means to render it useful and agreeable, he is a mad-man, and not a friend to wisdom.

A FEW STRANGE THINGS.

It is strange that a society should need to be threatened with destruction, before it will wake up to its best interests. It is strange that people will not co-operate with their minister in the cause of truth and righteousness.—It is strange that they expect a preacher to do every thing while they will not lift a finger. It is strange that when they have a good minister, they will let him go for want of a comfortable living, and to escape the pangs of poverty. It is strange that the people can not say work, work, work; and will let their infant prosperity kill them. It is strange that they are willing to trust themselves with a good preacher, and will not see the danger of their inaction till their preacher leaves them. It is strange that they will discourage a preacher in this way. It is strange that they can not see how much can be done, with a little extra exertion, until hard necessity compels them to attempt it. It is strange—passing strange—that they need to have this lesson.—Star in the East.

SCRAPES FROM THE GERMAN OF JEAN PAUL.

NATURE.—Mighty nature! when we see and love thee, we love our fellow-mortals too, and when we are forced to leave or lament them, thou still standest unchanged before us. Oh! before the soul on which the gay clouds of fancy have melted away and descended in chilling rains—before the heart, which in the walks of life finds only catacombs, and in those it meets, lifeless mummies—and before the eye, that sees no beloved one on which to rest its glances—before all these dost thou stand, reviving and ennobling Nature! with thy flowers, and hills, and cataracts, speaking peace and comfort, and the forsaken one wipes the tear from his eye that it may gaze undimmed upon thy imperishable glories!

A SCENE IN THE ALPS.—What a world lay before him! The Alps stood erect, like giants of another earth, ranked in the distance, and held up their glaciers like glittering shields to catch the first rays of the morning sun: they were girdled with blue forests, and vineyards and valleys were spread beneath their feet, and the wind played with the cascades as with strips of silver ribbon.

NIGHT.—The contemplation of night should lead to elevating rather than to depressing ideas. Who can fix his mind on transitory and earthly things, in presence of those glittering myriads of worlds; and who can dread death or solitude in the midst of this brilliant, animated universe, composed of countless suns and worlds, all full of light, and life, and motion?

LIFE.—Man's journey through life is like ascending a tower: he mounts with pain and toil one steep step after another, and finds at the top an open space for repose and a view of the world beneath him, writes his name and descends. Some more soaring, reach the very base at the top of the spire, but only to gaze for an instant at the heaven above them, and to descend.

THE STARS.—The constellations follow in each other's train like the different eras of man's life. The evening star is the herald of youth and joy, the moon is maiden age, bright and quiet but cold, and followed by a brief darkness soon to be succeeded by the splendor of the rising sun of immortality.

SHORTSIGHTEDNESS.—Shortsightedness is increasing so alarmingly, that the vision of a great many of the refined class takes in only the nearest object to them, that is, themselves; a defect which, in the most brilliant circles, forces them to confine their glances and their thoughts to their own persons and dress.

LOVE AND ANGER.—The rainbow of peace never rises on our hearts in all its beauty, till a storm has cleared the atmosphere. We are incapable of uninterrupted love, without coldness, quarrels and reconciliation.

YOUTH.—There is a fine period in a young man's life, in which he is determined never to take any office, and in a girl's, when she is determined never to marry. The duration of both is about equal.—Mirror.

Selections from the "Tin Trumpet."

GALLOWS.—A cure without being a prevention of crime. It is calculated, that since the suspension of bank payments, 800 human beings have been executed for forgery alone! In the year 1832 an important improvement was effected in our penal code, by the entire repeal of the punishment of death, as it regarded five classes of criminals.

It is curious to observe, how, in all cases, the good sense and humanity of the public outstrip those of judges and legislators, who, being generally both hardened and blinded by habit, neither feel for the criminal, nor see the iniquity of the law. Singular inconsistency! that many of the same clear-sighted and kind-hearted people, who rail against the severity of our code, as utterly inconsistent with the special injunctions and mild spirit of Christianity, will still subject those who differ from them in matters of faith, to all the damnable clauses of their vindictive creed. They are religiously bent upon mitigating every code but the religions, and would alleviate the punishment of all offenders, except those who have committed the irremissible crime of differing from them in opinion. And yet, what are the comparatively painless three or four minutes of hanging, to an eternity of exquisite anguish! Oh! why will not men adopt the healing, the consolatory, the blessed and blessing spirit of Christianity, instead of the occasional bitterness of its letter?—why will they not read the universe, instead of the perversions and anathemas of gloomy fanatics, and believe, that in a future state the doom, even of the guilty, will be measured by the wisdom, the justness, the mercy of the Creator, rather than by the misdeeds of the creature?

FUTURITY.—What we are to be, determined by what we have been.—An inscrutable mystery, of which we can only guess at a solution, by referring to the present and the past. These assure us by millions of incontestable proofs, that the benevolent Creator sympathises with our happiness; then He must sympathise still more tenderly with our sufferings. To suppose that he would scatter all sorts of delights around us in this evanescent world, and yet doom the great mass of mankind to everlasting anguish in the next, is an irreconcilable contradiction. The earth, upon which we are merely flitting passengers, is every where enmatted with flowers, equally exquisite for varied beauty and perfume, but useless, except for the purpose of diffusing pleasure; and yet our eternal abode is to be horrent with fire and agony! The best way of combatting the terrors with which superstition has darkened futurity, is to appeal from the unknown to the known, from the unseen to the visible, from imaginary torment to real enjoyment, from the frightfulness and the stench of Tophet to the beauty of a tulip, and the fragrance of a rose.

DEATHS.

In this city, on the 3d inst., HELEN, eldest daughter of Mr. Edmund Munson, in the 8th year of her age.—This is now the third death that has occurred in this family, within a few weeks. On the first of July last, Mr. M.'s amiable wife, and three promising children, were all in health; but the hand of sickness was laid upon them all, and death has snatched away, first his wife, then his only son, and now his eldest daughter leaving him now apparently slowly convalescent from the same lingering fever, with a little, sole surviving daughter of three years old nearly recovered from the same. Truly mysterious and inscrutable are the ways of divine Providence; yet in judgment will he doubtless remember mercy. Yea he does remember mercy, even to this his afflicted servant, in the calm resignation, Christian fortitude and cheering hopes of the future, with which his mind is blessed in this trying season of affliction; looking forward to that better world where all shall meet again, where "there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither any more pain, for the former things shall have passed away." D. S.

In Sullivan, (Caneonga village,) August 23d, Capt. TIMOTHY BROWN, aged 72 years. He had for many years been afflicted with occasional paroxysms of disease—the result of over exertion; which fixed itself permanently during the past winter, and subjected him to protracted and intense sufferings. He was among the earliest settlers of the village, rose by close application to business, to the command of wealth, maintained a fair reputation for correct habits and integrity, was kind and indulgent to the poor and distressed, and though not a direct professor of religion, he was decidedly favorable to the doctrine of the restitution—and lived and died an honest man.—Com.

OCCASIONAL SERMON,

BY REV. GEO. MESSINGER.

"And let us not be weary in well-doing; for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not."—GAL. vi: 9.

All who, in ancient or modern times, have become eminent for usefulness, have been characterized for perseverance and unwearied exertion. No one ever did, or can become a useful member of any community, who is indolent, or destitute of perseverance. It is not true that all the industrious and persevering are useful, for they may be engaged in a bad cause; and hence, there are some who are not weary in evil-doing: and all such may be assured, that in due time they shall reap corruption and wo. For he that doeth wrong, shall receive for the wrong he hath done.

"Let us not be weary in well-doing." This exhortation, given nearly eighteen centuries ago, to those who then lived, will answer as well at this time, and apply as well to those who now live. Hence, let us heed the language of the apostle, addressing us under the guidance of the divine Spirit, saying affectionately, yet powerfully, "Let us not be weary in well-doing." The assurance contained in our text, that in due season we shall reap, if we faint not, is exceedingly encouraging to all such as are apt to be faint-hearted; for with due perseverance and application, the anticipated good for which they labor, will be enjoyed. Persevering industry, is the surest road to success in every thing; but in order to pursue any course of well-doing with propriety and success, it is essentially requisite we should understand the nature and tendency of our calling; so that we may understandingly progress toward some useful end. If not, we may be like the head-strong and self-sufficient fanatic, who, under pretence of doing great good, rushes forward with blind impetuosity, and scatters destruction and misery in his path. Goodness in principle and action, in connection with knowledge and reason, are indispensable ingredients in the composition of the Christian character. Knowledge and reason raise man above the brute, and the less of these he has, the more like the brute he acts, and the more of them he has, the more god-like he acts. A knowledge of those laws of the all-wise Creator, which he has established for the government of all things, is indispensable to the proper conduct and well-being of man. Throughout all nations and ages, the same physical laws exist. Hence, if we learn by persevering application, these laws in one age and place, we may be assured they are the same in all other places and ages. It is so in the mental, so in the moral world. An infraction of any of these laws, produces disorder and misery; and obedience to them, produces order and happiness, and constitutes the well-doing referred to in our text. Hence, in order to secure the greatest amount of happiness, and at the same time avoid the greatest amount of misery, we must become acquainted with the laws of God, and obey them.

Let us, as studious disciples, study these laws in God's word and works. Let us not think that a competent knowledge of them can be attained in a short time, without application; for very few of mankind can learn intuitively. Nor let us think that a knowledge of them is so difficult to reach, that it can never be obtained. For perseverance will remove every impediment and surmount every obstacle. Seeing this is so, "let us not be weary in well-doing; for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not."

The laws of God are such, that all must inevitably receive according to their works, whether good or bad, "for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." This doctrine is not only scriptural and reasonable, but it is confirmed by the voice of universal experience. St. Paul assures us that God "will render to every man according to his deeds. To them who by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory, and honor, and immortality, eternal life. But unto them that are contentious, and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness: indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, upon every soul of man that doeth evil; of the Jew first, and also of the Gentile. But glory, honor, and peace to every man that worketh good; to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile; for there is no respect of persons with God." Mankind sometimes vainly imagine that evil-doing will render them happy; and under the influence of this delusion, they will practice vice, and pursue a course of iniquity in search of happiness, and reap the bitter fruit of disappointment and misery. Hear the words of the great Apostle, affectionately addressed to such deluded persons: "Be not deceived, for God is not mocked; [i. e., deluded;] for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to the flesh; shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the spirit, shall of the spirit reap life everlasting." Now come in appositely the words of our text: "And let us not be weary in well-doing; for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not." The apostle thus continues his exhortation: "As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good to all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith." Why should we do good, especially to those who are of the household of faith? Because, by encouraging, assisting, and doing good to them, we promote truth and righteousness more effectually than if we neglect the faithful and do good to the unfaithful and wicked. Why should we do good to all, as we have opportunity? Because God is good to all, and it will dispose them to do good to us. But why should we do good to the wicked? Because "God is good to the evil and unthankful;" and because it is goodness that overcomes evil and leads to repentance. God never becomes weary in well-doing. But men sometimes do, and flag, hesitate, and stop; and having stopped, they become discouraged, or what is worse, are led captive by temptation, and become useless, or worse than useless, to the world, by ceasing to good and learning to do evil. May God forbid that any of us should be left to do thus. Could mankind behold the horrid effects of evil-doing clearly displayed before them, it would operate as a powerful preventive. Let parents and teachers, then, hold up to the view of those under their direction, the inevitable and awful consequences of vice. O! witness the shame, the guilt, and the disgrace of a son, whose character has been deeply stained by the commission of foul deeds. Or, behold the de-graduation and agony of a daughter, who has stepped aside from the path of virtue. The effects do not cease with those who do the evil, but the hearts of parents are touched and afflicted. O! what heart-rending agony it has sometimes caused them, to learn that their sons or daughters have turned from the path of virtue, and pursued that of vice! A circumstance in point occurs to your speaker.

There were two kind parents, who had a son, an only child. They watched over him with paternal solicitude from infancy to manhood, provided for him, and educated him well. He was apprehended for forgery, brought before the bar of justice, and was condemned to spend a series of years in the State's prison. His parents were present at the trial. The father was in deep distress; and the mother groaned aloud with agony, when she heard the sentence pronounced by the judge. She left the court-room supported by her husband, and on the green, in front of the court-house, she fell lifeless—died of a broken heart!

The feelings of parents have been far more agonized by the vicious conduct of their children, than in following them to the grave. Yes, the death of a virtuous child is comfort, in comparison to the disgrace of a wicked one. Fathers can not be too watchful over the conduct of their sons; nor can mother's be too careful in watching over the conduct of their daughters. Fathers and mothers, watchfulness alone will not secure your sons and daughters from vice and consequent disgrace. There is a more effectual preventive, than the most anxious solicitude prompting the most vigilant caution. It is this—to be virtuous and circumspect, yourselves. The influence of proper example upon the young, is far greater than the best advice, or most salutary precepts. Good examples in parents, will go much further in forming virtuous dispositions and habits in their children, than all they can otherwise teach and do. If amity be manifested in the conduct and conversation of parents, they infuse the principles of gentleness and affection into their children—but if they quarrel and use abusive language to each other, before their children, they teach them to do likewise far more effectually, than if they should expressly say to them, "Children, go and quarrel and abuse one another."

Again: does the father or mother use profane language in the hearing of their children? If so, they ought not to be surprised if they should hear them repeat the wicked words. Although there are many fathers who are addicted to profanity, I rejoice that there are but few mothers who are profane. No vice is more strikingly characteristic of wickedness and folly, than this; and none less excusable. Children are apt to think that it is not wrong to imitate their parents; and as example is the surest way of teaching vice, so it is the most effectual way of teaching virtue. The power of example is great, upon all classes of mankind; and as this is the most effectual way of teaching what is good, Christians should, by all means, teach in this way—and those who wish to not promote or encourage any thing wrong, should be cautious not to set any bad example.

Again: let parents be in habits of intoxication, and their children will be apt to think it is not wrong, and will be led into this beastly vice by the influence of their example. But these same children, if their parents had not used intoxicating drinks at all, would have stood in no danger of becoming intemperate; and instead of being indolent, vicious, and intemperate, and consequently pests to society, they might have been industrious, virtuous, temperate, and useful members of it. O!

what wretchedness, poverty, vice, and disease, have been caused by intemperance; and we know of but one way of effectually arresting the progress of this destructive evil, and checking it altogether; and that is, for all to lay aside the use of all intoxicating drinks, as a common beverage. Let this be done, and drunkenness will be banished from the world. After considering this subject for years, we have come most solemnly to this conclusion, before God and the assembled universe. Let those philanthropists who have engaged in this good work, be persevering, and their labor will be crowned with success. Some will be reformed, and many be prevented from becoming drunkards. Friends of humanity, be not weary in well-doing in the cause, for if you relax not your exertion, in due season you will reap the noble satisfaction of beholding a temperate world. So long as this loathsome and degrading vice exists, we should use unwearied exertion to do it away. It is not intemperate drinking alone, we should endeavor to do away, but intemperate eating, also; for gluttony is a debasing and injurious practice, and is classed in the Scriptures with drunkenness. Both cause poverty, disease, and stupidity. As says Solomon, "the drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty, and drowsiness shall clothe a man with rags." All excesses, of every description, should be avoided, because they are injurious. Even exercising too much, or sleeping too long, enervates the system, and sometimes produces disease; and even attending religious meetings for weeks and months in succession, to the neglect of necessary secular concerns, is religious intemperance. "Six days shalt thou labor; the seventh day thou shalt not do any work." One "thou shalt," is as strong as the other.

Although we are happy to embrace this opportunity, to acknowledge that the ladies of our republic are, generally, exempt from the vices of profanity and drunkenness; yet some have gone to excess in drinking tea, taking snuff, and smoking tobacco, and have ruined their health by so doing; and some men have also done the same. Using tobacco to excess, is a very loathsome habit, and gives a person a filthy and disagreeable appearance, and is injurious to health, and sometimes ruinous to it, as well as being a waste of property. Would it not be wise for every one to lay the use of this Indian weed aside entirely, unless convinced it contributes to health, or has some beneficial effect?

We most sincerely believe that Universalists have the best faith in the world, exercising the best moral tendency, and that when carried out in its true practical results, it will make mankind universally good, and that there is no other faith that can ever produce such a glorious result; hence, we should strive to be the first in every moral and religious improvement of the age. Yea, it is our solemn persuasion before God, that the vastly important work of reforming the vicious, subduing the malignant and contentious, exploding the errors and corruptions of Christendom, and of correcting the religious abuses of this age, is, in a great measure, placed by our heavenly Father, in the hands of our denomination. May God grant that we may be faithful, and not be "weary in well-doing; for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not."

It is not what people profess or believe, that causes their influence to be felt, but it is what they do. Profession, alone, is of but little consequence to individuals or communities, either in secular or religious concerns. For instance: let a mechanic profess to be a complete workman, and to do every thing in his line of business in the best manner, and not perform any work—of what possible benefit would his profession be, to himself or any one else? None at all. Or, let a physician profess to understand all diseases, their causes and effects, to have ability and means to cure them all, and not cure any—of what benefit would his profession be? None—and if he actually could do all he professed, and should not do any thing, he would be useless in the world—his profession would be like faith without works, dead, being alone.

Those who do the best, enjoy the most, and are the most successful, and rise the highest in respect and esteem. See the good mechanic, who understands his business well, and is faithful in attending to it, and does all his work well, and fulfils all his engagements—he is a blessing to the public and his own family, and is justly esteemed and valued for his usefulness: and he will, in due time, receive a rich reward for his persevering industry. Let not the young mechanic, then, "be weary in well-doing; for in due season he shall reap, if he faint not." The good physician, too, who is active in destroying disease and relieving pain, and is skilful and punctual, benevolent and persevering, deservedly obtains a good reputation, and is a great blessing to our race. Let him not be weary in well-doing. The merchant, who is honorable and fair in his dealings, sells at a reasonable profit, is condescending and accommodating to his customers, and is attentive and faithful in his business, is almost sure to succeed well, and to gain property, respectability, and usefulness; but he who deceives, takes advantage of others in every way he can, sells at too dear a rate, neglects his business, and represents his articles to be good and cheap, when they are poor and dear, will be likely to be neglected and despised by the respectable part of community, and suffered to fail for want of patronage. Let the merchant, then, consider, that persevering in an honorable course, the most surely leads to prosperity. Let him not be weary in well-doing.

Again: see the industrious farmer, tilling his ground and committing his seed to the faithful soil—he expects, in due season, to reap a good crop as the reward of his toil—and he almost invariably finds that the soil does its part, if he does his. He toils not in vain—he sows in hope, and reaps in joy the reward of his labor. And here is the foundation of the imagery contained in our text. We hope to be benefitted by whatever we do, but benefit can only be realized as the effect of well-doing. If the farmer becomes weary in well-doing, neglects to clear or till his land, and permits thorns, briars, thistles, and weeds to spring up, there will not any thing grow that is of benefit. Let such a man profess to be a good farmer, and who will believe him? No one; for his farm tells a contrary story. By "the fruits" we know him.

Profession in religion, without corresponding works, is worse than useless. If a man is very strict in observing religious ceremonies, makes an open profession of religion, and it becomes notorious that he has secretly indulged in vice, no credit will be given him for his piety, and he becomes justly branded with hypocrisy. Hypocrisy is the besetting sin of saints, and the most abominable one of all, and this sin was more severely rebuked by our Lord than any other. Our Saviour adduced a most striking emblem, to represent the outward display and inward deformity of the hypocrite—viz., a whited sepulchre, beautiful in external appearance, but, inwardly, full of dead men's bones and all uncleanness. And even Musselmén assign the hottest part of the lowest hell to the hypocrite. The best foundation for doing good, perseveringly and successfully, is laid in correct views of the supreme Being. He gives daily testimony, that he does good constantly, and never becomes weary in doing it. Not only so, but he does good universally, is good to all, in bestowing blessings upon them—and as God is unwearied in doing good, we should endeavor to imitate him, in our unwearied exertion to do good to our fellow-creatures. Our Lord is a bright example for us to imitate. His unceasing labors of good, his patience, humility, meekness, and forgiving spirit, are worthy the imitation of all. He was one in spirit, design, and operation, with his Father, and "the express image of his person and brightness of his glory."

The most substantial reason why God is induced to do good to mankind, is, because he loves them. Love is an all-actuating principle of the Deity, and it eternally was, and eternally will be. This induced him to lay a plan, of the most extensive and lasting good for all our race. His unerring wisdom and infinite knowledge, enabled him to form a scheme for the salvation of the world, that was perfect, and in exact accordance with his goodness and love. And his almighty power will enable him to carry into effect this glorious plan. Our eternal salvation and immortal bliss is securely based, in this divine scheme. Numerous and strong are the testimonies, that the immutable and omnipotent love of God encircles our being, and secures our welfare, through immeasurable duration. This love of the Infinite Mind is "stronger than death," many waters can not quench it, nor the floods drown it." It was this love that induced him to send his Son to save the world—and each one who has felt the life-giving power and heavenly influence of this love, can exclaim with the apostle, "I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

The unwearied exertion of Christ to do good, presents a perfect example for us to follow, under all circumstances. He was a lover and kind-hearted friend of our race. He even loved his enemies, and labored for their benefit. Love makes every duty light and agreeable in its performance. Why does a mother watch, with such untiring vigilance, over her child, when it is sick or in danger? Because she loves it; and it is her love which makes her perform so cheerfully and willingly such labor for her offspring, and induces her to use such unwearied exertion for their welfare and happiness. It is the love of the universal Parent, that makes him watch over his children with such unwearied vigilance and ceaseless care. "It is his children that he loves, and he loves them because they are his children." That love which Heaven has implanted in the breasts of parents, is the brightest and fittest emblem found on earth, to represent that love which burns in the universal Parent. Love never can be extinguished, or even changed, in this source of love.

My ministering brethren, let us not become weary in the glorious cause of goodness and love, and of the emancipation of the world. It is even now, as in the apostolic age, "we both labor and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men." But this reproach is fast diminishing in our beloved country, for our sentiments are rapidly spreading, and are extensively received into good and honest hearts. Having the most joyful news to proclaim, we will announce it fearlessly, before a listening world—"Yes, we are unto" us if we "preach not the Gospel." Let us use unwearied exertion in proclaiming "the whole counsel of God," for the benefit, comfort, and edification of mankind. Go on, brethren, be energetic, be persevering, be vigilant, and "contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints." Be virtuous, as circumspect—"wise as serpents, and harmless as doves"—that our opposers may have no evil thing to say of you. Let your conduct and conversation contradict the oft repeated assertion, that our sentiments lead to licentiousness. Finally, "let us not be weary in well-doing; for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not."

Believers in a world's salvation, you are a highly privileged people—may you all be "a peculiar people, zealous of good works." I see many heads in this large congregation, frosted by the breath of time—some aged fathers in Israel, who have "fought and bled in freedom's cause," who purchased with their blood, the liberty which we so richly enjoy. O be grateful, sons and daughters of our happy land, for such toleration and liberty!

Beloved friends, believers in a world's salvation, our sentiments are the only ones which accord with the genius of our government. For, hear, ye friends of liberty and equal rights, the noble and enlightened political opinions of our patriotic forefathers—that "all mankind are born free and equal, and endowed by their Creator, with certain unalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." How exactly does this accord with the genius of Universalism! We believe that God, through his Son, will free all mankind from the bondage of sin and error, and make all equally the recipients of his grace, goodness and love—that there is an inheritance which is "incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away," reserved in heaven for all, and unalienably confirmed to them by the supreme will, and sealed by the Redeemer's blood—yea, more, we most firmly believe in immortal life in the Saviour, for all—that all will be made alive in him—that he possesses endless life—and that because he lives, we shall live also. "Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty." When God shall be "all in all," all will possess his spirit, be actuated and filled by it, and be ruled by the law of perfect liberty. O, then, that happiness which is the pursuit of all, will be enjoyed by all!

Come, then, patriots and Christians, join in the benevolent work of relieving the world from political and religious bondage. Let the world understand, that the government of Heaven is based upon far more liberal, enlightened, and benevolent principles, than the glorious government under which we live. And may you never become weary in your labor of love.

Is there a lone individual whose heart is warm with the love of Heaven, and whose mind is illumined with truth, and who lives amid bitter opposition? May he not be weary in well-doing—for, if he use unwearied exertion, he may one day see the cause he loves, espoused by many around him, a good society formed, the Gospel dispensed, a meeting-house built, and a numerous and respectable audience worshipping in it. Such cases have occurred, and they may occur again. O, then, my warm-hearted friends, who reside alone in your belief, be "not weary in well-doing; for in due season ye shall reap, if ye faint not." Let societies keep united, continue to be active, and keep the spirit of Christ alive among them, and they will flourish, increase in numbers, and rapidly extend their influence, graces, and happiness. Let no society, then, become weary in well-doing.

Finally, let preachers and people, who believe in our glorious, heart-cheering, and God-honoring faith, be as much better than others, as their faith is; and, as a denomination, we shall soon gain an overpowering popular influence, which all our opposers can not resist. So let it be. Amen.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

A WORD, BROTHER.

BY T. J. TENNEY.

We have spent some happy hours in the contemplation of the Scriptures of divine truth. We have found its promises are freighted with blissful fruits; and when deeply reflecting upon them—their depth, their richness, their universality—we have almost exclaimed aloud in the strains of impassioned joy and gladness, "Glory to God in the highest!" Oh, that all could look upon them in the same light—that all could see their immortality in this beacon of heaven—could read the incorruptible, unfading glories of God—then should we already be filled with the unspeakable riches of the future.

But, alas! how few of the many inhabitants of earth, seem to have attained to such an eminence as this—have become elevated so far as to receive any real pleasure from the prospective joys of the untried, unproved, and undiscovered time to come! What potent drug has deadened their faculties! Are they asleep? No—no. One man has bought him a farm, and must needs look for his bargain; another has got him a yoke of oxen, and must try them; and a third has taken a wife, and can not spend a moment in the contemplation of what is not already with him. My friend A. is of the first class, B. of the second, and C. of the third.

A. had accumulated a little cash, and could see just far enough to know that a man must live by the sweat of his brow. The next step was to get him a little spot of land, on which to indulge his propensity for labor. He got it, and since then his mind has been so absorbed in the culture of the vegetable productions of the farm, that he can spend no time in reading his Bible. True, he has been to meeting now and then, (as he used to tell us,) just to keep up good society; but as to the "whys and wherefores" of the preacher's sayings, he never could trouble himself to look for them.

B. is about with his horses and oxen—they are considerably larger than Mr. P.'s, and can draw more. Eternal life, if he can get time, by and by he will attend to the subject; but now—oh, he can not think of it. The Bible! it is too large a book for him to read.

And C.—why he has got him a wife! Astonishing! And are these the only reasons for neglecting the word of the great Jehovah! Are you contented with so narrow a vision as this! Look a moment—how long will your hearts and eyes be satisfied with the beauties of the field? That gaudy flower—those heavy boughs of verdure—and the green clothing of the earth—must soon perish. Where then will ye look for comfort? The war-horse as well as all other beasts of this lower world, are destined to the same end—their strength will fail, and death inevitably follow. What then will fascinate and enliven you? The bosom companion is alike subject to the laws of God. Though cheerful and happy now, thrilled with each new adventure, loving and loved, rising with the first notes of the morn, possessing a freshness, radical, like that of the rose, giving her a hue of beauty, which, among things beautiful, is most beautiful—her voice is the sweetest in the choir—the balm of the wounded, the enlivener of the social company, the proclaimer of peace around the family hearth, and the most fervent and devoted at the altar of God.

But what is life? It is even a vapor that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away. A sickness—a paleness—and death is the brief work of destruction. Or, may be, a lingering decay awaits her—a cold, cough, and consumption come upon her, to sever the ties of love and friendship. Where now will you look for pleasure!—where now for happiness? "Vanity of vanities, saith the preacher"—"Vanity of vanities," responds the lone one. Poor soul! it is indeed hard to take the parting hand of the dying—to hear the faint, last farewell!

And how long shall it be till he sees her again? Alas! he knows nothing of that—the future is a sealed book to him! Of the present he can exclaim, "all flesh is grass, and all the goodness thereof, is as the flower of the field"—that the grass withereth, that the flower fadeth; but the poor man knows naught of the word of God and its eternity: he has never read of flowers unfading—of gushing streams that flow from the throne of Omnipotence—of life eternal—of a resurrection—of incorruption—of glory—of honor—of the possession undefiled, and that fadeth not away. Had this been impressed upon his mind with the love of nature, he might have lived a double life—been happy with the blessings of this, and in the hope of that to come. Look to it, brother and sister—look to it, all of you, and see that you are not minus the word of life. We again repeat—LOOK TO IT.

RESIGNATION OF J. GAGE, 2d.

Br. GOSH—I perceive by the minutes of the proceedings of the Genesee Association, as published in No. 36, of the Advocate, just come to hand, that the council have accepted my letter of fellowship with them, which I had previously resigned to the proper committee for receiving it.

The reasons inducing me to withdraw myself from an associated body of our order, as expressed in my communication to the committee of discipline I deem proper to make known to the public. I present them in the form in which they were presented to the committee, to whom the resignation of my letter of fellowship was tendered.

"Br. J. S. FLAGLER—Dear Sir, I perceive by the 36th No. of the Magazine and Advocate, that during the session of our Association at Buffalo, on the 17th and 18th ult., a resolution was passed to the following effect:—

'Resolved, That all ministers holding letters of fellowship, in connexion with this Association, shall devote one-half of their time to the work of the ministry, while in the possession of health, or return their letters to this body; and in case such neglect shall continue during the term of one year, the council of this Association shall require from such delinquent his letter to be returned. And it shall be the duty of the committee of discipline, to make examination in relation thereto, and report such information to the council, at the next subsequent session, for their deliberation and decision.'

By this resolution, the council of the Genesee Association have arrogated to themselves the right and power of determining for me, and others, at what time I shall preach to the people, the Gospel of Christ—a right which I can by no means recognise as belonging to them; and, which I am unwilling, by any act of mine, or by my silence, the public should suspect I acknowledge them to possess. From the published minutes of the Association, it appears that you, with Brs. Skeele and Peck, were constituted a committee of discipline to take cognizance of all delinquencies under the resolution cited above. As I can not consent to the exercise of an inquisitorial power over my actions, dictating the time, place or matter I am to preach; therefore, in order to free myself from all obligations of this nature to any man or set of men, under any name or form whatever, which might be supposed to arise from the above assumption of power on the part of the council, I hereby resign my letter to the committee, on whom the duty of receiving it, pro tem, devolves, and voluntarily withdraw my fellowship from the Genesee Association, and from all other Associations which have, or which hereafter shall assume or claim the exercise of any such right or power.

In witness whereof, I hereunto subscribe my name, this 15th day of September, 1836.

JUSTUS GAGE.

Rev. J. S. FLAGLER, one of the committee of discipline, etc."

From what has been written above, the Universalist public will perceive, that the relation which I now bear to them, is that of a minister not in formal fellowship with any associated body of religious people; and they will have before them the reasons by which I have been induced to place myself in the position I now occupy.

As it is my intention to continue my ministerial labors as before, my reception by them, as a minister will be regulated according to their sense of the propriety of the course which I pursue. As to the resolution of the Genesee Association, (and some other Associations have passed similar ones,) I can not conceive it to be warranted by the usages of Scripture; nor dictated by sound policy, at least in the present state of the cause in which we are engaged. The reasons hitherto assigned in favor of it, are by no means satisfactory to my mind; consequently I claim the right of judging for myself how much of my time it is proper for me to devote to the work of the ministry, and disclaim all interference with my secular employments, or my professional engagements. JUSTUS GAGE.

Some people affect to believe, that if the fear of an endless hell were removed from the minds of men, they would infallibly plunge into all manner of sin and wickedness. These people do not believe that the blessed will ever commit sin—is it the fear of hell which prevents them from it there, as it is on earth!

A GRAND-FATHER'S LETTERS TO HIS GRAND-CHILDREN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

LETTER XI.

Your old school-fellow and bon compagnon, ———, now in the office of ———, Esq., came down to make us a visit lately. He had one of his hands tied up a little, having blistered it by wielding the axe instead of the quill. Knowing the avowed sentiments of his master, I took occasion to talk with him a little about his hand. I asked him if he did not know beforehand what was likely to happen to his hands, in consequence of chopping when not injured to it. Yes, certainly, he said, he might have anticipated a little chafing from having his own hands so before, and having seen those of others in the same situation. Well, then, I said, could you not have prevented this blistering which experience led you to expect? He said, he had put on a pair of thick gloves, in the hope that he could do all the chopping he had to do, without suffering from it. I asked him, if he had known beforehand that the gloves would be an insufficient defence, if he could have employed any other. Yes, he might have banded up each hand in a towel or handkerchief, as he had seen a young chopper once rigged out, after his hands had been severely blistered. But, he said, he would rather have suffered considerably, than submit to be so unseemly and incommodiously defended. I then asked him if he could think of no other way of prevention. He said he could not, except some modification of those he had mentioned; but he could think of none of these, which were not liable to the objection of being too unwieldy and inconvenient for ordinary application. I next asked him if he knew how those who are obliged to employ themselves daily in such labors, are defended against the pain and lameness which he was now suffering. I also asked him, if he would not have considered his master or his physician as possessed of great contrivance, if either of them could have devised a plan of prevention liable to none of the objections just alluded to. Yes, to the last question; and as to the natural defence, as he called it, he knew that the hands of laborers have the skin very much thickened and hardened. I explained to him that it was not the skin, properly so called, which became thickened, but only the outer layer, which has been called epidermis, cuticle, or scarf-skin. I told him that those who had investigated its structure and functions, have informed us that it every where covers the true skin; that it is very thin compared with the dermis, or true skin, and that it is quite insensible, having no perceptible blood-vessels or nerves. It is this which is raised when a blister is formed. The dermis, or true skin, is abundantly supplied with nerves or the power of feeling, so much so, that when the epidermis is removed, we can not bear, without pain, the least pressure or friction, as all know who have had a blister dressed. He then saw the use of this insensible membrane spread over the acutely sensitive dermis, to be a defence against the injurious pressure and friction of external agents. Without its blunting power, we could not bear to touch anything; we should be as one who had been scalded all over. In the palms of the hands and the soles of the feet, this covering is thickest, because there an increased thickness is necessary, owing to the greater pressure and friction to which these parts are liable. I then had him recount several of the injuries, and losses, and inconveniences, which man would have to sustain if his hands were so constituted that they never could bear more work than had been sufficient to blister his. How little labor could be accomplished—how many wants unsupplied—how many awkward inventions resorted to—how deficient our adaptation to the circumstances of our condition! Here, where the loss and the injury would be so great, and where our own resources are so inefficient and inadequate, what do we find done? A complete, a perfect protection provided!

Young ——— did not understand that it was necessary to our being able to feel, to have the sense of touch, that the true skin must remain unchanged. He knew the state in which we see the hands of the hardy laborer—with the skin, or more properly the scarf-skin, thickened, hardened, and become about as insensible and firm as nail or horn. But the structure or nature of this horny defence he never had explained to him. I told him, that just as we exposed our feet or hands to more or less pressure and working, the cuticle became thicker or thinner again. The true skin being irritated, throws out a little fluid, which in greater quantity would be a blister, and this becoming dry, forms a scale or additional coat over the exposed surface. I showed him this in one of his hands, where the skin was obviously raised a little, but not enough to be much painful, or to threaten a discharge of the fluid. This, I told him, would soon fall down, and leave the covering over the skin in that spot, just a little thicker, in the same way as if he had spread a little varnish on wood, and then let the liquid part of it evaporate or dry off.

I now asked him if he thought it possible that the skin should have been constructed so as to throw out this additional coating—coating upon coating—if the use, the necessity of such coating or covering had not been foreseen. Undeniable. I asked him if he thought the skin would have been found by us capable of this adaptation to the necessities of its condition, if it had not been so contrived and constituted on purpose. Hardly—certainly not. What, I asked, would the parent be called, who would exact service from his children, such as would keep them in continual suffering, while he himself knew of a prevention of that suffering? Cruel, in the extreme. I bade him again recount the miseries and wants to which we would have been subject, had our hands been incapable of this accommodation to circumstances, and tell me if anything else than good-will, sympathy, or benevolence could have prompted the contrivance of the protection against all these evils. No—there must have been benevolence in the contriver. I pushed the conversation no farther; but I doubt not that, notwithstanding the insinuations which he may have heard from his master, he thinks this no operation of chance, and I am hopeful, from the interest he took in the conversation, that this is not the only one of the works of nature, or nature's God, in the understanding of which he will feel concerned, and from the observation of which, he will be led to admire, venerate, and love the qualities which they display.

My young friend was well convinced of the superiority of the defence provided by nature in the above case, to any which had been attempted by art. Art can only interpose some clumsier and less efficient medium between the agent which produces ruffling, friction, or irritation, and the highly sensitive cutis, or true skin: a glove, or something similar. Here we have, I said, an instance of a want which our ingenuity and our means can but inadequately supply—of an evil, against the invasion of which, our intelligence and contrivance can not effectually interpose a protection, or devise a way of escape. Therefore, it is done for us. I inquired of ———, and now repeat the inquiry to you, is it probable that Nature (meaning hereby, always, nature's God) would have interfered in supplying our wants, or in warding off evil, if our own mind, ingenuity, or resources could have effectually or sufficiently supplied our necessities? Your school-mate inclined to think not. If any instance should occur to him in which our own ingenuity could have been quite sufficient to supply any of our wants, and yet Nature has interfered to supersede the exertion of our faculties, ingenuity, or industry, I requested him to let me know of it. I make the same request of you.

I hope, my beloved young ones, that ye are all becoming personally acquainted with the benefits which may be derived from a habitual spirit of devotion, and from maintaining, continually, a sense of God's presence with us. I trust that you are now able to add your testimony on these topics, to those which I presented to you in my first letter. I trust that you find that the practice of the above sentiments, does really bring with it the blessing by which it was recommended to Abraham—progress towards perfection. "Thou shalt arrive at perfection," (literally, perfections, the Hebrew word being in the plural, that is, very great perfection.) I may remark upon this word perfection, as commonly used, that absolute perfection is not to be understood as implied. Man's perfection, on earth at least, has never been, and can never be complete. Take the case of those who are called perfect in the Scriptures, and you will readily perceive that they are so described, not as being absolutely free from the domination of wrong-doing, or sin; but because a resolute desire after righteousness, or right-doing, formed the ruling principle of their souls. (Compare Gen. vi: 9 with ix: 21; Job i: 8 with xl: 4; Phil. iii: 12 with v: 15; 1 John iii: 6, 8, 10.) But there is a perfection to which you, and I, and all men can attain—even the resting satisfied with nothing short of it. This is the perfection attainable below. May we do as did Paul—forget the things that are behind, and reach, yea, press forward unto those excellencies to which we have not yet attained—may we die daily unto sin, and become alive unto holiness. Nothing will more powerfully contribute to this onward and upward progress, than the daily practice of those duties to which I have alluded above, and endeavored to recommend in the first of these epistles. Let this encourage you in the efforts which are requisite: we are predestinated to be conformed to the image of God's son, our elder Brother. May every day bring to your bosoms the delightful consciousness of increasing conformity to Jesus, increasing power to overcome the world—no higher felicity can be desired for you by

CHRISTIAN LIBERality.

HOW UNITARIANS TREAT UNIVERSALISTS IN SCOTLAND.—Neither of the above denominations of Christians, are at all numerous in Scotland. In the city of Glasgow, whose population is nearly equal to that of the city of New-York, there is but one congregation of each. In explanation of the great difference in numbers, between the liberal Christians of the Old and the New World, it should be recollected that in the British Isles, the orthodox systems of belief are patronised, and rendered nearly impregnable in their fortresses, by the respectability and wealth which a connexion with the State confers upon them. But to return. The pastor of the Universalist Society in Glasgow, deceased in 1828. His name was William Worrall, the successor of the well-known Neil Douglas, who we believe, was the first Universalist preacher in Scotland. Mr. Worrall was a native of Manchester, in England, and had been settled in Scotland about fourteen years before his death. He had an intense and persevering thirst for knowledge. Although brought up in the humbler walks of life, and with few early advantages, by industry and perseverance, he attained to eminence both as a teacher of youth, and a preacher of the Gospel. His life and conversation were blameless and exemplary, demonstrating the possession of a goodness of heart, and a truly Christian disposition. Although differing from those around him on many points of doctrine, he was always willing to grant to others that right of individual judgment, which he claimed for himself. He was a zealous advocate of liberty, civil as well as religious. He had been of Calvinistic sentiments; but by attendance on the preaching of the Rev. N. Douglas, he was led to embrace the doctrine of the unbounded love of God, and the restoration of all the human family to holiness and happiness. When he saw reason to change his sentiments, no consideration of worldly interest could deter him from the fearless profession. In Mr. Douglas' old age, Mr. W. was chosen his assistant; and afterwards became the regular pastor of the Universalist congregation.

The Rev. George Harris is pastor of the Unitarian congregation, in the same place. Upon the death of Mr. Worrall, he sent to the bereaved congregation a letter of condolence, expressing his belief, that as they admitted that the Almighty did all things well, and that all events work together for the final good of the whole human race, they would bow with entire submission to his holy will. He, at the same time, and inasmuch as he was united with the bereaved congregation in the belief of the great doctrine of the final restoration of the whole human race to purity and happiness, proffered to them his services on Sabbath evenings, till they were settled with another pastor. I add no comment.

A LETTER

TO THE UNIVERSALISTS OF DELAWARE COUNTY, N. Y., AND ALL OTHERS WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

A letter embracing nearly nine pages of cap paper, and bearing this title, has been sent to us, with a request from many friends in that county, for its immediate publication in our columns. It would give me pleasure to comply with this request in full, if circumstances permitted. But we have already waiting for publication, more long articles than we can find room for—as many promised as we can well publish, together with the current articles of the season, itself always a busy one, bringing with it much for immediate appearance in our paper. I am therefore under the necessity of vacating a portion of the editorial department, to give room to several extracts from the letter. The portion not included in the extracts, I will endeavor faithfully to condense, and thus do all I can, even with the extra labor it costs me, to oblige our friends, and especially the writer of the letter.

BRETHREN—I hereby apprise you of my intention to either leave the county, or to suspend my labors in the ministry for a season; and as this is perhaps the first intimation which many of you have received of it, you will naturally be led to inquire—What are your reasons for so doing? In order that no groundless reports or evil surmises may arise, I have thought proper to frankly state my reasons, and answer this inquiry in this public manner. And, in order that there may be no mistake or misapprehension, in relation to this subject, I propose to state—1st, what my reasons are not; 2dly, what they are, and 3dly, close with a few remarks addressed to the several classes into which I shall divide you.

The items under the first head, are declared to be—not a change in his views of the character of God, or the destiny of man. These he ever has held, and does now hold most firmly, as when he first became a believer in Universalism, in 1832. Neither does he quit that field because his zeal has in the least abated. He still views it as the most important subject and the dearest cause that can engage the powers and labors of man. Neither has he become tired of the labors of a Gospel ministry. With all the disadvantages he has had in it, he finds it peculiarly agreeable to him, and well suited to his feelings and dispositions, after an untiring pursuit of it for two years entirely devoted to it. He desires ardently to pursue it, if means can be provided so that he can travel from place to place, preaching the Gospel of God.—Neither does he take this step because he believes his services unacceptable in the places where he has travelled and labored; for, without boasting, he has the satisfaction of knowing they were well received.

By this time you may be ready to ask—If for none of these reasons you suspend your labors in the ministry, what, then, can be the reason? This leads me state what my reasons are. I remark, that I have one reason, and one only, to offer; and that I deem sufficient, and trust it will be deemed sufficient by all candid, rational men. What the opinions of others may be, I care not. My reason is this: I am no longer able to travel from place to place, preaching the Gospel, bearing my own ex- penses, and furnishing my own clothing, etc., without receiving any compensation for my services.

But you may ask—Have you received no compensation? I answer, very little—not enough to defray my expenses! But you may ask again—Are there not Universalists enough in Delaware county to support one preacher? I answer, there are; and they are abundantly able to support two or even three. Well, why have they not done it? are they not willing? I answer, I can not tell. The following statement may perhaps throw some light on the subject.

Two years ago, next November, I commenced preaching in this county. The cause of Universalism here was, at that time, comparatively new. The county had been visited only occasionally by preachers of our order: and then their labors were confined to a few towns. Br. Bullard had preached here more than any other one, and his labors, I have the happiness of saying, were productive of great good to the cause. Under all the circumstances, however, I commenced preaching here with the expectation of making a sacrifice. I was willing to sacrifice my time and labor. I did expect, however, from the numerous pledges and promises which were made, that the friends of the cause would furnish me with the necessary expenses. But this they have not done. Knowing the situation of things here, I have subjected myself to numerous losses, crosses and inconveniences, and to considerable expense. For the first six months after I came into the county, in order that I might not be burthensome to the friends, I boarded myself; and for the most of the whole time since I have been here, I have hired my own washing and mending. I have furnished the principal part of my own clothing, and paid for the making. The principal part of my travelling equipage, except my horse, has been furnished by a worthy friend of the cause in Harpersfield. And this same individual, in addition to this, has done half as much for the cause as all the rest of the friends put together. I have engaged other preachers to come into the county, and in some instances have paid them out of my own pocket. As I have before observed, since I commenced preaching here, I have devoted my whole time and attention to the work. My labors have been principally confined to this county. Very seldom have I disappointed a congregation by my non-appearance, and never without a reasonable excuse. On the contrary, I have braved cold and heat, encountered storms and tempests, in order to meet my engagements, and fulfil my appointments. I have preached in nearly thirty different neighborhoods in this county, and in only two instances have I taken up a contribution for my benefit. In one of these instances, it was done at the suggestion of a friend, who was present, without anything having been said to me on the subject; and in the other, I was requested to mention it by some of the brethren. In three towns in this county, a subscription paper has been circulated. The sum subscribed would amount, in all, to about one hundred dollars. About one-half of this has been collected—the other half remains due. I have received more by the voluntary, private gifts of individuals, than in any other way; but all that I have received, has not been sufficient to defray my expenses. In fine, my brethren, to sum it all up in few words, I have labored and preached among you for two years, at a sacrifice on my part, in time and money, of more than five hundred dollars! I have three reasons to offer why I can no longer do as I have done.

These are, 1st. Want of means. He has expended all, and is now necessarily obliged to resort to something or somewhere else for a living. 2d. The Universalists of Delaware county, are abundantly able to support preaching themselves; and even if he had a few hundreds more to expend, it would be unreasonable in him to spend it, when if each one gave but two or three dollars the same or a greater sum could be more easily and less oppressively raised. If they do not value hearing the Gospel at that small sum, it is throwing away his money to preach it to them at a hundred-fold greater cost. 3d. A few have done all, and he deems it unjust that they, who are less able, should supply the more able with the preached word; and he will not longer be the instrument of causing such unequal burdens.

If asked why he has not sooner made these facts known, he replies that he did, frequently, name them in private conversation—that a majority of the friends do know them. At least, his circumstances were known, and a moment's thought, and a grain of proper spirit, would have led the able friends to produce a different state of things. Again—he could not constantly harp on the subject—he will not beg—what comes, must come freely, and from those, only, who will not suffer by the giving of it. From others he expected nothing; and would receive nothing, even if offered by them. He confesses that “to beg he is ashamed,” and that if he is over nice in that particular, he owes it to the education received from a beloved father, who taught him to value freedom and an independent spirit above every thing else—to “never be, nor have a slave.”

You may now wish to inquire what I intend to do in future. This is a reasonable inquiry, and I have no objection to answer it. I have engaged to preach in Harpersfield and Davenport (in each one-quarter of the time) until next May. After that time, I shall either preach in some place where I can receive a reasonable compensation, or engage in some other business. It is not my intention, however, to suspend my labors in the ministry altogether. On the contrary, I shall preach occasionally when and where I think proper, and shall always hold myself in readiness to officiate on all special occasions, such as funerals, etc. Whether I shall ever again resume my labors in the ministry, so as to devote my whole time and attention to it, depends on circumstances. Of one thing I am certain, I shall never again unconditionally throw myself on the liberality or generosity, even of those who boast of possessing more of these qualities than any other class of men on earth. I have heard much said about the “cold charities of an unfeeling, unfriendly world,” and I have found, by dear bought experience, that there is more truth than fiction in this expression. I shall ever hold myself in readiness to abandon the occupation to which I intend to resort, (which is that of a mechanic,) and devote my whole powers and faculties to the promulgation of the Gospel, whenever and wherever a reasonable compensation can be secured to me before I commence. I am no advocate for high salaries; but I do think “the laborer is worthy of his hire,” and that he who engages in the ministry, and discharges its duties with faithfulness, ought to receive a decent support. At all events, however willing I am to do it, (and God knoweth my heart,) I am no longer able to war at my own charges, nor to labor in the vineyard without eating of the fruit thereof.

Under the third general division of his letter, he addresses—

1st. To those who have nobly stood forth, and done their utmost to sustain me in my exertions to spread the knowledge of the truth, in Delaware county—who have manifested their zeal in the cause by their works—who have presented the tangible evidences of their friendship; and who have stood by me through evil as well as good report—to you I would tender my heartfelt acknowledgements and thanks. I have shared your hospitality; I have received of your bounty, and I feel grateful for the favors which I have received at your hands. I feel bound to you by all the ties which can bind man to man. While life remains, your names will be treasured up in my memory, and you will always have my prayers for your temporal and spiritual prosperity. I might say more, but language can not express my feelings. You know me well, my brethren—you are acquainted with my disposition, and know all my peculiarities. You can better imagine what my feelings are, than I can describe or express them.

2d. To those who by their fine compliments and promises have aided in deceiving him, he says he must have something more substantial and sincere. They satisfy not the cravings of hunger, clothe his body, nor pay his debts. And if they wish their minister to be upright, and to fulfil his engagements, they must themselves practise towards him what they desire of him. He prays that God may implant in their hearts and minds the pure principles of love to God and man, so that they may be made manifest in their deeds as well as in their professions. He then closes as follows:—

To all, I repeat what I have said before: you are abundantly able to support constant preaching in this county. You are in duty bound to do it. A preacher is greatly needed here. The cause is as prosperous as could be expected. The friends in Harpersfield stand ready to build a meeting-house, and support preaching one-quarter of the time, whenever they can be assured that the friends in other parts of the county, will support preaching the other three-quarters. The exertions of a faithful preacher in this county, have only to be sustained by your united support, and the triumph of truth is sure—the victory over error complete. Will you not, then, stand forth like men, honorably discharge the duties which are devolving upon you, and “fight manfully the good fight of faith”? Whether preaching shall be sustained here or not, depends on you. Whenever you are willing to unite your exertions in this cause, and are willing to pledge a fair compensation to a preacher, I pledge myself to obtain one for you.

Brethren, I have done. To all—friends and enemies—to the good, to the bad, and to the indifferent—I send salutations of peace and good will. And now, wishing you health, happiness, and all the blessings which a bountiful Providence can bestow, and praying for your temporal and spiritual prosperity, I subscribe myself, your friend and well-wisher, EVERET E. GUILD.

UTICA, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1837.

OUR PRESENT VOLUME.

Man wills, but God only can enable him to perform. On looking back on what we promised to do—then at what we have done, and forward to what it may yet be performed, I perceive that much must remain unperformed this year. For instance—the commentary, which we hoped to have commenced in this present volume, can not be commenced. It is a work which will require not only much preparation, but a great expenditure at its very commencement. The latter is not now in our power to make; and, indeed, such has been the pecuniary difficulties we have met with in carrying on the present volume, that all our leisure has been frittered away in devising expedients to meet them, even to the neglect of much we otherwise might have done for the improvement of the paper itself, in other respects. As the non-appearance of any part of the Commentary is owing to causes existing not in our neglect, but in our subscribers', we trust they will set it down as a misfortune, rather than a fault, and pity, rather than punish us.

Again—owing to the late period at which we obtained prize tales and essays, and the great number of the latter that were then obtained, we will not be able to publish all of them in the present volume; but must necessarily delay the publication of some until the next year.

We have so much engaged that we must finish in the present volume, that this postponement is unavoidable. We regret it, but trust that, as the usual number will be furnished, and those, too, that obtained the highest premiums, no one will have just reason for complaint. We paid for what we will have published before the volume closes, as much as we offered as premiums; what we paid extra, will be furnished another year. We regret, also, that the pecuniary support yielded us during the present year was such, that we could not offer premiums for other articles for the next volume. Should an improvement in this matter, on the part of our subscribers, enable us to offer premiums in the course of the next volume, they may rely upon our doing it with great pleasure.

Again—and lastly—though the series of articles by Br. Austin, (which all unite in commending in the highest terms,) will, probably, all be published in the present volume; yet the very able and popular series of articles by Br. S. R. Smith, can not be concluded this year. The late hour at which their publication was commenced, and the extension of them to a greater number than was originally contemplated, prevents it. More, however, will be published on that subject, than we expected would be, when we promised the articles; so that my conscience acquits me of having failed in giving full measure. Regret is less necessary, also, inasmuch as the several articles of the series are not necessarily dependent, the one upon the other, and as we believe (or, at least, we hope) that nearly all our present subscribers will stick by us during at least another volume, and see the series fairly concluded. These two series will be published in book form before next Spring, and thus be put in a better form for general circulation and usefulness. As, in measure, we have given all that could reasonably be expected; so, in quality, I believe our readers are well satisfied, they have received more than we promised them.

These are, with a few minor, occasional and also unavoidable exceptions, all the cases in which we have fallen short of our engagements—and for which we throw ourselves on the especial lenity of the public; trusting, that as some of them were the cause of our failure, they will be slow to judge us severely. Of our plans for the next volume, and the many good things engaged for its columns, we will speak at a future but not distant period. We are sorely pressed, but our energies are not relaxed, nor is our desire to please and be useful, in the least diminished.

A CALL.

Not “a call to preach,” but a call to write; and consequently, not a call to the preacher only, but to the author. But not to deal in enigmas and to mystify our readers, I would say plainly, that some weeks ago—let me see—it was early in September—I received a brief note from a highly esteemed female correspondent, containing among other things, the following remarks.—They are so very appropriate—and call in tones so familiar, such as I would hardly dare to attempt, were I able—that I very gladly avail myself of them to utter, by another’s pen, my own longings and impatience.

“I have been somewhat anxiously awaiting, since the publication of the first prize tale, the appearance of further communications from the pen of Miss Louisa M. Barker. Why is our sister silent? Her fine talents should not be hid, when they can effect so much good. I observed her name mentioned in a late number of the ‘Union,’ as an Assistant Teacher in the Clinton Liberal Institute. She is doubtless dispensing much good in that sphere, but the light does not shine upon me.” [Let our sister who thus writes, but pay us a visit about the time of the next annual exhibition of the Institute, and I think I can contrive that she shall find the light beaming upon her—though I hope that some will beam from our pages before that time.]

“Of other sisters I might well inquire, Where are they? Mrs. Scott with her sweet melodies—and Mrs. Downer with her entertaining narratives—I advise them to take their harps from the willows where they have hung them, and rejoice many hearts with the strains they can so readily waken with a touch.”

So far calls our correspondent. Mrs. Scott but so occasionally appears in any of our periodicals, that the intervals seem like seconds of eternity, instead of only a few months of time—and—heigho!—it is an age of the same interminality since I have been able to put my eyes on a letter or communication from her. I have sometimes looked over some old manuscripts of hers, to see if I could not dream of receiving another article from her pen; but it would not do—the reality is too frigid—too dense, to be warmed by the airy imagination into a wreathing vision of joyous brightness! Mrs. Downer has so devoted her favors to the brethren at the East, that I fear to seem to trespass by soliciting one for our columns; and so enjoy them in the excellent publications of Mrs. Price and Tompkins. Of each and all, I trust the long repose of their pens, is but spent in the preparation of good things yet to come. May they come soon. The voice of the charmer has called, “Where are they?” and it can not but be, that they will echo back the answer, “Behold us in our works!”

A. B. G.

“FATHER, FORGIVE THEM.”

The prayer of our Saviour upon the cross, appears to me one of the most sublime exemplifications of the spirit of the Gospel, upon record. I say sublime, for there is a moral sublimity in it, that breathes a loftiness not of earth—a holiness and purity, that are contaminated by comparison with the best sayings of all its noble and its wise. To me, it is one of those internal evidences for the divine source of Christianity, which are irresistible and which stand proof against the cavils, sophistries and sneers of the infidel—and it is, also, one of those great teachings of our Lord, which we should learn by heart, and strive with all our strength to practise.

Splendid examples in history, there may be, of those, who, like the ancient philosopher, have exhibited a calm resignation to death, wrapping themselves in their mantles and sitting down to die—or who, like the gallant Roman, have thrown themselves into the yawning chasm, that the city might be spared—yet, how superficial, how hollow are these acts in comparison with the death of our Saviour. They are illustrations of stoical indifference, of patriotic generosity and valor, and be they true or false, we admire, perhaps, momentarily, the spirit which they exhibit—yet, it is but momentarily, for they are the cold statues, the sculptured mementos of that which has ever distinguished the philosophers and heroes of the world.—But here, here at the cross, it delights us to linger, for we see displayed, the living love, the kindling spirit that glows through all time, and blends with things which hallow eternity.

What devotion, what humility, what yearnings of the heart do we behold at this death scene of our Saviour! Did he ask his crucifiers for mercy? No—and even for this, perhaps, the Greek and the Roman might have recorded him as a hero—did he shrink from death? oh, no!—and for this, perhaps, they would have handed down his name to future ages, as a philosopher, who died as the leader of a sect should die. He died not as these—but as one “who spake as never man spake”—who taught and practiced the doctrine, “Love your enemies”—as one whose wisdom and fortitude were not of earth.

Unbeliever in the Gospel! this is the spirit of Christianity—a practical illustration of rendering “good for evil.” Have you aught to say against it? Search the chronicles of the past—call up all the events of ancient or modern times—cull from the pages of this world’s lore, the words and acts of those who have died on the battle field—perished in the dungeon—suffered at the rack—and bowed to the stake of the martyr—and can you bring forward a sublimer instance than this?—ay, can you produce one that does not infinitely sink in comparison with it? Cease sneering at the forms of Christianity, and urge one forcible objection to its spirit! cease pointing at the ceremonies of the Jewish, the corruptions of the Pagan convert—cease battling with the devices of the dark ages and the errors of Christians—and come to Calvary—come to the foot of the cross, and behold the Master! See him as his mission is almost accomplished! He has rested in the manger—taught on the sea-shore and in the wilderness—prayed in the mountains—wandered from place to place, having “not where to lay his head”—has agonized in the garden, sweating as it were great drops of blood—has been betrayed, denied, mocked, buffeted, scourged, spit upon—he is now numbered “with the transgressors”—thorns are ranking on his brow --nails are piercing his hands--his murderers are scowling around him--the flash of scorn is in the eye--the sneer just ready to burst from the lip--and what does he?—Does he lift to heaven a prayer of revenge?—does he invoke destruction on his persecutors? Oh, no! all the way up that hill, to his death, he has bade those who are soon to be swept by the sword and the flame, to weep, not for him, but for themselves and their children—he bows meekly to the stroke—he is ready “to die, that we might live”—his heart yearns with love—for hark! amid all the terror that surrounds him—amid all his deep agony—he breathes the gentle prayer, “Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do!”

Unbeliever, can you call that one an imposter, who speaks and acts like this? who, foregoing all the advantages of imposture, all selfish appropriation of the influence of a leader, submits to such a death? Extraordinary, imposture! Singular devotion for the purposes of deception! If you can not think him an imposter, call no more his Gospel the invention of man, the chimera of fancy, but bow to its doctrines and requirements—acknowledge the divine authority of that record which tells us how he died—how he entered the realms of shade—awoke from the tomb's dark sleep—burst its mighty bars, and rose triumphant over death forever. Think, think, I beseech you of these things.

Believers in the glorious truths of Christianity, what learn ye from this example? Love, humility, obedience, fortitude, forgiveness. Return not evil for evil, nor cursing for cursing. Follow in all things the Master. When the world presses its cares upon you, still give the cup of cold water to him that is athirst, and meat to the hungry—or if nothing else is left you, your prayers and your blessings. When the ungrateful and unthankful lift up the heel against you—bear with it all—when persecution gathers around you, persecute not again—and should you be led even to the death, go, with a triumph-smile, for he has conquered death—and when the axe glitters, or the faggot flames before you—when the taunt and the mock-word are in your ears—even then, call for no avenging stroke to smite your enemies, but with the act of committing your martyr-spirit to its God, blend the prayer which Christ breathed forth, “Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do.” E. EDITORIAL POETRY.

People have strange notions concerning Editors, it is certain. Let but a fellow prove himself good in using paste and scissors, and ready in dashing off a prose article with a few threads of something bright like gossamer, woven into the web by way of variety: and it is taken for granted that he is a good judge of all subjects on which he has selected articles for publication; is intimately acquainted with the subjects which he treats so gravely and earnestly in his editorials, and that, as he can use a poetic phrase occasionally, he must necessarily be a poet! In my case there is an additional item against (or, as some might say, for) me, in the fact, that some twelve or fourteen years ago, I occasionally dealt in rhyming ware—especially in partnership with a ministering brother, who, because he has become a very good poet, can not be persuaded that I also have not improved in like manner. Good, credulous friend! He forgets that the poet is born, not made; and that he was a born poet and I but a made one. Well; he, or somebody else, has spread abroad my supposed reputation, and I have enjoyed the credit about as long as an honest man dare do it, without undeceiving the public. It was only the other day, I received a letter from a dear friend, (whom, by the bye, I have seen only in the spirit,) all the way from Massachusetts, pitying the public much that I am “so parsimonious” of the “delicious inspirations” of the spirit of poesy! Eh! but this expression of pity would have puffed me up, had I not been conscious that the pity would be better bestowed should I exclude the poetry of others to make room for some of my own. No, reader, it is enough to bore you with some of my hurried editorial articles, without my also occupying the poet's corner! But as the cry for “copy” is unceasing, and as I wish to undeceive those who may have been led to suppose me more than a rhymist, I may once a year, or so, give you an article in rhyme from my own pen in my own department. For instance, the following was intended to be a simple hymn for an Appendix to Br. Price's very excellent Sunday School Hymn Book, should he ever choose to publish one. But I could not make it simple and smooth enough. So I sent it to the Budget of our Berean Institute, where it was read by a good reader, himself a “born poet”—even our associate “E. H. C.” It is the last article from a mint that has not coined more than four or five pieces within the last nine years; so that, like some old coppers, or brass medals, its rarity may make it pass for far more than its intrinsic worth.

Air.—“The Braes of Balquither.”

We are journeying home
To the arms of our Saviour,
And our Father calls “Come,”
To enjoy him forever.

There the cool waters flow
In salvation's broad river,
And the green pastures grow
And the flowers ne'er wither.

There the sinful and vile
Of each kindred and nation,
Cease their souls to defile
And rejoice in salvation;
And the good and the wise,
With the angels in heaven,
In the joys sympathise
Of all sinners forgiven.

In that bright spirit-land,
All whom death here has parted
Meet again, hand in hand,
Error-free, single-hearted—
Sorrow there is unknown.

For there, peace, as an ocean,
Overflows every soul
With the bliss of devotion.

Then, away with despair,
And all sadness and sorrow,
And on God cast your care,
Who'll provide for the morrow—
For the lilies that stand
Clothed in garments of splendor,
Are arrayed by His hand,
Though no service they render.

Praise the Lord, oh my soul!
And drink deep of the river,
Where the streams ever roll
That from evil deliver;
And with joy, tell and sing
The Redeemer's great glory,
Till the universe ring
With salvation's glad story!

THE RAINBOW.

There are few men who can write a good thing in better style than J. R. Chandler, Esq., of the United States Gazette. Even in trifling articles, apparently dashed off merely to fill a corner, we often find the hand of the master and the heart of the Christian philosopher apparent. The following, which, of course, was penned and first published in season, is an instance.

The sun went down last evening in a rain storm—but through a slight rift in the clouds on the verge of the western horizon, the rich beams of the retiring luminary were poured out upon the earth and clouds in all their fulness. A splendid rainbow spanned the heavens, full in its form and perfect in its colors. It was a lovely sight—and as we gazed upon the “sign,” we felt something of that awe which the ancient patriarch must have known when the finger of the Almighty pointed to that “bow in the clouds,” as a token of anger passed away, and of judgments forever postponed.

How exquisite the thought, that He whom we may call “our Father,” makes the tokens of his interference with man, the emblems of his greatness—the signs of his mercy are the gorgeous decorations of his majesty, for “there was a rainbow round about the throne.”

How correct and how beautiful the sentiment, as well as appropos the quotation! For when Moses desired to see the glory of Jehovah, the Lord granted his request by causing all his goodness to pass before him. A. B. G.

THE UNIVERSALIST UNION.

I think our readers, especially of that portion who have occasionally enjoyed the good things abundantly furnished in the Union, will rejoice with us in learning that Br. Price has given up, at least for the present, the idea of selling that paper to another. It will continue as heretofore, under his excellent management.

F A M E.

We should remember, in reading the lives and exploits of great men, that all fame, not founded on good principles of action, is more or less bedimmed or degraded in the eyes of posterity—for “principles are eternal,” and are themselves the records, as it were, which carry down to all ages a living and enduring memorial of those individuals who have defended and maintained them.—Though, as is expressed in the following fine verse, many good names are lost and forgotten.

“Tis not the good, the wise, the brave,
That surest shine, or highest rise;
The feather sports upon the wave—
The pearl in ocean's cavern lies”

E. H. C.

We have prepared a notice of the October number of the “Ladies Repository,” but our crowded columns oblige us to defer its publication until next week.

Br. Grosh thinks the rarity of his poem which appears under the Editorial head, or from the Editorial head, this week, will cause it to pass. We know not how rare it may seem to others, but to us, it appears well done.

HAMILTONIAN SYSTEM.

THE FRENCH AND OTHER LANGUAGES TAUGHT IN FIFTY LESSONS!!

The classes under this system have at length become so multiplied, as to induce the undersigned to procure enlarged and more suitable accommodations for his pupils. He has now located his establishment in the first story of the building north-east corner of Devereux and Genesee-streets. Here the classes will meet, and all applications for instructions be made. In addition to the French, the Italian, German, Greek and Latin languages will be taught by the same system.

Those who have not thoroughly completed their studies in either of those languages, can be privately instructed or be introduced into classes corresponding with their previous attainments, without being obliged to commence or to sustain the expense of an entire course.

POETRY.

There is a melancholy levity, if I may so term it, woven into the sentiment of many of our graver songs in the old ballad style, which thrills through the heart by its very incongruity with the remainder of the strain; and yet, like a discord in music, renders the whole piece doubly affecting and tender by the contrast. Of this character is "the mistletoe bough," and several others that might be named. But the following, less generally known and equally a case in point, I here publish entire as a good illustration of my remarks.

A. B. G.

From Bentley's Miscellany.

SONG OF THE OLD BELL.

"In an old village, amid older hills,
"That close around their verdant walls to guard
"Its tottering age from wintry winds, I dwell,
"Lonely and still, save when the clamorous rooks,
"Or my own feeble changes wound the ear
"Of Silence in my tower!"

ANON.

For full five hundred years I've swung
In my old grey turret high,
And many a different theme I've sung
As the time went stealing by!
I've pealed the chaunt of a wedding morn;
Ere night I have sadly toll'd
To say that the bride was coming, love-lorn,
To sleep in the church yard mould!
Ding-dong,
My careless song;
Merry or sad
But neither long!

For full five hundred years I've swung
In my ancient turret high,
And many a different theme I've sung
As the time went stealing by!
I've swelled the joy of a country's pride
For a victory far off won,
Then changed to grief for the brave that died
Ere my mirth had well begun!
Ding-dong,
My careless song;
Merry or sad,
But neither long!

For full five hundred years I've swung
In my breezy turret high,
And many a different theme I've sung
As the time went stealing by!
I have chimed the dirge of a nation's grief
On the death of a dear loved King,
Then merrily rung for the next young chief;
As told, I can weep or sing!
Ding-dong,
My careless song,
Merry or sad,
But neither long!

For full five hundred years I've swung
In my crumbling turret high!
'Tis time my own death song was sung,
And with truth, before I die!
I never could love the themes they gave
My tyrannized tongue to tell;
One moment for cradle, the next for grave—
They've worn out the old church bell!
Ding-dong,
My changeful song;
Farewell now,
And farewell long!

MOUNTAINS.

"Thanks be to God for mountains!" is often the exclamation of my heart, as I trace the history of the world. From age to age, they have been the last friends of man. In a thousand extremities they have saved him. What great hearts have throbbed in their defiles from the days of Leonidas to those of Andreas Hofer! What lofty souls, what tender hearts, what poor and persecuted creatures have they sheltered in their stony bosoms from the weapons and tortures of their fellow-men,

"Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints, whose bones Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold!"

was the burning exclamation of Milton's agonized and indignant spirit, as he beheld those sacred bulwarks of freedom for once violated by the disturbing demons of the earth; and the sound of his fiery and lamenting appeal to Heaven will be echoed in every generous soul to the end of time.

Thanks be to God for mountains! The variety which they impart to the glorious bosom of our planet were no small advantage; the beauty which they spread out to our vision in their woods and waters, their crags and slopes, their clouds and atmospheric lines were a splendid gift; the sublimity which they pour into our deepest souls from their majestic aspects; the poetry which breathes from their streams, and dells, and airy heights, from the sweet abodes, the garbs and manners of their inhabitants, the songs and legends which have awoke in them, were a proud heritage to imaginative minds; but what are all these when the thought comes, that without mountains the spirit of man must have bowed to the brutal and the base, and probably have sunk to the monotonous level of the unvaried plain.

When I turn my eyes upon the map of the world, and behold how wonderfully the countries where our faith was nurtured, where our liberties were generated, where our philosophy and literature, the fountains of our intellectual grace and beauty, sprang up, were as distinctly walled out by God's hand with mountain ramparts from the eruptions and interruptions of barbarism, as if at the especial prayer of the early fathers of man's destinies, I am lost in an exulting admiration. Look at the bold barriers of Palestine! see how the infant liberties of Greece were sheltered from the vast tribes of the uncivilized north by the heights of Hæmus and Rhodope! behold how the Alps describe their magnificent crescent inclining their opposite extremities to the Adriatic and Tyrrhene seas, locking up Italy from the Gallic and Pænic horde till the power and spirit of Rome had reached their maturity, and she had opened the wide forest of Europe to the light, spread far her laws and language, and planted the seeds of many mighty nations!

Thanks to God for mountains! Their colossal firmness seems almost to break the current of time itself; the Geologist in them searches for traces of the earlier world, and it is there too that man, resisting the revolutions of lower regions, retains through innumerable years, his habits and his rights. While a multitude of changes has remoulded the people of Europe, while languages and laws, and dynasties, and creeds, have passed over it like shadows over the landscape, the children of the Celt and the Goth, who fled to the mountains a thousand years ago, are found there now, and show us in face and figure, in language and garb, what their fathers were; show us a fine contrast with the modern tribes dwelling below and around them; and show us moreover, how adverse is the spirit of the mountain to mutability, and that there the fiery heart of Freedom is found for ever.

HOWITT.

BEAUTIFUL EXTRACT.

Oh! there is harmony in nature inconceivably attuned to one glad purpose! every thing in the universe has a voice, with which it joins in the tribute of thanksgiving. The whispers of the wind playing with the summer foliage, and its fitful wooings through the autumnal branches; the broken murmur of the stream, the louder gushings of the waterfall, and the wild roar of the cataract, all speak the praises of God to our hearts. Who can sit by the sea-side when every wave lies hushed in adoration, or falls upon the shore in subdued and awful cadence, without drinking in unutterable thoughts of the majesty of God? The loud hosannas of Ocean in the storm, and the praises of God on the whirlwind, awaken us to the same lesson; and every peal of thunder is an hallelujah to the Lord of Hosts!

Oh! there is a harmony in nature! The voice of every creature tells us of the goodness of God. It comes to us in the song of the birds, the deep, delicious tones in which the wood-dove breathes out its happiness; the gracefully melting descent of the nightingale; the joyous thrilling melody of the lark; the thrush's wild warbling, and the black bird's tender whistle; the soft piping of the bulfinch, and the gay carol of the wren; the sprightly call of the gold finch, and the gentle twittering of the swallow; even now, when every other bird is silent, little robin is pouring out his sweetest of all sweet notes upon yonder rose-bush; and so distinctly does he thank God, who made the leaves to grow for him upon the hawthorn, and mountain-ash, and who has put it into the heart of man to love him, and strew crumbs for him when the berries fall, that my soul, too often insensible to its own mercies, is warmed into gratitude for him.—The very insect tribe have entered into a covenant, that God shall, at no season of the year, be without a witness amongst them to his praise;—for when the hum of the bees and the chirping of the grasshopper have ceased to enliven us, and the gnat has laid by his horn, then the little cricket wakens into life and song, and gladdens our hearth with the same story till the winter is past; and so all nature praises God and is never weary.

SCRAPS FROM THE GERMAN OF JEAN PAUL.

STREAMS.—A stream driving a mill is an emblem of man's life; he flows on in his own channel towards the ocean of immensity, yet helps to keep in motion the machinery of the world.

WOMEN.—Women are like the sea, which is always changing, yet remains at the same temperature; while men, like the earth, though externally unmoved, fluctuate between heat and cold.

FUTURITY.—To the ardent spirit, the future is an iceberg, which at a distance is brilliant with shifting colors and rosy light, but when it approaches, brings frost and destruction.

TENDERNESS.—Affection, like spring flowers, breaks through the most frozen soil at last; and the heart which asks nothing but another heart, to make it happy, will never seek in vain.

SMALL VICES.—It is harder to conquer small and habitual defects than great and unfrequent vices, as it is harder to destroy a swarm of insects than one wild beast.

HUMAN LIFE.—Our life is like alpine countries, where winter is found by the side of summer, and where it is but a step from a flower garden to a glacier!

REPOSE.—The effect of repose on the mind is the same as is produced on turbid water by letting it stand, it shows and deposits its sediment.

MARRIAGE.—The bridegroom and bride give each other their hands at the altar, as prize-fighters in England shake hands before they begin to fight.

ANGER.—The flame of anger is like a conflagration, which burns fiercely if we give it vent, but goes out soon if repressed and confined.—Mirror.

A NOBLE SENTIMENT.—Says Dr. Channing "I look with scorn upon the selfish greatness of this world, and with pity on the most gifted and prosperous in the struggle for office and power; but I look with reverence on the obscurest man who suffers for the right—who is true to a good but persecuted cause."

THE CAUSES OF INFIDELITY REMOVED.....NO. X.

BY S. R. SMITH.

EXTRAVAGANCES OF CHRISTIANS.

Without descending to a prolix minuteness in reviewing the causes of infidelity laid in the doctrines and opinions of Christian professors, we may yet notice one more particular relating to religious practices. We say practices—for there are such, which are not considered as properly under the denomination of morals, and which are yet esteemed religious. And they are termed religious, not that they are thought to be indispensable to religion, but because certain religionists adopt and practice them. They are of such a nature as to admit of almost every form and modification that may suit the taste of any age, or the fancy of any particular person. By them, certain communities stand apart in the great family of Christians—so that, with many other things in common, by these they are distinguished and known.

These practices have, at different times, and in particular individuals, assumed nearly every conceivable form of extravagance. And these extravagances have been the prolific sources of disgust and irreligion. The reason is perfectly plain. For many of those who think and reason, when they see the professors of any given system, and, as they suppose, under its sanctions, acting unreasonably, will take it for granted, that the whole system and its profession are alike absurd. And we fear that the present age must answer for its full share of blame in this particular; since, with all its wisdom, science, and refinement, it has cherished and encouraged some of the most daring outrages upon the decorum and consistency of the Gospel, as well as upon the dictates of sober and enlightened reason. It has done this in the name of Christianity—and modern unbelievers have, as far as their means extended, made Christianity responsible for the extravagances of some of its devoted friends.

The mistake which lies at the foundation of both these evils—the extravagances of Christian professors, and consequent infidelity—probably, in a great majority of instances, originates in a very sincere desire to advance the interests of Christianity. But there is an error in the selection of proper means. Some are betrayed into an excess of zeal by the native warmth of their constitutions, and literally run mad in search of ways, and means, and occasions, in which to display their ruling passion. There are others who for some real or supposed wickedness, have been overwhelmed with penitence, and who on being converted to Christianity, have felt impelled to do some very extraordinary things by way of atonement. And there are others still, for whom no such apologies can be made—who observing the general tendency of human nature to excitement, adopt a course of religious extravagance as a matter of expediency. This class justify themselves on the ground, that their religious practices involve no particular moral principles, and that they are perhaps favorable to the interests of religion.

But, without calling in question the moral integrity of any man, we may be permitted to observe, that it is believed they are mistaken in their opinions; and that a little reflection will convince them of their error. Does it involve no principle of morality, that mankind absolve themselves from the usual relations of society? It is notorious that this has been done by an immense number of hermits, monks, and nuns. Is not morality concerned, when men adopt a course of conduct at variance with all the ordinary notions of decency and sobriety? This has been done for many ages, and is now done by several sects in this country, in religious meetings held at unseasonable hours—conducted in an improper manner, and continued to an unreasonable length of time. Is not morality deeply interested, when thousands neglect some of the plainest duties of common life, under pretence of serving the Lord? And this is daily done, to the manifest injury of health, and the great detriment of the property as well as comfort and care of families. Can it be for the interest of the Christian religion, to illustrate its profession by extravagances of which the sober believer is ashamed?—which a great majority of the youth regard as the subject of ridicule and merriment?—which turn skeptics into downright infidels?—and which terminate in a morbid reaction of feeling, if not of principles, in the devotee himself, whose "last state is worse than the first"? There are too many facts in proof of all these things, to leave any doubt or suspicion of their correctness; and whatever fanatics may think of the matter, and however pertinacious they may be in pushing their enthusiastic experiments, they have only to open their eyes, in order to discover that they are forcing a great number of persons into infidelity—and, unfortunately, some of those, whom it must be desirable to retain as the friends of Christianity.

It is no part of our plan, to tax the reader with a long detail of the extravagances which distorted the features of Christianity before the era of the reformation. When first established, it was wholly free from any and every thing of a fanatical or disorderly character; and its professors were alike distinguished for the sober consistency of their zeal, the propriety of their conduct, the decency of their devotions, and the moral purity of their lives. During the apostolic age, only some trifling advances were made in religious extravagance. The Judaizing Christians were over zealous for the observance of the Mosaic ritual—and the converted Heathen philosophers, showed considerable anxiety for the preservation of the principles and practices of their respective schools. As yet, however, the outrages which distinguished the Christianity of a later age, did not enter into their anticipations. But when men were canonized for living in solitude and in filth—when they received the honors of an apotheosis, because they could subsist some forty or fifty years, upon a stone pillar, exposed to all the changes and rigors of the seasons—then religious extravagance had attained its maximum, and superseded the more sober duties of common life.

The hermit eventually became a monk, the recluse exchanged his cave for the cloister, and his solitude for a community; and vows of poverty, ascetic mortifications, and idle and frivolous ceremonies, became the standard of Christian perfection. At this time, the empire of monkery was complete; and nearly the whole of visible Christianity, consisted in the rites which the church had imposed. The encroachments upon the simplicity and purity of the Gospel, were so slow and so uniform, as in most cases to pass without much observation or censure. Each succeeding age added something, either in principle or practice; and the forms of religious extravagance assumed a corresponding modification. At one period, the fanatic was the inoffensive victim of a melancholy temperament and mistaken zeal; and who, from disgust at the ordinary forms of society, sought refuge in the cloister; but this same spirit, afterwards, led him forth in arms, to court death on the plains of Palestine, in the character of the proud, reckless, and chivalrous knight. It is difficult to imagine a metamorphosis more complete, than that which transformed the quiet, ease-taking monk, into the ever-active and daring crusader. The same spirit actuated both—it merely took a different direction. And, unfortunately, in both instances, the temper and morality of the Gospel were almost wholly overlooked or disregarded.

It seems that a total inversion of the laws of vision, takes place with many Christians, as they look at certain things, considered far off or near. Thus, all protestant Christians agree, that the religious extravagances to which we have referred, were both improper and immoral; but they do not perceive, that in whatever age they may appear, and under whatever form and modification, they are still improper and immoral. So that things in the distance, seem to be seen more clearly, than even the same, or at least very similar things, near at hand. In the retrospect of past ages, it is perceived that fanaticism led to crimes—while the same fanatical spirit is now too often regarded as the nurse of much religion, if not of virtue. There is, no doubt, a difference in the degree of criminality which attaches to ancient and modern fanatics—but probably no greater difference than can be accounted for by the general condition and intelligence of the respective ages. What was wrong then, in the temper and practice of enthusiasts, is yet wrong, however modified in its developments; and if the apology may now be made, that the moderns are sincere and conscientious, it may also be urged in extenuation of the fooleries and outrages of a less enlightened period.

But we are principally, because more immediately, concerned with the religious extravagances of Protestants, and with those of the present age, rather than any other. To attempt a formal history, or even an enumeration of these, in this place, is impossible; yet it is due both to believers and unbelievers, to take some notice of the prevailing fanaticism. Differing as it does, in some respects, from any and every thing of the kind which appertains to a former age, it may, however, be regularly traced through successive sects, to the visions, trances, prophecies, ecstasies, and prostrations of the French prophets, as their extravagances may, in turn, lay their elements in the blind and furious zeal of the Anabaptists of Germany.

It is by no means intended to represent, that the present actors in these scenes of moral misrule and confusion, are aware of the affinity of their proceedings, with those of the enthusiasts here named. Much less can it be presumed, that they have any idea of doing disservice to the Christian religion. They can not even intend to copy a course of conduct, which those who know any thing of the subject, will at once admit was extremely absurd, immoral, and dangerous to the interests of the Gospel of truth. Still, whoever will compare the proceedings of certain individuals and communities, in producing and conducting what are denominated revivals, or awakenings, as well as the conduct of some sects in their usual assemblies for public and social worship, will at once perceive the workings of the same spirit that has marked every period of the church since professors turned enthusiasts.

Let the following things be duly and candidly considered—and then let certain professors of the Christian doctrine ask themselves, if it can be surprising that so many doubt, or reject the truth of divine revelation!

1. Ministers of religion profess to be specially directed by the Holy Spirit, and converts to have been instantly and miraculously illuminated by its influence—when it is a conceded point, by all sober Christians, that both the gifts of the spirit, and all other miraculous interventions of the divine energy, have been suspended entirely, since the age of the apostles. Besides, these very ministers are neither, in general, distinguished for their talents, their attainments, or their success—nor are their converts remarkable for their religious knowledge or moral purity. Some of this class of preachers, have fallen into gross sins, some have abandoned the sects for whom they labored, and others have relapsed into that state of apathy, consequent upon undue excitement and unnatural exertion. Many of their converts have seen and lamented their delusion, others have lost the fervor of their zeal, and others still, have returned to the beggarly elements—their last state being worse than the first.

When these pretensions and their concomitants are duly considered, we must cease to wonder, that while some men run mad, others turn infidels. These are the natural and obvious extremes which act upon and influence each other, and which will only disappear, when Christian worshippers return to the simplicity of Gospel truth, to the manly temper and pure morality of the primitive disciples.

2. Religious meetings of various descriptions, have been multiplied to an unreasonable extent, so as greatly to interfere with the necessary avocations and domestic duties of families and neighborhoods. Under some pretext, nearly every day, or evening, calls certain sects to the house of worship. And there are regular arrangements for doing this, for at least half the year. It is not the accidental interruption of a different order of things—but a systematic plan of operation for the avowed purpose of keeping up a state of intense and unnatural excitement. And in effecting this, there is not only a waste of time, but a frequent neglect of the most ordinary duties of common life—loss of health—and, occasionally, loss of reason.

3. Religious meetings are often held at unseasonable hours, conducted in an improper, irreverent, and indecent manner, and continued for an unreasonable length of time. Thus, they commence very early in the morning, are continued very late, sometimes through the whole night, for weeks in succession; and men, women, and children, mix up the service with sighs, and groans, and frantic gestures, and vociferous prayers and praise. Nor are these things the result of accident, in which some particular circumstance might both induce and apologize for the violation of ordinary rules. They are the result of previous calculation. And those who will rise at four o'clock on a winter morning, leave the care of their families, and walk half a mile to attend a prayer-meeting, are considered more zealous, if not more religious, than those who prefer the less ostentatious duty of looking to the comfort of their children and households. Those who are most obsequious to the arrogant dictation of some master of the ceremonies, who bear with most patience his abuse, hear with most complacency his blasphemous assertions, and witness with most apparent satisfaction, the violation of all the common rules of religious order and decorum, are esteemed persons of remarkable piety. While those who can bear up under all this for some thirty, fifty, or sixty days, almost without food, or rest, or mental derangement, are regarded as furnishing unequivocal proof of their Christian calling and experience, as well as confirmation of their superior sensibility and devotion.

We might enlarge this catalogue of enormities to a great length—but the particulars named, embrace the prominent extravagances of the age, and are enough to satisfy any one, that though it is neither a time for peopling the cloister, nor yet of feats of chivalry, the spirit of fanaticism is by no means extinct. In the mean time, we admonish those Christian believers, to examine their Bibles more carefully, for the authority which can justify these things. What apostle, after the gift of the spirit at pentecost, ever fell into deadly sins, turned from the integrity of his profession, or relaxed in his endeavors to establish and spread the influence of the Gospel? When did their followers commit sin without rebuke, or indulge in fanatical excesses unrepented? When, but for the rage of persecution, were their assemblies held at improper or uncommon seasons? or when conducted in a disorderly manner by permission? And, at what time did they so overlook or disregard the social and domestic interests of Christians, as to continue their devotional exercises from day to day, and from week to week? Finally—when, and where, do they approve of extravagance in any form, or any exercise of the mind not regulated by sober reason—any practice, that is not sanctioned by truth and virtue? Never—in no instance can an exception be found; and, consequently, all those outrages which have been named, are not only unauthorized by apostolical example, but are contrary to primitive Christian practice—fanatical and injurious to the cause of truth.

But unbelievers in general, do not appear to concern themselves about the example of the primitive Christians. They take things as they find them, and seem to presume, that, because the present age furnishes examples of fanaticism, it is proof that all others have only produced Christians with more zeal than knowledge—more pretension than piety—more enthusiasm than substantial morality and pure religion. And that these extravagances have had, and still have, their full weight in confirming them in the rejection of the Gospel, none can doubt who have given the subject any attention. So confident are they that these aberrations are the test of Gospel influences, that they speak of them as among the proper indications of the Christian character; and instead of regarding a fanatic as a monstrous production in the Christian family, he is more commonly viewed as its proper representative.

Now, we deny that the spirit of Christianity is fanatical; and maintain, that it never led a single believer into any acts of religious extravagance. And this has been proved by reference to the principles, professions, and conduct of the great Master of Christians, and his immediate disciples. Some of the early Jewish and Gentile converts fell into a few of their previous excesses; but these were promptly disavowed and rebuked by the apostles. Fanaticism, then, among Christians, is of Jewish and Heathen origin; nor can an instance be produced from the New Testament, which even remotely sanctions a single extravagance in Christian practice. It might as well be pretended, that Christianity encouraged and countenanced crime, as that it authorizes fanaticism. But this, none will argue—and when the subject under remark, receives proper attention, unbelievers will learn that they have drawn conclusions respecting it without premises, and repeated assertions which remain to be proved.

But the truth is, they find it easier to sneer at the fanaticism of professors, than to ascertain whether it is authorized by the Gospel as recorded in the Bible. And we venture to predict, that whenever they will set about the examination of the subject, in sober earnest, they will find that the extravagances of Christians, in this or any other age, have no connection with, or authority from revealed truth. To this work of investigation, they should apply themselves without delay; that by so doing, they may learn, that they have blamed Christianity for the errors and weaknesses of its friends, and that, notwithstanding these mistakes, it is altogether worthy of their faith, confidence, and obedience.

A VISIT TO MY FATHERS GRAVE.

BY MISS U. M. FELTON.

Reader, hast thou ever followed to the grave a beloved friend, whose guardian care has watched thy infant years, sustained thee amid the trials of life, smoothed the pillow of sickness with parental care—and taught the first breathings of thy infant voice to praise the name of thy Maker, from whose hands we derive all our blessings both temporal and eternal? Then thou canst sympathise with me, as I now linger over the grave of such a friend, whose memory is distinctly woven with every earlier and tender recollection. Yes, my Father sleeps in the little burying ground at H—, my native place, the scene of all that is most pleasing in retrospection; and though “no stone or monumental cross” rears its head in memory of his ashes, yet, by me he is not forgotten. Yet far different are my feelings now, than they were at the time I last visited it. Then, all was darkness and desolation—then, I looked on death as a total extinction of existence—then, I believed that the last great debt of nature which we must all sooner or later pay, was an eternal sleep! But thanks be to God, the tears which I now shed over this beloved spot, are tears springing from a far different source. Then, life to me was a burthen, insupportable and grievous to be borne. Then, I thought I had committed to the grave my last friend, and that I had no guide, no protector, but must wend my way alone through life's uneven journey. Then, I looked on death as a welcome messenger, which would terminate all my cares and sorrows. But my mind has happily emerged from this heap of ruin, and I feel I am not left entirely destitute. No, God, my heavenly Father, watches over me; and though I am left an orphan, though no paternal roof shelters me, yet, in Heaven I have a Friend, a Father, on whom I place the greatest reliance; one who will sustain me in every trial—and I feel assured, that “as in Adam all die, even so, in Christ shall all be made alive.”

DEATH.

BY MRS. S. L. WHISTON.

Death is frequently represented as the King terrors;—this ought not so to be. Death when viewed as an entrance into a happier and better state of being, should be considered rather as a liberator from the thralldom of sin, and a release from disease, care, and suffering of every kind.—True, the love of life is so deeply implanted in our natures, and there are so many ties calculated to make us cling to existence, that it is hard to look upon death, especially in the full enjoyment of health, without something like dread and dismay. In every stage of existence, there is something that makes us desire to live. To the buoyant and healthful spirits of youth, life is seen through the deceitful but brilliant kalidæscope of fancy—and hope presents no difficulties but those it will be a pleasure to overcome. To their warm and ardent imaginations, all is fair and beautiful, and the untried future appears one continued scene of happiness. The middle aged are engaged in the active scenes of life, and the happiness, comfort, and perhaps the very existence of others, depend in a measure upon their exertions. They do not feel willing that the cords which attach them to earth, should be severed. And even the aged, would fain linger on the threshold of time, like the seaman, to take another and another look at the home of their childhood, before they enter on a voyage to the eternal world.

It has been wisely ordered that this should be the case. Were it not for the tenacity with which we cling to life, that is so inherent in our natures, how many in a temporary fit of vexation and disappointment, would put an end to their existence, and thereby deprive society of useful and ornamental members.

It is not the love of life, therefore, that we would deprecate; but we do think that death should not be painted in such appalling colors, as to cause so much horror at his approach. To those who see naught in death but the trappings of woe—the charnel-house and the tomb—who contemplate the loathsome corse as only food for worms; with no prospect for the future but nonentity—death is indeed gloomy. To those who are taught to believe, that in a future world, for many, very many—perhaps for themselves, or for some connected to them by the strongest and most endearing ties—there exists a place of unending and unmitigated suffering, death is terrible. But to those who expect to meet in another world, not only all they knew and loved in this, but all who bear the Creator's image, cleansed and made pure in the blood of the Lamb, to enjoy perfect happiness, as long as God himself exists, there is no "sting in death—no victory in the grave."

EVENING CONTEMPLATIONS.

BY MISS ANN BARTLETT.

"How lovely, in the arch of heaven,
Appears yon sinking orb of light;
As darting through the shades of even,
It gilds the rising shades of night."

If there is ever a time, when the contemplative mind can leave the scenes of earth, and range through infinite space, it is at that hour, when it beholds the last rays of the golden sun, sinking beneath the Western horizon; and views the celestial orbs of night, as they appear in the heavens, one by one, until the whole firmament is illuminated with those sparkling gems. It would almost seem that earth, by some unknown power, had withdrawn her alluring charms from the view of man, that his thoughts and affections might be concentrated in the glorious scene before him.

Such scenes and objects, seem well calculated to draw forth every latent power of the mind, and dilate the heart with joy. At that hour of solitude and retirement, man, the image of his Maker, can leave the evanescent scenes of earth, and wing himself, in imagination, to distant worlds—there to contemplate, admire and adore, the wisdom of God. He can take his flight along with the planets, in their wide career around the bright luminary of day; and behold them running their ample rounds, with a velocity that far surpasses our limited conceptions. He sees Jupiter, encompassed with luminous girdles, alternately interspersed with gems of sparkling brightness; and to add to the magnificence of the scene, he can accompany his splendid retinue of satellites in their swift career, as they wheel their stated courses around that stupendous orb. He gazes with rapture and delight on the magnificent arches that adorn the firmament of Saturn, appearing to the beholder not unlike the rainbow a thousand times expanded: at one time, illuminating the sky with their splendor, at another, casting a deep shade over certain regions of the planet, presenting to view the sublimity and grandeur of the starry heavens: at the same time, he can witness the various aspects of its assemblage of moons; he sees one rising above the horizon, another sinking beneath it, whilst a third is approaching the meridian—one entering into, another emerging from an eclipse—one appearing as a crescent, and another with a gibbous phase—and, not unfrequently, all of them appearing in one bright assemblage. He can view the mountains, plains, and valleys, that cover the face of the moon; at the same time, he can traverse the milky-way, and there behold the unnumbered millions of bright worlds, that bedeck that lucid zone.

"O what a confluence of ethereal fires,
From urns unnumber'd, down the steep of heaven
Streams to a point and centres on my sight."

But he need not stop here—for God has never said to the immortal mind, "thus far shalt thou go, and no farther;" he may even penetrate the depth of infinite space, until he is surrounded with myriads of suns, and systems of worlds, all running their destined courses, in obedience to the laws of their allwise Creator. "These are scenes worthy of the majesty of the divine Being to unfold, and of rational creatures to contemplate." Philosophy has taught him, that the universe is governed by fixed and immutable laws; that not one lawless particle of matter, thwarts the ethereal sky—and that, although he may behold the swift shooting meteor, as it darts from the zenith to the horizon, and seems to threaten conflagration, yet he need not fear it will be precipitated on this our sphere: for God, who condescends to make the delicate moss of the field and clothe the lilies of the valley, will not forget us, who are made in his own image, and destined to an immortal existence.

The endless beauty and harmony that pervade the universe, afford matter for the most sublime and elevated contemplations. In this ample field of beauty, the most luxuriant mind may range uncontrolled; representing to itself, scenes and objects in endless variety and extent. The frequent contemplation of the sublimity and grandeur displayed in the firmament, tend to enlarge the intellectual powers, and elevate the soul above the low and vicious pursuits that too often characterize too large a portion of mankind. "Could we all live, and act, in view of the myriads of bright worlds that are constantly looking down upon us," where, I ask, is the individual that would infringe upon the moral law of his nature? Instead of indulging in low and pernicious habits, his soul would take a more elevated stand; and he would look with amazement on the evils and misery wherein mankind, in the pursuit of happiness, have precipitately fallen.

It is only when we view the wondrous works and ways of God, that we realize what mere atoms we are in the great map of the universe.—Whilst in this attitude, we feel the asperities of our natures softening into philanthropy; our pride is suppressed; and humility, which ought to characterize frail mortality, erects her temple in our hearts. Man is a dependent creature, and can not justly call anything his own. This earth from which he derives his sustenance, the gurgling rill, from which he allays his thirst, and the air that moves his heaving lungs—are not his own; they are only loaned to him, whilst a sojourner here. May we, one and all, turn our thoughts and affections from all that tends to vitiate the morals or retard the march of intellect—ever bearing in mind, that every step we advance in virtue, so far we recede from vice.

SCRIPTURE ITS OWN INTERPRETER.

Let any reader of this paper, who never experienced or tried the interpretation of Scripture by Scripture, read the following parallel passages, and he will become personally convinced of its advantages. The story of a leper who was cured of leprosy is told by Matthew, (viii: 2-4,) Mark (i: 40-45), and Luke, (v: 12-14,) but a little differently by each. Suppose that you read them in the above order, we may be allowed to conjecture that you are at some loss to determine what Matthew means by the leper's worshipping Jesus. You may have heard grave divines, or read eminent commentators, who assert that this worship was a proof of the deity of Jesus. With this uncertainty in your mind you pass on to read the account of the same translation by Mark. Here you find that the leper is represented as falling down on his knees to beseech Jesus for a cure. So that the divine worship which some would persuade you was offered to Jesus, consisted only in bending the knee or resting on the knees. You go further, and consult the account by Luke. You there find that the petitioner fell on his face, and you now are pretty certain that the leper's worshipping consisted merely in the Eastern mode of saluting persons of rank or eminence, or in making a profound obeisance even to the ground. If a request was made, it was offered before the person arose, or while yet upon his knees. It would be better, indeed, on account of the peculiarity of meaning attached to the English word, worship, that the Greek word proskuneo which is rendered in the above passages in Matthew, and elsewhere, were translated to fall down or make obeisance.

Again: you will find in Mark a circumstance not noticed by the other historians—the motive by which Jesus was influenced in granting the request of the leper. Mark says he was moved with compassion and so stretched out his hand and touched him. When reading the other accounts you might readily enough let this consideration escape your notice; but by comparing the several histories you have, as it were, forced upon your notice the inward workings of the sympathizing, benevolent Jesus—of him who was verily full of compassion.—This cheering and delightful view of the character of our Lord and elder Brother, will more than amply repay you for your small trouble in comparing Scripture with Scripture.

Again: In reading the account in Matthew, you may be at a loss to account for the charge of secrecy given to the man who was healed. In the last verse of Mark's account you are supplied with a key, in part at least, for this injunction of secrecy. One consequence of the publicity of his compassionate and miraculous cures is there noticed. Doubtless there were other reasons; but where the chief men and rulers in a city were informed of his fame and miracles, their malignity was sharpened, and they, more and more, sought to kill him. Jesus, as his time was not yet come, or, in other words, as the purposes of his mission had not yet been fully accomplished, had to keep out of their reach so as to avoid their laying hands upon him. This inconvenience he would doubtless have wished to prevent and avoid as far as possible.—Another reason why Jesus may have wished to avoid publicity as much as to enjoin secrecy on the subjects of his earliest miracles at least, you may gather from the narrative of Luke. He says that as the fame of Jesus spread abroad more and more, great multitudes were constantly thronging together to hear him and to be healed of their infirmities; but that he kept constantly withdrawing into lonely places and praying. Here is the reason why he wished to avoid an ever-thronging multitude—it left no leisure for retirement, devotion, and prayer. How sweet and useful are these to his followers; to their Master, they seem also to have been necessary.

Go my reader, search and compare the Scriptures, and with earnestness and prayer investigate their meaning, and may every one so doing find that they are able to make him wise unto salvation.

MUSIC.

Says Moore of Love and Religion,

"Music, music is the link
Which they both hold by to the skies."

Whether this be strictly true or false, the idea is a beautiful one, for certainly there is hardly any thing which so wafts the spirit up above the earth as music—and, as love often clings to something to sustain it against the flood of the world's cold cares, it finds in the strains which music breathes, an invisible chain, as it were, to keep it from sinking in the depths of despondency and gloom. In regard to religion, we find, in the swelling anthem and the loud hosannah, that the soul floats, so to speak, on angel-wings and trembles with the exultation of a new and heavenly existence. Oh! how many tears have been dried, how many sighs checked, how many troubled spirits soothed and fited for communion with their Maker, in prayer, by the soft, gentle and consoling voice of music. Truly, it hath a language which is universal—an appeal in every heart which is irresistible. Its cultivation, then, should be a prominent part of our education, as its practice is an interesting portion of our public religious worship. EPSILON.

A VOICE TO YOUNG MEN.....CHAPTER VIII.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

CULTIVATING THE MIND.

That there is a striking distinction between the capabilities of mankind and those of animals, is a self-evident truth. The cause of this vast disparity, consists in the endowments bestowed by the creative Hand, for the guidance of the different races. Instinct is the highest capacity possessed by the brutes. Through its influences, they are enabled to obtain food for the sustenance of the body, and also to take measures to secure themselves from threatening danger. These being the only wants of the animal races, the powers of instinct are amply sufficient to afford every needed supply; and the Creator has thus granted them all they can ask in consistency with their nature and scale of being. But man has been endowed with the higher and more diversified powers of Mind. These crown him lord of this world—these form the grand, and indeed, the only distinction between him and the brute world—these enable him not only to supply all the wants of his body, but also to rule over the animal creation, and convert them to his purposes.

The human mind, who can describe?—who can fathom its capabilities?—who can measure its mighty powers?—who can mark the limit of its upward flight toward infinite Perfection? Wonderful faculties! which annihilate time, and enable us to live in a moment, as it were, through a thousand ages of the recorded Past, or of the imagined Future! Inscrutable powers! which enable us to overleap space, and in an instant, to traverse the earth from pole to pole, and from meridian to run the vast circle to meridian!—which enable us to soar aloft to the bright stars of heaven, and to stray from planet to planet, and from system to system, throughout the azure fields of ether! Incomprehensible mind! guided by faith, on swift expanded wing, it can urge its flight up, far, far up, through illimitable extent, and bow in gratitude and love before the very throne of omnipotent Goodness!

What has not been accomplished by the human mind? It has not only sought out means by which every luxury has been procured for the body—it has not only improved and expanded its own powers, and elevated the human race from ignorance and barbarity, to civilization and the possession of an immensity of knowledge—but it has made the elements its servants; it has penetrated deep into the properties and operations of nature's laws, and ascertained to no inconsiderable extent, the perfect principles upon which the Mighty One upholds and directs the works of his hand! Yet, amid all its deep researches, amid all its surprising discoveries, the mind has not yet fathomed its own wonderful capabilities; it can not yet even conceive of the unmeasured extent, the vast height and depth, the length and breadth, verging to infinity, of the knowledge its far-reaching powers are capable of grasping! Truly has man been created in the image of his God—truly is his intellect a transcript, an emanation, of the Infinite Mind!

Young men, should the powers of that heavenly mind with which you have been endowed, be overlooked, neglected, forgotten? With the invaluable cluster of mental faculties which you possess, and which only need exercise, to gush forth in streams of pure, high, holy enjoyment, will you pass them by, as unworthy your attention, and join with the brute, in a career of low, bodily gratification? Every manly and ennobling impulse within you, cries out against such a dishonorable course!

There is not only a wide distinction between the powers of instinct and of mind, but also in their natures. In instinct there is no perceptible improvement. All its powers are imparted at once. The bird builds its nest, the bee seeks its delicious nectar, the beaver constructs its hut and its dam, with the same unerring precision on the first effort, as after years of practice. Neither is there any improvement in their races. The bird, the bee, the beaver, indeed all animals, perform their various avocations with no more perfection now, than when they came forth from the ark of Noah. Instinct, it is true, is susceptible of a very limited improvement in some animals, which is aided by man's reason. But it does not possess within itself, the least power of improvement. But the mind of man is constituted on principles entirely different. Of all living beings, none, probably, are more ignorant and helpless, than the new-born infant. The barking whelp of the same age, evinces much more knowledge, than the feeble offspring of man, a few days or weeks old. But in that cradled nursing, slumber the faculties and energies of a mighty mind, which, under proper cultivation, can be improved to an extent now incomprehensible! Thus instinct exercises its power without cultivation; but man must improve and exercise his mental faculties, before he can enjoy the high advantages they are capable of bestowing.

The Creator has seen proper so to constitute the human mind, that it much resembles the rich soil of a garden. When destitute of cultivation, it will be overgrown by the weeds and briars of ignorance—useless in themselves, and the source of great evil—with here and there, perhaps, a sickly plant of knowledge, struggling for existence, amid choking thorns and thistles. And the more powerful the natural capabilities of minds in such state, the greater the evils flowing from a want of culture, as the richest soil shoots up the rank weeds. To be duly benefited by the elevated capabilities with which the Creator has endowed man, the soil of the mind must be properly tilled; the weeds and brambles must be exterminated, root and branch. And not only so, but the seeds of knowledge must be sown—the tender plants, as they spring up, must be nursed, and watered, and warmed into a vigorous growth, by instruction and reflection, and all the numerous aids that abound. In this manner the tree of knowledge will grow and enlarge; its branches will expand, and, ere long, be clothed with beautiful blossoms; and in due time, a rich and precious harvest of invaluable wisdom, will be the reward of these labors.

The mind will not remain dormant and idle. If its energies and capabilities are not summoned to the acquisition of useful knowledge, they will submit to the dictation of ignorance and superstition, and under their control, will become loaded with those dark and erroneous conceptions, which are the fruitful source of unspeakable evil. If the intellectual capacities are not sufficiently cultivated and enlightened to be your master, to control and direct you, they will become powerful assistants to evil propensities—if they are not led to the aid of virtue and truth, they will volunteer in the service of sin and error; they will marshal the passions in battle array, and lead them on to the attack of every thing virtuous and commendable, and to the destruction of every pure, rational, and proper source of enjoyment.

It is a law of our nature, both bodily and mental, as now constituted, that no good can be obtained, no real benefit secured, no proper enjoyment experienced, without a corresponding exertion to procure it. Hence, if you make no effort to cultivate the mind and improve your faculties, you will remain in ignorance, and be compelled to experience all the manifold evils that flow from ignorance. But to secure all the advantages and all the enjoyments of an enlightened intellect, you must summon industry and perseverance to your aid, and properly cultivate the powers God has given you.

Are there not, then, young men, inducements abounding, sufficient to urge you to a proper cultivation of the mind? Let me direct your attention to a few further considerations. A mind properly cultivated, becomes the source of much unalloyed enjoyment. The bacchanalian over his cups—the debauchee in his revels—the unprincipled in their career of crime—sometimes experience fleeting sensations, which they denominate enjoyment. But these, at best, are but moments of fitful excitement, that can not properly be dignified by the name of happiness. They are, in reality, evils disguised in those alluring robes which decoy their dupes to certain wretchedness—and millions of miserable victims, can testify from experience, that at last, they “bite like a serpent, and sting like an adder.” These delusive excitements are truly represented by the book of the Revelator, which was sweet in the mouth, but bitter, bitter, in the stomach! Why should rational beings seek those misnamed pleasures, that are invariably followed by more than an equal amount of pain and wretchedness? especially, when there are numerous sources of happiness within their reach, without any of this alloy!

The enjoyments springing from a well cultivated mind, are exalted and exquisite in nature, without any intermixture of succeeding unhappiness. They flow from fountains entirely disconnected from, and elevated above, the passions, and are not, therefore, subject to their fluctuations. Compare the pleasures of the student with those of the profligate. The student goes on in acquisition, from truth to truth, obtaining clearer and brighter views of the wonderful laws of science and of nature, and the amazing displays of infinite wisdom which abound. He perceives every where, the utmost knowledge and perfection at work, adapting means to produce wise and benevolent ends. He obtains an understanding of the curious in art, and the wonderful in philosophy. And as his mind expands and his wisdom increases, in these researches, a pure stream of enjoyment pours into his heart, with an influence sweet as the dews of Hermon. These pleasures are unalloyed—they never satiate the appetite—they cause no disease, pain, or decrepitude—but they increase in delight as they increase in abundance! But not so with the profligate. The more he indulges in what he calls his pleasures, the deeper he sinks in corruption and degradation—the oftener he gives way to his unbridled passions, the less power do they possess of bestowing enjoyment, the greater is the pain they induce, and the more entirely does he become their slave—until every sense is palled, every taste is blunted, every source of rational gratification is destroyed; and he goes downward to the grave, a miserable, decrepid, idiotic caricature of humanity!

A cultivated mind, is one of the most important requisites in obtaining a respectable standing in society. The least degree of discrimination will satisfy you of the truth of this assertion. Who are respected in community?—who move in the highest circles?—who are selected to fill stations of trust, of responsibility, and honor? Your own experience will testify that they are men of cultivated minds. In this land of republican equality, there are no privileged orders, no feudal system, to foist men into stations for which they are unfitted. But he who would rise to distinction here, must depend upon his own resources—must ascend on his own merits and capabilities. In this land, the truth of the poet's words are fully exemplified—“Honor and fame, from no condition rise:

Act well your part—there all the honor lies.”

And need I say, that to “act well your part,” in this enlightened age and country, a cultivated mind is indispensable? Without it, your prospects of elevation and honor, are dark and unpromising. You can not reasonably expect to rise above the rank you now occupy, without a diligent application to the enlightenment of the mind.

A cultivated mind is essential to insure prosperity in any circumstances. There is no proper profession, occupation, or calling in which men engage, where an enlightened mind will not directly tend to prosperity. “Knowledge is power.” He who possesses knowledge, has resources at his command to aid in every undertaking, of which the ignorant man is wholly deprived. Compare those who have been successful in life—who have arisen from obscurity to fame, from poverty to wealth—with those who have always remained in obscurity, or have been reduced from wealth to poverty, and, as a general rule, you will discover that while the former are men who have cultivated their minds, the latter are ignorant and unlettered.

In cultivating the mind, three things are necessary to insure successful progress, viz., application, industry, and perseverance. Whatever may be your condition in life, by calling these to your aid, you can hardly fail of succeeding, to the extent of your aspirations. Are you wealthy, and surrounded by numerous advantages? Still without industrious application, you can make no improvement, no progress. A score of tutors may attend you without avail, unless you call your own energies into activity. They can not study for you, or think or learn for you. You must do this for yourself, or remain in ignorance; you must severely task the powers of your own mind, or continue under all the disadvantages of a want of cultivation. Are you poor?—destitute of means and advantages? These circumstances should not discourage you. A resolution nobly and firmly formed, to triumph over the difficulties that surround you, and sustained by industry and perseverance, will make you almost any thing you choose to be. A poor stammering boy of ancient Greece, resolved to become an orator, although to appearance, wholly unfitted to succeed in his determination. But for him, application and perseverance did every thing. With untiring industry, he cultivated his mind. In the caves of the mountains, and beside the boisterous ocean, he trained his powers, until success crowned his efforts. Even in those days of eloquence, he charmed and astonished all Greece, and transmitted the name of Demosthenes, to the latest generations of men. The celebrated Dr. Alexander Murray, was the son of a poor shepherd in Scotland. He learned his alphabet from the board of an old wool-card, whereon his father marked the letters with the burnt end of a root taken from the fire. From this humble condition, by an industrious and unwearied cultivation of the mind, he arose to an eminence as a scholar, to which few can expect to attain! Many instances might be cited in our own land, where, by application to mental culture, men have arisen from obscurity to eminence and renown. Thus poverty, a humble origin, or disadvantageous circumstances, need not be an insurmountable obstacle to the cultivation of the mind, or to an elevation in respectability and public esteem.

In cultivating the mind, you should exercise a proper command over its powers. There is no habit more fatal to rapid improvement, than to permit the attention of the mind to be distracted by a variety of objects. You should sway sufficient control over the mental faculties, to concentrate them at will, on any given subject, until you have become acquainted with its properties. And when your attention is directed to the acquisition of any particular branch of knowledge, let it be the object of all your energies and labors, until it is fully attained, and stored safely in the repository of wisdom.

Patience is necessary in improving the mind. There are many discouraging circumstances attending even the most successful students. But patience will enable you to triumph over every difficulty. Patience will dig down mountains and fill up valleys—it will enable the simple to become enlightened, and the enlightened, to excel in wisdom. You should not be frightened at perplexing and knotty points in your studies. Some minds are inclined to slide easily around such obstructions, and travel on in ignorance of their merits. This is a deleterious practice, and to be especially avoided. Look every question fairly in the face—attack it manfully and vigorously—penetrate thoroughly to its foundations—and all its mysteries will soon be unfolded to your comprehension. In this manner you will not only secure the knowledge enclosed in the difficult point, but will exercise and train the mind into increased strength and power.

A frequent recourse to the instructions of the aged, is a valuable and pleasant method of improvement. The aged have for many years been collecting wisdom, both theoretically and practically; and they are happy to impart to the young from their fund of information. Much practical instruction can, therefore, be gathered from the conversation of the aged. But they must be permitted to proceed in their own way. They will relate scenes they have participated in, describe sights they have witnessed, experiments they have seen tried, and theories that they have beheld tested. In these narrations, you will hear many wise sayings and aphorisms—much useful information, interlarded with adventure and anecdote—you will hear relations delineating the workings of human passions, evincing the evils of ignorance, the wretchedness flowing from error, the folly of indulging in sinfulness, the misery and pain which it invariably entails upon its votaries, and the wisdom of walking without deviation in the path of virtue, probity, and temperance. In thus unloading their minds to the young, the aged are capable of imparting lessons abounding in the rich instructions of precept and example.

REMARKS.

The weather being unpleasant, the congregations were not large the first day, but on the second, though smaller than they would have been, had the weather been favorable, they were respectable as to numbers.—Many came from the East and the West, from the North and the South, to share in the social delights of this joyful occasion, and we trust, they returned to their respective homes, confident that their spiritual strength had been renewed, and increased.

The public services gave general satisfaction. They, as a whole, breathed a spirit of devotional piety. No harsh and unfeeling reflections were cast upon the opinions of others, differing from ourselves in sentiment. No misrepresentations of their faith were given, and we trust, if any of them were present to hear, they will testify that they had no cause to complain.

In the evening, as will be seen by the minutes, we held a concert of praise. I know not what effect this meeting had upon the feelings of others—what emotions it may have excited in their bosoms; but I do know, that it was a season of rejoicing to my soul. And I would to God that our brethren, in every quarter of our Master's vineyard, could be brought to see the benefits that must inevitably flow from frequent meetings of this kind.—Where there is no stated preaching, much good might be done, if the lay brethren would assemble themselves together—encourage each other on in "the race set before them"—cultivate the devotional feelings of the heart, and thus let their light shine amidst the surrounding gloom of error. I am no fanatic. But I do believe that social worship is necessary in order to keep alive the religious faculties of man, and to call into exercise his devotional feelings. And should it be neglected in all places where there is no preaching?

Harmony and good feeling characterized the deliberations of our Council. Some important subjects were considered, touching the prosperity of our Zion, but with great unanimity of feeling.

Being shut out from the Baptist meeting-house, (at which this Association in 1836, adjourned to meet,) by a protracted meeting conducted by Elder Parr, and at which, one individual was driven into insanity, we were accommodated with the use of the Presbyterian meeting-house, two miles from Scipio Centre. Here we met and commingled our devotions before the throne of our common Father, to whom be glory forever and ever—Amen.

T. D. Cook.

Blindness and prejudice are seldom resigned but with pain; and therefore, for the most part, are not resigned at all. It is but an unacceptable civility to offer to let in the rays of understanding upon those minds, which are used to subsist in the dark. It is like opening daylight upon a nest of owls; it always sets them screeching.

CIRCULAR.

To all brethren of the like precious faith, the Susquehanna Association of Universalists sendeth Christian salutations.

Beloved Brethren—Our meeting together was a meeting of joy and satisfaction. Our brethren and sisters came from the East and the West, the North and the South, and sat down together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus. And although the time was one when business pressed heavily upon all classes, the commodious house which our friends in Sheshequin have erected, was filled to overflowing with devout and attentive worshippers. And as our brethren in the ministry proclaimed the cheering truths of the Gospel; as they spake of the purposes and promises of infinite Goodness, the tears of joy that trickled down the cheek, evinced the feelings of the heart and the affections of the numerous congregation.

The deliberations of our Council were conducted with unanimity and friendship, and from the information brought by the delegates, we may safely affirm that the progress of our cause is onward. And though we can not speak in definite terms respecting the increase of numbers, yet we rejoice in the evidence we have of the prosperity of our Zion; and we hail the dawning of the period when she shall arise in the power of her might, "fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners."

Our thanks are due to the friends in whose houses we found a home, and with whom we shared in the blessings and the comforts of life. May they find a rich and ample reward in the consolations of the Gospel which was tendered them, and in the anticipation of that better meeting above.

"Where congregations ne'er break up,
And Sabbaths never end.

DAY DREAMS.

Says Lord Kames, "when awake we are conscious of a continued train of perceptions passing in our minds"—but, reader, did you ever stop and notice, if I may so express myself, the various hues and forms which these perceptions will assume in a reverie? In other words, did you ever let your thoughts go "a wool-gathering?"

When we apply ourselves to study, we exert a, perhaps, laborious use of our reflective powers. Having some particular object in view, we collect and concentrate all our energies to that end, and, whatever course of investigation we may take, all tends to that one point. But, when we throw off the shackles from our thoughts, it is then that they roam, uncontrolled, into the very depths of the spirit's fairy-land—then we hold communion with sweet and tender memories—then we gather together the fragments and rebuild the shrines and fanes of the by-gone time—or, gliding into the misty future, we conjure up the forms and features of what may be.

Now, you are gazing listlessly at the various objects in your apartment—or you turn a vacant eye upon the beautiful scenery around you—but, in either case, where are your thoughts? Why, they are summoning bright imaginings in the land of poesy, or are aloft, in the clouds, "castle-building"—here, there, and perhaps not precisely any where. Oh, a reverie is a delicious thing!

But poetic visions and cloud-castles, are not the only images which pass before "the mind's eye," in these fits of musing. They, in the language of cent-per-cent, are "unprofitable"—and philosophy may call them "unsubstantial,"—"mere vagaries"—so, I will let them pass for nothing, though I by no means, endorse such sentiments. I say, then, these fair fancies are not the only things we behold in day-dreams. There are hours spent in this manner, which are not unprofitable, but which exert a happy, and, we trust, a purifying influence upon us.—There are hours when we pause amid the roar and the crowd of the ever-busy world—or when we rest from the weariness of brain-racking study—to look to the heart, that it grow not callous, or to open its deeper recesses, and see what remembrances are enshrined there. These things to be sure, may invite our notice, may flit before us, in the midst of our daily avocations—but we check them then, or put them hastily by, or lose sight of them, as soon, almost, as we have had a glimpse, by directing our attention to the more palpable objects around us.—So, it is a good thing, that we occasionally retire apart, and sit down and muse.

Then come up the scenes and the homes of our youth. The bright stream and the hill-side—the wood and the mountain then glide before us images of the loved and the lovely. The forms of those with whom we "Roamed about the braes,

And pu'd the gowans fine."

Now we see some dear familiar face, a laughing, pleasant one, that is blended with the recollection of old jokes and joyous times—anon, it changes to the stern visage of the pedagogue, who, "clad in a little brief authority" has had his share, in literally beating "education" into us—again, it assumes the countenance of some "ancient crone," who from the chimney-nook has croaked into our ears strange legends of "the olden-time" and wild deeds done in wizard-days—and then, bright laughing eyes and floating tress—stop!—(we must prevent visions [of this kind, or the sternness of bachelorism will melt before them—) then the social circle, we can almost hear the merry laugh—then, the wedding-rite—then, the funeral train!—and, heigho! so they flit over the mirror of our soul, reflecting forms, broken and strange, yet beautiful and bright, like star-light upon waves. Dim shadows and vivid perceptions—now running through a long chain of intimate associations, now turning off in a different course, appear in quick succession, until our present griefs, our present cares, are all, all forgotten, and we are entranced and absorbed in the restored, the re-illuminated and the re-living past.

Now, reveries like these, we maintain, are not profitless. They do not, occasionally indulged in, unfit us for the realities of life, by taking us away from that which exists around us, to those things which are only as dreams. No! they nerve us up to encounter trials and perplexities, which are momentarily pressing upon us. Surely, the memory of friends and scenes, which we have loved, should be cherished and kept bright in our progress through this uncertain and mutable world.

If we do not wish always to hear the harsh din and the wrangling of busy life—if we do not wish, in our eager graspings after wealth or fame, to crush every tender recollection that clings around the heart, to trample every pure and holy image in the dust—if we would not grow deaf and blind to every thing that is truly beautiful and worthy—if we would not seal up the heart's fountain and check the flow of its best feelings—let us turn aside, at times, to the voice that calls us to the past—let us reflect and grow better, as we behold the varied and glowing visions which glide a-hiward our "day dreams."

And there are moral lessons to be learned from these things, which even philosophy should not spurn. When we look back upon the sunshine and the shadow which have fallen upon our path, we know, from that experience, that life is a checked journey—and when the future shadow comes we shall humbly wait for the sunshine, and when the sunshine cometh we shall not be lifted up with pride, for we shall remember the shadow. When we behold beauty that has faded, wealth that has "taken wings," and schemes that have been blasted forever—we shall learn not to set our hearts upon these phantoms—but to adorn the beauty which all may possess, the beauty of the soul—to lay up our treasures "where moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through and steal"—and to lay hold of that hope which is not, like earthly schemes, tossed and wrecked by every wave and breeze, but which is "an anchor to the soul, sure and steadfast." These shall we learn, if we rightly heed teachings which come to us from hours that have been.

Truly, then we shall be prepared to encounter the toil and the danger which lie in our onward course.—When visions of the future rise, we shall estimate the prospects they hold out to us by the realities of the past—and, when the scenes that are gone by trouble us with a shade of sorrow, we shall be comforted by the cheering ray which beams to us from things to come. Yes, from things to come! for "we have no abiding city here" and these temporal things should fit us for "things, that are eternal." When, therefore, we would be calm and happy, let us go apart and hold communion with our thoughts—and if the memories they bring before us cause us even to weep, we shall find our tears are "precious drops"—purifying the soul. And oh, when our musings have passed over, let us bow ourselves resignedly to His will who ever has been with us—let us, by the blessings of the past, be thought to trust Him for the future—and, holding communion with our Father, we shall lift our foreheads from the dust, radiant with hope and peace, and, girding up our strength, be ready again, to journey on in our pilgrimage.

EXTEMPORANEOUS PREACHING.

An excellent, spirited discussion between Br. Thomas Whittemore, of the Trumpet, and Br. C. Gardner, of the Gospel Banner, has been going on for some time in those periodicals, on the subject of extemporaneous and written discourses—the former contending for the superiority of the first mode, and the latter for the second. Both modes have their advantages, but it seems to me that neither should be indiscriminately recommended. The success of a man on either plan, will, in my opinion, depend on his peculiar organization. Some there are who will scarcely ever make good extemporaneous speakers; and I am inclined to believe, also, that there are others who never will succeed as well in reading sermons, as they will in extempore delivery.

Two other modes may be named, partaking of both those already named, which have been successfully used by many public speakers. The first is, to speak from "short notes," as they are familiarly termed—in which each division of the subject, and each argument and illustration belonging to each division, is briefly named, leaving the language to be supplied impromptu, while delivering it. The second mode is, to write out the discourse, and so far fix its order and language in the memory, as to recite it mainly as it is written. This latter mode requires a good verbal memory, and a mind that bids defiance to interruption. Let all others who wish to try it, be careful to have the sermon itself at hand, in case of a failure.

I have no doubt that many read a sermon badly, in consequence of writing it in a bad character, or with a poor arrangement. I have a little experience in this matter, which I am willing to bestow on my brethren in some other article. I have not room nor time just now. I also have no doubt, that some make but poor extemporaneous speakers of themselves, because they rely too confidently on "the inspiration of the occasion," and "the impulse of the moment." On this subject I speak from observation only.

In what I have thus written, I have no design to interfere with the able controversialists, but merely to advise our readers of that discussion, and to offer my own opinions on the subject—in short, to answer a demand for "more copy."

To correct any misunderstanding that may obtain on the subject, I would state that a notice of the intended ordination of Br. Z. Cook was sent us by Br. Vedder; but it either arrived too late for publication, or was mislaid—it is forgotten now, which prevented its appearance.

LADIES REPOSITORY.

We have received the October number of this work, have looked through its pages, and have been much gratified with the perusal of some of its articles. We give a brief summary of its contents.

"A tale of truth," is the first article, and is a simple, well-told and affecting story—portraying in the character of "the uncle," too many features, we fear, of the world as it is. We trust it may be the means of rebuking selfishness and cold-hearted charity—while at the same time, it serves as a gentle admonition those, who, without forethought, rush into that spacious paradise of rainbows and roses, ycleped "married life"—not that we denounce matrimony as a general thing, Reader, oh no!

"The Ramble," is an interesting narrative of a walk in the country, and a description of the writer's feelings upon viewing the works of the Creator in their untarnished loveliness—his reflections thereon, are, we think, in the main, very correct—yet, if the maxim of Pope be true, that we have an ample volume opened for us in the crowded variety of the city, and certainly, a city life is not without its advantages, for if on nature's page we read motives to worship our Maker, and feel our hearts, as we gaze, glowing like an altar, with thanksgiving to him; with these feelings fresh within us, we can go back amid the dense haunts of men, and strive, by humble imitation, to practice the benevolence we have seen spread out before us.

"The proper study of mankind, is man,"

We hope the article entitled "Female Writers," will call forth the valuable contributions of that class of correspondents, both to the pages of "The Repository," and of other publications.

"Mount Auburn," is a beautiful and appropriate article upon that "garden of graves"—by Miss M. A. Doid. We publish the greater part of it, upon the last page of this paper.

"The providence of God" and "Woman's love" are the titles of two poems from the pen of our fair correspondent, Miss S. C. Edgerton; the name of the authoress is a sufficient guarantee for their merit. We have marked the former piece for insertion in our columns.

"The Jews," by J. M. Ausin, is an interesting article upon that "peculiar people." In reading the author's visit to the synagogue in New-York, we feel that strange thrill, which must have quivered over his own heart, upon thus "stepping back, as it were, from the Gospel to the Law, by one stride." They are indeed living and abiding monuments of the truth of Holy Writ.

Lines on a lock of hair—Religion natural to man—The Landscape—Universalism—Early Recollections—The Good Samaritan—The Hervey Family—Illustrations of Scriptural figures—The Fireman—Effect of Christianity—Faith, Hope, and Charity—A common subject considered—Trust in Providence—The Mechanic's Fair—The death of the Young—Hope—Thoughts on death—notes and piece of music, entitled "an evening Hymn"—are the remaining original articles, which we have not room more particularly to notice—several of them also we have not read—but our friends can gather from the notice we have given, the general tenor and style of the work. We trust that this periodical will continue well patronised, and we shall be happy to receive any subscriptions therefor, which may be sent us. Published monthly, by A. Tompkins, Boston; H. Bacon, Editor—price $2 per annum, in advance, to which 25 cents will be added, for every three months delay.

MONEY.

Let our friends yet in arrears, not forget us—our wants for money are constantly recurring; and although our receipts have improved a little—a very little—still, they are not yet sufficient to clear us of the difficulties in which the great dearth of money during the last four months has placed us. Let them, then, not forget us, but when they can, let them immediately forward what is due to, and sadly needed by us.

REMOVALS.

We should have noticed in our last the removal of Br. S. R. Smith, with his family, to Albany. It took place a week ago last Saturday, and on the following day he commenced his duties, as the Pastor of the Universalist Society in that city. The loss sustained by this section in the removal of Br. Smith, will, we trust, be fully made up to the cause at large, by his labors in that important station, and to himself and family, by a release from duties and labors the most arduous of any imposed on any family in the circle of our acquaintance.—Our best wishes attend him and his—those he has left behind, and those to whom he labors.

On Thursday a week, we were also called on to bid farewell to Br. Skinner and family, on his departure to the South in search of that sweetener of all other earthly enjoyments—health. His farewell discourse on the Sunday previous, drew moisture from many eyes "unused to the melting mood," and he departed accompanied by the devout prayers and good wishes of all who knew him.

* * All letters and papers intended for Br. S. R. Smith should be addressed, in future, to Albany—those for Br. Skinner, (concerning him personally.) may be addressed until further notice, to Richmond, Va. Letters to him on business, should be addressed as usual, to this office, as may be seen by the following NOTICE.

Being about to leave for the South, for an absence of six or eight months, I have left my business, connected with Books, Papers, etc., in the hands of Mrs. Grosh and Hutchinson. All persons, therefore, indebted to me for the Memoir of Rev. J. Freeman, for Letters to Aikin and Lansing, for other Books or pamphlets, or for the Magazine and Advocate while published by me, will oblige me by settling their several accounts at this office. There are very many subscribers who are in arrears, and agents who have long had monies belonging to me in their hands, who, I really hope, will not need another or any different call from this, to induce them to settle up their accounts.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

BIRTH-DAY STANZAS TO THE MEMORY OF MY MOTHER.

Natal morn! thou'rt a mirror that shows every taper,
Which flings e'en a twilight o'er memory's urn!
The dreams that were lost in oblivion's vapor,
All bright to the ken of my mind's eye, return.
And though far from the land, where my sire yet remains;
And the one my heart dwells with, as ere my transition;
To the charm-laden scenes of my dear native plains
I am borne back again, on the wings of my vision!

Not rejoicing, as one whose glad harp-strings are woven,
With jessamine, gather'd from childhood's fresh bow'r;
But reflecting, as one who a wand'rer hath proven,
With my life cover'd o'er with the wild prairie-flow'r—
Not elated, as one who hath caught the sweet tone,
Of a dear mother's voice, the deep heart-fountains swelling,
Ah no! on bright pinions her spirit hath flown,
To realms, where in glory the seraphs are dwelling!

When the death-angel spreads his white wings on the altar,
Where 'rose sweet incense of maternal love,
Then, methought a voice echo'd—"Tis right we exalt her,
From earth's leafless bow'r to an Eden above!"
She is gone!—she is gone!—to that palace on high,
Whose maker and builder, is Zion's great Founder—
Where no sin tempests gather—no death-arrows fly;
But the beauties transcendent of Heaven surround her!

Shall we sigh for our Mother, who's seen no more bending,
'Neath grief, that beclouded her pathway on earth?
Shall we mourn her departure, the while she is blinding,
Her anthems with angels', of heavenly birth!—
Shall we let a tear trickle o'er memory's shrine,
When we speak of her spirit unladen, that's soaring
Where heaven's bright splendor unceasingly shine,
On those waters, that Adam's lost race are restoring?

Would one wish recall her from that blissful dwelling,—
That wish hath no birth-place in this lonely breast!
But that ALL will appear where her anthems are swelling,
Is a hope that will lull this warm bosom to rest,
While I bear the bright armor of Zion's high King;
Till a chariot de-cend for my disenthralled spirit,
And I mount up, and soar on a love-impearled wing,
In that thrice blessed region, the ransomed inherit.

LINES TO A FRIEND.

BY REV. T. J. TENNY.

Come, gather flowers—flowers
From nature, every where—
And weave them in life's bowers,
To bloom in brightness there.

And, 'round thy forehead wreathing,
A chaplet, thou shalt be Adorn'd with beauty, breathing
Of truth and purity.

Bind roses in those locks of hair,
Of softest, deepest hue—
But lilies, water lilies, bear
Around the heart with you.

Pure emblems of a purer mind,
Let each in order stand—
'Till thou shalt leave this world behind,
For a better, better land!

For scenes of bliss unceasing—
For love's o'erflowing streams—
For glory still unceasing—
For heaven's all radiant beams—

For all that deep devotion
Could ever wish to be—
For a blessed saint's promotion—
For vast eternity!

Then gather flowers—flowers
From nature, every where—
And weave them in life's bowers,
To bloom in brightness there.

FLOWERS AT MOUNT AUBURN.

BY MISS M. A. DODD.

But why are not flowers—those pure and beautiful emblems of affection—more profusely and carefully cultivated by those who have here buried their dead? I would rather a rose-tree told the place of my repose, than the most costly marble, or the blue and lowly forget me not, than an elaborate inscription. Ye say "they are fair and fading memorials"—true, but their beauty may be renewed while the hand of affection shall tend them, and when this becomes a task for the nearest and dearest, why should the "storied urn" claim remembrance from the stranger? Ye may pile high the monument, but ye can not bid defiance to time; for granite and marble shall moulder, and the tenant of the tomb be forgotten. They tell not of touching tenderness, like the delicate and cherished plant. Then bring flowers, bright flowers for the departed. Young husband! thou art mourning the early darkening of the sunbeam which lit thy dwelling; plant here the locust, and its white and fragrant blossoms shall speak of "affection beyond the grave." And thou pale widow! though the mourning geranium tell of thy deep despondency; place near it the eglantine, which teaches that He who winged the shaft, but wounds to heal. Brother! thou art weeping for the fair blossom which grew up beside thee, lit-touched by an untimely frost. Her light steps shall no more fly to meet thee, nor her blue eyes sparkle with joy at thy coming. Let the lilac emblem her youthful innocence, and the white lily, her purity and beauty. And sister! though the purple hyacinth tell of thy sorrow, let the flowering reed grow up beside it, teaching "confidence in Heaven." Mourning mother! the daily rose and flower of an hour, are fit symbols of thy cherished but so early blighted, but the balm may mingle its fragrance with their evanescent beauty, and the poppy give consolation. Plant the laurel above the grave of ambition, the olive for the messenger of peace, the lowly broom and lily of the valley for the humble and pure in heart, the cedar and everlasting for remembrance, the almond, hope, and the amaranth, immortality. Then bring flowers, bright flowers for the departed. Let the sunlight fall softly on them, and dew-drops gem their tresses. The poet sings that their opened petals are the fair homes of their ministering spirits, and it is surely a pleasant and harmless superstition, to fancy that every blossom here cultivated, is made the dwelling place of a good angel who is watching over the dead. Then farewell to thy sweet and quiet shades, O lovely Auburn! and may they ever be as now, a fitting place for angel visitants, and the unseen presence of those who have gone home before us.—Ladies' Repository.

THE PEACE OF RELIGION.

There is a twofold peace. The first is negative. It is relief from quiet and corroding care. It is repose after conflict and storms. But there is another and a higher peace to which this is but the prelude, "a peace of God which passeth all understanding," and properly called "the kingdom of heaven within us." This state is anything but negative. It is the highest and most strenuous action of the soul, but an entirely harmonious action, in which all our powers and affections are blended in a beautiful proportion, and sustain and perfect one another.—It is more than silence after storms. It is as the concord of all melodious sounds. Has the reader never known a season, when, in the fullest flow of thought and feeling, in the universal action of the soul, an inward calm, profound as midnight silence, yet bright as the still summer noon, full of joy, but unbroken by one throb of tumultuous passion, has been breathed through his spirit, and given him a glimpse and presage of the serenity of a happier world? Of this character is the peace of religion. It is a conscious harmony with God and the creation, an alliance of love with all beings, a sympathy with all that is pure and happy, a surrender of every separate will and interest, a participation of the spirit and life of the universe, an entire concord of purpose with its Infinite Original. This is peace, and the true happiness of man; and we think that human nature has never entirely lost sight of this, its great end. It has always sighed for a repose, in which energy of thought and will might be tempered with all-pervading tranquillity.—We seem to discover aspirations after this good, a dim consciousness of it, in all ages of the world.—We think we see it in those systems of Oriental and Grecian philosophy, which proposed, as the consummation of present virtue, a release from all disquiet, and an intimate union and harmony with the Divine Mind. We even think, that we trace this consciousness, this aspiration, in the works of ancient art which time has spared to us, in which the sculptor, aiming to embody his deepest thoughts of human perfection, has joined with the fulness of life and strength, a repose, which breathes into the spectator an admiration as calm as it is exalted. Man, we believe, never wholly loses the sentiment of his true good. There are yearnings, sighings, which he does not himself comprehend, which break forth alike in his prosperous and adverse seasons, which betray a deep, indestructible faith in a good that he has not found, and which, in proportion as they grow distinct, rise to God, and concentrate the soul in him, as at once its life and rest, the fountain at once of energy and peace.—Channing.

Also, in Otsego, 3d inst., Miss AMANDA S. KELLOGG, aged 17 years.

Both these amiable and excellent women were members of the choir of the Universalist meeting in Cooperstown—both believers in the glorious doctrine of Universalism—both adorned their professions with well ordered lives, and died in its cheering hopes. The funerals of both were attended, and discourses delivered by Br. Whiston.

In Perryburg, N. Y., September 4th, Mrs. SYLVIA SPRAGUE, in her 39th year. This amiable woman was carried away by that malignant disease, the consumption; which bears so many of our best-loved friends to the tomb! She had been a believer in the doctrine of endless misery, and a member of the Baptist church, nearly twenty years! Two or three years since, she was excommunicated from that society, because she embraced more honorable views of the divine character than she had entertained. By searching the oracles of divine truth, she learned that Christ was verily "foreordained before the foundation of the world"—that in him God had laid the plan of immortal salvation for all his intelligent offspring—and when called by the purity of his nature to inflict punishments upon his wayward children, she believed they would be paternal—a means and not an end in his moral government; and that God would not be so unwise as to inflict punishments that would entirely prevent him from accomplishing his purposes, and destroy the best plan he ever made for the good of his children. Before her death she requested the writer of this notice to attend her funeral—and while struggling with death she forever silenced the believers of endless sin and pain who stood around her dying bed, by telling them that she was happy, and resigned to the will of her Maker, and was going to her Saviour, where all "are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection."

She has left a husband and five children to mourn her departure from them. Br. Sprague, who was once a member of the same church, but now a believer in the final redemption of all mankind, knows and appreciates the heavenly truths that yield him consolation in his afflictions—may Heaven's choicest blessings rest upon him and his little flock that are left to his charge. Her funeral was attended on the 5th, and religious blessings and hopes were presented to the mourners and neighbors who came to sympathize with them, by

ORIGINAL SERMON.

BY REV. W. E. MANLEY.

"And as it was in the days of Noe, so shall it be also, in the days of the Son of Man. They did eat, they drank, they married wives, they were given marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark, and the flood came and destroyed them all. Likewise, also, as it was in the days of Lot: they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded. But the same day that Lot went out of Sodom, it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all. Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of Man is revealed." LUKE xvii: 26-30.

This passage of Scripture brings to view three instances of the special judgments of God upon wicked men, viz., the destruction of the antediluvians, by the flood; of the Sodomites, by fire and brimstone; and of the Jews, by the Roman armies. The two former are named by our Saviour, to illustrate the latter. The particular point which he seems to have been especially desirous of illustrating, was the sudden and unexpected nature of these judgments. He would have his hearers understand, that, as in the case of the antediluvians and the Sodomites, so in the case of the Jews, the calamities to be poured out upon them, were to be sudden and unexpected. But though this particular was the one to which the attention of our Saviour's auditors was particularly directed; still the comparison may be carried farther, without doing violence to the text, or to other scriptural testimonies, relating to the same subject.

The comparison contained in the text, suggests the two following propositions—1st. That the Scriptures contain no evidence of the endless misery of the antediluvians, the Sodomites, or the Jews. 2d. The Scriptures do contain evidence of the limitedness of their punishment—and also evidence of their final happiness.

I. The first of these propositions is sustained by the considerations that follow:—

1. The history of the respective instances of punishment, mentioned in the text, contains no intimation that more than temporal suffering was inflicted or endured. That this is a fact, no one can doubt who is familiar with his Bible. The language of God respecting the antediluvians, is, "I will destroy man, whom I have created, from the face of the earth; both man, and beast, and the creeping thing, and the fowls of the air: for it repenteth me that I have made them."—Gen. vi: 7. Respecting the Sodomites, it is stated, that "the Lord rained upon Sodom, and upon Gomorrah, brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven. And he overthrew those cities, and all the plain, and all the inhabitants of the cities, and that which grew upon the ground."—Gen. xix: 24, 25. All the terms here made use of, and also of the connexion in which these passages occur, clearly evince that nothing but temporal destruction was inflicted upon them. At least, the hearer will search in vain to find any intimation that endless misery was, or ever would be, their portion. The same may be said of the destruction of the Jews, predicted in the text. All that is said of that event, evinces the temporal nature of their punishment; and nothing is said or intimated respecting any other punishment being inflicted upon them. Even in Matt. xxiii: 33, where our Saviour inquires of the Scribes and Pharisees, "how can ye escape the damnation of hell," the connexion clearly shows that all the damnation of hell alluded to, was contained in those temporal calamities he there describes, and concerning which he says, "all these things shall come upon this generation."

Now let the serious and important question be proposed, how can we account for this silence of Scripture, respecting the endless misery of these several classes of people, if endless misery was to be their portion as soon as they had passed from the shores of time? It would seem that the most proper place for giving us some intimation of their final destiny, in a world of immortal wo, was while relating their temporal destruction. Yet, when we search for such intimation in the Bible, we find it not. And the reason is, that it is not there.

2. Many, and perhaps I might say most, Limitarian divines admit, that the doctrine of endless wo is not taught in the Old Testament. And whatever may be thought or said by those who do not admit this, it is certain that previous to the destruction of the Sodomites, no traces of the doctrine of endless misery are to be found. Even the word hell, nor the original of which it is a translation, does not occur in the Bible, till a long time after the history of the destruction of the Sodomites. Accordingly, if hell, the supposed place of endless suffering in the future world, existed in that age, it existed without a name, and without the knowledge of mankind.

How does this fact accord with what we know, and what every body admits, respecting the divine character? The antediluvians and the Sodomites, are taken from time into eternity, and consigned to the mansions of unending wretchedness, without the least previous intimation that such was to be their awful destiny! How, I ask, does this accord with the divine character? What a contrast between this course of conduct and the declaration of Scripture, that the Lord is good unto all, and that he is kind to the evil and the unthankful!

It can not be replied, that Noah preached the doctrine of endless misery to the old world; and that Lot did the same to the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah; for, in the first place, the assertion is wholly destitute of argument to sustain it—and, in the second place, it stands opposed to the fact previously stated, that we find no traces of the doctrine in question, till a long time after this period—Limitarians themselves being judges. If this doctrine had been known and preached before the flood, or even before Moses' day, it is impossible that he should not have given us some intimation of the fact. He does not give us to understand that either the Israelites or the Pagans believed it, at this period; and though it is to be traced to the latter, yet it is probable that their prolific imaginations had not, at this time, given rise to so horrid a dogma.

3. The destruction of the antediluvians and the Sodomites, is referred to in the Scriptures, in a great number of instances, as a warning to others; but it is always their temporal sufferings, and not their endless misery, that are alluded to. The following are the only passages that can be supposed to constitute an exception. Matt. x: 15—"Verily I say unto you, it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, than for that city." Matt. xi: 23, 24—"And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted to heaven, shalt be brought down to hell: for if the mighty works which have been done in thee, had been done in Sodom, it would have remained till this day. But I say unto you, it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom, in the day of judgment, than for you." See, also, Mark vi: 11, and Luke x: 12, 14.

That these passages do not refer to a punishment in the future world, may be made to appear by offering, first, a brief explanation of every thing about them, which can be supposed to favor such a construction; and, secondly, giving a statement of some things connected with them, which make a different construction more obviously correct.

1st. It is asserted, that "the day of judgment" must mean a future period in which God, in a special manner, is to judge mankind; or, in other words, it must refer to the general judgment at the last day.

This, I know, is the common understanding of the phrase, "the day of judgment"; but from this it by no means follows, that such was its original application. There is one thing, not to say more, connected with this phrase, which convinces me that the common application of the passage is incorrect. Our translators had no right to give us the phrase as it now stands. It should have been, "a day of judgment." This accords with the original, and gives us to understand, that there are more days of judgment than one. Hence we say, that when God destroyed the old world, it was a day of judgment with them—when he destroyed the Sodomites, or the Jews, it was to them, respectively, a day of judgment.

2d. It is said in the passages we are considering, "it shall be more tolerable": thus referring us to a future period, and to a future punishment. True—this language refers to a future period, and to a future punishment, but not to a period or a punishment in the future world. The period referred to, was that at which God would pour out his judgments upon the wicked Jews, as he had done upon the Sodomites. The language is that of a comparison between two instances of punishment—the one past, the other future. Accordingly it was as proper to say it shall be, as it was to say it has been: the former, it is true, literally throws both instances of punishment into the future; but the latter would have thrown them both into the past, and been equally untrue, literally, as the former—allowing, as we contend, the comparison to relate only to temporal punishments. Either of these forms, however, would have been perfectly intelligible; as other expressions and remarks, connected with them, plainly evince that a comparison between a past and a future event, was intended. The form made use of, was such as the people at that time were accustomed to use in such comparisons; and similar to those which we often use in similar cases.

3d. It is said that the punishment of Capernaum, which is compared to that of Sodom, was to be in hell: "thou shalt be brought down to hell"—and that hell here means a place of endless punishment, is made obvious by its being contrasted with heaven.

This argument I apprehend to be rather unfortunate for the popular construction of the passage; for it is certain that Capernaum was never exalted to a spiritual and eternal heaven: and hence, the contrast clearly proves that it was not to be brought down to a spiritual and eternal hell. It was to be brought down to hell, (hades;) it is true; but the hell to which it was to be brought, was to be where the heaven was, to which it had been exalted—viz., in this world. Hell is sometimes used in Scripture by way of contrast with heaven; but the heaven with which it is contrasted, is here, and not in a future state. For an explanation of the term hades in this passage, see Clarke on the place.

We will now name some things that stand opposed to the popular construction of the passage we are considering.

1st. The language, "land of Sodom," "that city," etc., does not appear to me to be as appropriate, when applied to the spiritual world, as some other would be. On the contrary, its aspect is strictly temporal.

2d. In the immediate context, Tyre and Sidon are brought into the comparison; and it is said of them, "if the mighty works which have been done in you, had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repeated long ago, sitting in sackcloth and ashes." This must certainly refer to the state of Tyre and Sidon in this world; for sackcloth and ashes are not adapted to a spiritual state of existence. And if their temporal condition is referred to, why not admit the same of those cities compared to them?

3d. When it is said of Capernaum, "thou shalt be brought down to hell," it is added, "for if the mighty works which have been done in thee, had been done in Sodom, it would have remained to this day." Its not being allowed to remain, or in other words, its temporal destruction, was its punishment alluded to; and hence I affirm, that when our Saviour immediately added, "it shall be more tolerable," etc., every body must have understood him as making a comparison between the past temporal destruction of Sodom, just mentioned by him, and the future temporal destruction of the Jews.

4th. While this view of the passage has nothing in the connexion to oppose it, but much to favor it, it also accords with the teachings of our Saviour in other places. For instance, he says of the temporal calamities coming upon the Jews, that they should exceed every thing that had gone before. Of course, every other temporal judgment must have been more tolerable than that.

Again: Jude 7—"Even as Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities about them, in like manner, giving themselves over to fornication, and going after strange flesh, are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire."

1st. That Sodom and Gomorrah were destroyed by fire, as here stated by Jude, is a historical fact; and was then as well as now. 2d. That this fire was eternal according to the meaning of the original of that word, is capable of the clearest and most satisfactory proof. It lasted till it had utterly consumed those cities, for which it was sent. It also continued to burn for ages afterwards. And this was all that was necessary to justify the application of the original word, here rendered eternal. 3d. The cities of Sodom and Gomorrah were set forth as an example, and were subsequently referred to as such, to warn others against crime.

To illustrate what is here said of the Sodomites and the inhabitants of Gomorrah being an example, let another passage be brought forward and considered in connexion with this. 2 Pet. ii: 5, 6, 7—"And spared not the old world, but saved Noe, the eighth person, a preacher of righteousness; bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly. And turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes, condemning them with an overthrow, making them an ensample unto those that after should live ungodly. And delivering just Lot, vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked." This passage clearly proves that Sodom and Gomorrah were set forth as an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire in this world. Besides, the expression, "those that after should live ungodly," proves that there was an afterwards to their punishment, and that, accordingly, it could not be endless.

And again: respecting this example, it may be remarked, that to suppose it in the future world, is to represent God as setting an example before people for no purpose, or for an evil purpose. To us, punishment in the future world, is not an example. It can only be such to those who are there—to the saints in heaven, or to the damned in hell. To the latter it must be useless, as it can do them no good; and to the former, so far from doing them good, reason would say that it would render them more miserable. How must just Lot feel, to see his wife set forth as an example to him, suffering the vengeance of an angry God, and of a flaming hell, to all eternity? Lot had the feelings of humanity as well as we—he doubtless loved his wife as well as any man; and now, can it be supposed that her wailings will contribute to his enjoyment?

If so, God deliver me from becoming his company, in a place of such marble indifference and cold-hearted malignity.

These passages being explained, let me repeat my previous remark, that whenever the destruction of the antediluvians and the Sodomites, is referred to in Scripture, as an example to others, it is to their temporal punishment, and not to endless misery, that reference is had. This, with other reasons named, together with still more that might be named, I regard as sufficient to be adduced in favor of my first proposition, especially as all the arguments to be brought forward in favor of the second, bear with equal force upon this.

II. We are now to prove that the Scriptures contain evidence that the punishment suffered by the antediluvians, the Sodomites, and the Jews, is limited, and that final happiness is to be their portion.

I. To sustain this proposition, the first passage that I would bring forward, is 1 Pet. iii: 19, 20—"By which also he went and preached to the spirits in prison, which sometime were disobedient, where once the long suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was preparing, wherein few, that is, eight souls were saved by water." It had been my intention to introduce this passage while discussing my first proposition, and to show that it contained no evidence of the endless misery of the antediluvians; but on further reflection, it seems to me to belong more properly to the present proposition, than to the former. If the passage does not (as some maintain) refer to the future world, it will not, of course, be supposed that it favors the doctrine of the ceaseless wretchedness of those that were destroyed by the flood. And if it does refer to another world, as others contend, so far from proving the endless misery of any part of mankind, it seems to me to contain plain intimations, if not positive proof, that the antediluvians are to be the subjects of salvation. If this does not appear obvious to the hearer, let him answer the following question—Would the Lord Jesus Christ have gone and preached to the spirits in prison, knowing that their destiny was fixed—their fate sealed to all eternity, and that neither his preaching, nor that of any other being, would procure their redemption?

It is not for me to say (at least in the present discourse, for necessity does not seem to require it) what the meaning of the passage is; but only, that allowing it to refer to the future world, it favors the doctrine, that the spirits in prison were not to suffer endlessly, but were finally to repent of their wickedness, believe the Gospel, and be saved.

2. In Ezek. xvi: 50, it is said of the inhabitants of Sodom, "And they were haughty, and committed abomination before me, therefore, I took them away, as I saw good." This is just what we should expect of the Father of the spirits of all flesh. He is good to all, and acts towards all according to the principles of benevolence. Now, the only rational construction that can be put upon this passage, must involve the sentiment, that the condition of the Sodomites, after they were taken away, must have been better than it was before. It is impossible that the Deity could have considered it good to take them away, and make them infinitely more sinful and wretched than they were on earth. And if he took them away as he saw good, or to improve their condition, why may we not suppose that such was his motive in the destruction of Noah's contemporaries, and in the destruction of the Jews, and in all similar cases? That this is the case, is obvious from Ps. cxxvi, where, to several instances of the kind, the emphatic expression is immediately subjoined, "for his mercy endureth forever." The Psalmist offers thanksgiving to Him who "overthrew Pharaoh in the Red Sea; for his mercy endureth forever." May we not add, "and destroyed the old world by a flood: for his mercy endureth forever—and burned up the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah; for his mercy endureth forever—and destroyed the Jewish nation, by famine, pestilence, and the sword; for his mercy endureth forever"? There is no way to vindicate the character of God, but by the supposition that all his judgments are ordered in mercy, and designed for the good of the sufferers.

Again: in the immediate connexion of the passage just quoted from Ezek. xvi, we find the following testimony in favor of the ultimate redemption of the Sodomites and the Jews: "When I shall bring again their captivity, the captivity of Sodom and her daughters, and the captivity of Samaria and her daughters, then will I bring again the captivity of thy captives in the midst of them.... When thy sisters, Sodom and her daughters, shall return to their former estate, then thou and thy daughters shall return to their former estate." See verses 53-55. How perfectly in accordance with this is the language of the apostle, (Rom. xi: 25, 26,) "that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in; and so all Israel shall be saved."

3. Another evidence in favor of the limitedness of the punishment of the Sodomites, and consequently of their final salvation, may be found in Lam. iv: 6, compared with Isaiah xl: 2. The former passage reads thus: "For the punishment of the iniquity of the daughter of my people, is greater than the punishment of the sin of Sodom, that was overthrown as in a moment, and no hands stayed on her." The latter reads as follows: "Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her, that her warfare is accomplished, that her iniquity is pardoned; for she hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins."

The argument which these two passages contain, may be stated thus:—The punishment of the Jews was limited—their sins were pardoned—still this punishment was greater than that inflicted upon the Sodomites: hence the conclusion that the punishment of the latter, as well as the former, was limited. And reasoning from analogy, we should conclude, that all similar punishments inflicted upon mankind, (that of the antediluvians, for example,) must be limited also.

4. The last argument to be adduced in favor of the position I am attempting to establish, is found in the fact, that there are numerous passages of Scripture which assert the finite nature and extent of punishment, and the unlimited extent of final salvation.

These passages of course embrace the antediluvians, the Sodomites, the Egyptians, the Jews, and all other people. As certain as universal salvation is sure, so certain is their's sure. And if universal salvation is not true, then there is no truth in the Bible, and the history of even the temporal destruction of the inhabitants of the old world, those of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the Jews, will have to be regarded as untrue—for it is certain, that he who can construe the declaration, "who will have all men to be saved," without admitting universal salvation, can find no difficulty in perverting similar passages that relate to other subjects, not excepting the plainest statements of historical facts.

Before concluding this discourse, I will offer a remark or two upon the common representation of the destruction of the antediluvians and the Sodomites.

It is said that they were wicked people. This is true. But it is affirmed, that, according to the doctrine of Universalism, God took these people suddenly out of this miserable world, into the state of immortal blessedness, in consequence of their wickedness; and left righteous Noah and just Lot to endure a long time the buffetings of this world, because they were better than their wicked neighbors. How, says the objector, is this to be reconciled with the justice of God?

The reply we have to offer, is this. The representation given is incorrect. It was not on account of the sins of the antediluvians and Sodomites, that they were taken to heaven. It was doubtless on account of their sins that they were made to endure temporal destruction: but their salvation, whether effected immediately after they were dead, or at some future period, is to be ascribed wholly to the grace and mercy of God. Again: Noah and Lot were not left to endure the miseries of this world on account of their righteousness. It was, that they might receive the enjoyments which this world is capable of affording to those who, like themselves, were just and righteous persons. And when they died, it was on account of the grace of God alone that they could be saved. They had no more claim to salvation than their wicked neighbors—as neither had any claim to it.

The counter part to this representation may now be heard. The people of the old world, and the inhabitants of Sodom, were exceedingly wicked, and God was angry at them, and took them out of the world, “as he saw good,” and made them infinitely worse than they were here. Again: their wickedness had made them wretched, and God was “grieved at his heart,” on account of their miserable condition, and accordingly he took them out of the world, and sent them to a fiery hell, where they would be infinitely more miserable than they were on earth!

Now, allowing these two representations to be both correct, (though the first is not, while the last positively is, according to the respective doctrines concerning which the representations are given,) which, I would ask in the first place, ascribes the most goodness to God? If the amount of divine goodness is to be estimated by the amount of happiness it produces, which is doubtless a correct criterion, it is obvious that the salvation of those people was a greater act of goodness, than their damnation could be. Their salvation must certainly conduce to their own happiness, and can in no way be supposed to interfere with the happiness of others.

In the second place, let it be asked, which representation ascribes the most consistency to God? If those people were taken from the world to become infinitely more sinful and miserable than they were here, God must have acted in a very inconsistent manner, by taking them away. If he was displeased with their condition here, would he not have acted with more consistency by improving that condition, than by rendering it worse? If he was displeased with their wickedness here, is it not obvious that he took them away that they might become better? And, furthermore, if he was displeased with their misery here, is it not rational to conclude that he took them away to make them more happy? Surely this must be supposed, if God is a consistent being.

In conclusion, I have a single question to propose. Why is it that people generally have so little compassion or sympathy for the antediluvians, and the Sodomites, and I may add, the Egyptians? These people seem to be utterly excluded from the affections of the human heart. Others, not excepting the Jews, who have been swept from the earth by similar judgments, are the objects of compassion. Not so with them. Why is this?

MORTALITY.

Change and decay are indelibly written on all things of an earthly nature. Mortality is stamped in legible characters on every thing here below. Man, and all his noble works, as well as the inferior species of creation—the earth which we inhabit, and all its productions bear the impress of mortality. Wherever we turn our eyes, we behold nothing that is durable—nothing but what fades and passes away.

Time's stern visage has witnessed kingdoms and empires rise in a short space of time, to enjoy a brief state of prosperity, then, totter and come to naught. It has seen the beautiful specimen of architecture, which was the employment of some mighty artist for years—the massive edifice of stone, which seemed to bid defiance to time or power—and the towering dome, which stretched far into the blue ether to emulate the skies—crumble and mingle with their native dust. It has seen the moralist, philosopher and sage, who have enriched the world by the vast resources of their giant minds—the statesman whose eloquence shook public halls, and the warrior who nerved his arm to the downfall of empires—all have their day of glory, then laid powerless in the narrow house appointed for all the living. The great and good—the learned and unlearned—the virtuous and vicious—are alike subject to the control of mortality. They pass into the dark shades of oblivion, and the places that knew them shall know them no more forever. We turn to our friends to enjoy their society—they are hastening to that land from whence no traveller returns. We lock them in the fond embraces of our love, resolving to part with them never—but the sovereign mandate is given, and must be obeyed. The ruthless hand of death plucks them from our bosoms and consigns them to the cold tomb. It matters not how dearly loved, how fondly cherished, how highly prized they are, for none of these things move the grim king of terrors or cause him to loose his unrelenting grasp. There is nothing earthly but what is transitory and fading—that is not subject to change and decay. And, when our spirits are well nigh crushed to the earth by sorrow and despondency, is there no balm in Gilead, which applied will give us rest? Oh! yes, blessed be God! we have the assurance that this mortal shall put on immortality—that this corruptible shall put on incorruption—and as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly. O glorious promise! Thine, Father of mercies to bestow, and ours to enjoy! Well may we triumphantly ask, O death, where now is thy sting? O grave, where now is thy victory?

INTRODUCTION OF DEATH.—A DIALOGUE.

Limitarian. Friend G—, I was somewhat surprised yesterday, on hearing a person of your good sense combating the doctrine, “that the vegetable and animal worlds, anterior to the first sin, were perfect, and not subject to decay.”

Universalist. You were surprised, probably, at the weakness of my arguments.

L. I was surprised that you should be found combating the doctrine of the Bible.

U. Indeed! I should be surprised at that myself. But in opposing the position you mention, I have the Bible to support me, instead of having to contend with it. To ask a man to believe that man, beast, and vegetable became mortal by the first transgression, is about as reasonable as it would be to propose for his belief the position, that the falling of a body to the earth, is the cause of gravity, instead of its effect.

L. We are informed in the fore part of Genesis, that death was brought into the world by sin.

U. The death that Adam died on the day of his transgression, was, but no other.

L. Time with the Lord, is one continual now. U. True, and by his using the term “day,” he evidently adapts his language to the capacity of those who reckon time by the use of that term, and not to Himself, with whom it “is one continual now.” Adam died a moral death on the “day” of transgression; and whoever goes beyond this, must proceed upon the assumption, that what is not written may be inferred. But this is not all; you will allow, I suppose, that carnivorous animals existed before Adam's transgression?

L. If I do, it will be acknowledging that death existed!

U. Well, be careful and not do that, even if you have to deny a dozen axioms!

L. I do not feel fully prepared to answer such an interrogation, having never considered it in all its bearings.

U. Very well, then, let us take the first chapter of Genesis. We are there informed, that the herbs were given to man and beasts “for meat,” this shows, positively, that death reigned in the vegetable world. The same chapter says to man and beast, “multiply and replenish;” now I am at a loss to conceive what would be the state of the world, if continued propagation of animal nature, were not counterbalanced by a corresponding mortality of the same. Surely the world could not contain a fraction of them. In the third chapter we are informed that the serpent was “more subtle than any beast of the field.” How could one beast be more “subtle” than another, if all had been “perfectly pure and holy?” Or, in other words, can there be any such thing as “subtlety” in a perfect world, abounding with nothing but perfection?

L. I will think of this subject, and answer you at some future time, your ideas are new to me.

U. Do think of them, and examine the first chapter of Genesis at the same time; you will there find more ideas concerning this, which are as “new” as any I have advanced. SIGMA.

THE SABBATH.

BY REV T. J. TENNY.

It is a blessed privilege we enjoy of assembling ourselves together, on each returning Sabbath, to deliberate on the glorious truths of the Scriptures.

Here we lay by the cares of the week—its sorrows and perplexities—its pains and sufferings—its frowns and heart sickenings—for the contemplation of Deity in all the beauty and grandeur of his most lovely works.

Joy is written on every countenance as the happiness of mortality is displayed to the understanding of the hearer; for holiness is comely and maketh the heart glad; a blissful calmness diffuseth itself over and through the whole system as the promises of divine favor meet the ear of the listener—and the soul becomes enwrapped in glory—in heaven—in GOD, as our doubts and fears give way to the gentle influence of devoted, unlimited and unchanging love.

“Here we come thy name to praise,
Let us feel thy presence near,
May thy glory meet our eyes
While we in thy house appear,
Here afford us, Lord, a taste
Of our everlasting feast.

“May the Gospel's joyful sound,
Conquer sinners, comfort saints;
Make the fruits of grace abound;
Bring relief from all complaints;
Thus let all our Sabbaths prove,
Till we join the church above.”

Brethren, if we have any feelings of devotion—any aspiration for things holy—any love for the welfare of our fellow-men—any notions of immortality—of bliss, we shall hail the day with gladness on which the Saviour ascended from the grave, and led captivity captive, displaying a love unexampled in all the annals of the nations, and kingdoms of the world.

Let it not pass then, without drawing one step nearer to God, by lessening the love of life in the resplendent, infinite glory of heaven.

THE CONTRAST.

It is often said, and truly, that we never fully appreciate health until we can contrast it with sickness. So it is with every thing—the world abounds with contrasts. But we have one of a peculiar nature. It is a contrast between being full fed with the choicest viands of heaven, prepared and served up for the occasion, by one who has spent all his days in feeding the hungry with the “bread of life,” and being compelled to live in a state of starvation, anxiously looking for some kind ministering angel to bring us a morsel from the table of plenty. O what a change! A few weeks ago and Sunday brought with it a “feast of fat things.” Now it brings want, hunger, and thirst to those who formerly rejoiced at the weekly banquet. Must we starve? UNIVERSALISM GOOD TO LIVE BY.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

It is a singular fact, that our enemies have admitted enough to prove Universalism—yes, even one concession is sufficient to show its purity and moral tendency. And the very admission proves their own doctrine to be useless to society. I refer to the oft-repeated declaration, that the sentiment which we maintain, will do to live by. It must be evident, then, that Partialism will not answer for life, for two opposite doctrines in morals, can not have the same effect. When our opposers made this declaration, they virtually, but unwittingly, said to the world, that Universalism was the best doctrine, and that their own was of no practical utility. But why is Universalism good to live by? Because—

1. It teaches the certainty of punishment for every transgression. It declares, "though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished." "He that doeth wrong, shall receive for the wrong which he hath done; and there is no respect of persons with God." Our opposers, it is true, preach more punishment, but then they uniformly urge the sinner to repent, bolding up the idea that this will enable him to avoid the consequences of his transgressions. No doubt, thousands have been thus deluded.* Partialism has been the cause of more crime than all other causes put together. It should ever be remembered, that in all correct codes of criminal law, it is laid down as a first principle, that it is not the duration nor the severity of punishment that has the greatest moral effect, but the certainty. Universalism lies at the foundation of all good laws. It is the only doctrine that can ever be successfully employed for the reformation of the world. The inseparable connexion which it presents between crime and misery, would, if realized, entirely prevent all transgression. It is evident, therefore, that it will do to live by.

2. Universalism will answer for life, because it rises above our narrow and selfish feelings. It teaches that there is salvation for our neighbors, as well as for ourselves. Hence, it never feeds pride and haughtiness. The Universalist is obliged to believe that, in eternity, his bitterest enemy will enjoy equal blessings with himself. Should he feel angry, he is reminded, at once, that it is contrary to the spirit of his doctrine; whereas, Partialism teaches that even God is angry, and will remain so forever! Indeed, there is no room for pride in Universalism. All are at once brought on to a level with regard to the blessings of eternity. True, in the present life, it makes a difference "between him that serveth God, and him that serveth him not." To the one, it presents blessedness and peace; to the other, anguish and misery. Hence, Universalism will do to live by.

3. Universalism teaches man that he has a kind and merciful Father in heaven, who loves all his offspring, and will continue to bless them all forever. Hence, it calls off our affections from every thing of a vain nature, and leads us directly to God. Could the world once feel the power of the undervalued and perfect love of God, all hatred and wrath would cease forever. Man has, unfortunately, been so long taught that God is his enemy, that he takes no pleasure in the contemplation of his moral perfections. Universalism, alone, can bring the world back to God. Let it be proclaimed, therefore, in all its fulness, power, and beauty. Let its advocates pour forth upon the world the host of arguments that may be presented in its favor. Above all, let its professors bring out in their lives and conversation, its moral purity. It will be almost useless to tell the world that our doctrine is holy, just, and good, and then to live in the habitual violation of its sacred principles. May God help you, reader, to try this doctrine, and then you will know whether it is of God, or of man.

THE CHARACTER OF WASHINGTON.

BY MISS U. M. FELTON.

A person who attempts at the present day to say any thing new of Washington, may be termed arrogant; and he who can say nothing about him, may justly be censured for ignorance upon a subject with which all ought to be acquainted. It is a subject which has employed the talents of the master-spirits of the age, and exhausted, as it were, the descriptive powers of language. The beauty of any external object is fascinating, but the moral beauty of Washington exhibits an appearance on which the pleased eye might linger for ages and never become wearied. Distinguished from childhood for unsullied veracity and self-denial, his youthful virtues grew with his growth, and strengthened with his strength, till virtue and Washington were synonymous terms. When called into public service, far from betraying pride and vanity, he was eminently distinguished for that modesty which is the sure attendant of merit. The whole tenor of his life presents a shining pattern of excellence. On a sacred and punctilious performance of every duty, he founded his interest.—Punctuality and perseverance were incorporated in his nature—unwearied exertion for the benefit of mankind, was the basis on which he founded his happiness. Endowed with quick passions, he attained over them an unlimited control, and seemed to possess the infirmities of nature, only to make his character more perfect by subduing them. Others have been great warriors, great statesmen, great politicians—Washington, uniting these three characters in one, was great in goodness. When danger called him to the field, his courage, like his goodness, seemed to be of a peculiar cast; not that which rushes recklessly on into scenes of blood and carnage, but that which sustained unmoved the insults of his most inveterate foes. But the most brilliant point of his character, and that which cast a superiority over all the rest, was his constant reference, both in public and private, to that almighty Power whose agent he was in forming this great Republic. Conscious of the important nature of his undertaking, and viewing with a prophet's eye the mighty benefits that would result to mankind, he seems to have constantly drawn from the fount of wisdom, resources which supported him amidst the most severe discouragements, and which conducted him safely through the most imminent perils. Fame with her hundred tongues has deservedly spread his name throughout the earth, and exhibited the wonderful beauty and sublimity of his character to all ranks and conditions. It is a stimulus to the child to excel in filial duty, an incentive to youth to promote the welfare of his country—to the middle aged it presents a shining pattern of disinterestedness, and confirms the aged in their choice of retirement among scenes of nature, to contemplate nature's God. The name of Washington has been properly called the watchword of liberty. It is the main spring of republicanism—the polar star in the political horizon, to which the conscientious statesman looks, to guide him in his devious and uncertain way. It causes the heart of the virtuous to glow with warmer emotions, and buoys him up in high and difficult undertaking. Even the vicious bow beneath its mighty sway; and the wily politician, seeking to undermine the fabric of independence, with eloquence flowing from his mouth and malice rankling at his heart, points to the portrait of Washington, and makes to it a sublime apostrophe, while he wantonly contradicts every precept which it inspires. The celebrated Charles Phillips in speaking of Washington, has emphatically said, "Mankind are his posterity, his dwelling is the universe, his fame is eternity."

HEALTH AND HAPPINESS.

Happiness, as Paley has observed, consists in a considerable degree in health. He who has gazed upon the gambols of young animals, who has witnessed the delightful overflowings of animal healthfulness and spirits in the infant, may conceive of the happiness there is in health. He, who in his own person has felt this happiness reproduced by the departure of sickness and suffering, will be ready to subscribe to the dogma of Paley.—This same vivacity of feeling, of which the convalescent is conscious for a few days after his recovery from languor and pain, seems to be in perpetual vigor in the young of our own and other races of animals. Animal gladness seems that species of joy, which is provided by the Author of Nature for all animals, during youth and growth. It is the element in which the spirit breathes.—For other animals, in their maturity, other sources of well-feeling are superadded, and for man, in the strength of his maturity, there are provided gratifications which have reference less to his animal than to his intellectual and moral nature.—Paley says, "When we are in perfect health and spirits, we feel in ourselves a happiness independent of any particular outward gratification whatever, and of which we can give no account. This is an enjoyment which the Deity has annexed to life, and it probably constitutes, in a great measure, the happiness of infants and brutes."—Now let us pause and inquire, why is it so? Do we not plainly perceive in this provision for our happiness, before our minds are capable of taking care of their own well-being, and in making this joy the constant companion of the brutes, that He who made us, made us to be happy—that the hand that made us is Divine—and, too, divinely good? Can we look upon infancy—healthy infancy, in the exuberance of its joys, in the overflowings of its delightful existence, without feeling that our Father is Love indeed? Can we look upon that age which seems beloved of Heaven, upon which have been showered all its delights, without emotions of grateful joy? God is good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all his works! Is not this truth forced upon the heart, when we behold how joy is the very atmosphere of the young spirit—how all its sorrows are transient as the early dews which the sun's first beams dispel from the eyelids of the opening flowers—how all its faculties are expanding in joy—how it is gathering in its delights, strength against a sterner season, in short, when we see how abundantly God has provided for those who could not provide for themselves? We trust every heart feels so.

IGNORANCE.

The great obstacle, which impedes the progress of Christianity, is ignorance. This forms the insurmountable barrier to the furtherance of pure principles and benevolent actions. It is an indisputable fact, that we must be brought to know and comprehend the nature and extent of the relations we sustain towards our fellows, our duty to our neighbors and our God, before we will act accordingly. It is utterly impossible to convert the intemperate, restrain the wicked, or turn the vicious from their course, so long as their minds are enveloped in Egyptian darkness.—You must first enlighten their minds, in order that they may estimate the evil to which they are prone, and the misery consequent of such inclinations. Teach them the nature and object of their moral and religious obligations, and a reformation will most assuredly follow. It is, therefore, impracticable to facilitate the doctrines or measures of any sect or party, without previously imbuing the minds of their subjects, with a sense of its utility and importance. Now, it is well known, that we can have no perceptions, only through the medium of the nerves—so, on the other hand, we can have no idea of right or wrong, good or evil, without education. In this way, it is easy to account for the oft times ill success of the preacher. It matters not how thoroughly he may have digested his subject and maturely considered its bearings—still, frequently he sighs in sorrow and sadness, that his discourse has no effect. Some preparatory measures are indispensably necessary, in order that lectures, however powerful, should have the desired effect. The mind must be fully prepared, ere it will receive and nourish good principles and good habits. Like the soil, it needs the best of culture. An uncultivated mind may be compared to a barren soil—it is encumbered with briars, and thorns, and noxious weeds, which stifle and check the growth of all those tender sensibilities that exalt us above the brute, and adorn us in the image of our Maker. How much more real, lasting benefit, might be derived from the agency of temperance lectures, would they but take this preliminary step. They would not then so often complain, about talking to the walls, and their words falling on barren soils. Let them throw away their pledges so frequently violated, and devote a portion of their time to imparting instruction to those whose minds are ready to receive instruction. Much more good will result from such a course. This atony of the mind prevails in every department of society—in all the grades and stations of life. It is the chief cause of the tardy progress of Universalism. Before every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess—ere all shall know the Lord from the least to the greatest—the people must be enlightened en masse. The practice of explaining that which is unknown, by that which is still more unknown, must be done away. The period which shall usher in the Sun of righteousness, will be consequent on the advancement of knowledge. Then let us not be weary in well doing—but let us persevere in our essays to relieve mankind from the thralldom of sin, by disseminating the seeds of knowledge—for knowledge is the handmaid of Religion. CIRCULAR LETTER.

* A person who visited the cell of John Washburn, who had been guilty or accessory, to thirty-one murders, thus sums up from his lips, his experience:—"He had settled it in his mind as a positive truth, that happiness in this life consisted in money and dissipation; that religion was gloomy and uncomfortable in this world; that he would roll sin as a sweet morsel under his tongue in this life, and that he would avail himself of the means of future enjoyment by repentance at death, like others."

To the believers in the faith of Abraham within the limits of the New-York Association—

Brethren—Once more have we been permitted to meet in annual Association. We were cordially welcomed by our worthy friends in Huntington, and received at their hands every token of fraternal and Christian regard. The Society in this place although in its infancy and by no means numerous, is still deserving great praise for its zeal and well directed exertions for the promotion of the cause of truth and virtue. During the last year it has erected a very neat and commodious house for public worship, which, on the first day of our session, was by appropriate services, dedicated to the one living and true God. May the Lord prosper them abundantly and enable them to reap the fruits of their labor of love.

It was gratifying to see our Association so well attended. With the exception of one, we believe all our societies were fully represented in the Council. This is as it should be. Societies should be careful to appoint their delegates to the Association, and appoint such active and zealous individuals as will attend. There are fewer indexes of the healthful state of our societies, and we trust that another year we shall not be under the painful necessity of making one solitary exception.

The business of the Council, we need not say, was conducted with that spirit of good will which characterizes all our meetings, and the public services of the occasion were uniformly well suited, and acceptable to those who attended them. Two societies, that of Poughkeepsie and that of Huntington, were received into our fellowship; and a vote was passed as will be seen by recurring to the minutes of the proceedings, requesting the several societies in the Association, to make a contribution on the first Sunday in December, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of delegates to the State and United States Conventions. The measure was recommended by our last State Convention, and we feel confident will commend itself to the unprejudiced judgment of all our brethren. It seems no more than an act of equity that the expenses of our delegates to the State and United States Conventions should be defrayed. If they give their time we ought not to subject them to any farther loss. The amount required from the individual societies would be small, and could be regarded as no intolerable burden.

We have been highly gratified with the tidings of prosperity which we have received from all quarters. Never before was the cause of universal grace in so prosperous a condition within the limits of our Association as at this moment. The truth runs and is glorified, and blessed be the name of God. Brethren, let us be encouraged to increasing zeal and activity, and let those who have named the name of Christ be careful to depart from all iniquity. By order, T. J. SAWYER.

MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS.

The great increase of Associations and Conferences in our order, and the room the minutes of their proceedings occupy in our periodicals, renders a few improvements in the manner of preparing these minutes desirable to Editors at least, if not to a great majority of the readers of our papers. The present is not perhaps the best season to offer some suggestions on the subject, but it is the time when, from the frequent recurrence of the difficulty, I am best prepared to offer them.

A full and regular journal of all the proceedings of each Convention or Association should be made out as the business progresses, for the use of the Standing Clerk, who should as fully record it in the book of records. This has not, heretofore been done. The minutes, only, of the proceedings have been recorded. Of them, more anon. To prevent errors, the journal of those proceedings should be read at the close of the session to which they belong, and at the commencement of the next session, when, if any errors were noticed, they could be corrected. Thus, not only the resolutions and measures passed, but those negatived, with the names of their movers, would be preserved, and be arranged, too, disposed of. The reports of committees might be in the very order in which they came up and were made in writing, and, with the letters of societies, be put on file, after all the useful and interesting information had been extracted from them, and recorded by the Standing Clerk in his book of records. It is true, this measure would give employment to the Assistant, as well as to the principal Clerk, usually appointed to note down the proceedings—but are they not appointed for that purpose—and will they be kept more busily engaged than the Moderator? I am certain one can do it all, if the members will but do up all the usual business of appointments and reports on the first day of the session, as should always be done. As to the Standing Clerk, his labors would be a little increased immediately, it is true, but he has the whole year to do it in, and when called on for a report of the state of his Association, he will find the increase of labor in recording the journal, to be a great saving of labor in the search necessary to make out a full and correct report. Nor will he have to draw on the stores of his failing memory, or that of his ministering brethren. So much for the Journal now for the Minutes.

Minutes (simply, short notes) of the proceedings of our public bodies, should contain all the appointments made, the reports adopted, and the resolutions and votes passed; but the whole, should be as briefly expressed as possible. The meaning is all the public are concerned to know—and only what has been, or is to be done, (not what was negatived, or left undone,) affects them. Nor is it generally necessary that these should be arranged in the order in which they occurred. Indeed, for convenience, all the business of the same kind, should be arranged together. Thus all the appointments might be put together—then the reports and their adoption—then the votes and resolutions on other subjects. This measure would lessen the room now generally occupied by our minutes about one-third. Then omit noticing the several adjournments during the session—the opening and closing of each interval of business with prayer, and other small items, all of which every one knows to be matters of course, and one-half the room they now occupy, will be amply sufficient to hold all the really useful information now given. The room thus gained, from fifteen to twenty times per annum in this paper, I have the vanity to believe, can be filled with matter more useful to our cause and far more interesting to our readers. And as I think of this papers so do I think of the other periodicals published by our brethren. True, this paper will not be rid of all its useless articles, so long as I am compelled to write, often to fill out a column rather than to communicate information. But an approximation will be made to greater utility.

The Circular letters, yet retained by some of our Associations, I think might be omitted with advantage and profit. When we had few or no periodicals to instruct and enlighten our denomination as to the general state of the cause, and exhort them to a performance of their duties, the proceedings of our Councils were published and distributed in pamphlet form, and these letters were highly interesting and useful. But this state of things no longer exists. One-half of these letters are filled with meaningless, or at least thread bare, stereotyped phrases, which have ceased to interest or instruct—like a hard task, well committed to memory, they rather tire and disgust the reader. Instead of the circular, a brief statement of any unusual circumstances attending the session, and a statistical statement of the several societies in the Association—their number, increase or decrease, condition and prospects—would be very interesting to the public, and would generally occupy far less room to more purpose.

Even the Circulars of our State Conventions, might be modelled after some plan like the above suggested—being filled rather with statistical and instructive matter, than a repetition of the information already embraced in the minutes, interlarded with the old stereotype phrases too commonly used in them.

The order of public services, might be bridged somewhat, by merely stating who preached, and who took other parts in the public services and devotional exercises of the council. But care should be taken to state the number of delegates, ministerial and laical, who are present—to which may be added the ministerial visitors present, if deemed proper. But in each and every part intended for publication, it should be borne in mind, that minutes, and not a full journal, of proceedings is all that is wanted.

I have long desired that some one would write upon this subject, and urge the universal adoption of these or similar improvements in our published minutes. Delicacy, alone, has prevented me from doing it long ago.—But as, perhaps, none but an Editor can so well tell the perplexity, and notice the incongruities attendant on the present mode—and, certainly, as none other is made to feel so frequently its inconveniences, and to hear the complaints which subscribers make against it—I have at last thought it no offence against propriety to offer my opinion and unasked advice respecting it. Will our brethren, who have the management, generally, of these matters in their several Associations and Conventions, please bestow a little thought on this subject, and use their influence to effect such improvements as they may deem beneficial?

SERMON WRITING.

There are many who are much embarrassed in reading manuscript sermons, who would, I believe, find it easy, by observing some of the following hints, the result of good advice to myself from others, and of my own experience.

1. Having chosen the form of the books in which you intend writing your sermons, ascertain on how many pages you can write what will fill out your allotted time in speaking. Then make up your blanks, of the form and size, in good stout covers, and trim the edges neatly, so that you can readily turn the leaves. Covers are necessary, to keep the manuscript from being frayed or soiled so as to have its outer pages illegible.

2. Prepare a skeleton of your sermon, and allot to each division its proportion of pages of manuscript. A little practice will make you a good guesser.

3. Begin each sentence about one inch from the left hand edge of the page, thus making each sentence appear a distinct paragraph. You then know exactly where to find the beginning of each sentence—which saves your eyes and feelings while delivering the preceding one—as it always begins at the indentation at the left hand of the page.

4. Write in a clear, open, and large hand—you will then read it as easily as print. Many are anxious to get as much as possible on the least quantity of paper—a miserable economy, for which the back must pay at a low desk, and the eyes, in a bad light, and the patience at all times. Add to this error, that of writing your sermons on dark colored paper, with pale ink, and neglect to stitch the leaves together, and I have no doubt you will rail out against reading sermons! If you do not, your hearers will!

5. Read your sermon over carefully just before you go to deliver it, until you make yourself familiar with the appearance and place of every sentence and division thereof—and then, by taking in, with the eye, as much as possible at each glance, and by proceeding leisurely in the work, you will not find yourself "confined to your notes," nor will your hearers be likely to complain of a due degree of spirit and ease in your delivery.

Sermons thus prepared will allow interlineations without much confusion—will be worthy of preservation for years—and can be thus preserved, and be delivered without any renewal of labor in old age—a thing that can not be said of extemporaneous discourses. How many aged preachers now wish they had written and preserved the sermons of their more vigorous days!

THE JEWS.

Certainly no people can possess a greater interest in the eyes of the Christian, than the children of Judah. The Israelite, wandering, persecuted, despised—a proverb and a mockword among the nations—is yet of a lineage nobler than the proudest race of Europe's monarchs—for their fathers were those whom God chose for his peculiar people—over whom he exercised those remarkable providences which are recorded in Holy Writ, and through whom we have received "the Law and the Prophets." They are those who "were broken off, that we might be grafted in"—to whom were committed "the letter," that we might obtain "the spirit"—whose temple is in ashes, but whose God we worship—whose "types and shadows" we use not, but whose Messiah is our Saviour—who have rejected the Gospel, yet, who are its monuments, its living witnesses, scattered throughout the earth.

Their altars are down-trodden, but the fires that glowed there are kindling upon our own shrines—their "harps are on the willows," but the strains of their "sweet singer," warm in our hearts, and flow from our lips, and blend with our hallelujahs—their prophets have passed from among them, yet the words of Israel's "holy men of old," are read, and learned, and repented in all the Sabbath-blessed valleys of our land—in all the wide domain of Christendom! But, though now

"In shade and storm, the frequent night," envelopes them, yet upon them, upon them the tempest-beaten descendants of Judah, through the darkness, shall beam "the star of Bethlehem," and though now

"Forsaken Israel wanders lone," yet "the ransomed of the Lord shall return to Zion, with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads!"

The above remarks are, perhaps, not inappropriate to the introduction of a poem, which we have ever admired, by Walter Scott. It is the hymn of Rebecca, the Jewess, in Ivanhoe. The train of thrilling events alluded to in it, will, we think, naturally call up thoughts like those which we have expressed, and we shall glide into the spirit of the piece, until we feel a portion of that solemn and sublime awe, which "the chosen people" must have felt when God moved before them in the pillar of cloud and the fiery column. Then leaps the heart with gratitude and joy, when "the choral hymn of praise," the sound of "trump and timbrel" rise upon the ear, and "Zion's daughters" mingle their soft voices with the deep tones of "priests and warriors," in ascriptions of thanksgiving and honor to Him who led them through their journeying. Then comes a sadness over our souls, a sadness for lone, wandering Israel, who would not know the ways of Him whom they had proved and tried, and whose work they had seen, and who are now abandoned "to their own." Then comes the deep, the holy trust in that Being, who is "present still, though now unseen," and to whom we all should pray, that He would be our "cloudy screen," our "burning and shining light."—Then, then comes the Gospel truth, gleaming amid the desolations of Zion, that the contrite heart, "the humble thought" are better than sacrifices and offerings. This appears to us the spirit and the feeling which the perusal of the following will inspire. It is a beautiful hymn, worthy the splendid genius of Scott. One word more—we are surprised that it has not found its way into any of our hymn books—at least, we do not recollect of seeing it in any. It seems to us to be well adapted for singing, when set to the tune called "Park street."

E. H. C.

"When Israel, of the Lord beloved,
Out of the land of bondage came,
Her fathers' God before her moved,
An awful guide in smoke and flame.
By day, along the astonished lands
The cloudy pillar glided slow;
By night, Arabia's crimson'd sands
Return'd the fiery column's glow.

"Then rose the choral hymn of praise,
And trump and timbrel answered keen,
And Zion's daughter's poured their lays
With priest's and warrior's voice between.
No portents now our foes amaze,
Forsaken Israel wanders lone;
Our fathers would not know thy ways
And thou hast left them to their own.

"But, present still, though now unseen;
When brightly shines the prosperous day,
Be thoughts of thee a cloudy screen
To temper the deceitful ray.
And oh, when stoops on Judah's path
In shade and storm the frequent night,
Be thou, long-suffering, slow to wrath,
A burning, and a shining light!

"Our harps we left by Babel's streams,
The tyrant's jest, the Gentile's scorn;
No censor round our altar beams;
And mute our timbrel, trump and horn.
But Thou hast said, the blood of goat,
The flesh of rams, I will not prize.
A contrite heart, and humble thought,
Are mine accepted sacrifice."

MIXED METAPHORS.

"The jumbling different metaphors in the same sentence, beginning with one metaphor and ending with another, commonly called a mixed metaphor, ought never to be indulged in."—Kames.

The above description of a fault in composition, is one which should be carefully attended to, especially by young writers. We like, occasionally, a metaphor, well-timed and well carried out—but fragments, thrown together, without regard to the rules of rhetoric, we can not away with. For instance, we like the introduction of a gem or a flower, by way of illustration; but, when we hear of the gem's drooping or withering, or of the flower's sparkling or flashing, we had rather the piece should have remained ungemmed or unflowered. In a metaphor, an object is called up upon which the imagination becomes fixed—if broken or crossed by the intervention of another object, it becomes confused, and the beauty of the figure is lost.

Some eminent authors are chargeable with this fault. We take the following instance from Shakspeare, given by the writer we have quoted at the commencement of this article.

"Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer
The stings and arrows of outrageous fortune,
Or to take arms against a sea of troubles,
And, by opposing, end them?"—Hamlet, Act III., Sc. 2.

Now, any one, almost, can perceive the incongruity here. The taking up arms against a sea of troubles, is an idea which mars the metaphor—or, by bringing two metaphors together, spoils the beauty of them both. For, divide the sentence, and the two expressions, taken separately, will assuredly be proper, as troubles may be fitly compared to a sea, and our resistance to them may be likened to the taking up of arms—yet, when brought together, there is, to the perception, all the incongruity which there would actually be in our opposing the surges of the deep with sword and musket. The substitution, simply, of the word host, instead of the word "sea," would, in our opinion, form a perfect metaphor—thus:

"Or to take arms against a" host "of troubles,
And, by opposing, end them."

The following lines from the Lady of the Lake, though perhaps to others unobjectionable, appear to us to contain a mixed metaphor.

"Aloft, the ash and warrior oak Cast anchor in the rifted rock."

Cast ing anchor, seems to be out of keeping with the fine idea of a "warrior oak," that has stood and battled with a thousand tempests—and such an expression is to us rather a flaw in that beautiful description of the scenery near Loch Katrine. This is, of course, merely an individual opinion, it may be a peculiarity of taste—for, although it may give an idea of firm-rootedness, which certainly belongs to an oak yet, the active notion of casting anchor, is associated in our mind with the strange figure of a mooring tree. We should even have liked better the passive expression—

"Aloft the ash and warrior oak"
Were anchored "in the rifted rock"— but we had rather cut the anchor, entirely. On the whole, it appears to us a specimen of the mixed metaphor.

It is needless to multiply instances, as probably enough have been given for the purpose of illustration. We would not, in thus commenting, arrogate to ourselves perfection as far as this fault in writing is concerned—for I, myself, am a young writer, liable to, and probably guilty of, the defects of a young writer. I am fond, as I have said, of an apt and perfect metaphor. Yet I do not like to see winged creatures swimming, nor dwellers of the deep mounting sun-ward, nor trees walking, nor diamonds scattering perfume, and the like, for the simple reason, that, although I fancy all these things in their place, yet I can not bear to see the order of nature perverted, even in metaphor.

If, then, what I have written upon this subject calls the attention of writers to it, myself among the rest—and if, thereby, they may be induced to strive and avoid this fault—I shall feel that this article is not inappropriate, and that it has done good.

OUR PROSPECTUS.

We this week send out copies of our Proposals to a number of our agents and friends. The remainder will be forwarded next week. We desire to say a few words to those to whom they are sent, especially, and to our friends everywhere, generally.

To the full extent of all the support received from our subscribers, and even to the extent of considerable support borrowed from personal friends, we have endeavored to be punctual in furnishing our subscribers with it, and in fulfilling, as far as possible, all our engagements with them. How far we have succeeded they know—we are not afraid to trust to their decision in the matter. To do this longer, we must be supported by our subscribers; and to make up for what we have fallen behind-hand in pecuniary means, we think we deserve an increase of our paying subscribers. It will require considerable to place us where we would probably have been had the monetary affairs, and the cost of living, remained as it was when we purchased the establishment. For, independent of recently contracted debts, that purchase money yet hangs heavily on our efforts to make the paper all we desire it to be. Under these circumstances we humbly prefer two requests to each subscriber now on our list.

1. Brother—for it is to you we speak—please to continue your subscription to our next volume. Pay for it in advance, if possible, and we think you will often rejoice that you have continued to take it. At all events, we scarcely can part from you now—we need your support, and believe that with it we can do you and our cause much good, as well as ourselves. But if you must (stern word!) discontinue—(do not do it unless you must)—do try and get us a good subscriber in your stead.

2. Brother—for we make this second request to you, also—can you not benefit us, and some good friend or neighbor, and the Great Cause in which we labor, by procuring us at least one, good, new subscriber. Do try. You know not what you really can do till you try earnestly. And you know not how encouraging it is to publishers struggling and laboring in hard times, to receive good, paying, new subscribers. Try it.

We send out a number of gratis papers—we can scarcely afford to do it, but are loth to discontinue them. Some are to the aged and infirm poor—others to ministering brethren, who are scarcely able to be taxed for them—we hope all such will endeavor to aid us by granting the second request above made, and by sending us something which will tend to render our paper valuable to its readers. We will see.

G. AND H.

PICKERING'S LECTURES.

Some weeks ago I incidentally named this work, among others on the evidences of Christianity, and stated it was out of the market. It appears such is not the fact.—The Independent Messenger, and Br. Whittemore have my thanks for setting me right on the subject. I forget how I got my impression on the subject. But having been set right, we have now ordered on a lot from Boston, and hope soon to be able to supply the orders of our friends for this excellent work.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE U. S. CONVENTION.

By an article in the last Union, I perceive that this pamphlet is published at that office, and orders for it solicited from our ministering brethren generally. Not having seen the work itself, we can not speak of it particularly, but in hopes that some will be forwarded to us for sale, before long, we call attention to it thus early.—Will our brethren, North and South, who have no opportunities of sending direct to New-York, please let us know soon how many copies they will want for sale in their respective neighborhoods, in order that we may procure a sufficient quantity before navigation closes?

A. B. G.

THE UNIVERSALIST UNION.

The terms of this valuable periodical, conducted by that excellent publisher Br. Price, were forgotten on the last page of this paper. We copied from the Herald of Truth. The terms are, two dollars per annum, payable in advance; if not paid within six months, the paper will be discontinued, (unless the subscriber is known to be responsible,) and charged at the rate of two dollars and fifty cents per annum—and at that rate, if not discontinued. I believe I have given Br. Price's terms correctly, but I quote from memory.

A. B. G.

BOOKS—BOOKS.

Just received, a new and large assortment of Universalist, Phrenological, School and Sunday School works—besides some valuable standard works in Theology—and a few miscellaneous works well worth examination. Our limits do not permit us to specify, at present; but we invite orders for any books, as what we have not got, we can immediately obtain, if in the market.

For a number of weeks past, indispensable business, at home and in the office, has prevented me from paying much attention to those favors of correspondents that needed much correction. There are some that need so much revision, (and some even need re-writing,) that I fear they are doomed to lie over a while longer.—Do endeavor to write legibly and without crowding the lines.

A. B. G.

THIS PAPER.

Our readers will see that the ever welcome Br. Spear again appears in our columns—we have more on hand. Br. Manley's sermon will well pay for perusing it—try it, reader. The article by Sister Felton, is an admirable one also—so brief, well expressed, and comprehensive—worthy of its subject. Of the editorial it becomes me not to speak, but let not the reader forget to read, remember, and practice on the requests in the article headed "Our prospectus." We feel a peculiar interest in that article.

NO. 22.

We are nearly destitute of this number. Will our agents, and Postmasters who have papers in their hands, please examine them, and send us all the copies of this number they can procure? LINES.

On the death of Helen, aged two years, daughter of George W. and Susan Freeman, of Ohio city, Ohio.

By MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

How fair is the tinge of the opening rose,
As in bright blushing beauty the petals unfold,
And, with diamond drops sparkling, the carnation glows,
When in glory the banners of morn are unrolled.
But the violet fringe of those petals will fade,
And the tempest-breath darkens the carnation's glow,
And the rose, where the pencil of beauty hath strayed,
When the storm-cloud has passed shall lie mournfully low—
And the pure gems of light, that so brilliantly beam
In the circuit of love 'round the mother's fond heart,
One by one must go down in the dark rolling stream,
And like shadows of glory at sunset depart.
But a beautiful region is beaming afar,
Where the crystalline fountains are shaded with bloom,
Cast their spangles of light on the sweet-scented air,
And the wings of the cherubim scatter perfume.
There flowers that wither 'neath time's chilling sky,
Transplanted shall live in perennial prime,
Where the anthems of glory are sounding on high,
And the arches of suppliance ring back the loud strain.

PROVIDENCE OF GOD.

ST. LUKE: Chap. xii: Verses 24, 25, 26.

By MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

Sweet lily in thy snowy bloom,
Who wore thy glorious vest!
Did fairy at her magic loom,
Or silkworm in his nest?
Or did thy own white lady-hand,
Thy thread of beauty draw?
Dost thou profess to understand
The spinster's mystic law?
Ah no! I neither toil nor spin,
Nor vex myself with care;
Yet kings' habiliments are worn,
Compared with these I wear.
For He who weaves the web of fate,
Hath wove my satin dress,
And need I fear he will abate
His patient watchfulness?
Thou raven of the bright black wing
Who gives thee food to eat?
What thrifty laborer dost thou bring,
To sow and reap thy wheat?
For when the warm, bright days are o'er,
Still ravens must be fed,
Thou where thy garner, where thy store,
When Summer fields are dead?
I sow not, neither do I reap,
Nor have I threshing floor;
Yet still my Husbandman doth keep
An ever bounteous store.
He ever hears my hungry cry,
And gives me dainty food;
Then shall I not, indeed, rely
On Him for every good?
If God so clothes the Summer flower,
Which fade in a breath,
Thou why distrust his gracious power,
O ye of little faith!
Are ye not better than the fowls,
That skim the bright blue air?
Thou why not yield your fainting soul,
To his sustaining care?

HAPPINESS.

"Happy the man who sees a God employed
In all the good and ill that check his life."—Coverley.

Reader, bear with me awhile and I will tell you the true secret of happiness. I will first tell you what and where she is not.

The miser bears another penny to his vast and glittering heap, and hopes to find happiness there. The politician seeks for it in the elevation of himself or a favorite to some lucrative or honorable post; the poet in adding another flower to his wreath of fame; and the sensualist in the gratification of his animal appetites. In all this as an end, they find nothing but "vanity and vexation of spirit."

By the mass, it is sought for in the shape of excitement of some kind or other. The revivalist can be happy if he can succeed in getting up a religious excitement. The husband prefers spending his evenings at the theatre, tavern, or some other public place of resort, because "there is something going on," in other words, some excitement there. For the same reason he is loath to prefer a glass of wine or brandy to good cold water.—The wife thinks it very pleasant to spend an hour or two each day in gossiping about, retailing scandal and other excitement; it is so moping to employ one's self in making old clothes almost as good as new; and all the et ceteras of domestic employment and domestic peace. The daughter

"Loves to hear men flattering,
Loves fashionable clothes,
Loves music and dancing,
And chatting with the beaux!"—

all this is so charmingly exciting! She does not like to assist her mother in making puddings and pies, but if the mother is engaged in puffing a new fashion, admiring the last novel, criticising the manners of Mrs. A. or the dress of Miss B., she is all animation and volubility.

I do not mean all husbands, all wives, and all daughters. No, there are bright and honorable exceptions, nor are they few. There are those who seek happiness where alone it can be found; those who feel that "Within ourselves this jewel lies,

And they are fools who roam."

The means by which happiness may be attained are simple, and within the reach of every one. We have only to feel and act in such a manner that we can be entirely satisfied with ourselves; have a "conscience void of offence toward God and man." For our assistance in this course of conduct, our Saviour has given two sublime and beautiful rules, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbor as thyself," and, "whatever ye would that others should do unto you, do ye even so to them." Here lies the whole duty of man; the criterion by which we are to measure every thought and action. We should seek for knowledge, wealth and power, only as so many means of advancing our own happiness and that of others.

We can not escape afflictions, disease, or death. They are the unavoidable lot of all; the chastisement of a father's hand, directed by a father's love. By them we are taught to be humble, to sympathise with others in their afflictions, to relieve the needy, and "comfort those that mourn." In doing all this, we find happiness; high, solid, and lasting happiness, such as the wealth of worlds can not give, or their little transient afflictions take away.—Pearl and Galaxy.

DEATHS.

In Marshall, at the residence of her father Mr. Gann, Mrs. MARY ANN WHALEY, consort of Mr. Abner Whaley, aged 22 years. This afflictive dispensation has been rendered doubly so by the particular juncture in which it happened, especially to her companion.

They were married on the first day of October, the next day Mrs. W. was seized of an illness, that produced a derangement, from which she never recovered, but expired on the 10th. Those virtues and amiable qualities, therefore, that had so gracefully adorned her youth, causing her to be beloved and esteemed at home and respected and admired abroad, have been suddenly blasted by death, ere they were permitted to expand and bloom in maturer years; and his morning sun, which rose so bright and clear, has been immediately enshrouded in a dark cloud of sorrow.

May the hopes and virtues of Christ's Gospel, which alone hath immortality, sustain and comfort the mourning circle, and enable them to say with the Psalmist, "We know, O Lord, that thy judgments are right, and that thou in faithfulness hast afflicted us." D. B.

PROSPECTUS OF THE THIRD VOLUME OF THE UNIVERSALIST UNION.

Being the 10th volume of the Religious Inquirer, and the 7th volume each, of the Christian Messenger, Gospel Anchor, and Pioneer and Liberator.

The Third volume of the "UNIVERSALIST UNION" will commence on the 11th of November, 1837. The Proprietor deems a few remarks necessary in respect to its future course and character. The past is the best pledge he can offer for the future. It will continue the "even tenor of its way," noiselessly it may be, but none the less effectually, he trusts, in the end. The paper has never breathed the atmosphere of excitement, but has rather in all its investigations of the momentous question which divides Limitarians and Universalists, aimed to address the sober, reasoning faculties of man, while a good portion of its labors has been directed to a proper development of the moral influences of its own peculiar tenets, and the upbuilding of the same in the hearts of all who take upon themselves the profession. Other courses, he is sensible, might have been pursued, and perhaps might have produced greater immediate effects; but it is still questionable whether they would have been more lasting. He has endeavored to pursue that course which duty seemed to mark out, and if he has erred, he believes he has erred on the right side—the side of charity. And the increasing approbation manifested by esteemed friends in various sections, induces him to believe that he has not entirely misjudged in the case, and encourages him to persevere in his labors.

As heretofore, a portion of its columns will be devoted to miscellaneous reading of moral tendency. It already possesses a highly respectable list of correspondents, both male and female, in various parts of the United States, to whom the proprietor is under many obligations for their labors in imparting interest to his columns. Others are respectfully invited to join this number, and make the Union a medium of, at least, occasional articles from their pens. No efforts are spared to make it a respectable channel of communication to the public—an interesting and instructive periodical and creditable to the denomination to which it belongs. Its form being well adapted for binding, and its matter of a permanent character, by a little care in preserving and binding from year to year, it will furnish a valuable series of volumes for after reading and reference. The 1st and 2d volumes can still be had. P. PRICE.

NEW BOOK OF PSALMODY.

Just received and for sale at this office, at the publisher's prices, the NEW BOOK OF PSALMODY, entitled "SONGS OF ZION: OR THE CAMBRIDGE COLLECTION OF SACRED MUSIC: designed for the Church, for the Social Meetings of Christians, and for Family Worship: comprising a rich variety of the most popular tunes, anthems, etc., with many pieces from various authors, never before published, written expressly for this work: arranged with a figured bass for the Organ or Piano Forte. To which is prefixed a Familiar Introduction to the Art of Singing, designed for the aid of those who are entirely unacquainted with the science of music; the Instructions being reduced to great plainness and simplicity." By THOMAS WHITTEMORE.

This Book contains upwards of three hundred tunes, of a great variety of metres, which may be divided into three classes: 1st. A small and choice selection from the best of the old American authors. 2d. A selection from the European tunes which have become popular in this country: and 3d. A large variety of original tunes, which have never appeared in any work, and which can not appear in any other than this. In addition to these, there are upwards of 100 pages of Anthems.

This work contains upwards of 250 pages of the size of the "Boston Academy's Collection," and will be sold at the same price, viz. $1 single; $10 per doz. to societies. The author pledges himself to the public, that neither pains, nor expense have been spared to render this work correct, in its scientific, and elegant in its mechanical execution.

This work is very particularly recommended in cases where different denominations of Christians unite in "Union Singing Schools." On the great theme of praise, all Christians agree; we can all unite our hearts and voices in celebrating the praises of God and the Redeemer, and the glories of eternity. Some old and very popular pieces, that have of late been neglected, are here revived. In a great number of cases, the whole Hymn is put upon the same page with the tune, which will be very convenient in singing these tunes as voluntaries.—There are many most excellent hymns inserted entire, which appear in no hymn-book in common use.

GUILFORD BOSTWICK:

OR

PAINS OF GUILT AND POWER OF LOVE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "EDWARD AND CORNELIA."

Happening to spend a Sabbath in New-York, in the Summer of 183-, I attended meeting in the afternoon, at a church in D. street, where the venerable Mr. — had labored for many years, in sustaining the doctrine of the Restitution. He discoursed, with his usual eloquence and pathos, on the subject of repentance. Although myself much interested in the sermon, I could not but observe the tearful attention given by the occupants of an adjoining pew. These consisted of an aged lady, of a care-worn yet placid expression; a man and woman a little short of middle age; and a blooming girl of perhaps fifteen. The three former, especially, attracted my attention by their susceptibility of feeling, as the preacher so eloquently portrayed the poignant stings of guilt, and the sovereign power of love to subdue and bring home the offender. At the close of service, having a partial acquaintance with the clergyman, at his earnest solicitation, I accompanied him home. On our way, I inquired concerning the interesting family, with whose devotionality of feeling I had been so attracted. "The history of that family," replied my reverend friend, "is most pleasingly identified with my labors in the ministry; and shall, if you please, form the entertainment of the evening, at our fireside." The evening arrived. We were seated around the parlor hearth, and the good man began his narrative.

"Not long after I commenced my labors in this city, I had discoursed, one morning, on a favorite subject, James i: 27—'Pure religion,' etc. At the close of service, a middle-aged, matronly-looking female, indifferently clad, came up to me, and introduced herself as the widow Jarvis. She said she had been, for some time, a believer in the Restitution, but living at a distance, this was the second time she had ever attended my meeting. She requested I would visit her family at No. 29, C. street, adding, in a calm, subdued tone of voice, 'you will there find both the fatherless and widow in affliction.' I was deeply touched with her appearance, and promised to comply. * * *

It was a cold evening in December, I drew on an overcoat and took the street, intending to redeem my promise to the interesting widow. I had gone but a few paces from my door, before I returned for my cloak; and passing through the hall, I looked at my thermometer, and observed that the mercury stood at 18 degrees below zero. I quickened my usual pace to keep warm, and soon found myself in C. street. In another moment I was in an upper apartment, which presented one of those scenes of poverty with which a long residence in this emporium has since rendered me familiar.

In a grate, protruding from the chimney, were a few coals, mingled with carpenter's chips. The widow bade me be seated, upon a broken chair, while she replenished the fire with another handful of coals from a bushel basket, which she said contained her whole store of fuel for the winter, and the Lord only knows what she should do when these were gone. She then produced the bottom of a broken bowl containing a little oil, with a wick in the centre, formed by tying a strip of old muslin to a button, the button standing on the earthen to keep the wick upright. She lighted the miserable taper, and its first faint flickering revealed two small windows, caulked and patched with rags and paper, with here and there a still open cranny, through which the chill air streamed as from a bellows.

I looked around to see if all was in this sad keeping—if I might not meet some token of comfort to relieve the wretched monotony. In one corner of the apartment was an object, till now unobserved—a sick person, on a couch. Four bricks, standing upright, supported the four corners of a door, which I observed had been unhinged from an adjoining closet. On this door was spread a thin layer of straw, and over this, a well worn sheet, which kept the straw in its place by being doubled under it at the outer edge of the door, and tucked between the door-edge and the wall, on the other side. On this sheet lay the invalid, covered only with a thin shawl and some other meagre articles of female apparel. I approached the couch, and beheld a female, apparently about eighteen, faded indeed, and emaciated, but still retaining the lines of striking intellectual beauty. The eyebrow was dark and arching; the forehead high, and thin about the temples, but farther upward, swelling out into a delicate and graceful roundness. All I remember of the mouth, the lips bore a deeply marked but indescribable expression of penitence and self-condemnation. She slept. I placed my hand upon that fair forehead, and it was hot, notwithstanding the coldness of the air, and openness of the apartment. I listened to her breathing. It was forced and heavy. But a sound soon caught my attention, like the faint sobbings of an infant. The widowed lady approached the couch with a quick but noiseless tread, lifted the shawl, and upon the arm of the invalid there lay a young and feeble child. I drew back from the heart-rending picture, and as soon as the first gush of feeling was sufficiently conquered, turned inquiringly to the widow. She understood me, and after a moment of inward struggling, found utterance.

"This is my daughter—my only, beloved child. My husband was a seafaring man. While he lived we were independent, though not affluent. Five years ago, he sailed as supercargo of an Indianian, and was lost. It was a heavy stroke. Emma was an orphan—I, a widow. We strove against our hard fortune, and, for a while, successfully. Having been much accustomed to the needle, I soon learned Emma, and by taking work from a neighboring clothing store, we made ourselves quite comfortable. Two years ago there was a revival in the Methodist chapel, in this street. Emma, in company with several other girls who wrought for the same establishment, and who were now our only associates, attended these meetings, which were held every evening for several weeks. I ought not to have permitted her attendance. But I was not, at the time, aware of the extravagance with which these meetings were conducted, nor did I fully know the susceptibility of her imaginative temperament. She became a subject—a victim of the excitement. Several young people were soon after added to the church, and she among the number.

At this meeting she formed an acquaintance with a young man named Guilford Bostwick, at that time a clerk in the store of Messrs. C., G. and Co., Pearl-street. He was handsome, graceful, and intelligent. But what most endeared him to my daughter, was his apparent zeal and fervor in religion, having become a member of the meeting at the same time with herself. I can not dwell upon the sequel; suffice to say, he wooed—won—ruined—forgot her!"

Here sobs and tears prevented further utterance.

At length she proceeded: "After Emma's sickness, being unable to do any thing but attend her, I commenced selling one thing after another, to procure the means of life, till our bed, chairs, dishes, every thing are sold."

"Every thing sold?" exclaimed the sick one, in a feverish, half delirious tone, partly turning upon the couch—"every thing sold? You hav'n't sold the ring?"

"No, no, child, the ring is on your finger. It shall not be sold. Alas! it proved the price of her innocence."

"Mother," continued the invalid, turning again upon the couch, "we will change the water in the flower-jars, and range them on the mantle. Guilford is coming this evening." The mother wept.

"Four weeks ago last Sunday," continued the widow, "having engaged a neighboring woman to sit by Emma, I resolved to go to the Methodist chapel, and ask assistance from the minister, having understood there was a fund provided for the needy belonging to that congregation. I sought an interview with the clergyman, at the close of service, and laid our case before him. He said he would consider the matter, and bring it before the church. I heard nothing further, till a friend informed us that the matter had been considered by the church, and Emma excommunicated!"

"I resolved not again to solicit charity; but last Sunday morning, having procured the services of the same woman as before, I determined again to seek your meeting, to find, if possible, some balm for a wounded spirit. I did not go in vain. The prayer at the close of your sermon, for the needy and afflicted, that they might find treasure in Heaven, and health in the good Physician, reached my heart. I have felt, ever since, that I am rich—that I need nothing, want nothing, but to die. Reverend Sir, will you utter that prayer again?"

"The request was a welcome one. My heart was full, and I knew not so good a way to unburthen it, as to pour it forth in prayer. 'Emma,' said she, 'awake—the stranger will pray with us. She is sensible when awake,' she added, in a lower voice. I instinctively fell upon my knees by the couch of the sick one, and arose with a heart relieved. I found the daughter able to converse a little. It was now growing late, and I departed, promising to call again.

The next Sabbath, I related the case, in part, to my congregation; and although we were then few and unopulent, we took up a collection of forty dollars, which was presented to the widow without her knowledge of the source.

Not long after this adventure, I had occasion to spend two Sabbaths in Boston, on an exchange with a worthy brother in the ministry of reconciliation. We were, at that time, 'few and far between,' and an exchange was not an event of very frequent occurrence. While in Boston, I took up a paper, one morning, and looking over the list of police intelligence, my eye fell upon the following item:—

"ARREST FOR MURDER.—Two young men were brought before the city authorities, yesterday, and examined on a charge of having stabbed a man the night previous, in a house of ill fame, in — street. The quarrel is said to have originated in an affair of gambling. The watch was called, and they were arrested on the spot. Two knives were found on the floor, and two wounds in the body of the deceased, (one in the breast and the other in the abdomen,) corresponding to the knives, one of which had a broad and the other a narrow point. The names of the accused were Dasher and Monteb. They were both committed for trial. Dasher appeared hardened and indifferent; but Monteith was much affected, wept profusely, and declared his innocence.

This case struck me as one of interest. I therefore proposed to my host, to visit the jail, and he agreed to accompany me the next day. We went. The keeper informed us that Dasher had broken jail the night before, and escaped; that Monteith might have gone with him, being confined in the same apartment, but refused. That he still persisted in declaring his innocence, and determined to await his trial. He also informed us that a Methodist clergyman had just entered the prison before us. When we entered, the clergyman was engaged in earnest conversation with the prisoner, and we remained, for a while, silent and unobserved, that we might hear. 'Little did I think,' said the clergyman, 'when I baptised and admitted you into my church, in New-York, that I should ever visit you in a place like this. I say not whether you are guilty or innocent of the crime, but—'

'Innocent of that,' interrupted the prisoner, 'but guilty, still—polluted, miserable, undone! O God!—but, no—I pollute the name. I will suffer in silence—die, if the court decide; the world will be rid of a monster.'

'But how could you,' continued the clergyman, 'after so many faithful warnings—after so many warm and repeated exhortations to shun the pleasures of sin?—'

'Hold! Mockery, insult, blasphemy! The pleasures of sin! That syren song of satan you first sounded in my ear. I believed the deceitful tale, and, lulled by its delusive charm into a false security, I have plucked the forbidden fruit of vice and found it poison! The pleasures of sin! Deceived by this wile of the devil, I have destroyed health, squandered fortune, defrauded the upright, and worse than all, because irreparable, ruined innocence and blighted happiness! I have spent the seed-time of life in sowing thorns. They have sprung up, and are piercing my very heart-core! Whether guilty or innocent, you say. I am guilty of every thing but blood; and even that could but crimson over the already scarlet hue of my character.'

'You have fallen from grace. Repent, return. This prison, or even the gallows, is light in comparison with the worm that never dies, and the fire that is never quenched!'

'Avant! There can be no deadlier worm than is gnawing here—no hotter fire than is burning in my bosom! Talk to me of hell! It were a welcome hiding place, could it screen me from the eye of God! Its fires were soothing, could they but melt the iron links that bind me to the rack-wheel of my own conscience! Go, leave me!'

He raved as he spoke, and emoté his breast. The clergyman retired, bowing slightly as he passed us. The prisoner dropped his head upon his knees, and uttered sighs and groans that were heart-piercing. I paused until he became in some degree composed, and then approached him.

'Young man,' said I, 'will you listen to a few words from one who would befriend you, and has become more deeply enlisted in your interest, from what he has listened to? He raised his head—looked at me steadily and wildly—and as he gazed, his countenance assumed a forbidding aspect. His eyes continued rivetted upon me, and gradually his features relaxed into calmness and even tenderness.

'Stranger,' said he, 'experience has destroyed the respect I once entertained for the garb you wear; but there is that in your voice and countenance, that inspires my confidence and makes you welcome.'

'My young friend,' continued I, 'you speak of conscience. Conscience, after all, is the best textbook of doctrine. The creeds of men are various and contradictory, but conscience and the Bible always bear congenial testimony. Alas, that human creeds should too often cast a veil over the truths that these would teach us, which the painful light of experience, alone, can dissipate. It is seldom till the worm has begun to gnaw, that we learn its venom.'

'Stranger, you speak my thoughts,' interrupted the prisoner. I continued—

'Conscience and Scripture both declare that the soul that sinneth shall die—that there is no peace to the wicked—that his mind is like the waters of the troubled sea, which cast up mire and dirt—that the way of the transgressor is hard—that though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished.'

'Reverend stranger, your words are arrows—they probe my heart. And yet speak on; perhaps they may open this deep abscess of festering, foul pollution. Gladly would I part with heart itself to find one moment's respite from its throbbings.'

'Thou art indeed, young man, in the gall of bitterness and bond of iniquity. Well does thy case bear testimony that God will visit indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish upon every soul that doeth evil—that the wicked shall be recompensed, even in the earth—that his judgment lingereth not, and his damnation slumbereth not. There are, indeed, most fearful retributions for the evil-doer.'

'Art thou an angel or a mortal man, that canst thus read the black-lettered tablet of my heart?' He spoke with a kind of maniac wildness, which the dimness of the prison served perhaps to heighten; and I found myself insensibly beginning to sympathize with the unearthliness of the scene.

'I have been reading only the testimony of Heaven's truth, recorded in this book,' I answered, presenting him a pocket Bible.

'Keep the book—I need it not,' said he. 'Its condemnations, which thou hast repeated, are written, nay, engraved upon my conscience. Its language, though true, is but faintly expressive of what I feel.'

'But it hath promises,' I replied.

'Promises?—aye, and threatenings, too; but they are not for me. I fear not hell: the utmost mortal can endure, I suffer. I ask not heaven, could I but find peace within.'

'This is the heaven the Bible promises, and such the hell it threatens,' I responded. 'Your case is not hopeless. David once found himself encompassed with the pains of this same hell, and was emancipated. He was delivered from the 'lowest hell.' The prodigal may yet return, after all his wanderings, and find acceptance. The tears of penitence can wash away the darkest stain.'

'Tears of penitence? Ah, that I could weep! But the fountain that welled forth smiles and tears, is forever dried up by the scorching fires of sin.'

'Not dried up, I trust—only sealed. Let me open it, by assuring you, that the God beneath whose fancied frown you tremble, is your Friend—your more than Friend—your Father. The creeds which blinded you to the miseries of guilt, have also obscured the beauties of His character. His chastisements are indeed severe; but he corrects in mercy. While the ministering angel of his justice, wields, in one hand, the scourge of retribution, he holds, in the other, a napkin, to wipe the tears that fall for the offender. Do not distrust the goodness of your Maker. He is the chief among ten thousand, the altogether lovely. Are you the prodigal? He is the Father that will meet and embrace his returning penitent while 'yet a great way off.'

'You have unsealed the fountain. I weep. O sweet relief! I am subdued. Stranger, your words are balm. Will you pray with me?'

I took his hand and knelt upon the prison floor. When I arose, his eye was calm, and the tears flowed freely. I still held his hand, and we wept together. It was the happiest moment of my life. When I departed, I gave him the pocket Bible, open at the story of the Prodigal.

The court sat while I was yet in Boston, and the trial came on. One of the two knives found on the floor, at the time of the affair, was shown to have belonged to the deceased. It was the one which corresponded with the wound in the abdomen. Dasher having broken jail, was circumstantial testimony against him; and Monteith remaining, was considered evidence of his innocence. It was, therefore, concluded that the wound in his breast, which was the fatal one, had been inflicted by Dasher; and that the other was occasioned by the deceased having fallen upon his own knife; and Monteith was acquitted.

After my return to this city, I was confined to my house for ten weeks, from an indisposition. I was, therefore, unable to call at 29, C. street, in search of the indigent widow, till some time in the Spring. I found her gone, and the chamber occupied by other inmates, who knew nothing of its former tenants, save that a young man had called there a week before, after some books that had been left—said he had removed the family to the eastern part of the city, and wanted the books to carry to sea, as he was to sail the next week.

Three years had passed. One afternoon, on returning from some pastoral visits, I found upon my desk a note, in a bold, business-like hand, requesting my attendance, that evening, at a wedding in the eastern part of the city, a neighborhood remote from my meeting and residence, and where I had seldom been called to officiate; and signed 'Guilford Bostwick.' I at once recognized the name, and was full of curiosity. I attended, and was shown into a room where were four persons: an elderly lady, a young man and woman, and a little girl, apparently three or four years old. The little girl was seated on the lap of the elder lady, with a rose in her hand.

'Grandma,' said the prattler, 'let me put this rose in your cap—it will look so pretty.'

'Hush, child—roses are for the young. Let me braid it in your own glossy ringlets,' said a voice I had heard before. The lady hearing my step, put down the child, arose, and gave me her hand. It was the widow I had visited in C. street! 'This,' said she, turning to the young woman, 'is my daughter, whom you once saw in a very low state of health; and this is Mr. Guilford Bostwick, whom you are to make my son.' She sunk again in her chair, and hid her face. I looked upon the young woman. There were that same arched brow, and high, ideal forehead; but the sallowness of the cheek had given place to a moderate tinge of health, and the compunctuous expression of the lips, to a smile of meekness; and on the hand she extended to salute me, I beheld the self same ring! I turned to look at the young man, and all was mystery. His countenance, half strange and half familiar, seemed that of one I had sometime beheld in death and now saw revived.

'Mr. Bostwick,' I asked, 'where have we met before?' He put his hand into his pocket, and gave me a pocket Bible. I recognized the binding—opened it, and saw upon a blank leaf my own autograph. I looked again upon his countenance, and the scene in the prison flashed like a meteor on my memory. We wept.

After the marriage was consummated, he informed me, privately, that Monteith was an assumed name he had been known by in the haunts he had frequented in Boston, and which he chose to retain on his arrest, and while in prison, to spare the pangs which the appearance of his real name in the prints, might occasion his relatives. He also stated that he had met with Dasher in a foreign port, confined in a hospital, and raving in wild despair—his dreamy imagination haunted with most horrid images. He had knelt beside his bed—related his own experience—read to him from that same Bible, the story of the thief upon the cross—and he had died in peace. We wept again.

A few weeks after, I saw, in a morning paper, the following communication:—

'THE POWER OF CONSCIENCE.—Messrs. C., G. and Company, Pearl-street, recently received a letter, through the post-office, enclosing one hundred and twenty dollars, accompanied with the following confession—'Messrs.—Accept this as reparation from an individual who once wronged you; but who, having learned that 'the way of the transgressor is hard,' here returns you principal and interest."

I remembered the widow Jarvis having mentioned, when I visited her in C. street, that Bostwick had served as clerk in the store of C., G. and Company. I therefore cut the signature from the note I found upon my desk, inviting me to the wedding—carried the note to the store of C., G. and Company, and compared the chirography with the letter they had received, enclosing the money. They were written on the same kind of paper, and evidently by the same hand. No questions were asked, and no information given. This was my first acquaintance with these gentlemen. They have since become my friends and members of my meeting; and Guilford Bostwick is now a partner in the firm of C., G. and Company.

Such, Sir, is the history of the interesting family you observed this afternoon in meeting. I have not related it before, for many years. I am growing old—the sands of life are nearly out, and its events are fast fading from my memory. You are young and have memory and leisure. You may, therefore, if you please, sketch these incidents, and publish them to the world, as an illustration of the PAINS OF GUILT, AND POWER OF LOVE."

DECAY.

Delivered at the Annual Exhibition of the Clinton Liberal Institute, August 30th, 1837.

BY JOHN SNOW.

Nature forms one of the most fruitful themes for the study of man. It is a subject upon which the mind of man can dwell, and the imagination play, until a true development of its mysteries shall take place. It is something that carries in its very feature, lineaments truly pleasing and sublime. What can be more pleasing to the visionary mind, than from some beautiful, shading grove, or from the crest of some grassy mound, to take a view of the wide-spread fields which are presented to the sight? It forms a scene at once exalted, which the limited power of the human mind may contemplate without satiety. It breathes into the mind of man, a feeling that hardly favors the highest invention of art with complacency.—It excites the genius of the youthful mind, to a spirit of investigation. It awakens in the human breast, a full sense of its own imbecility and the unlimited power of that Being who is the Author of so beautiful productions. Yet, the grassy mound, the shady grove, the green fields, change—they lose their verdure and fragrance, and are clad in turn, in vestments of gloom.

We behold in all the productions of nature, a steady and undeviating course, a fixed principle by which all its laws are characterized. We behold it to be the fundamental principle of all organized matter that is liable to decay. We behold it progress for awhile, and dazzle the world with its beauty; but soon the blasts of time make it the devoted victim of decay, and it relapses into the bosom of its mother earth. We behold the verdant plant as it shoots forth from the earth, with but a faint impression of the many mysteries connected with its nature. Scarce do we dream that it, under the nutritious hand of the Author of its existence, will soon raise from the earth, overshadow it with its mighty branches, decorate its green vestments with its fruitful bounty, and then perish. But such is the fact. Scarcely does it bathe the earth with its fruitful mists, when the bitter shafts of decay striking at its very core, cause it to wither and moulder into ruin. So it is with the proud oaks that raise their heads so high in the forests. They, from tender twigs, nurtured by the fostering hand of their Creator, thrive and prosper, until they astonish mankind by their size, and excite admiration by their sublimity.

Such, too, is the law of all animal creation.—Just as they begin to see the pleasures of this world, the cold hand of death encloses them in its paralyzing grasp. Little do the domestic herds, as they roam in flocks over the verdant brow of some high hill, or feed upon the grassy meadows of some beautiful valley, under the watchful eye of the faithful shepherd, feel that life and sensation are so soon to be blighted by the ruthless hand of decay. The roaring lion, the belligerent panther, seem to take pleasure in roaming over the wooded hills, or lurking in the deep jungle, for the prey that nature has formed for the gratification of their voracious appetites. The roughest impediments of the dreariest wilds, are mockery to their strength and agility. But soon the unrelenting hand of decay fastens upon their powerful forms, and they commingle with the earth upon whose bosom they so lately bounded and sported. Thus it is with the whole brute creation. They grow for awhile, reach their maturity, and then fall.

So it is with man—the brightest ornament of nature. He enjoys the gayeties of life for awhile, with unrestrained pleasure. He suffers his imagination to revel upon the different scenes presented to the view—and admires their grandeur. The anticipation of the many pleasures that the dim future conceals from his sight, brings to his mind hopes truly gladdening. He dreams of the many pleasures that are about to surround him. He lays the foundation of future greatness and renown. But, alas! how soon are the brightest hopes blighted—how soon is man stripped of the many pleasures around him. Decay overshadows him with its withering form, and eternity opens before him! No remnant is left of his former greatness, but his noble deeds and brilliant genius. Man is endowed with certain intellectual capacities, and as these faculties are exercised they increase. As the mind of man is nurtured by the pure air of science, the sparks of his natural genius begin to shine and illuminate the world with their effulgence. But as the tide of time rolls on its troubles and misfortunes, his powerful understanding that once shone so bright, begins to weaken and fall to decay.—But the brilliancy with which his genius once shone—the mighty powers it once displayed, will ever leave effects as memorials of what it once was. We see societies that were once so prosperous and flourishing, falling away, piece by piece, until no remnant of their former proud station, remains to tell the world the pleasures arising from the benefits they shed around.

The bright firmament of American freedom abounds with its inspirations of learning and knowledge. But time will be, when others shall write the gloomy but common destiny of their downfall on the page that tells of the past. Yes! those mighty walls within which we have inhaled the pure joys of science, will soon, by the blasts of time, fall to decay. A few more years, and this mighty fabric of freedom will moulder in ruin. But may the sparks of genius that have there been nursed and made to shine, remain as lasting monuments of its glorious station in the galaxy of renown.—May it stand among the highest of those institutions that have added glory to man.

But to turn to more familiar scenes. What are the feelings of him, who leaving the scenes of his youthful days—the sacred home among those fine clad hills, those verdant valleys, those towering forests where the romance of his youth had seen all its pleasures—has rambled over the busy world of misfortune and trouble, that he might lay the foundation of his after fortunes—what are his feelings when he again returns to these scenes?—A sensation of the many pleasures he was about to forsake, then vibrated in his bosom; but with a fixed determination of satisfying the desires of his enterprising mind, he pursued his course, and directed his ambitious spirit over the fields of other climes. Having satisfied the desires of his wandering imagination—having formed the projects of his future life—a few years bring him back to the seat of his youthful days. But how changed is the scene around him! The faded and altered features which the hand of decay has left in her rapid course, are the only mark by which he discovers it to be the land of his nativity.

Thus do we see the effects that time ever has upon the things of this world. Thus do we see that the flower which is so prosperous and beautiful at noonday, withers and falls to the ground before the sun sets behind the western hills.—Thus do we see that the most splendid palaces—the most beautifully decorated mansions—the firmest monuments—the most flourishing cities—the brightest inventions of man—nay; all creation, no matter whether it be animate or inanimate, must sooner or later be prostrated by the destructive hand of decay.

AVARICE.

Avarice, is the most corroding and baneful passion, that infests the human heart. The ardent aspirations of friendship wither from or at its touch like the verdant leaf, beneath the chilling blasts of Autumn. It blights the joys of social life—renders the domestic circle as cheerless as the polar rock, and plants the sting of sorrow deep in its possessor's bosom. It knows no object but the accumulation of wealth, in the prosecution of which it often snatches the only remaining penny from the hand of suffering poverty, and as ruthless as a demon, hears the cries of injured and famishing humanity, unmoved, and leaves the wanting unrelieved. It saps the foundation of public liberality, and wraps itself in the narrow shroud of its own insignificance. It knows no motive but self-interest, and the aim of all its exertions is directed by this. It engenders crime—fosters ignorance, and blasts every joy its influence can reach.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER.

"Sheshequin, November 4th, 1837.

"Br. GROSH—Our cause in this quarter is onward, without noise or tumult. The 'still small voice' is whispering through our vallies and over our hills and mountains. It does not get a foothold by violence and excitement. It causes no trembling, except from the ecstasy of joy; and while its motion, like the leaves of the forest in a gentle breeze, is soothing to the mind of man, we hear at a distance the thundering of Orthodoxy, which, as it has become so much of 'an old story,' is less heeded than formerly. Too much of a good thing, will soon cause a surfeit; but too much of a bad thing, is the evil in bad earnest. Orthodoxy may be likened to the Dead Sea—where its outlet should be, it is bounded by a sand bank—nothing can live in it, nor partake of its waters, without vomiting. Is the Limitarian system any better? It is surrounded, figuratively speaking, with a Sodom and Gomorrah. The nature of its morals are like the waters of the Dead Sea—sickening to the participants—for, tell me not that a doctrine limiting the goodness of God, can bring health to the soul, or joy to the mind of man. The candidates of Limitarianism, before being marked for initiation, may be likened to the river Jordan, which moves sluggishly along, without being aware of the deadly gulf it is approaching, till it enters upon an anxious seat into the bosom its bitterness!

"If I have been severe in the above remarks, I have penned them in perfect good nature. Dull preaching often puts its hearers asleep. It is therefore necessary, almost, to kick some people, before you can get them to listen.

THE UNKNOWN AND THE KNOWN.

One thing that I do not know, and one that I do know.

I do not know how a person can "deserre endless damnation."

I do know that a person who "does deserve it," is more fit for the States' prison than the sacred desk.

A GRAND-FATHER'S LETTERS TO HIS GRAND-CHILDREN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

LETTER XII.

MY DEAR CHILDREN—You know how much I respect the talents and love the Christ-like spirit of the aged man who occupies the pulpit of the Episcopal church, in this place. No wonder that oft my footsteps wander thither, to receive instruction and delight, and to imbibe more and more of that spirit, without which, we may indeed call ourselves Christians, or the followers of Jesus, but "can not be his." On the last occasion that I heard him, we had a very excellent discourse on the unsatisfying nature of "wordly enjoyments," as the current phrase is, or of those enjoyments which arise from the ordinary pursuits and employments of the major part of our kind. I know not whether the experience of years adds to the vividness and impressiveness of our conceptions upon this subject; but it occurred to me, that I had never heard any declamations upon this topic from less aged preachers, which seemed to come so much from the heart, or were imbued so much with that earnestness and fervor which generally characterizes heart-felt convictions. And at no earlier period of my own life, did I ever feel, with equal force, the truth of propositions to which I had frequently given my decided, unqualified assent. I wish that I could transmit to you, now in the season when pursuits are to be chosen, and when the judgment is to decide upon the worth and the value of many conflicting claims, with all the vividness and freshness of my present feelings, a conviction of the biting remorse and stinging disappointment which you must feel from adopting the generally received anticipations of happiness, from the ordinary occupations of men. Many, I doubt not, were present at the delivery of Dr. —'s discourse, and admitted the truth of his statements, yet, on that very evening, on the very next week, recurred, with former ardor, to the pursuit of happiness in those channels in which they themselves admitted it could not be found. Such a conviction, so fruitless and unproductive, I would not be satisfied with your entertaining; but now, in the days of your youth, I should wish to impress upon your minds a firm, forcible, invincible persuasion, that from certain sources no satisfactory, adequate enjoyment can be procured or extracted, while from certain others there flows a perennial, refreshing, and soul-satisfying stream of pure and ennobling felicity.

In the hope that I may contribute to the formation of such a persuasion in your young hearts, I design to submit to you an outline of the discourse alluded to, yet fresh in my memory, adding such illustrations as seem most likely to effect my purpose, and, yet more, the fervent prayer of a devoted well-wisher, that ye may choose wisely among the sources of enjoyment—that ye may make an early choice, which will cause you no regrets—a choice, "not to be repented of."

Dr. — chose for his text the words of Isaiah, (lv: 2.) "Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread, and your labor for that which satisfieth not?" This language was addressed, as may be seen by referring to the preceding verse, to every one that thirsteth, that is to every human being without exception, inasmuch as the expression, he who thirsteth, is descriptive of the state of every man who is not actually in possession of happiness permanent in its nature, and adequate to satisfy him to the full measure of his capacity of enjoyment. The prophet's invitation necessarily implies, what indeed is expressly stated in the subsequent verses, that they who comply with it, shall find in the waters of which he invites them to partake, that which will fully satisfy their thirst after happiness. The Dr. guarded against a misapprehension by stating, that the invitation was not to be understood as promising to put those who complied with it, at once in possession of happiness to the full extent of what they are capable of enjoying, or to exempt them from a share in those afflictions and disappointments which are inseparable from a state of imperfection and discipline. The prophet's invitation further implied, he said, what indeed other passages of Scripture unequivocally teach, that every other source of gratification to which men may betake themselves, will, sooner or later, be dried up; that though the longings of spirit by which they are ever prompted to seek after a variety or an augmentation of enjoyment, may for a time appear to be satisfied in the pursuit, or in the possession of some object on which the affections were placed, they must, in the end, be left without any object that can at all satisfy them; and that every scheme of happiness, therefore, however wisely laid, or vigorously pursued, must at length terminate in misery and disappointment. This account which the Scripture gives us of the condition of man, as to the insufficiency of present gratification to afford him full and permanent happiness, is confirmed by the experience and testimony of mankind universally; for there is no man living, who has not had in his own experience, a thousand distinct intimations, that every such gratification is essentially imperfect, and must be transitory. Strange, then, yet true! that though the most devoted and the most successful votary of the world may never have been able to say that he has found in it a satisfying good, yet they that follow his footsteps, will not relinquish the hope of being still more successful; that even after successive disappointments, and the failure of the very fairest of their prospects, their expectations of a new enterprise will be as high and sanguine as ever; and that, notwithstanding the abatements which years of experience may compel them to make from their estimate of worldly enjoyments, yet they will not feel nor practically acknowledge the fairness of their delineation—"that they spend their money for that which is not bread, and their labor for that which satisfieth not."

Look around you, my children, and observe for yourselves the restlessness, the dissatisfaction, the discontent of mankind. How the spirit of man is restless and unbound! How it ever longeth after something better! How unsatisfied it is with this world's fare—with fame, with wealth, with power! From how many sources doth it attempt to derive satisfaction and pleasure! How seldom doth it find that its exertions and labors have been otherwise than misdirected! How it turneth to other pursuits, only to find, in their issue and extreme, the same disappointment and dispeace! It thirsteth, yet from a thousand fountains it findeth not wherewith to quench its thirst! It seeketh, O how unweariedly it seeketh enjoyment, satisfaction, and peace, yet findeth them not!

What meaneth all this discontent and dissatisfaction of the spirit of man—all this inquietude of soul? We have read in Gibbon of a king, who, after a long life and reign, could remember only eleven days which he could wish to live over again; nor could his historian number many more. Xerxes offered a high reward to him who should invent a new pleasure. Alexander, after the conquest of the world, wept because there were no other worlds to subdue. Solomon, after a trial of every source of gratification, pronounced upon all of them the sentence—Vanity and vexation of spirit. What is the language of these, and a thousand similar facts? Is it not, to the sufferer as well as to others, that they must hereafter seek their enjoyment from some other, richer, purer, sweeter, more satisfying fountain? Do not such facts and experiences, proclaim to us every evening, and at every interval of meditation and repose, that we have not yet found a satisfying fountain of felicity—a well of living water, and urge the wise in heart to take account of the causes of their failure.

Adopt this wise course for yourselves. Turn to the Lamentations of Jeremiah, iii: 39, 40, and admire and pursue the course there prescribed. Examine yourselves, and from the retrospect of your history, find out when you were farthest from satisfactory enjoyment; and again, in what and when you made the nearest approach to it. Thus from suffering will ye extract sweetness—from seeming evil will ye educe good—from restlessness will ye draw forth repose—and from the evidences of imperfection will ye gain a lesson which will lead you in the path towards perfection.

Perhaps the most valuable and instructive lesson which we ever learned in life, was derived from such an examination—such a retrospect. How frequently do the results recur to our memory! How frequently have they supplied conscience with a scourge, wherewith to punish and restrain our wanderings! Fresh as on the evening on which this retrospect was made, do we yet retain the impression which it left upon us. It appeared to us then, that the nearest approach to solid, serene satisfaction which we had ever experienced, consisted in the emotions of reverential awe, of filial admiration and homage, of gratitude, confidence, and trust, which were excited by contemplating the character and the government of our heavenly Parent. In these emotions, and in the spirit and conduct which seemed to emanate from them—aspirit of charity and good-will, of resignation yet activity—we seemed to have approached the nearest to peace, to satisfaction, to heavenly enjoyment. Next to this, as a source of true enjoyment, we ranked our determined, active, thoughtful, energetic pursuit of any exalted object. To the pursuit of whatever worthy aim we had been devoted, and in the pursuit of which we had been eager, thence we had uniformly derived the approbation of our own minds, and a rich portion of satisfactory felicity. Further results of my own early self-examination, I need not detail: for, from a similar one, instituted by and for yourselves, you will derive lessons more appropriate to your own cases and circumstances. To such, I pray you, devote an early peaceful hour.

UNIVERSALISM GOOD TO DIE BY.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

In a former article, it was shown that Universalism was a good doctrine to live by, and that even this was admitted by unbelievers. We shall now prove that it will equally answer for the dying hour.

1. It is evident that the admission just mentioned, covers the whole ground: for the observation of all must soon convince them, that there are many things in life worse than death. Many might be named, but it is unnecessary. If it is not so, why then do men often terminate their existence? Lord Bacon says, "It is worthy the observation, that there is no passion in the mind of man so weak, but it mates and masters the fear of death.....Revenge triumphs over death; love slights it; honor aspireth to it; grief flieth to it; fear pre-occupieth it." A doctrine, therefore, that will carry us through scenes more afflictive than death, will certainly carry us through death itself. A mariner who had sailed through many severe tempests with his ship, would certainly not be afraid to encounter a slight storm. Universalists, like Noah in the ark, sail on safely amidst the billows, and are not afraid of meeting the king of terrors.

2. Universalism will answer for the hour of death, because it presents a glorious prospect before the mind. To borrow the words of a charming writer: "The prospect viewed from every other quarter presents gloominess, darkness, and despair! But turn toward the east gate, and behold the wonders of the rising dawn; not a cloud to intercept the sight, neither is there a spot upon the fair face of the Sun of Righteousness; but unbounded and incomprehensible glory is spread far and wide, and darkness and despair are fled, to be forgotten in an eternal day!" Such is the bright and beautiful prospect which Universalism opens upon the mind in the dying hour. No other doctrine presents such joys. Well, then, may we cherish such a sentiment in health, that we may have its consolations in death.

3. The doctrine of universal salvation is good to die by, because it teaches us that we are going home. This world was only designed for a brief existence; yet we often act as though this life were never to end, and the next never to commence. We are taught by the doctrine of impartial grace, that "the dust shall return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it." Partialism presents a home, but only for a very small part of the human race. There is no light that breaks in from above. There is to be a separation, not momentary, but eternal, that shall cut asunder the tenderest ties that bind humanity together. It must be evident, then, to the candid and reflecting, that there is no comfort in that sentiment to the dying. A hope for the world is the only sentiment to support the soul in leaving its frail tenement of clay. Indeed, every one who dies happy, obtains his comfort from the doctrine of universal salvation. Go, ask the dying Christian where he puts his trust. He will tell you it is not in his works, for they appear as nothing. He looks now to the grace of God—that is his only hope. This is where Universalists look for salvation. Hence, Universalism is the only doctrine that will sustain the mind in the termination of our earthly career.

4. That universal salvation is a good doctrine for death, is evident from the well-known fact, that thousands have departed from the world, rejoicing in its high and elevated hopes. Our periodicals bring daily confirmations of this remark. True, our unwearied opposers have endeavored to prove that Universalists uniformly give up their doctrine in the dying hour. They send forth their fictitious narratives. But it is only to sustain a sinking cause. It is too late in the day to convince a discerning public, that the believers in our doctrine renounce it in death. No. We know of nothing better for life or death, than a sentiment which hath for its foundation the Rock of Ages. If our enemies wish to convert us, let them present something better than the happiness of the world, if they can, and we will then renounce our faith forever.

THE PLEASURES OF SIN.

BY A. R. BARTLETT.

The pleasures of sin! How harsh to the ear—how unwelcome to the virtuous soul, is the eunuciation of such a sentiment! "The wages of sin is death." Is this the happiness of sinners? Is it desirable to be "dead in trespasses and sin?" No! From whence, then, cometh this unseemly expression? The sacred pages, though full of instruction, contain not the sentence (save in a mistranslation of Hebrews xi: 25—"the emoluments of sin for a season"—showing that even the emoluments of sin are of short duration)—but they inform us that the curse of the Lord is in the house of the wicked." I go out beneath the broad canopy of heaven, and gaze upon the brilliant arch above: there I behold the tokens of God's unchanging goodness, shining like beacons and stars "on eternity's ocean," as if to invite my weary spirit up to immortal blessedness—but the inscription is not there. Shall I apply to reason? She would resent the indignity with a frown. Memory comes with the cup of experience, as if to decide the inquiry; but, ah! her dregs are bitter, though her lessons are profitable. She, too, gives the lie to the expression. Where, then, shall we seek for its authority?

Strange as it may appear, it is nevertheless true, that this abominable sentiment is held and expressed by professing Christians. Yes, reader, we are told by the advocates of endless misery, that the wicked enjoy more happiness in this life than do the saints. We are told that there is pleasure in unrighteousness, because the sinner is permitted to escape the anxiety and care to which the Christian is subject—that the sinner enjoys peace and happiness of mind, and riots on the abundant goodness of a bounteous Providence, while the Christian is compelled to deny himself of these good things, and live a life of gloom and sadness. Now all this is very true, if the believer in a partial salvation is (what is inadmissible) the only being that is entitled to the name of a saint. The fact is, he doubts the efficacy of what he is pleased to call the Gospel, and well he may. True, he thinks he understands that Gospel which is "the power of God unto salvation." But is he happy—does he "rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory?" He says not. Why, then, does he complain of misery; why envy the wicked? Is not this misery the result of a limited faith? O yes, but then—we shall be told—justice is not rendered to him in this world; his reward is in a future state of existence. Strange, that the law of nature must be perverted before he can be happy—strange, indeed, that the cause which renders him so perfectly miserable in this life, should be the very means of his unspeakable happiness in heaven.

But he not only doubts the efficiency of the Gospel, but he also feels a want of confidence in the justice and mercy of God. It matters not in what light we view the doctrine of endless misery; whether it be that God has ordained the endless existence of sin, that he might gratify the purified saints in glory by displaying to their admiring gaze, the execution of His implacable vengeance on their sons and daughters—or, that He purposed the unending duration of punishment for his own pleasure, and the perpetuity of sin as a necessary agent: still, the Partialist is incapable of reconciling its injustice with his conceptions of the divine nature; and its inconsistency with the love, power, and wisdom of God, render it inexplicable and mysterious. The horrid glare of its cruelty flashes across his aching imagination, and the proud spirit within, quails at the thunderings of his own visionary Sinai! No wonder he trembles—no wonder that such a doctrine is a source of mental anguish, or that its believers complain of misery. The vacant stare, the sepulchral laugh, and the midnight wanderings of the maniac—the blasted hopes of the living—the despairing groans of the dying—the bursting agony of the fond mother, as she gazes with gushing tenderness upon the lifeless remains of her beloved offspring, whom she now believes to be a child of perdition,—these, these are the infallible tokens of its withering influence. If the belief in endless misery produces so much unhappiness, what must be the effect of its reality?

Partialist brother, let me appeal to you. If the doctrine which you believe, is attended with so much misery to you, that the troubles of the wicked are pleasures, compared with it, what will be your situation in view of its infliction? You believe that your creed is of divine origin, and that it will certainly be carried into effect, and this belief makes you wretched. How much more wretched must you be, then, when in Paradise, you look down into the gulf below, and behold the awful certainty of that which is now a matter of peace-destroying faith! O, deluded man! Pause a moment and view the sandy foundation on which you stand! What surety have you of your own salvation? You believe your faith is righteousness. If God has permitted righteousness to be a source of misery here, what assurance have you that the same righteousness will not continue to be a source of endless misery in eternity? Where now are your hopes? Tottering on the crumbling verge of error, soon to plunge into the dark abyss of despair! Cling not to such hopes. Their very fulfilment would make you miserable forever! Say not that your happiness will be augmented by the miseries of the damned. No—the groans and shrieks of the infernal host, would reverberate through your soul, mingling curses with your shouts, and with your songs of praise, "horrible discord."

Turn, then, from the error of your ways, to "the living God, who is the Saviour of all men." It is not true that there is pleasure in sin—but it is true that "righteousness tendeth to life." It is not true that the way of the righteous is hard—but it is true that the way of the Partialist is fraught with death. Can the way of death be a righteous way? "In the way of righteousness is life, and in the pathway thereof there is no death." But "there is no peace to the wicked, saith my God." Does my brother complain, that he enjoys less happiness than those whom he judges to be sinners? Let him seek for the cause of his misery, where alone it is to be found; in his own heart—in his own faith, and in his own practice.

THE GLORIES OF HEAVEN.

I have often pondered upon the thrilling subject of man's future salvation. I have reflected much upon the glorious and all-conquering grace which must at last melt every stubborn heart, and subdue every evil passion. And upon that great and happy day, when Christ, the chosen Mediator between God and man, shall have sought out every wanderer of the Adamic family—when he shall with ransomed myriads come before the immaculate throne of the great I AM, saying, Father, I have completed my mission—I have finished the work thou gavest me to do. I was the good shepherd—I laid down my life for my sheep. It was thy will of all thou gavest me, I should lose nothing; and, Father, behold them here, coming to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads. These are the fruits of my labors and pains. I now deliver them to Thee, that thou mayst be all in all.

Oh! what an absorbing theme! What mind is not lost in contemplating the grand consummation of all things! What mind does not experience rapturous ecstasy, while viewing with an eye of faith the glories of heaven! The immediate presence of God which is life and light, is there. The lovely Jesus, and all patriarchal fathers of old, are there. All the good and great that have lived and died since the commencement of the world, are there. Has the chill hand of death plucked from our bosom a dear relative—from our social circle a loved friend?—they are there, basking in the eternal sunshine of God's love. The spirits of all just men made perfect, are there, together with tens of thousands of angels chanting the song of redeeming love. C. W. M.

TWO EVILS.

CHOOSE THE LEAST IF EITHER.

I have often thought what a consistent appearance old Atlas must have made, when compelled by Jupiter to carry the heavens upon his shoulders. Such nice proportions! the whole terrestrial world supported by one man! Now there are some who marvel much that mankind could ever have been credulous enough to believe this mythological legend; while, at the same time, they believe in endless damnation. Now, my organ of comparison is such, as to make the relative size of the two first, approximate much nearer to each other, than the two last, which are countenanced by modern incredulity. The first two are more visible to the eye of imagination. Still, with a little reflection, we can easily discover that the disproportion of the two last is much the greatest.

Imagine the most cruel torments of the Spanish Inquisition ever invented—then imagine torments that as far exceed these as time does eternity, both in duration and degree—and then compare them with sin; and if you do not have a man with this mundane sphere on his back, you will certainly have his actions with all eternity resting on them!

QUEST—How much did Heathen credulity exceed modern extravagance? SIGMA.

The uncultivated man is contended, if he sees something going on; the man of more refinement must be made to feel; the man entirely refined, desires to reflect.—Goethe.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, D. SKINNER, AND S. R. SMITH, EDITORS.

UTICA, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1837.

SUICIDE.

Br. Grosh—Are you a believer in a limited punishment post mortem? If not, how do you reconcile cases of suicide with your doctrine of all-sufficient punishment in this life? An answer to the above would be gratifying to
X. Y. Z.
South Venice, N. Y., October 13th, 1837.

ANSWER.

Br. X. Y. Z.—I am not a believer in punishment post mortem, [i. e. after death] either limited or unlimited.—As to suicide, I suppose that the Scriptures to regard it under one of the following heads.

1. Either—they class it under the head of murder—"thou shalt not kill"—in which case the penalty—the whole penalty—the only penalty, after the act, I can there find on record against murder, is inflicted on the criminal in the very act of transgression—viz. by man his blood is shed. I am not very sanguine in this opinion, inasmuch as there is no appearance of malice in the offender against himself; for the apostle Paul says, "no man ever yet hated his own flesh"—Eph. v: 29; consequently the act is scarcely murder.

2. Or—the Scriptures consider it as the act of none who are of sound mind, and therefore accountable beings. In the cases where suicides are recorded, the act itself is never condemned or even named as a criminal one. See 1 Samuel xxxi: 4, 5; 2 Samuel xvii: 23, and the case of Judas. It seems entirely omitted in the various and frequent lists of actions forbidden to be practiced. If suicide is an act which can be committed by a perfectly sane mind, why this entire silence—why the absence of all censure on the cases recorded—and why is no penalty laid down as its proper demerit, in the Scriptures?

3. In conclusion—believing the object of punishment to be salvation from sin, I can conceive of no use for it for this act more than for any other. There is no danger that suicide will ever be committed in the immortal state. As to the mental guilt, let it be shown that the suicide had an evil intention, and that he was of perfectly sane mind in forming it, and that it is necessary for his salvation to be punished after death, and there is no one that will object to his receiving all that is necessary. As this can not be done—no more than I can prove the negative of the proposition—and, above all, as the Bible is silent on the subject, I think it best becomes us not to dogmatize upon it. I have therefore confined myself strictly to answering the questions asked, in hope, that seeing why I differ from you, you may have charity for (what you may deem) your erring brother.
A. B. G.

"AND THERE WAS LIGHT."

It appears to me, that any intelligent man upon taking up for the first time the Scriptures—say one deeply read in the world's lore, and acquainted with various knowledge, but ignorant of Holy Writ—it seems to me that such an one would be deeply affected by that passage which declares that "God said, Let there be light, and there was light."

There may be those to whom the Bible "is a sealed book," who may have vague ideas of some creative process, some radiant emanation—some omnipotent fiat—thoughts blended with their notions of things, which they have gleaned from old memories, from lessons taught them in childhood—but we are supposing a case of one who has never previously heard the scriptural account, and whose eyes for the first time have caught the sentence referred to. Until then, when, where and how light, the beautiful light was created, if created at all, has been to him, perchance, a problem wrapped in impenetrable doubt. He has studied the deep mystic sciences—he has been a diligent student of the arcana of nature—he has gazed by the tombs of the mighty—he has pored over the pages of the poet and the philosopher—but, until then, never, never has he found such a simple, such a sublime solution as that given by the inspired writer. Here, in these few words, is a truth which the reasonings of a thousand theories could have but led him to at last, and "his spirit is still" under the influence of that solemn truth, "God said, Let there be light and there was light."

And, oh! what a moment must that have been, when first the clear, glad light broke over the earth, which before had been "without form and void," and which dispelled the darkness that until then had rested "upon the face of the deep." Then sprang into existence, beauty, life and joy. The seas glittered in their bounds, and the dry land knew its place, and the great sun, and "the lesser" moon, and "the host of heaven" looked forth—and herb and fruit—and all living and moving things of earth and stream, and sea and air, rose into being—then, through the blue high arches of the firmament went forth a sound, as sphere wafted to sphere "the great harmony"—for, then, "the sons of God-shouted for joy"—then, the star-harps rang creation's jubilee.

It is not our design in this article to enter into a philosophical disquisition upon the cause and nature of light. We are not capable of doing this, and were we, these columns are not a place for an essay of the kind. It sufficeth for us, in writing this, to know that "He spake," and it burst into being—that wonderful and subtle existence, which pervades the visible external creation, and touches all things with a smile and a glory.—We shall speak in a metaphorical sense and say, that, to us in the moral, as in the physical world, light precedes a new creation, or rather, it heralds a new order of things evolving from the chaos of the old. Nor will we pause here to observe upon individual cases—upon those who, "sitting in darkness have seen great light"—to whom the world and the course of events have looked mysterious and inconsistent, until the truth has beamed forth and all was clear, bright and harmonious—these we will not remark upon here. But, we shall speak of one or two of the great moral revolutions which have occurred in the history of man.

And let us survey, for a moment, the world as it was at the time immediately preceding that great event, the introduction of the Christian dispensation. Even the chosen people, the taught of God, beheld, only through the dim medium of types and shadows, the better things to come. And, around them, oh, what a waste! Look at the chaos, the darkness! Some, very few, perhaps wise compared with the many. But, we are speaking of the many. And what was their condition? Swayed by wild superstition, and groveling fear—using rites and ceremonies, mystic and blinding—bowing down to altars red and reeking with unhallowed oblations—seeking from the soothsayer and the oracle the responses of fate—conjuring up all strange and evil imaginings—owning 'gods many'—consecrating shrines to Diana and shrines to Jupiter, and even then, in the polished city of the Greek, the place of learning, of boasted wisdom and refinement, perchance, was reared "an altar to the unknown God" whom they "ignorantly worshipped."

It needs not that I should enter into a detail of facts so well known and understood before—nay, I am aware that I am recapitulating things of almost a wearisome triteness—but I have used them as an illustration of the view which I have taken of this subject.

Here, then, was a darkness brooding over the world—a time of desolation and mental gloom—which called for light, light! And, as it were, "God said, let there be light, and there was light!" The clouds which had enveloped the nations, rolled away—the symbols of the Jew were laid aside, and the altars of the Gentile were overthrown—the brotherhood of human-kind was declared—the veil of the temple was rent in twain, and man came then and cometh now to his Father, by Christ "the mercy-seat." This was another creation. The symmetry of a new world formed from the elements of the old.

Sweet were the strains in which was sung the anthem of its birth!—sweet was the angel-chorus that pealed over the hills of Judea: "Glory to God in the highest; on earth, peace, good-will to men!"

Take another instance—the Reformation. Again had there been darkness—mental, moral darkness. The people were groping and blindly walking in their ways, chained and tested by creed, and form, and ceremony—corruption polluted the high places, and spiritual despotism ruled over God's heritage with a rod of iron. The fires on the shrines of Genius were dim—and learning was in the cell and the cloister; the starlight of poetry may have glimmered here and there amid the gloom, but, as a mass, the human intellect slept almost motionless, like the sluggish waters of that doomed eastern sea which bears no living thing upon its bosom. Then, as it were again, "God said, let there be light, and there was light." The grey dawn broke—and the press thundered, and mighty men lifted up their voices—and the compass guided through unknown waters—and the swift ship's keel stranded upon shores "beyond the seas"—and as it grew lighter and lighter, the vast intellect began to heave up from its slumber, and to murmur in its strength, and then did the surges roll, and swell, and beat against the foundations of that proud Babylon that had so long lifted its head to the skies.

But the accustomed limits of an Editorial article, demand that I should be brief. Our readers will perceive I think, the truth of the remark, that in the moral, as in the physical world, light precedes the evolving of a new order of things from the chaos of the old. For as it has been, we may expect it always will be. Let men have light, and error and superstition will flee away. Whether the present age is one upon which there is to burst more light, let each one judge. In my first article, I stated that we lived "in a remarkable, a peculiar age"—seemingly, one of those periods "when the great designs of Providence glow out with more than common legibility upon the moral firmament." How true this is, also, let others decide. But let us do one thing, whether as individuals or communities: let us trust the Lord in all times of desolation and gloom; for, remember, "when the earth was without form, and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep," then "God said, let there be light, and there was light." He is God over the moral and mental, as well as the physical universe. Trust Him.

THE RECORD.

CONVENTIONS.—The South Carolina Convention of Universalists met in Harmony M. H., Anderson District, S. C., on the Friday preceding the first Sunday in August, 1837. Br. James Mullikin, Moderator, and Br. Allen Fuller, Clerk. Brs. G. Rankin, of Anderson; D. Cook, Charleston; J. Feaster, Sr., Fairfield, standing committee. Br. Mullikin was chosen to deliver the next occasional sermon, and Br. Lynch, substitute. Brs. Fuller and Fisk were chosen agents to establish circuits for preaching. The delegates to the U. S. Convention were instructed to use their influence so to alter the Constitution, as to allow all visiting brethren to take parts in its deliberations. A Protest "in reference to the course pursued by several of our periodicals"—"of arraigning brethren in the public papers, and the use of unkind language towards them"—was passed with a declaration of withdrawal of patronage from such as should continue it. [This protest is an ungenerous and unjust classification of the injured with the injurer. I know of no paper, save one, (the S. C. Evangelist,) that has assailed others, except in defence against the attacks of that paper—why then say "several"—why not name the criminal and let the rest go unwhipped? For one, I protest against this wholesale injustice of the South Carolina brethren, as ungenerous to the innocent periodicals, and unworthy of themselves. A. B. G.] The thanks of the Convention were tendered to Br. Fuller for his excellent occasional sermon—to the friends in Anderson District for their hospitality—and sermons were preached by Brs. Lynch, D. H. Porter, Mullikin, Fisk, and A. Fuller. Adjourned to meet in Fredonia M. H., Newberry District, on the Friday preceding the first Sunday in August, 1838.

The Vermont Convention of Universalists met in Rockingham, August 23d, 1837, Brs. Warren Skinner, Moderator; E. Garfield, Clerk. Brs. K. Haven, W. S. Ballou, C. Woodhouse and J. E. Palmer, a committee on statistics. Brs. J. E. Palmer, K. Haven, E. Wellington and H. F. Ballou, committee of discipline. Brs. W. Skinner, K. Haven and J. E. Palmer, standing committee on ordination. Br. E. Garfield, Standing Clerk.—Brs. W. Skinner, W. S. Ballou and R. Streeter, committee to raise funds for supplying destitute places with preaching. Br. W. Skinner to preach the concluding discourse and customary addresses at the next session. The Clerk to prepare the minutes and circular. Ministers from other States were invited to take part in the deliberations of the Council. Recommended the establishment of Sunday schools to churches and societies.—Recommended that the brethren in Bennington county unite with the Windham Association—the latter altering its constitution accordingly. Recommended to each society in the State to raise funds to pay the expenses of delegates to the United States Convention. Recommended continued exertions to abolish the common use of intoxicating liquors, and affectionately invited all engaged in their sale or manufacture to discontinue the same. Returned thanks to Br. Haven for his concluding discourse, and requested its publication in the Watchman. Conferred ordination on Br. Solomon Laws.—Sermons were delivered by Brs. J. V. Wilson, E. Garfield, A. L. Balch, J. G. Adams, ordination sermon by D. Skinner, and K. Haven. On Wednesday evening, sermons were also preached in the vicinity by W. Bell, J. Moore and W. Skinner. Seventeen resident, and ten visiting ministering brethren, and nine lay delegates were present. Three Associations were represented—one, (the Northern,) was not represented. Adjourned to meet at such place as the committee may designate, the fourth Wednesday in August, 1838.

The Connecticut Convention of Universalists met in Danbury, August 30th, 1837. Brs. Zadoc Stevens, Moderator; J. H. Gihon, Clerk.—Brs. A. Moore, F. Hitchcock, L. Lamb, committee on fellowship and ordination. B. B. Hallock, to preach the next occasional sermon.—L. Lamb, J. Booth, and W. Brown, committee of discipline. The Clerk to prepare the Minutes and Circular. Invited the brethren present, not members, to take part in the deliberations of the Council. Rescinded the eleventh article of the Constitution. Requested Br. Moore to furnish a copy of the occasional sermon for publication. Voted to confer ordination on Br. Henry Lyon. Recommended to the several societies to defray the expenses of their pastors, who may be so appointed, as delegates to the U. S. Convention. Voted to publish the minutes, statistics, etc., in pamphlet form. Seven ministerial and seven lay delegates were present; eleven preachers in all—of whom three were visitors.—Sermons were preached by Brs. L. D. Williamson, A. Moore, J. H. Gihon, B. B. Hallock, R. O. Williams and W. A. Sickney. Adjourned to meet in Middletown, Conn., on the last Wednesday in August, 1838.

RETRENCHMENT.

It is the duty of every man in hard and difficult times, to retrench his expenditures. But many, even in this business, commit grievous and very injurious mistakes. They retrench the necessary, and retain the useless articles which cause expense. The manufacturer or mechanic will dismiss his workmen, whose only dependence is their daily wages, and whose only hope of earning them is in being employed by him; and he will retain his expensive and even injurious luxuries, which are but questionable as to their good effects on any persons in community. The farmer will retrench in books for his children, that they may be idle and ignorant in their leisure hours, at a future expense which can never be met but with anguish of heart; or, perhaps, will give up his newspaper, the only source from which he may derive information that will aid him in selling his crops to good advantage and at an early day. And yet, for lack of stopping a few cracks in his house, he will burn extra wood enough to pay for half a dozen papers, or by retaining some careless habit, he will lose more than would furnish his children with a good library.

But there are other profits than those that can be computed in dollars and cents—aye, more valuable and enduring than any pecuniary gains. Though even in a pecuniary point of view, many lose more by unwise retrenchment, than they gain, yet still more may they lose in a moral or mental point of view. Some of our subscribers talk of retrenching their expenses, by giving up the Magazine and Advocate—even some who, if they had attended to the offers we have made, would actually have saved enough to pay for two-thirds of the next volume! They admit the paper to be worth more than double the subscription price, yet they will discontinue it, and retain some things more costly, and worse than useless to them or their families. Nor is this all. By retrenching their support to our periodicals and our preachers, (when, by retrenching in other things not nearly as necessary to their welfare, and to the happiness of others, they could easily increase their support of both,) they injure the cause—delay or retard its speed, and suffer tenfold more in injury, than they now pay for preaching and periodicals, from the consequently unreduced ignorance, bigotry and superstition of the world in which they live.

Therefore, to all our friends who severely feel the pressure of hard times, I would say, Retrench your expenditures by all means, if you can not honestly increase your income so as to meet them. But be careful what you cut off and what you retain. Be careful that in saving yourself, you do not injure others. Be careful that in saving your money, you do not suffer in your mental and moral well-being, or in that of your family. Look well within—and well around—begin with your habits—then your omissions of duty and of carefulness—and having retrenched what you there find useless or injurious, (if any such things there exist,) proceed to cut off the least beneficial, the least worthy, and the most injurious of your "comforts," as they are called, always remembering that the value of a thing is not always to be measured by its price—nor its effects whether for good or ill, visible and palpable to the eyes and touch.

These few hints are offered to those Universalists who are without preaching or papers, as well as to those who have withdrawn, or intend withdrawing any portion of their support from the preachers or printers of the Gospel, on account of "hard times." Pay for your preaching and your papers in advance, and you will hardly feel the expense.

OUR BEREAN INSTITUTE,

Is in a highly prosperous condition, numbering, as we understand, not far from a hundred and twenty or thirty members. Debates and lectures upon alternate evenings—also, when time will allow, reading from a manuscript literary journal called the Budget, articles contributed thereto, with occasional declamations, compose the exercises of the Institute. We hold our meetings every Tuesday evening, and are generally favored with large and respectable audiences of ladies and gentlemen.—Non-members are allowed to participate in the debates, and the privilege of voting upon the merits of the question. We shall be happy to see any of our friends and the public, residents of this city or from abroad, who may see fit to visit us. The meetings of the Berean are held in the front room of the basement story of the Universalist meeting-house, Devereux-street. We shall publish, from time to time, when convenient, the question before the society for discussion on the next debating evening after the issuing of our paper. The question for the next Tuesday evening we do not recollect precisely, verbatim, but is, we believe, to this effect:—"Does the Constitution sanction (or allow) slaveholding as it exists at the South?"

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate

CHRISTIANITY.—A POEM.

Delivered at the last exhibition of the Clinton Liberal Institute.

The gloom of ages o'er the world hung Jark,
Accumulate. The clouds of error, black
And dense with ignorance; commingled
As lurid as the starless midnight drear,
In which the wanderer may strive in vain
To reach the haven of his hopes; had lowered
Down upon earth.

Then superstition's blight, destructive dire,
Had widely spread its desolations round,
Withering the fairest, brightest hopes of man—
Its poisonous sediments infusing deep
In every cup where sparkled vital joy.
Mysterious motions, theories absurd,
Were cherished, and believed of Deity.

No motive was presented to induce
The world to virtue, no restraint imposed
To check the violence of passion dire,
And hence, mankind lured the bitter draughts
That vice prepared, and deeper sank in woe,
The shrieks of victims rent the passing gale,
Extorted from submissive votaries,
Who bowed at superstition's altar, red
With the life-blood of thousands.

One dim light, feeble and flickering, shone amid the gloom;
Its scattered rays had shot athwart the dark,
And on the curtain, cast their sickly gleam,
That shrouded all beyond this nether world.
But like the lowly and expiring lump
Glimmering in its socket ghastly, made
The darkness o'er more terrible apparent.
As yet, no beacon on the distant height
Was reared, to safely guide bewildered man
Through sorrow's luzzy sea. No ray of Hope
On the dark shores beyond the grave had gleamed,
To cheer the pilgrim and dispel the dread
That shrouded death and caused the soul to shrink
Aghast, when dolorous expectation locked
Its fond, bright hopes, its being and its joys
Within the dreary vault of Non-existence.

At length, a Star upon the sky appeared,
It cast its glorious radiance through the gloom,
And won the gaze of mortals—guiding them
To hail the new born Child, the Nazarene,
Who came to pour o'er man's benighted path,
CHRISTIANITY'S effulgence. He, despised,
Rejected with his little band, was doomed
To toss upon the raging element
Where persecution's bloody surges heaved.

But fortunate for man, he kindled up
The inextinguishable light, that cast
Its radiance on the path earth's pilgrim treads,
Extending principles by him diffused,
Their influence hence uprooted error,
And superstition's night-like mantle rent.
They showed a God in majesty enthroned
Who earth had made—with vast varieties
Of species peopling every element.
The nature of that God exhibited,
Omniscient all—in Wisdom, Infinite,
In Goodness and in Power unlimited,
Inhabiting all space, and yet, unseen,
Rewarding virtue, and dread chastisements
Indicting upon vice—

He showed that happiness was virtue's mood,
And vice, to those who followed in her train,
Reached forth the deep, deep cup of bitterest woe.

Privileges

The same giving to all impartially,
Restraints the same imposing upon all,
To all one common FATHER giving, God;
Making the interest of all, of each
The happiness, and points misfortune's child
To streams of Charity, of Friendship, Love,
Where he can love and quench the pangs of grief Intense—

But, more than all, and glory chief of this,
It opens the portals of the grave, and sheds
The radiance of Hope beyond. The vaults—
Deep vaults of death are rent asunder. Faith
Serenely treads the chaste abode of worlds
Celestial, where all sorrow is unknown.
There, in the vast domain of peace, immortal,

It congregates the world prospectively.
This is the glorious theme, enrapturing,
Of Christian credence—of CHRISTIANITY.

Then Death's barbed dart shall rust
And lose its potency, and sorrow's cup,
Dashed from the lips in scattered fragments lie.
These are the prospects CHRISTIAN HOPE affords,
Unequalled; cheering sad and heart-sick man
With prelibations of unfading joy.
Companion of his lonely hours—his stay,
Unfailing, when the fiercest, wildest blasts,
Adverse of fortune, howl and weep away
His brightest prospects—and the purest solace
Of age, when time, stern unrelenting time
Upon his wrinkled brow shall twine the blossoms
That portend decay.

Receive, O man, the prospects and the hopes,

GRATITUDE.

Perhaps there is not a broader distinction between individuals than that which arises from their susceptibility of gratitude and the contrary. In the common walks of life, we meet with some men who appear to have no idea of that virtue. Favors may be heaped upon them, and they still expect more; but an emotion of thankfulness never arises in their hearts. And here religion appears to be a proof of the capacity of the heart for gratitude.—We have received every thing from the hands of our Creator. We owe him our existence. We owe him for every blessing which we have received through life. We lie down at night under his protection, and rise up in the morning renewed in strength and cheerfulness.—We commence the labors of the day under his blessing, and every thing that prospers in our hands is an immediate favor from the hand of God, deserving of our gratitude and adoration. Happy is that man who is constantly grateful to the benignant giver of every good gift, for gratitude is not only a just debt which we owe to the bestower, but it produces happiness in the bosom which entertains the delightful guest. Rivers of joy flow into the heart that rises in gratitude to God, and we are doubly blessed. On the other hand, may we not doubt the sincerity of his gratitude, who, while professing to be very thankful for some small favor received at our hand, never thinks of the great Benefactor who has bestowed upon him all the blessings of life, and promised joy unspeakable in the world to come.—Ladies' Repository.

ITALIAN AND GERMAN MUSIC.

Bulwer, in his last work, (Ernest Maltravers,) says of music, "It is almost the only thing which Italians in general can be said to know, and even that knowledge comes to them, like Dogberry's reading and writing, by nature—for of music as a science the unprofessional amateurs know but little. As vain and arrogant of the last wreck of their national genius, as the Romans of old were of the empire of all arts and arms, they look upon the harmonies of other lands as barbarous; nor can they appreciate or understand appreciation of the mighty German music, which is the proper minstrelsy of a nation of men—a music of philosophy, of heroism, of the intellect and the imagination, beside which the strains of modern Italy are indeed effeminate, fantastic, and artificially feeble. Rossini is the Canova of music, with much of the pretty, with nothing of the grand!"

SCRAPS FROM THE GERMAN OF JEAN PAUL.

BY A BOOKWORM.

AFFECTION AND ADVERSITY.—Oh! how strong is our affection, when all things else around us are fleeting away and breaking; and when, in spite of them all, the bonds of love are unbroken, and the light of love undimmed, and it clasps our shattered beings and spirits in its firm embrace, like the rainbow bending, unmoved and unchanged, over the scattered waters of a cataract!

LOVERS.—People who are in love with each other, wonder that third persons should discover their sentiments. They fancy themselves in a sort of Calypso's Island, and are astonished when a strange sail is seen approaching the coast. There is, in point of fact, no paradise which has such a low and thin fence as this; every passer-by can see through it.

GRIEF.—It is not the greatness, but the uncertainty of adversity, that afflicts us. The Minotaur, the rocks and pitfalls, in the labyrinth of old, was not half so terrible to the unfortunate wanderers as the dark night around them, and the turns and windings of its outlets.

FALSEHOOD.—False men's words and deeds remind us of thunder and lightning on the stage, which, united in heaven, in the theatre are generated in opposite corners of the house, and by different operators.

LEARNING.—Accomplishments and ornamental learning are sometimes acquired at the expense of usefulness. The tree which grows the tallest and is most thickly clothed with leaves, is not the best bearer, but rather, the contrary.

MUTUAL AFFECTION.—The pursuits and the affections which two hearts possess in common, are like objects placed between two mirrors, which each reflects to, and receives back from the other, in endless variety and multiplied beauty.

HUMILITY.—Hail humility! thou art the only virtue that was created by God himself, not by man, or by human institutions. Thou art like light, which shows all other things in their fairest colors, itself invisible in heaven!

MORNING.—The morning gives our soul pinions, which the day makes to droop; hence the horses of Aurora, in the old mythology, were winged, but not those of the God of day.

WOMAN.—There is a heaven in woman's heart, full of beauty, but dim; and it is hard for a man to count and classify all the stars that adorn it.

SELFISHNESS.—Selfish men are always the first to grumble about and to exaggerate the selfishness of others; as the heathens of old used to call the Christians atheists.

LOVE.—As long as a woman loves, she does nothing else. A man has other matters to attend to in the intervals.

JOY.—The cup of joy, unlike all others, is heaviest when empty.—Mirror.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

From the Millennial Harbinger.

No. 11.—Mr. Campbell to Mr. Skinner.

Steam-boat Coquette, Ohio river, September 30, 1837.

OF one of the Cæsars it has been truly said, that he sought the fame of victory and the spoils of war more than the good of his country or of human kind. If, like him, you are not too much enamored with the love of glory, you do yourself great injustice. We have not yet discussed the first proposition, and already you have proclaimed about seven triumphs. Our readers will, I fear, begin to think that you are more in quest of victory than of truth. Dazzled with the splendor of your conquests as with their number, you excel even Cæsar in the relation of them. Three words told his glory—two yours. He said, VENI, VIDI, VICI, (I came, I saw, I conquered.) But you still more heroically say, VIDI VICI, (I saw, I conquered.) It is your glory, Sir, to gain a triumph before you enter the field of battle. I know indeed some cynical folks may say that you resemble not so much the Roman hero, as a certain American chief, who, while he was on the retreat, was always reporting the victories he had gained.

2. Connate with this your gasconade, as some hypocrits might call it, are the elegancies of the following Universalian compliments. Of yourself and me in contrast you very politely say, "I studiously avoid all ambiguity; a thing, by the bye, of which I fear you will never be guilty, so long as a DOUBLE ENTENDRE will serve your purpose better"—"you well knew that certain words would answer for you to play an ambiguous game with"—"Keep cool, friend Campbell—keep cool: you will not only feel but do much better;" and why did you not add, "Don't swear, don't lie, friend Campbell?"—"I will not waste my spittle to quench [your sun till it rises]"—"I hope my dear friend will get in better humor before he writes again," etc., etc., etc.

3. These, Sir, are a few, a sample of your Universalian nosebags from your letter No. X. My readers will remember, as an excuse for me, that you were recommended to me as a most GENTLEMANLY opponent—not only as the MAGNUS APOLLO, but also as the BEAU IDEAL of an honorable Universalist disputant. They will therefore forgive me, and I will endeavor to give them a specimen of self-government.

4. Notwithstanding your seven triumphs, I am gratified to observe in your letter of August, No. X., received while I was (as I am now) from home, that my syllogistic parallelisms between the various acceptations of Paradise, Heaven, Hell, Shemim, and Gehenna, have been by you unequivocally admitted. For this admission you may have as many triumphs as you make paragraphs in your reply to this. The concession is, that although Shemim, Paradise, Heaven, Hell, Gehenna, all originally meant something earthly, local, and passing away, they have actually become the figures of other states, and the names of them too, and that they might even represent a future state of misery or bliss. This is all I asked. But, strange to tell, now that I have sustained my first proposition, it is not one of the arguments of Universalists; that, in one word, "Universalists do not now argue that because Gehenna originally meant the Valley of Hinnom, therefore it can not represent a state of punishment after death." And what in the name of reason, mean the hundred volumes of Universalists, proving that Gehenna originally meant the Valley of Hinnom, if they did not thence argue that it could not in the New Testament mean a state of future and endless punishment? or that it could not depart so far from its original meaning! And why do you dwell so much upon the original meaning of this word!!

5. Our readers will judge between us here when I have quoted a few words from your oracle, Mr. Balfour:—"I have," says he, "contended that the Jews could not understand our Lord by 'the damnation of hell' to mean a place of eternal misery, because Gehenna has no such meaning in the Old Testament."* Again, to sustain himself on this ground, he says, "The Old Testament is the dictionary of the language of the New;" and therefore whatever Gehenna meant in the Old it must mean in the New Testament. And yet, you now affirm that Universalists never denied that Gehenna might mean endless punishment, so far as its original signification is concerned!!

6. And why do you, paragraphs 5 and 6, recall this concession, and again, for the tenth time, tell us that Gehenna originally meant the Valley of Hinnom; and ask, "What reason have we to suppose it was used in an entirely different sense in the New Testament?" But as you have admitted my syllogistic arguments, letter VIII, paragraphs 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, you can not now be indulged with the reoccupancy of the fortress which you have abandoned, if not surrendered.

7. Yet I must say, that it is not an entirely different sense even from its Old Testament acceptance, yourself being judge: for you say, "In process of time"—yes, I quote your words, "in process of time Gehenna and Tophet, another name for the same thing, were used in the Old Testament figuratively to set forth the temporal but severe judgments coming upon the Jews." In process of time it began to be used figuratively!—Well, so far so good. And upon better testimony than your Balfour, we add, in process of time it was used to represent future and eternal punishment, as is found in the apocryphal books of the Old Testament and in the Jewish Targums.—These writings, so far as the use of words or their current acceptance are concerned, are of as much authority as dictionaries. The norma loquendi, or the particular meaning of words in any given time, must be learned from the books of that time.—Hence some of our most learned writers have been at pains to show that during the interim between Malachi and Matthew Levi, the word Gehenna was used figuratively to represent not only future punishment, but future punishment in another state of existence. The "process of time" and the process of change which you mention, may, even upon the concessions of Balfour, be continued on down to the New Testament.

8. In the New Testament, as I have already shown, (though you seem not to have noticed it,) this is not the only term which has in process of time come to mean something very different from its Old Testament or original meaning. Did I not enumerate the words Jerusalem, Mount Zion, Temple, Circumcision, Passover, Manna, Babylon, as well as Garden or Paradise, Heaven, Hell, etc.? And will you hazard the denial that these words have meanings in the New Testament which they never had in the Old?

9. After all, your courage rises to concede, paragraph 7, still more unambiguously all that you just seemed above desirous to recall. "Therefore," you conclude, "I do not say that because Gehenna originally meant the Valley of Hinnom, it can not represent a state of punishment after death in another world." Now, Sir, stand to this. Let it be final, and tell us no more about the Valley of Hinnom.

10. But we are yet one step before you. We do not only say that in accordance with the laws of language and the words Paradise, Heaven, Temple, Zion, Jerusalem, Babylon, etc., etc., it may mean, but it does actually mean in the New Testament, punishment after death in another state of existence. And to present our proof in order—that Hell or Gehenna, in the Christian Scriptures represents a place or state of punishment after death, we argue:—

11. 1st. From Matt. x: 28, where Christ taught his hearers to fear him that after death, "after he has killed the body," has power to destroy both soul and body in hell: FEAR HIM. Hell, then, indubitably denotes a state of future punishment after death.

12. 2d. The Messiah again threatens punishment in hell to some of his contemporaries as unavoidable: "How can you escape the damnation of hell?" Matt. xxiii: 33.

13. 3d. Jesus uses the words "hell fire," "unquenchable fire," "everlasting fire," as substitutes for hell, or as equivalent to one another. Matt. xviii: 8, 9. Mark ix: 43, 44, 45. Words, as well as things, that are equal to the same term, are equal to one another.

14. 4th. Hell is by Jesus contrasted with life; and to "go into hell" opposed to "entering into life." But to "enter into life" is by Jesus explained as equivalent to entering into heaven or into eternal life after death. Therefore, to go into hell is the opposite of going into heaven. If heaven be everlasting bliss, hell is everlasting misery.

15. 5th. But as the word Hell or Gehenna occurs twelve times in the New Testament, and as it is impossible to show that the Valley of Hinnom or any temporal punishment was ever intended by any of them, they may in their various occurrences be regarded as so many evidences of punishment after death in another state of existence.

16. Now we shall see what you have been able to urge against these proofs. With regard to the first it is said, perhaps—the person who had power to cast into hell after death was some of the Roman Cæsars—and the disciples of Christ and his hearers were commended supremely to fear Cæsar, because he had power to destroy both soul and body in the conflagration of Jerusalem! With regard to the second—perhaps the "damnation of hell" meant the conflagration of Jerusalem, with all its calamities, by the hand of Titus; and perhaps some of the scribes and elders to whom Christ said, "How can you escape the punishment of hell," lived forty years after Christ—perhaps they were present in the siege, and perhaps they were burned in the Temple. In reference to the third—perhaps the "everlasting fire" substituted for "hell," by Jesus (Matt. and Mark,) meant the sparks of Hinnom or the transient flames of Jerusalem. And with regard to the fourth, to enter into life certainly means to join the church—and contrasts certainly do not mean contrasts, because a hot day (which may sometimes be 100 degrees above zero,) when contrasted with a cold day, does not mean 100 degrees below zero!!—This being your own logic, Sir, I return it without any other comment than—perhaps you may be mistaken in some one or all of these hypotheses against facts. We only affirm that a thousand such hypotheses would not disprove one fact.

17. But with regard to the fifth proof, you quote a note from my Family Testament, with a very triumphant air; and yet the said note on Matt. v: 22, does not prove for you any thing that in this controversy I have denied. For the note does not say more than that the judges, the council, and the hell fire alluded to in the passage were all human punishments, and were used by Christ as figures or illustrations of the severity of his administration as respected the discrimination and punishment of offence! I request our readers to examine the whole note. And this is all you have to except out of the New Testament use of the word as possibly once referring to your Valley of Hinnom!

18. But you will say you have made a stronger effort against my fourth proof. Well, we shall try it. To "enter into life" you now affirm does never mean to enter into heaven; and this is your proof that it always means to join the church. Summary logic! In your letter, No. VII, paragraph 13, you do admit that sometimes "life, entering into life," etc., mean in Scripture entering into future and eternal bliss. But in your last letter you recall this and affirm as follows:—"I have not admitted, and do not admit, that 'enter into life' is ever equivalent in Scripture to entering into the immortal beatitude in the eternal world." Paragraph 13. What credit is due this assertion will appear by comparing it with the passage above referred to. Your words are—"That life, entering into life, passing from death to life, entering into the kingdom of God, kingdom of heaven, etc., do not in the Scriptures GENERALLY signify future and eternal bliss or entering into immortal beatitude, I think must be obvious to the most superficial biblical critics." Now I ask every man of sense, whether the affirmation that a word generally does not mean entering into life, is not an admission that it sometimes does so mean? However, you now say it never does so signify. I will rest all the controversy on my proving that it does so signify according to the best interpreters in the universe.

19. In your letter No. X., paragraph 14, your words are—"In reply to your 14th, 15th, and 16th paragraphs, I remark, that the phrase 'enter into life' only occurs in three passages in the New Testament viz. Matt. xviii: 8 and 9, xix: 17, and Mark ix: 43, 47, and in all the three passages evidently means entering into the Gospel dispensation." And what is your proof? You say "The only way of coming at the true meaning of the phrase is to collate all the places where it occurs, with the respective contexts, and compare them with other phrases as nearly resembling it as can be found." But you have not worked by your own rule. We shall try it. Let the reader open Matt. xix: and carefully read from the 16th verse to the end. The facts are:—

20. A rich man asks the Messiah what he should do "that he may have eternal life." Jesus replies, "If you would enter into life, keep the commandments." Observe first to have eternal life and to enter into life in the style of the great Teacher are equivalent. The young man went off disobedient; upon which Jesus said, "a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of God." This also is made equivalent with "entering into life" or "having eternal life." The disciples, startled at the answer given to the young worldling, ask, "What shall we have that have left all for your sake?" The answer, as stated by Matthew, Mark, and Luke, is, "A hundred fold more in the present, and in the world to come eternal life." Now I ask every unsophisticated mind, can there be any thing more plain than that Jesus used the words, "inherit eternal life," "enter into life," "enter into the kingdom of God," and "receive eternal life in the world to come," as equivalent!—Compare Matt. xix: 16-30, with Mark x: 17-30, and Luke xviii: 17-30. Matthew, Mark, and Luke all recount the same narrative in the same words—"He shall receive in the world to come life everlasting," as contrasted with all that he receives in the present life. Nothing, then, can be more evident than that to "enter into life," to "inherit eternal life," to "enter into the kingdom of God," and to "receive in the world to come eternal life," are used by Jesus as perfectly equivalent.

21. I may, under another head of this controversy, enlarge much upon this subject. In the mean time I will only add, that although all Christians are said to have life, and to have eternal life abiding in them, as a principle and a right, or gift under Christ; yet the inheriting, entering into, or receiving life, or eternal life, is always regarded as future by the Apostles, and so presented by them to the churches. For example: Paul says, (Rom. ii: 7.) "To them who by patient continuance in well-doing seek for glory, honor, and immortality [the will reward] eternal life." He exhorts Timothy (1st epistle, vi: 12,) "to fight the good fight of faith, and to lay hold on eternal life." This he calls "the prize of their high calling," Phil. iii: 14. And of the rich Christians, who you say could not get into the kingdom of heaven on earth, he says to Timothy, (1st epistle vi: 12.) "Charge the rich in this world to do good" etc., "that they may lay hold of eternal life." And of himself he says he "had not yet laid hold of the prize," but (Titus i: 2,) "in hope of eternal life I am a servant of God," etc.—"What a man hath why doth he yet hope for?" What say you, Mr. Skinner!

22. My five proofs standing firm and unscathed by all you have alleged, I shall only add a sixth and dismiss this proposition. It is this:—The word Gehenna, or Hell, in the New Testament, can by no possibility of interpretation refer to any earthly punishment: for, besides the reasons already given, neither Jesus nor his Apostles did at any time threaten temporal, physical, or corporeal punishments to those who disobeyed the Gospel; but, on the contrary, said, "Of how much sorer punishment than even the temporal calamities and death of the rebellious Jews, shall he be thought worthy who despises the Gospel," etc.

23. Perhaps by this time you will think that your last letter is sufficiently eviscerated without my stopping to descant upon the impersonal devil in which you believe, or whether you might not have chosen one of my four propositions rather than have heaped upon me two negatives and two affirmatives—to nullify and stultify each other; or to show how gratuitous it was for you to deny propositions that I never affirmed—such as that heaven and hell were always contrasted; and how inapposite your allusions to Baron Swedenborg's correspondence, and to hot and cold days, etc., etc. But I must tell you that your language is often too strong, and your assertions might at least not be quite so reckless as in the case of sincere penitence being the only hell or punishment which Divine Justice can ask or receive; for, Sir, the passage quoted, paragraph 16, in my August letter, is every word taken from your own paper. I can not here refer to the page, but think you will find it in the present volume from page 50 to 60.

24. I have never noticed in your paper a copy of the propositions, rules of discussion, etc., signed by your hand; nor have I heard from you touching the tendering of the copy-right of our discussion to the Bible Society, etc. Pardon me for calling up these matters, if you have attended to them. I have only seen one of your papers for two months. I hope you will early despatch the reply to this, as I have been under the necessity of now writing two letters out of place through my absence from home. I am now on my way to the annual meeting of the College of Teachers, Cincinnati, and expect to be at home about the 18th of October.—Yours, etc. A. CAMPBELL.

GOOD HUMOR.

There is scarcely anything with which we are acquainted, that is calculated to give a more delicious zest to all the various pleasures of this life, than that peculiar state of mind called good humor. This seems to be that lively cheerfulness which makes, not only its possessor, but all within its benign influence so exceedingly joyful—that gives such a placid and serene aspect to the countenance—that beams kindness and love from the eye—that opens the heart in benevolence and charity, and that gives to life one of its most peculiar and fascinating charms. It is this that constitutes the social circle a fountain of enjoyment, from whence flow so many of our sweetest pleasures. It is this that makes the "connubial state, a paradise below;" where the silken joys commingle in happy union, and double the relish of every pleasure. It is this, indeed, that sweetens all the other joys of life, and gives to the immediate blessings of Heaven, that happy effect, which causes the cheerful soul to pour out itself in gratitude to its beneficent Benefactor. This is that cheerfulness, which makes the sentient being a source of happiness to himself. He views every thing within his ken, in its proper light, and thus reaps a rich harvest of enjoyments, where the peevish and petulant find naught but disquietude and misery. While the ill-natured receive every thing through a false medium, and poison every pleasure with repinings or gloom, the cheerful enjoy a continual feast—a "feast of fat things" which can be enjoyed only in this frame of mind. To be happy and ill-natured, at the same time, is quite impossible. Hence, gentle reader, if you would be happy, you must be good humored—and if you can't be good humored, be as good humored as you can!

A VOICE TO YOUNG MEN.....CHAPTER IX.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

ESTABLISHING FIXED PRINCIPLES.

In his physical creation, the Deity has established causes which operate with unswerving certainty—which invariably produce the same effect. A certain degree of heat will always burn—and a certain amount of cold, as certainly, will always freeze. The Creator has also established moral laws for the government of the human race, which are as sure in their operations, and as undeviating in their effects, as his natural laws; although their movements and influences are not so evident to the eye of the spectator. Fire will no more certainly burn, than will a vicious action, sooner or later, cause unhappiness to him who is guilty of it.—This principle in morals is as immutably fixed, as the pillars of Jehovah's throne. And when this important truth of the certainty of punishment for every wilful violation of the moral law of God—a truth which runs through the whole extent of the Scriptures, and which is testified to by the experience of all ages—is believed and settled in the heart, there will be no more inducement to commit a known crime, than to walk into the burning flame!

Young men, do you believe these propositions? do you believe there is a just and certain punishment awaiting you, for every deed that is morally wrong?—and a punishment, too, from which there is no escape? If you do not—if you imagine that immorality of any character, will make you happy, and that you can escape the evil consequences flowing from it—you are truly in a pitiable condition—you are treading a dangerous path—you are under the sway of a delusion, which, beyond all possibility of doubt, will lead you into pain, and grief and wretchedness. But if your minds have become sufficiently enlightened to adopt the belief, sanctioned by divine revelation and the whole history of our race, that moral guilt of every description, is the cause of certain unhappiness and degradation, you have adopted a wise opinion; and if faithfully adhered to and practiced, will save you from the most fruitful sources of earthly wretchedness.

With these reflections in view, you will perceive the necessity of establishing, at the outset of life, certain fixed principles of moral conduct, to which you will rigidly adhere in all your intercourse with the world. These principles will, of course, be of a character corresponding to the career which you desire to run through life. If it is your inclination and ambition, to mingle with the vicious and depraved—to become a miserable, degraded, despised outcast—a bloated, deformed, diseased libel upon the form and name of man—a moving pestilence, a stench in the nostrils of community—the object of the scorn, and contempt, and disgust of the virtuous of your fellow-beings—if these are the circumstances to which you aspire, you will adopt your principles accordingly; you will determine to be unprincipled, vicious, intemperate, profane, cruel and revengeful—and your desired degradation will speedily and unavoidably follow. But if, more wisely, you are ambitious to obtain the good will of society—to become respected, loved, honored—to be successful in your business undertakings, and to receive the aid of friends in times of need—if you desire to possess that peace of mind, that calm satisfaction and complacency, which form the foundation of all true happiness—you must adopt principles of a corresponding nature—principles directly the reverse of those above enumerated. Remember that a good standing in society—a character of respectability—can never be obtained by an adherence to vicious principles. The one is entirely incompatible with the other—is as impossible in the very nature of things, as for the streams of water to rush back to their fountains.

I repeat, you must choose and adopt the principles by which you would be governed—you must establish them in the heart, lay them up in the mind, as landmarks for future direction. "When an author has stood a thorough examination, and will bear to be taken as a guide, I put him on the shelf. When I have fully made up my mind on the correctness and value of a principle, I put it on the shelf of the mind. A hundred subtle objections may be brought against this principle; a hundred temptations to violate it; I may meet with some of them, perhaps; but my principle is on the shelf. Generally I may be able to recall the reasons which weighed with me to put it there; but if not, I am not to be sent out to sea again. Time was when I saw through and detected all the subtleties that could be brought against it. I have past evidence of having been fully convinced; and there on the shelf it shall be."

I can not refrain from enumerating two or three important moral principles, which every wise young man should adopt and adhere to.—Have you formed the resolution to pursue a course in life which shall secure the respect, the esteem and confidence of community at large? It is a noble, manly resolve; and of itself is one good step towards success in its completion. Let me say to you, that—

Honesty is one of the first and most important principles to be adopted, to secure this end. That "honesty is the best policy," is a proverb universally allowed to be true. Never swerve from the teachings of this proverb, even in the most trivial degree, on any occasion, however trying. When you are assailed by temptation to defraud another, stop one moment and reflect—call to mind the above maxim and reason with yourself: "If honesty is the best policy, then dishonesty in any respect, is bad policy—the worst policy—and, will, in one way or another, result to my final injury." The tendency of such reflections, will be to enable you to withstand the temptation and preserve your integrity. "No one ever did a designed injury to another, without doing a greater to himself." These are words of truth; and were they engraven upon every heart, and made to influence every mind, how much iniquity would it prevent! A dishonest action will revert upon the head of its author, with tenfold vengeance. He who cheats another, cheats himself far more deeply than his victim. He defrauds his victim of perishable wealth; but he defrauds himself of that which is of more value than all the riches of the Indies—he defrauds himself of a good name, of the confidence and respect of his fellow-beings, and of that peace of mind, the absence of which, is continued torture. A man in business very much mistakes his interest, who defrauds his customers—who takes a mean advantage of the ignorance of those who are so circumstanced as not to know the true value of articles. His acts of this nature, can not long remain concealed—he is soon detected; and community place a mark upon him, as dark, and deep, and enduring as that upon the brow of Cain. Public confidence being lost, his business dwindles away, his customers forsake him; and when it is too late, he finally perceives the imperishable truth of the motto—"honesty is the best policy." Concealing or misrepresenting the market price of articles—selling goods or any property, as perfect, which is unsound, or concealing the defects of what is disposed of—are all dishonest and dishonorable practices, that will result vastly more to your injury than your benefit. Never be guilty of them, as you value your true peace and prosperity.

Poetry never uttered a more evident truth, than that which runs in the following line—

"An honest man's the noblest work of God."

The title of an honest man, is more to be coveted than any that can be conferred by the favor of royalty. And when we lie down in the grave, could there truly be inscribed upon the slab which marks our resting place, the epitaph—"Here rest the remains of an Honest Man"—it would be a memento far more honorable than the proudly swelling cenotaph, or the lofty pyramid.

Veracity is another principle which should be firmly fixed in the mind. A love of truth, and an inflexible adherence to its guidance, on all occasions, is one of the most noble characteristics than can adorn humanity. But what is more unmanly and contemptible, than the habitual utterance of falsehoods. He who is addicted to this dishonorable practice, soon gains a reputation far from enviable or desirable—he is ranked in that class who are "not to be believed when they speak the truth." Avoid this habit as ungentlemanly and wicked—as only calculated to bring upon you the distrust and disrespect of society. While its mark is upon you, no one will confide in you or esteem you. Let all your communications be characterised by strict truth and integrity. A name well established for veracity, will minister much to your enjoyments, both in a moral and a pecuniary point of view.

Benevolence should also be established, as one of the leading principles of your character. This heavenly characteristic is enjoined by religion, morality and the condition of mankind. In every community, there are the rich and the poor—the prosperous and the unfortunate—those who are surrounded by plenty, and those who are pinched by want. Should your condition fortunately be the former, forget not those who are involved in the difficulties of the latter; but impart to them a portion of your means, and your kindness will not go unrewarded.

By benevolence I do not mean the giving alone to some mammoth institution, or the support of some popular scheme whose field of labor is far distant. It is to be feared that improper motives induce too many to bestow their means on these projects, and that there is more wrong feeling indulged in thus giving, than in withholding. The benevolence which I would particularly recommend, is more of a home character—more of a domestic virtue. It is that emotion of pity and kindness, by which your ear will be open to the petition of distress at your own door, and your hand be made ready to relieve the wants of the poor in your immediate vicinity. These should be attended to first. If you still possess the means, you can then widen the circle of your benevolence. And permit me to say, that even a little, given to hush the orphan's wail and dry the widow's tears—to cause the smile of plenty to pervade the abodes of penury and want—is a sacrifice upon the altar of benevolence, the incense of which will arise far higher toward the throne of infinite Goodness, than thousands publicly lavished upon some popular scheme, to accomplish you know not what! Allow benevolence to be your pervading characteristic—be the friend of the friendless, the protector of the weak and defenceless, the patron of the deserving poor—and you will realise how sweet is the truth of the Scripture declaration—"It is more blessed to give, than to receive."

THE SUNDAY MAIL.

An excellent and indefatigable friend of youth, and a valuable correspondent of this paper, has much rejoiced our hearts by the following voluntary offer of contributing to our next volume, a series of articles especially intended for the lambs of the Redeemer's flock. In their name—in the name of the lovers of youthful piety and innocence, as well as in our own, we thank him, and bid him "God Speed." A. B. G.

TO OUR YOUNG READERS.

THE NEXT VOLUME.

MY YOUNG FRIENDS—Some of you are engaged in Sunday-schools, some in Bible-classes, and all of you would wish to understand that book which is more frequently in your hands than any other, I may presume—even the New Testament. We have in our possession, copies of letters which the young members of an excellent family addressed to their parents, giving an account, each week, of the occupations and thoughts which employed them during Sunday; with some of the father's letters and diary, in answer, or with reference to these letters. This we think an example worthy following; and to give you an idea of how such exercises were conducted, and to stimulate you to similar exertions, I have the intention to lay before you, in the next volume of this paper, extracts from, and specimens of, the correspondence referred to. I am now engaged in looking over these papers, which were lately entrusted to my care by request, and which I find have been labelled on envelope, "SUNDAY MAIL," and am selecting from the several letters, fifty-two passages of the New Testament, upon which some remarks have been made. These fifty-two passages or paragraphs, being one for every Sunday in the year, I will arrange for the Sundays of next year, and your excellent uncle and friend, Br. Grosh, will print them in the form of a Table, in the last number of this volume, and in the first of next. He will do this, that you may know beforehand the passages which are to be remarked upon, and by making them the subject of your own thoughts and reflections previously, may be better enabled both to be interested and benefited by the observations of those who have made the same passages the subject of study before you. Write you your thoughts before you receive your weekly paper, in which you will always find a column or a corner for you, and you will be amply compensated for your trouble ere the year expire, and during all the future years of your life. Copy the tabular list, and keep it in your Bibles; and every Sunday give your parents proof that you have been studying and thinking about the Sunday lesson in earnest, before the Sunday comes. We hope many of the young readers of this paper will comply with our request, and accompany in his progress through the "SUNDAY MAIL," their friend,

A SCENE.

Aurora, sweet goddess of the morn, had unclosed the gates of the East, with her rosy fingers; the golden sun soon followed, clipping the eastern horizon in all his wonted splendor, emerging from another sphere, his radiant beams shone forth in all their beauty, gilding this upper earth with its lucent flood, dispelling the darkness and the chilly night, warming and cherishing all nature with its caloric flame—and bringing to our world another day. What is more beautiful than such a scene—than the sun when it first emerges to our view, halved by the horizon, seeming a ball of liquid fire in the vast immensity of space, kept in its course by attracting worlds, resting upon infinity, revolving in the orbit of eternity! What is more congenial to sublimity than this? What is more capable of exciting the admiration of man? What can inspire him with a greater love of nature? What shows him more plainly, his insignificance? In fine, how clearly does it point out the work of a MASTER HAND! J. W. C.

OBJECTS OF THE MESSIAH'S MISSION.

BY REV. J. H. GIBON.

"The spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound." ISAIAH LXI: 1.

This language is prophetic. It relates to the advent of the Messiah, and the benevolent objects of his mission upon earth. This is evident from the testimony of St. Luke, in the fourth chapter of his Gospel. After the "spirit of the Lord" had descended upon Jesus on the banks of Jordan, it is said that he went in "the power of the spirit" into a Jewish synagogue, in Nazareth, "and stood up for to read." "The book of the prophet Esaias" (or Isaiah) having been handed him, he opened it, and read the passage placed at the head of this article. When he had thus read, he closed the book, and sat down—"and the eyes of all that were in the synagogue were fastened upon him. And he began to say unto them, this day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears." What scripture? The scripture, of course, that he had just read in their hearing. But how was this scripture then fulfilled? Evidently by his immediately commencing to preach to the persons then assembled, the glad tidings he was anointed to proclaim. It is said, "And all bare him witness, and wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth." Thus it is clearly manifest, that the text has reference to the "sent of God," the divine authority and power with which he was invested, and the gracious purposes for which he was sent into the world.

This point being established beyond controversy, by this plain testimony, it is a matter of no little astonishment that so great a diversity of opinion should exist in the Christian world, concerning the purposes for which Jesus appeared among men. Some modern prophets, who are "wise above what is written," most strenuously contend that he came to effect objects very dissimilar from those stated above. They maintain, that, in the plenitude of his displeasure, the Deity had threatened the human race, in consequence of their sins, with unending misery in a future world; but having afterward more maturely reflected upon the subject, he repented of his rash determination, and therefore set about devising means by which he might save the objects of his vengeance without falsifying his word. This was unquestionably a difficult undertaking; but it was nevertheless accomplished. Jesus, the innocent Jesus, must suffer the penalty in the room and stead of the wicked sinner. He must die the cruel death of the cross. And thus God's vengeance would be appeased, his justice satisfied, and his awful threat to inflict endless torments on the violators of his laws, fulfilled. This plan having been devised in the counsels of the Divine mind, it is affirmed that the Messiah was sent forth to effect its accomplishment.

If there could be found the least shadow of authority for this ridiculous notion, in the Scriptures, we should still be at a loss to determine, with the use of all the reasoning powers the Creator has been pleased to confer upon us, how God's displeasure against the sinner could be appeased by the crucifixion of his "dearly beloved" and "only begotten Son"! Or, how his justice could in any wise be satisfied by punishing the innocent instead of the guilty? Or, how his threat to inflict endless suffering upon the transgressor, could possibly be fulfilled by the death of Christ upon the cross!

But aside from the fact, that this idea is directly opposed to right reason, and common sense, there is another substantial reason for concluding that it has no lot nor part in truth. It is this: the Scriptures are as silent as the grave in relation to it. There is not a passage in the sacred Record which intimates that Jesus came to appease the vengeance of an incensed Almighty. Surely the prophet Isaiah must have known as well as any prophet of more recent date, what the objects of the Messiah's mission were; and as he was most assuredly a "faithful and true" prophet, he must have correctly stated those objects. Does he, then, say any thing about the Deity's being excessively displeased with mankind, and sending his Son to save them from his own displeasure? No. On the contrary, he plainly and unequivocally declares, that Jesus was anointed "to preach good tidings unto the meek"—that he was "sent to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound." Such, he assures us, were the objects the Saviour came to accomplish, and those who maintain a different doctrine, boldly deny the truth of his testimony.

And, furthermore, Jesus himself, who must have known as well as any other person, for what purposes he visited the earth, declared that he came to effect first what the prophet foretold he should. He adopted the language of the prophet, and applied it to himself. "The spirit of the Lord is upon me," he said, "because the Lord has anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised; to preach the acceptable year of the Lord." All this is perfectly plain. No person can misunderstand the meaning of this language. There is not the slightest intimation in all this, or any other passage, that Jesus came to appease the vengeance of an incensed Deity, and save mankind from the terrible demands of a violated law, by the sacrifice of himself.

It is true, that in the prosecution of the benevolent duties he was commissioned to perform, he became obnoxious to the hatred and displeasure of wicked priests and their wretched dupes—who, to subserve their own interests, and satisfy their own vengeance, and not the vengeance of God, put him to a cruel and ignominious death. But we have the joyful assurance that he has burst asunder the bonds of death, and ascended to the mansions of perpetual bliss; and that in heaven he will consummate the work he so gloriously began on earth. Through his instrumentality, the Gospel shall be preached to all the nations, families, and kindreds of the earth—every broken-hearted child of humanity shall be brought to a knowledge of the life-giving influence of divine truth—and the last miserable slave of iniquity, shall be liberated from the gloomy prison house of sin.

"His own soft hand shall wipe the tears
From every weeping eye;
And pains, and groans, and griefs, and fears, &
And death itself shall die."

"For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy shall be destroyed, death. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son, also, himself be subject unto him that hath put all things under him, that God may be all in all."

Such is the precious testimony of the word of God, and blessed is the man who places an unwavering confidence therein. It will incite in his bosom that unfeigned gratitude for the Father of mercies, which will produce a willing and cheerful obedience to his commands; inspire his heart with fervent praise, and enable him to "rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory."

REFLECTIONS.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

Calm and serenely bright, the stupendous arch of mysterious azure bends over the variegated scenery of earth. Not a breeze stirs the foliage of the greenwood—not a cloud dims the glowing lustre of the cerulean—but the golden crested sun proudly rolls his fiery chariot down the horizon, while, towering over the eastern hills, the brightening moon looks like a silvery ball hung up to reflect his warming rays. Now thin fleeces of light roll up like mists from some distant and unseen ocean. One after another they come forth upon the shining plain, waving and spreading their soft fringes in the golden sunlight, and casting a sombre shadow over the distant landscape, until a vapory screen obscures the brilliant orb of light. Then darkness gathers on their folds, and the threatening tempest-tone is heard afar in the rustling breeze. The tender leaflets sigh to the murmur of the freshening gale—darker and darker frown the threatening clouds—the thunder's deep voice rolls through the echoing vault, and the proud majestic forest groans in the sounding blast. The towering oak, that spread its giant arms to heaven, yields to the whirlwind's shock, and now lies prostrate on the plains, or, scathed by the lurid lightning shaft, waves its shivered branches in the rocking tempest, a sad monument of departed glory. The "flower-crowned daughters" of Spring, that lately blushed so sweetly, now lie low with the dust, and the bloom of the fruit trees is scattered about by the eddying winds, and their perfume wasted by the breath of the storm. How like, is such a scene as this, to life when, in young fancy's glass, the heaven of existence looks clear and bright in its boundless loveliness.

How gay are the blossom-wreathed bowers of childhood

Ere fancy's young roses are snapt from their stems;

While the song of the lark sweetly rings in the wildwood,

And the golden-eyed king strews the landscape with gems;

While the banners of youth's rosy morning unfurling

Their rainbow ting'd folds o'er life's ocean of ills, &

Make the sorrow's dark mists that above it are curling

Seem like twilight's soft vapors that sleep on the rills.

How every scene is fraught with delight! The young bosom thrills with joy, as the soft-winged zephyrs sport with the floating curls—the freshening breeze adds elasticity to the bounding step—and the merry laugh of buoyant hearts, joins with the silvery carol of the forest songster. Anon, floating mists display their gaudy pennons in the glowing sky; soft and bright, at first, as the fleecy masses on the azure seas of ether, but they gather fast, until reason's light is obscured, and, then, their gloomy ridges frown darkly over the prospects of the misguided and bewildered votaries of pleasure. They pursue the airy visions of bliss that vanished from their grasp, while the substantial treasures of life are perhaps unheeded. Meanwhile their bark is left to float along the current of time, to take the direction of every passing wave, until the gale of misfortune wrecks it upon the rugged rocks of adversity. And when affliction comes, as come it must to every son and daughter of Adam, if the soul is not fortified in youth by the principles of reason and religion, it will hardly stand secure in the dark tempest of sorrow, when wild surges drive on the trembling vessel to that gloomy passage, where the roar of the swelling breakers comes up from the sea of despair. But in life's rosy morning, when the golden sunbeams glance in beauty on the landscape of the future, when all is calm and fair, and pleasure's fountains sparkle brightly, let reason's voice be heard, and let us lay hold of the anchor of faith, by which we may be able to triumph over all the storms of time. Let us be firmly stay'd upon the everlasting Rock—let purity of heart, and uprightness of conduct mark all our actions—and then, though tempests rave around our devoted heads, though the billows of adversity swell and rage, and darkening shadows obscure all prospects of good fortune, yet may the mind rest calmly secure—for its trust is placed upon One who is mighty to save; and though all earthly tabernacles fail, yet the mansion not made with hands is waiting to receive the weary pilgrim—where sorrow can no more annoy, where tears shall be forever dried—and where the mourner shall sigh no more.

A LETTER,

TO MRS. J. POTTER AND O. WHISTON.

Brethren—I address you at this time, in behalf of the Universalists in this place, and for the purpose of soliciting some information from you, in relation to certain reports which have been circulated here, about the truth or falsity of which, you have the means of knowing or ascertaining.

It may be proper for me to state, in the first place, the circumstances which induced the circulation of these reports. A respectable individual of this town, a member of the Presbyterian church, was suspected of having embraced the heresy (so called) of Universalism. On the first Sunday in October, the Rev. Mr. Clark, (pastor of said church,) took occasion to relate in public, and while officiating in the sacred desk, the following stories.

1. He stated that a certain Mr. Beadle, living in Cooperstown, a carpenter by trade, and one of the most prominent Universalists in that place, had recently renounced Universalism on a sick and dying bed, declaring, that although good to live by, it would not do to die by. Said Beadle's given name, he believed to be Nathaniel. He had a son, who was a Presbyterian preacher.—During his sickness, his son visited him, prayed with and for him, and was finally an instrument under God, of converting him to the truth, and saving him as a brand from the burning.

2. He stated, that during Mr. Potter's residence in Cooperstown, a protracted meeting was held in that place, at which one of the members of Mr. Potter's church, got alarmed about his soul's salvation, and under a state of dreadful anxiety of mind, went to visit Mr. Potter, for the purpose of having some conversation with him on the subject of religion. Mr. Potter refused to have any conversation with him, and, on his pressing the subject, became enraged and ordered him out of his house.

3. He stated that Mr. Potter had left Cooperstown and gone to Lockport—had there renounced Universalism, and joined a Partialist church.

I pretend not to give the precise words of the Reverend gentleman, I only give the substance of the stories as they were related by him. These stories were, no doubt, related for the double purpose of influencing the mind of the individual who was suspected of having embraced Universalism, and to prejudice the minds of his hearers against Universalism. If this was his object, his labor was certainly in vain; for the individual referred to, had no confidence whatever in the correctness of these reports; and it would, undoubtedly, be impossible to add to the amount of prejudice, which already exists in the minds of most of his hearers against Universalism.

Now, whether these stories are true or false, we know not. Mr. Clark related them without any kind of qualification, whatever. He did not even give his authority for circulating them, but told them as if he was, himself, acquainted with all the circumstances, and was personally knowing to all the facts. We are strongly suspicious, however, that they are like a thousand similar reports which are circulated in community—wholly destitute of any foundation in truth.

To you, Br. Whiston, we look for information in relation to the first mentioned story. If any such thing has taken place in Cooperstown, you are no doubt acquainted with the circumstances. At all events, you can ascertain whether the story is true or false, by a little inquiry. We wish to hear from you in relation to this subject through the Magazine and Advocate.

As to the statements contained in the other two stories we have no doubt that some of them are correct. That a protracted meeting was held in Cooperstown, while you, Br. Potter, resided there, we have no doubt—that an individual might have been terrified at the frightful representations of endless hell torments, which are generally made at such meetings, is quite probable; and that even a member of the Universalist church in Cooperstown, might have been frightened at these representations, although not very probable, is quite possible; but that you ever ordered a man out of your house, who came to converse with you on the subject of religion, we do not believe. Again, that you had left Cooperstown and gone to Lockport, we were certified on undoubted authority, before we received the information from Mr. Clark; but that, since you took up your residence there, you have “turned aside after satan”—again become entangled in the “yoke of bondage,” and gone back to the “weak and beggarly elements of the world,” we can not believe, without more evidence than we are in possession of at present. You can answer for yourself, respecting the charges which are preferred against you.

We are anxious to hear from each of you, brethren; not because we have any confidence in the truth of these reports, but we wish to have the means of proving, to the satisfaction of our Presbyterian brethren, that they are false. We hope that they will learn from this, that their Reverend Pastor is not only liable to mistakes, but actually has circulated reports which have no foundation in truth, and that, therefore, he does not always speak by inspiration from the God of truth.

Yours, etc., EVERET E. GUILD.

A TRANSLATION OF THE TWENTY-THIRD PSALM—WITH NOTES.

BY THE AUTHOR OF NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

1. Jehovah is my Shepherd,
I shall never be in want;
2. In the green-budding pastures he shall cause me to lie down,
To the waters of rest he shall gently lead me.
3. My enjoyment he shall restore,
In the ways that are right he shall guide me,
For the sake of his name.
4. Even when I shall walk in the valley of death's shade,
I shall not fear evil;
For Thou shalt be present with me,
Thy rod and thy staff, they shall support me.
5. A table before me thou shalt provide,
Yea, even before mine enemies;
My head with oil Thou shalt anoint,
Yea, my cup shall overflow.
6. Goodness and abundance shall accompany me all the days of my life,
And in the fold of Jehovah shall I dwell for a length of days.

The Book of Psalms, or Praises, as the Hebrew word signifies, contains hymns adapted to music, and composed according to a peculiar system of poetry. For an outline of the nature and characteristics of Hebrew poetry see Magazine and Advocate, volume vii, page 97, or number thirteen, for March 28th, 1836. Reference to that will save repetition here.

Verse 1.—Judea was, in great part, hilly, and of course well adapted for sheep-pasture. Were there no other source of information as to the existence of flocks of sheep and sheep-culture in the Holy Land, we might very confidently infer from the frequent employment, in the Jewish writings, of the figures of sheep and shepherd, and of allusions to the practice of taking care of these animals, that the authors of these writings, as well as those to whom they were immediately addressed, were familiar with sheep and their herds. That we may fully appreciate the beauty and the propriety of the figure employed in this verse, we should be equally familiar with sights of sheep, and the society of shepherds, as was David, once a tender of flocks, or as the Jews generally. To enable those who are not familiar with such scenes, to enter into the spirit of such a passage as that now before us, (and similar allusions are frequent in the Old Testament,) we know of no help that can compare with an acquaintance with the works of James Hogg, generally known as the Ettrick Shepherd, but more particularly with his Winter Evening Tales. There the life, the cares, and the painstaking labors of a shepherd are vividly depicted. He who would wish to know what confidence in the providing and protecting care of the “Shepherd of Israel” the royal Psalmist here expresses, should read these picturesque views of pastoral life.

Verse 2.—It is pretty generally known, that in the Hebrew language the verbs have only two tenses—the preterite and the future—by means of which to express all the variations of time past, present, and to come. In English, we have the present—the past in three forms, imperfect, perfect, and pluperfect—and the future tense in two forms; and in Greek, there are five forms or modes of expressing past time. In translating from a language with no present tense, and only one form in which the past or the future can be expressed, there is difficulty, and there must be latitude in determining the exact meaning. As all the verbs in this Psalm are in the future tense, except two, we have translated it as if David meant throughout to say how he should feel in any future emergency. The Common Version gives this Psalm a different turn; but, as we have rendered it, there seems more beauty, more consistency, and more conformity to the original.

In the hot season, even in this country, we are familiar with animals reposing in the shade at noon. In Judea, a warmer climate, animals sought the shade at this time of day, and no where was it to be found so certainly as under trees “near-planted by a river.”

The meaning is: I will regard Jehovah as having made provision, not only for my subsistence, but also for my comfort and peaceful contentment. When we taste and feel that God is good in all our supplies and enjoyments, our pastures, however small, may be regarded as rich and abundant, Ps. xxxvii: 16; Prov. xv: 16, 17; and we may be said to enjoy the luxury of peaceful and quiet resting-places, in our pilgrimage through life. Happy lot!

Verse 3.—The word rendered soul in the Common Version, properly signifies life; and as life, in Hebrew parlance or phraseology, frequently means enjoyment, we have so rendered it, as seemed requisite, here. As in a couplet of Hebrew poetry like this, the second line is a reiteration of the first, with some variation or rise in the sense, we think the meaning is this:—My principal enjoyments, hitherto, have arisen from strictly regulating my conduct according to the law of righteousness—of doing as I would be done by, loving my neighbor as myself—and I firmly confide in these pleasures being restored, inasmuch as my Shepherd has made the practice of such virtues comparatively easy, as well as highly delightful.

We are all too apt to go astray like lost sheep. Psalm cxix: 176. Oh, Shepherd of Israel, restore unto us the joys of thy salvation!

Verse 4.—The shadow of death, was a phrase in use among Hebrew writers, to express severe affliction, fear and terror, great darkness, and similar thoughts. The reader may refer to Ps. xlv: 19; cvii: 10, 14; Job x: 21, 22; xxiv: 17, and Jer. ii: 6, in proof of this. The Psalmist felt such confiding trust in the goodness of his heavenly Father, that he persuaded himself, that “come weal or come woe”—even in the darkest dispensations, the most trying afflictions, perhaps he even thought that in death itself, the king of terrors, he should see nothing to undermine his confidence in the parental kindness of the Supreme Ruler. How few so feel in the prospect of afflictions or death, as to be able, with truth, to say, “I will fear no evil!”—they are sent in kindness—they are meant for my profit! Alas, for the world, how few! May we, more and more, see these as the corrections of a Father.

The traveller in rugged and mountainous countries, finds the aid of a staff indispensable. It was common in Palestine, for those on a journey to carry a spare staff, lest one should fail. Jesus alludes to this custom in his instructions to his twelve apostles, Matt. x: 10; Luke ix: 3. David here intimates, that upon the knowledge he had of God's character he could lean in difficult and afflictive circumstances, as the traveller leans upon his staff in the difficult passes of a journey over the mountains.

Verse 5.—David is confident that God maketh plentiful provision for the enjoyment of his children. If we do not habitually feel so, the distrust and discontent which must thence result, and our want of confiding joy, should be traced to their source. Perhaps it may be found in our views of happiness and enjoyment being altogether different from those of God. Let us compare our views of felicity with those in the commencement of the fifth chapter of Matthew's history.

Verse 6.—An expression of confidence in God's abundant goodness continuing through life.

Let us meditate oft upon this consolatory hymn.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, D. SKINNER, AND S. R. SMITH, EDITORS.

UTICA, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1837.

DEBATING SOCIETIES.

The power of thinking, of reasoning for ourselves, and of expressing our opinion, readily, upon any subject, is an acquirement so valuable, that every one should strive to attain it, and he is verily guilty who neglects the means of doing this when they are in his reach.

In this age, thought and habits of investigation are necessary to every individual who would not be left behind in the march of intellect. The world, at least the world around us, is agitated with divers doctrines, hypotheses, and opinions, upon subjects sacred and subjects secular, and it behooves each man to inquire for himself, as to what is true and what false—himself must possess the crucible which will refine the pure gold, but carry away and dissolve the base metal and the dross.

The amount of knowledge and the facilities of communication at the present day are, we know, wonderful and unprecedented. The pen is ever busy and the press labors night and day—the rail-car thunders on its track—and the steam-boat ploughs the waters, and “sails are sheeting” swiftly over the deep, and the once wide separated places of our land, are rendered as it were, contiguous, and the shores of the old world are brought in near communion with those of the new. The backwoodsman reads to day, by his cabin-fire, news that circulated through the city but yesterday, and intellectual treasures that have long been hidden in the cell of the student or have adorned but the libraries of the learned and the wealthy, are brought to light and spread out, and are within the means and comprehension of the poor man and the toil-bowed laborer. Indeed, this is the time when they may compete with the great and the wealthy in mental achievements, and when nature's nobility may take its stand above the mere hereditary titled of the earth.

In view of these things, it is to the young we would speak and say, friends, companions, is he not guilty of worse than neglect, is he not highly culpable, who slights the advantages which lie at his hand? We need seek at the shrine of no oracle, the inmost penetralia of knowledge are open to our own endeavors. There are no robed teachers, to whom are solely committed the mysteries of learning—her portals open at our touch, we can enter. There are fountains of intelligence gushing from a thousand sources, and we may freely quaff. There are treasures beneath the soil, and if we will diligently search for them, we shall bring them up, flashing to the sunlight. We are not obliged to follow blindly in the path which others have marked out, but we may carry the torch our selves if we will, and first and foremost we may explore the dark, the intricate and the untrodden. All visible things are ready for our investigation. The laws of mind and of matter, with all their interesting and important truths are open before us. The great principles of religion, too, are glowing out brighter and brighter, and the darkness of antiquity, of creeds and systems, is passing away, and we are called upon to seek, examine and know for ourselves. Now will any one at a time like this, cower down in the shadow, and remain in mental and moral indolence? I trust not. And yet, to keep pace with the times, as I expressed myself before, we must be studious, vigilant and active. It is true, a man is not now, like the athlete of old, distinguished by his physical superiority, by his speed in the race, his power in pugilistic combat, his precision in guiding the chariot steeds, his skill in hurling the swift javelin—yet, he has a part to perform in the great intellectual arena, if he would come out from oblivion, if he would become an acting portion of the age, and well should he be girded and prepared for the task. That mighty weapon, reason, should be ever ready and bright in the hand, and we must exercise and inure ourselves to the conflict of mind with mind,

And how are we to prepare ourselves for this? How, but by training those intellectual powers which will be called into operation when we mingle in the world.—And where shall we best tutor these powers? In the Debating Society, in the association for moral and intellectual improvement.

In our last we had an article upon the Borean Institute of this city, and now we have made these remarks, tending to show the value and importance of Debating Societies, as a sort of comment thereon. We think that these associations should be formed and established in every community, containing a sufficient number of individuals to render them interesting. And under the name “Debating Societies,” we would include associations for the purpose of moral and intellectual improvement, by all suitable means that may be at hand, such as lectures, compositions, and declamations, as well as extemporaneous discussions. To these should be admitted persons of each sex, and the exercises so arranged that both can participate therein. Thus, social feelings are not only cultivated, but perhaps somewhat of the stormy passion of rough debate is allayed by this measure, and the literary character of the society, more refined in its nature. One evening in the week spent in assemblies of this kind, certainly could not be otherwise than profitable. Besides the advantages resulting from the mutual imparting and receiving of instruction from the members, the library would furnish entertainment and instruction, intellectual and moral, wherewith to occupy the long evenings of Winter, and the leisure hours which occur to many at all seasons. Thus the social ties are strengthened, the reasoning powers used to and made ready for action, and the mind and the heart cultivated. Let these societies, then, be established in every community, as we have said, having a sufficient number of individuals for that purpose. Let the questions there debated, be not those of a puerile and unimportant nature, but questions of interest, of usefulness—questions which may call for our action in the great assemblings of the people or on the vast stage of the world—manly, weighty questions.

Let the sex of Hemans and Martineau, and Sigourney and Sedgwick, give their encouragement to these associations, not only by their presence, but by contributing to the essay department of the same.

Let the more advanced in life mingle with the young. Let them not avoid taking part in the debate, but by the aid of their experience, and their skill, let them teach those who would learn—let them “show how fields were won.”

If these are ideas and remarks common-place and in the minds of almost every one, I would say if I am anticipated in suggestion, I hope these well known truths, again presented will be additional and effectual incentives to action.

If others differ from me in regard to debating societies and think that I have given too much prominence to them, I hope that they will pardon this somewhat diffuse expression of my opinion, for I view them as possessing all the importance which I have attached to them. I look upon them as the means of great instruction—of checking the tide of dissipation—of giving the truth to the young and the power of its defence—of raising up a generation worthy of America—may I not add, of training the immortal for immortality! MINUTES

Of the proceedings of the General Convention of Universalists in the United States—for 1837.—Condensed for the Magazine and Advocate.

Met in Lombard street meeting-house, in Philadelphia, on Wednesday, September 20th, 1837. Called to order by Br. Williamson. The following delegates were present. Maine—Brs. Drew, Burr, Byrum, Mandell, ministers; J. Herrick, S. Winchester, B. Quinby, laymen. Massachusetts—Boydton, T. Whitmore, Paige, Austin, ministers; J. W. Watson, J. A. Green, laymen. Connecticut—R. O. Williams, Balkeley, Hillyer, ministers; Z. Stephens, W. Todd, H. Fairchild, laymen.—

New-York—S. R. Smith, Le Fevre, T. J. Sawyer, Williamson, ministers; B. Ellis, P. P. Hayes, S. Van Schaack, H. H. Brown, J. T. Goodrich, J. M'Coy, laymen. Pennsylvania—Myers, Thomas, S. W. Fuller, Perry, ministers; D. Grosh, Sr., E. Dallet, Jr., J. Dungan, Y. Saurman, J. M. Butler, L. Breiner, laymen.—Prayer by Br. S. R. Smith. Elected Hon. J. Herrick, of Maine, Moderator; and Br. L. R. Paige, of Massachusetts, Clerk. Appointed Br. A. C. Thomas to deliver the next occasional sermon—Brs. Sawyer, Le Fevre and Ellis, a committee to publish the proceedings of 1836 and 1837 in pamphlet form—and the Clerk to prepare the minutes and circular for publication. Voted, that henceforth the Council will not interfere with the public services except the occasional discourse—that the thanks of the Convention be presented to Br. Whittemore for his occasional sermon, and a copy be requested for publication—that the report of the committee on Murray's monument be accepted with thanks—that the report of the committee on supplying destitute places with preaching be accepted. [The Committee reported that there are a sufficiency of preachers for the support yielded—and recommend a general itineracy. The following are the particulars reported by them.

“1. Let each State Convention create and annually replenish a general missionary fund. This may likely be effected in all the societies blessed with a stated ministry, and by donations from individuals.

2. Let each State Convention appoint one, two, or more general itinerants, whose duties will be to visit destitute societies and places; preach wherever and whenever an opportunity offers; seek out the indifferent and strive to renew in them a right spirit; confront the adversary in a becoming temper; and attend to all such other ministerial offices as a zealous, discreet sense of duty shall suggest.

3. To each of these itinerants, a suitable recompense should be guaranteed by the Trustees of the fund. The preacher would doubtless receive compensation in part from destitute societies and from generous brethren in bonus, and neighborhoods in which societies are not organized. In some cases, one-half, and in others, two-thirds the amount guaranteed would in this way be secured—so that comparatively, a small missionary fund would enable each State Convention to have two itinerant preachers, constantly in commission.

These are the general outlines of the ‘ways and means’ which in our judgment are best calculated to disseminate the glad tidings of salvation.”

They also recommended that “whenever any number of individuals in any destitute section of the country, deem it advisable to express their desire for the services, either temporarily or statedly, of a clergyman of our order, they are advised to make due inquiry into their ability to recompense the labors of any minister who might serve them; and make known the sum for which they will be personally responsible in case they are supplied. These requests might, in our judgment be advantageously communicated to the Editors of our periodical publications; and doubtless due attention would be given thereto. The personal and definite guaranty of a few faithful men in any destitute section of our country,

“The Committee appointed in 1835 to erect a monument to the memory of Rev. John Murray, Reported that they had removed his remains to Mount Auburn, near the centre of the cemetery.—That over the remains, they have erected a Monument, enclosed by an iron fence.—That the enclosure is of an oval form, seventeen feet in length, and ten feet in width;—that the Monument is composed of a fluted Stockbridge marble shaft, about twenty inches in diameter at the base, resting on a granite plinth, and surmounted by an urn of Italian marble; the whole being about ten feet in height.—That on a plain tablet, which encircles the shaft, about midway in its height, are two inscriptions,—

On one side,
“John Murray,
Preacher of the Gospel;
Born in Alton, England, December 10, 1741;
Died in Boston, September 3, 1815;
Re-entombed beneath this stone,
June 8, 1837.

On the other side, “Erected by the recommendation of the United States General Convention
Universalists.”

The location of the lot, the style of the Monument, and the general appearance of the whole, the committee have the gratification to say, have been universally approved. The whole amount of money received by the Committee for the execution of the work assigned them, is $637 57; of which they have expended $625 53. The balance, 11 99, will be appropriated for any repairs or ornaments [such as trees, shrubs, etc.] which may hereafter be judged necessary. Subjoined is a particular account of receipts and expenditures. All which is respectfully submitted.

would be a means well adapted to insure success in an application for ministerial aid.

In offering these suggestions we are not apprehensive of censure from any persons excepting such as are accustomed to consider it the duty of ministers of the Gospel to sacrifice every thing but a good conscience, in efforts to illuminate and reform a darkened and sinful world. We feel confident that our suggestions will be heartily approved by all those who perceive and understand the reciprocal duties of preachers and people.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

That the Standing Clerk keep on file the originals or copies of the statistical reports from State Conventions, recording only an abstract of their contents—that nothing in the Constitution shall be construed as to prevent any State Convention with less than four clergymen, from being a member of the U. S. Convention—that the thanks of the Convention be presented to the friends in Philadelphia for their hospitality, etc.—and then, after prayer by Br. Whittemore, adjourned to meet in Boston on Wednesday, September, 19th, 1838. N. B. The session on Thursday, was held in the meeting-house in Callovhill street.

Public services were held in the two meeting-houses, and sermons delivered by Mrs. Sawyer, Smith, Whittemore (occasional), Williamson, Drew, Williams, Austin, and Paige—concluding addresses by Br. Smith.—Preachers present, not delegates, were Mrs. W. Lyon, Dudley and T. F. King, Charlestown, Mass.; W. Whitaker, Hudson, N. Y.; W. Fishbough, and Z. Fuller, Philadelphia, Pa.; and W. West, Cincinnati, Ohio.

TO GERMAN UNIVERSALISTS.

RESIDING IN OR NEAR THE VALLEY OF THE MOHAWK.

DEAR BRETHREN—Many of you have, at different times, expressed a great anxiety to have the Gospel of Universal grace preached to you in the language of the Fatherland; and expressed your firm conviction, that a preacher could be well supported by a portion of you. Such a preacher can now be had—is the support, necessary for him, to be had also?

Rev. JOHN K. WEIAND was, for many years, the pastor of the German Lutheran church, in the city of Lancaster, Pennsylvania—twelve miles from my former residence in that State. Though then not personally acquainted with him, I always heard him spoken of in high terms of respect and admiration, as a liberal man, a scholar, and a Christian. After I left that State, the Lutheran synods began to lord it over the consciences of their brethren, compelling some of their preachers to smother up their long entertained belief in the final salvation of the whole world, and threatening others with excommunication if they would not do the same. Br. Weiand, acting as one whom the Lord hath made free, not only refused obedience to their mandates, but withdrew from their unrighteous fellowship, and took upon him the labor and suffering of reproach, for trusting “in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, especially of them that believe.” Even clerical opposition has been unable to find a stain on his moral character—nothing but his faith can be alleged against him, and in that he may glory, rather than be ashamed. Such is the man—such the preacher, I here introduce to your notice, and solicit for him your fraternal regard and support.

He is ready to come into this section to spend several weeks among us, in the month of December next. Will you please signify to me, as soon as possible the places where appointments for him may most conveniently and profitably be made—whether on week day evenings, in case he can not attend on Sundays—and the persons nearest the lines of public conveyance, on whom he shall call? There is no time to be lost—what you do, do it quickly; as, in case I receive no such notices, I shall venture to make a few appointments for him in such places as I think will most liberally remunerate him for his labors, and aid in securing his residence among us.

As Br. Weiand can probably spend but a limited time in this section, (he leaving his wife and child in Pennsylvania,) it will be necessary, also, that you ascertain as early as possible—even before he arrives, if you can—what sums can be secured to him in your respective neighborhoods, for his support, provided his services can be obtained. Thus preliminaries can be adjusted without so much loss of time, labor and patience, as is sometimes required in settling a new preacher.

Those of our German brethren who can understand English, are especially requested to make known the contents of this address to their German neighbors and friends, and to urge them to the necessary exertions.—The number of Germans now residing in the valley of the Mohawk, and the continual increase of their number by immigration, renders it very desirable that a German Universalist preacher be procured for them. And it is hoped, that even our English brethren, in the vicinity of German neighborhoods, will lend a helping hand in this matter. They will find, in the consequent spread of our cause, an abundant compensation for all they may expend and do.

REPORT

Of the proceedings of the U. S. Convention of Universalists for 1836 and 1837.

This neatly printed pamphlet of the same size, and paged so as to bind up with that for 1835, has been forwarded us by the publisher. The proceedings for the present year—at least an abstract of them, and a few condensed items of other matters will be found in this paper. The pamphlet contains all the statistical and other reports made to the Convention at the two sessions, the proceedings, etc., of the Universalist Historical Society, for the same years—and the two occasional sermons by Br. Drew, (published in our paper last Fall,) and Br. T. Whittemore of Boston. All these matters will be found very interesting to every Universalist, and as, from their great length, they will not find their way into our periodicals generally, our friends will do well to purchase, each one a copy. The price of the present Report for the two years, is but 25 cents, single—cheap enough in all conscience for a handsome octavo pamphlet of 95 pages. We shall have, soon, a number for sale. The Report for 1835, can also be had at our book store, at the low rate of twelve cents per copy—cheap for that.

UNIVERSALIST EXPOSITOR.

We gladly perceive by the last number of the Ladies' Repository, that the above work is now in a fair way of again appearing before the public. The shares of the stock are all taken up and it will be, as formerly, edited by Rev. Hosea Balou, 2d. We hope it will be extensively patronised and supported. We shall give advice of the publication of the first number. It will be well for those who wish to subscribe for it through this office, to send in their subscriptions at as early a date as possible. Terms, $2 per annum. E. H. C.

THE PAPER.

The quality of paper used for the Magazine and Advocate for a few weeks past, and which we will be compelled to use for a few weeks to come, is not as good as what we have generally used. But it is the only kind we can get in the market. We must use this, or none. The reason is, our paper-makers, supposing we had yet a sufficiency of that we formerly used, delayed going to New-York for stock, until informed that we were nearly out of that supply, and were therefore obliged to make us a lot of inferior quality. We hope soon to receive some of the former kind, and if our subscribers will permit us, we will not again run short. A. B. G.

WHERE IS HE?

The Post-master at Otsele informs us that Daniel Morrow, one of our subscribers at that place, who owes this office $7, has eloped to parts unknown. Should he come in contact with any of our agents will they please collect the amount.

THE UNION.

The first number of the third volume of this valuable and well-conducted paper was issued on Saturday last. Br. Price has discarded his former method of having a “many headed editorial department,” and only the single title, “The Union,” is retained. We think this a better plan, and one reason is, that now each Editor can write in any portion of the editorial department, over his own initials, and that space will thus be filled up, while the authorship of each article, at the same time, will be as well known as before. In the other plan, that of appropriating a heading and space for each Editor, the said head-piece is too apt to be like the sign-board to an empty inn—promising cheer where we find none. We hope that our subscribers will remain, delinquents pay up, and new subscribers flock in, and that “the Union will be preserved.” E. H. C.

THANKSGIVING DAY.

Governor Marcy, of this State, has appointed Thursday, the 30th inst., as a day of thanksgiving, and recommended its observance to the people of this State. I learn from the secular journals that the Governors of the States of Maine, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New-Jersey, and Michigan, have all appointed the same day for thanksgiving in their respective States—so that it is recommended to the observance of nearly 4,000,000 of the people of the United States! This is certainly a singular coincidence. A. B. G.

BOOKS.

Besides a number of other books and pamphlets, on various subjects, not named here, we intend keeping a constant supply of the following, for sale by the dozen or single copy, at the publishers' prices. Orders—especially cash orders—are respectfully solicited.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.
REJOICE IN GOD.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

When gentle gales are sweeping
The darken'd plain along,
And pensive wild flowers sleeping,
Lull'd by their plaintive song;
And the silver moon careering high,
Along her pathway bright,
Where the blue scene of the star gemm'd sky,
Sparkles with living light;

From hearts warm with emotion,
Let grateful incense rise,
And songs of sweet devotion
To Him who built the skies;
Who speeds our frail and trembling bark
Safe o'er life's stormy sea,
Though waves roll high, and tempests dark
Frown o'er the devious way,

Or when sublimely pealing,
The deep toned anthems swell,
As rock and tower are reeling,
In the earthquake's billowy swell;
Or when the awful thunder-note
Rings through the midnight sky,
And the storm-king's gloomy banners float
In fearful majesty;

While deep to deep replying
Roars back the tempest's voice—
Still, still on God relying,
Bid the hush'd soul rejoice;
For though the spheres in ruin fall,
Though nature's dome be riven,
The mind shall trace, redeemed from thrall,
The star-paved courts of Heaven.

USES OF WATER.

How common, and yet how beautiful and how pure, is a drop of water! See it, as it issues from the rock to supply the spring and the stream below. See how its meanderings through the plains, and its torrents over the cliffs, add to the richness and the beauty of the landscape. Look into a factory standing by a waterfall, in which every drop is faithful to perform its part, and hear the groaning and rustling of the wheels, the clattering of shuttles, and the buzz of spindles, which, under the direction of their fair attendants, are supplying myriads of fair purchasers with fabrics from the cotton-plant, the sheep and the silk-worm.

Is any one so stupid as not to admire the splendor of the rainbow, or so ignorant as not to know that it is produced by drops of water, as they break away from the clouds which had confined them, and are making a quick visit to our earth to renew its verdure and increase its animation? How useful is the gentle dew, in its nightly visits, to allay the scorching heat of a Summer's sun! And the Autumn's frost, how beautifully it bedecks the trees, the shrubs and the grass; though it strips them of their Summer's verdure, and warns them that they must soon receive the buffetings of the Winter's tempest! This is but water, which has given up its transparency for its beautiful whiteness and its elegant crystals. The snow, too—what is that but the same pure drops thrown into crystals by Winter's icy hand? and does not the first Summer's sun return them to the same limpid drops?

The majestic river, and the boundless ocean, what are they? Are they not made of drops of water! How the river steadily pursues its course from the mountain's top, down the declivity, over the cliff, and through the plain, taking with it every thing in its course! How many mighty ships does the ocean float upon its bosom! How many fishes sport in its waters! How does it form a lodging place for the Amazon, the Mississippi, the Danube, the Rhine, the Ganges, the Lena, and the Hoang Ho!

How piercing are these pure limpid drops! How do they find their way into the depths of the earth, and even the solid rock? How many thousand streams, hidden from our view by mountain masses, are steadily pursuing their courses, deep from the surface which forms our standing-place for a few short days! In the air, too, how it diffuses itself! Where can a particle of air be found which does not contain an atom of water?

How much would a famishing man give for a few of these pure limpid drops of water? And where do we use it in our daily sustenance? or rather, where do we not use it? Which portion of the food that we have taken during our lives did not contain it? What part of our body, which limb, which organ, is not moistened with this same faithful servant? How is our blood, that free liquid, to circulate through our veins without it?

How gladly does the faithful horse, or the patient ox, in his toilsome journey, arrive at the water's brink! And the faithful dog, patiently following his master's track—how eagerly does he lap the water from the clear fountain he meets in his way!

The feathered tribe, also—how far and how quick their flight, that they may exchange the northern ice for the same common comfort rendered liquid and limpid by a southern sun!

Whose heart ought not to overflow with gratitude to the abundant Giver of this pure liquid, which his own hand has deposited in the deep, and diffused through the floating air and the solid earth? Is it the farmer, whose fields, by the gentle dew and the abundant rain, bring forth fatness? Is it the mechanic, whose saw, lathe, spindle and shuttle are moved by this faithful servant? Is it the merchant, on his return from the noise and perplexities of business, to the table of his family, richly supplied with the varieties and the luxuries of the four quarters of the globe, produced by the abundant rain, and transported across the mighty but yielding ocean? Is it the physician, on his administering to his patient some gentle beverage, or a more active healer of the disease which threatens? Is it the clergyman, whose profession it is to make others feel—and that by feeling himself that the slightest favor and the richest blessing are from the same source, and from the same abundant and constant Giver? Who, that still has a glass of water and a crumb of bread, is not ungrateful to complain?

THE FATHERS.

As writers, the Fathers have been greatly overrated; the value of their opinions has been overrated; but as champions of Christianity, contending manfully and unhesitatingly, with the power of the whole pagan world, the power of the sword, the power of superstition, wit, and ridicule against them; the champion of a pure and inflexible morality in ages of extreme degeneracy and corruption; the defenders of a faith which recognized the principle of a supreme and human brotherhood as the gem of all social duty, and inculcated a spirit of self-sacrifice and benevolence as constituting the only sure test of discipleship, a faith, under the banner of which they cheerfully met death, and often a death by violence, and left traces of their toil and blood on every soil, no tribute of veneration we can render them can exceed their merits. To their spirit of noble courage, it is to be attributed under Providence, that Christianity was not crushed in its infancy, through them its blessings have been bequeathed to us: their labors purchased our peace, their sufferings our consolation, their martyrdom our hope; and to turn on them a look of contempt on account of some superstitious weakness, which belonged to the age, or were the result of their pagan education, and which, on emerging from the night of heathen darkness, they had not the strength at once to throw off, argues, we think, if the effect is not to be ascribed to want of reflection, a degree either of illiberality of mind, or of heartlessness, which constitutes no enviable distinction.—Christian Examiner.

AUTO DE FE—or act of faith.—Roasting our fellow creatures alive, for the honor and glory of a God of mercy. The horrors of this diabolical spectacle, which was invariably beheld by both sexes and all ages with transports of triumph and delight, should eternally be borne in mind, that we may see to what brutal extremities intolerance will push us, if it be not checked in the very outset. Thanks to the progress of opinion, the inquisition and its tortures are abolished; but fanatics, whether Romish or Reformed, still reserve the right of punishing Heretics, (that is all those who differ from themselves on religious points,) with fine, pillory, imprisonment, and odium in this world; while they carefully retain the parting curse of the inquisition, "Jam animam tuam tradimus Diabolo," and consign them to eternal fire in the next.—This moral inquisition remains yet to be suppressed.—It is only a postponed auto de fe. And all this hateful irreligion for the sake of religion! How truly may Christianity exclaim—"I fear not mine enemies, but save, oh! save me from my pretended friends."

The goodness of God is indisputably equal to his wisdom and power. Wisdom without goodness is cunning; power without goodness is despotism. God is almighty and allwise, and therefore infinitely good. He made all his works in wisdom, and his tender mercies are over them all.

PROPOSALS

For publishing the Ninth Volume (for 1838) of the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate.

Rev. A. B. GROSH, Editor; E. H. CHAPIN, Assistant Editor; Revs. D. SKINNER, and S. R. SMITH, Corresponding Editors.

Having conducted this periodical for nearly two years, with the evidence of a constantly increasing patronage in favor of their exertions, the Publishers deem but few words necessary to describe its character. It will continue to advocate the doctrine of God's universal paternity, and the salvation of the whole world from sin and death, by Jesus Christ our Lord, as taught in the Bible; and will endeavor to promote by its temper as by its teachings, the spirit of the Gospel among men. Its contents will embrace Sermons, Prize Tales and Essays, moral and religious articles, explanations and illustrations of Scripture, proceedings of ecclesiastical bodies, notices of the progress of our cause, defences of divine revelation, choice poetry, and literary and scientific miscellany—nearly all of which will be written expressly for its columns, by some of the best writers in the denomination—and the selections will be equally good.

It will be seen that no change has been made in its Editorial department, save in the addition of Mr. Chapin as an Assistant Editor; nor will any be made in its correspondents, except in occasional additions. The removal of Dr. Smith to Albany, and the rejoins, during a great portion of the year, of Dr. Skinner in the Southern States, will rather add to their leisure, and to the interest of their communications; and the most interesting questions on the destiny of man, remain yet to be discussed between the latter, and Rev. Alexander Campbell, of Bethany, Va. Both sides of this Discussion appear in this paper.

In short, no labor, time, or cost, in our power, will be spared to make the next volume excel its predecessors. And feeling sensibly the pecuniary difficulties of the times, and believing that our exertions tend to advance the best of causes, we solicit the continuance of all our present support, and such an increase as will enable us to go on in our labors rejoicing.

A VOICE TO YOUNG MEN.....CHAPTER X.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

STABILITY OF PURPOSE.

The minds of men differ in no respect more sensibly, than in stability of purpose. While some are stable and firm, their movements characterised by cautiousness and decision, others are equally remarkable for lack of foresight and firmness—incapable of forming a decision from patient research and investigation, and unable to abide by any decision, however formed, for any reasonable length of time. This latter failing is very unfortunate. "A man without decision, can never be said to belong to himself; since, if he dared to assert that he did, the puny force of some cause, about as powerful, you would have supposed, as a spider, may make a capture of the hapless boaster the very next moment, and triumphantly exhibit the futility of the determinations by which he was to have proved the independence of his understanding and his will. He belongs to whatever can seize him; and innumerable things do actually verify their claim on him, and arrest him as he tries to go along; as twigs and chips, floating near the edge of a river, are intercepted by every weed, and whirled in every little eddy. Having concluded on a design, he may pledge himself to accomplish it—if the hundred diversities of feeling which may come within the week, will let him. As his character precludes all foresight of his conduct, he may sit and wonder what form and direction his views and actions are destined to take to-morrow; as a farmer has often to acknowledge the next day's proceedings are at the disposal of its winds and clouds."*

How often do we discover people of this character—generally denominated "fickle-minded." They are seldom satisfied with their present condition or employment—preferring almost any other situation to the one they happen to occupy, and any other business to that in which they are engaged. Their minds are usually filled with some new and wonderful project, or employed in unfolding some magnificent discovery, which they believe will astonish the world, and bring inexhaustible wealth into their possession. Such people are generally industrious—not, however, in that steady application to useful business, which will in time yield a certain reward—but in building stupendous and beautiful "castles in the air," which are reared this hour, only to be demolished the next!

The "fickle-minded" man is not satisfied with doing well—he is not willing to "let well alone"—and his mind is constantly engaged in devising schemes to do better! In entering a new occupation, he looks at every thing through the medium of an ardent imagination. He believes he shall realise speedy and abundant wealth from his change of employment; and for a season he is industrious and persevering. But at length the gildings of the imagination become effaced by sober reality; and when he discovers the real nature of his business—its actual advantages and disadvantages—it almost invariably falls short of his expectations; and his industry slackens, his energy fails—he becomes discouraged, and abandons his occupation for some new scheme, which more than probably, will also flatter him for a season, and again end in disappointment. And the man "wonders how all the embarrassments in the world happen to meet exactly in his way, to place him in those situations for which he is peculiarly unadapted, and in which he is also willing to think no other man could have acted with such facility or confidence. Incapable of setting up a firm purpose on the basis of things as they are, he is often employed in vain speculations on some different supposable state of things, which would have saved him from all this perplexity and irresolution." People who give way to this instability, can not prosper to any extent. They are constantly liable to be deceived and involved in difficulty. Their sanguine temperament leads them to look upon impossibilities as probabilities, and upon probabilities, as certainities! From this credulous, inconsistent disposition—this incessant inclination to change—this desire, while doing well to do much better—how many have been reduced from competency and fair prospects, to utter ruin and despair!

I have already remarked that the minds of men naturally differ very materially in respect to firmness and stability of purpose. But a deficiency in these valuable qualifications, need not be an irreparable defect. It can, to a good degree, be remedied by proper exertion and application. When you become sensible that your mind is constitutionally inclined to fickleness and instability—(and a little candid self-examination will enlighten you upon this point)—you should then call up all your energies to counteract this tendency—and it should be your study to strengthen these weak properties of the mind, by a constant and watchful guard upon its operations. By proper exertion, the mind can be trained into a good degree of firmness and decision, so that its promptings may not be changed by every varying wind. By obtaining the mastery over your mental powers, you may concentrate them upon any given subject within your comprehension, and search out its foundation, its bearings and influences, and ascertain the weight of the claims it has upon your attention.

To act safely, requires you to act wisely, cautiously and firmly. You should ponder well all the measures you adopt. Never enter upon any important undertaking rashly, at the impulse of any fleeting emotion, but be deliberate and reflective—examine it in all its bearings, and weigh well its probable results. You should not forget that there are always two sides in the appearance of every project—a bright and a dark side. Give yourself no labor in examining the bright side—for that will usually present itself in colors sufficiently attractive. But be diligent in thoroughly investigating the dark side of the picture. Look with an eye of scrutiny, at the worst aspect it can assume—endeavor to discover its greatest disadvantages and its most remote liabilities to failure. On the one hand, you should not aggravate the appearance of difficulties, or conjure up vain and unreal obstacles—and neither should you neglect to recognize every well-grounded objection, and look it fairly in the face. And from all your means of information, deliberately form your judgment, as to the most proper course to pursue. And when you have once engaged in any honorable occupation, or entered upon any proper branch of business, let all instability, and fickleness, and doubt, be banished from the mind—call into requisition all your effective powers—be industrious, persevering, economical, and patient—let no visionary scheme charm your attention into another channel—and you will be on the high road that leads to prosperity.

The mania of speculation has been the ruin of multitudes in our land. Those who are brought under the sway of its delusions, are hence led to despise the slower method of their fathers, of obtaining wealth by honest industry and perseverance, as tedious and useless; and it is their constant study to devise some scheme, by which they can leap at once into boundless wealth. This thirst for speculation, has been the source of immense evil to our country. And not the least among its evils, is, that it leads to the neglect of the common, yet most useful avocations of life—those branches of productive industry, upon which our general welfare depends—and begets not only fickleness of mind, but idleness, chicanery and corruption. Young men should beware of this rage for speculation. Where it enriches one, it plunges a thousand into poverty. It seems, indeed, to be nothing less than a strife among a certain class, to defraud one another, and the public at large; and therefore, the honorable and the upright can not with propriety engage in its excesses. The only laudable and safe method of acquiring wealth, is to engage in some occupation that is useful to your fellow-beings; and if you are industrious, prudent, persevering and stable-minded, you can not avoid obtaining a comfortable livelihood, with the prospect of securing in due time a sufficient amount of wealth, to give you all the enjoyment that can flow from riches.

The old maxim cautions us not to have too many irons in the fire, lest some should burn. Dr. Clarke imagines this to be a needless caution. He says a man can not have too many irons in the fire, and that he should thrust in "shovel, tongs and poker." But I differ from the Doctor in this respect. It is true, there are minds so bountifully endowed, possessing so great a variety of powers, so much energy, discrimination, and elasticity, that they can successfully engage in various branches of business at the same time. But such minds are more rare than common. The generality of mankind will succeed far better by directing all their attention to one branch of business, than by distracting it among a variety. It is wise, therefore, still to adhere to the old maxim, and beware of having too many irons in the fire.

Let not the stability of your mind be shaken by ill-luck or by misfortunes. "Don't be discouraged, if in the outset of life, things do not go on smoothly. It seldom happens that the hopes we cherish of the future are realized. The path of life in the prospect, appears smooth and level enough; but when we come to travel it, we find it all up hill, and generally rough enough. The journey is a laborious one, and whether poor or wealthy, high or low, we shall find it to our disappointment if we build on another calculation. To endure what is to be endured, with as much cheerfulness as possible, and to elbow our way as easily as we can through the great crowd, hoping for little, yet striving for much, is perhaps the true plan. But don't be discouraged, if occasionally you slip down by the way, and your neighbors tread over you a little—in other words, don't let a failure or two dishearten you. Accidents happen—miscalculations will sometimes be made—things will turn out differently from our expectations, and we may be sufferers. It is worth while to remember that fortune is like the skies in April, sometimes cloudy, and sometimes clear and favorable; and as it would be folly to despair of again seeing the sun, because to-day it is stormy, so it is unwise to sink into despondency when fortune frowns: since, in the common course of things, she may surely be expected to smile again. Don't be discouraged, under any circumstances. Go steadily forward. Rather consult your own conscience, than the opinions of men, though the last are not to be disregarded. Be industrious; be frugal; be honest; deal in perfect kindness with all, exercising a neighborly and obliging spirit in your whole intercourse; and if you do not prosper as rapidly as any of your neighbors, depend upon it, you will be as happy.*

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

No. 13.—Mr. Skinner to Mr. Campbell.

Richmond, Va., November 13th, 1837.

MY DEAR SIR—Your letter No. 12, (11 you have it,) dated September 30th, in answer to mine of August 12th, No. 9, (which you miscall No. 10,) only reached me on Saturday evening, 11th inst., six weeks after its date! Whether it had been on a pilgrimage to Mecca, or Jerusalem, or made an excursion among the Cæsars, I know not; but certainly it has been a long time in reaching me.

2. It is useless to waste time and words in replying formally to your first two or three paragraphs, about boasting of victories, gasconading, etc. If I have vaunted or swaggered more than, or even as much as, yourself, over the "incomparably weakest of all causes" espoused by an opponent—over his "headless, pointless, wide-spreading declamation" and "impotency," or of the ability amply to refute "each and every of its pretensions," etc., etc., I have only to say, "The Lord have pity on me!" But I am perfectly willing to trust the decision of this question to the good sense of our readers, believing they will "render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's."

3. I deeply regret the necessity imposed on me of pointing out to our readers, in the very first paragraph which you have written on the question in issue, (paragraph 4,) the grossest perversions and misrepresentations, and following them up, exposing the like perversions in several other parts of your letter. You say I have "unequivocally admitted" your "syllogistic parallelisms between the various acceptations of paradise, heaven, hell, shemim, and gehenna"—that I have "conceded that these words might represent a future state of misery or bliss," etc. This is an egregious error. So far from "unequivocally admitting" them, I said distinctly, that they were "all wide of the mark;" and went on to show that they were as fallacious as the "visionary theory of Swedenborg." And although I admitted that heaven was sometimes used to represent the "place or state of endless happiness hereafter," yet of gehenna I said, "you can prove, as far as the Bible warrants, the application of it to severe temporal punishments, but beyond this you have no warrant in the Bible to go: that it signifies a place of misery in the eternal world, you have not offered one particle of proof, nor do I believe you can offer any."

4. In the same paragraph, after charging me with acknowledging that these words "might represent a future state of misery or bliss," you add, "This was all I asked." This is another error. So far from this being all you asked, you say, letter 8, paragraph 16, "I have then, Sir, formed the issue. It is with me a strong outpost. That life implies death, that eternal life implies eternal death—in one word, Sir, that in the preaching of Jesus, to be 'cast into hell,' 'into the everlasting fire,' as certainly means endless punishment, as to 'enter into life' or 'into the kingdom of God,' does mean endless bliss." Thus, Sir, you asked that these phrases should be allowed to signify endless punishment and endless bliss.

5. In your 6th paragraph, you call Mr. Balfour my oracle. This is a mistake. I acknowledge no man on earth to be my oracle. And if I mistake not, you have had recourse to Mr. Balfour quite as often as I have, though I regret, to so little profit—for you misrepresent him. You affirm that he says, "whatever gehenna meant in the Old, it must mean in the New Testament." It is true that he said, "the Old Testament is the dictionary of the language of the New," and that "to the Old we must have constant recourse for the true meaning of it." But he did not say, "whatever gehenna meant in the Old, it must mean in the New Testament." In the close of this paragraph you say, "And yet you now affirm that Universalists have never denied that gehenna might mean endless punishment, so far as its original signification is concerned!" This is another error. I have never made such an affirmation. In your sixth paragraph you accuse me of recalling a concession, which in fact I had never made, and you repeat the erroneous statement of the concession of your syllogistic arguments, which I have above pointed out.

6. In your sixteenth paragraph you accuse me of maintaining that "'to enter into life' certainly means to join the church"—and that "contrasts certainly do not mean contrasts." These also are two more errors; for I have done neither. In your eighteenth paragraph you accuse me of having admitted, in letter No. 7, that "enter into life" does sometimes mean in Scripture, entering into future and eternal bliss, and of recalling it in No. 9, and denying that it ever does so signify. This is another error; for I never made that admission. What is your proof that I did? Why, that I said in No. 7, "That life, entering into life, passing from death to life, entering into the kingdom of God, kingdom of heaven, etc., do not in the Scriptures generally signify future and eternal bliss, or entering into immortal beatitude, I think must be obvious to the most superficial biblical critic." Thus, because I say of five or more distinct phrases, they do not generally signify a particular thing, this is saying of one of them, selected by my opponent out of the whole, that it does sometimes positively signify that particular thing! Is this the acumen, is this the candor of my learned opponent?

7. I shall pass by a number of similar errors, and for the present only notice one more, viz., your perversion of the quoted "dogma," as you call it, of "Universalism." I find it on the 38th page of the current volume of the Magazine and Advocate. It reads thus, the words in brackets [] only being added: "In the sincere penitence and reformation [the end sought] of the offender, justice is satisfied, and can neither ask nor receive further punishment, [as a means to the end which is already attained,] either retrospective or prospective. The sinner has been punished according to the full merit of the crime, in his case at least, and all good objects that could be obtained by punishment are already attained. Thus justice and mercy meet together; righteousness and peace embrace each other." These are my very words. Let the reader candidly read them, and see if he can discover one of those odious features which your caricature, or perverted form of it, would fain present to him. You represent me as saying—"Repentance is the only hell, or state of punishment"—"justice can neither ask nor receive further punishment than sincere penitence and reformation"—"justice can demand no greater punishment than repentance," etc. How different this from the above! Have I there declared either penitence or reformation to be the only hell, or any hell at all; or the only punishment, or any punishment at all; have I used either penitence or reformation, as synonymous with either punishment or hell; or have I used the word hell at all? Do you deem it possible for any candid man to suppose me, for one moment, to mean any thing like your distorted view of the matter? You ought, Sir, to blush and be ashamed of such an outrage, instead of essaying again and again to sustain and justify yourself in it! If you can not blush yourself, every friend you have on earth ought to blush for you: especially all those who have been accustomed to regard you as the MAGNUS APOLLO, the BEAU IDEAL of an honorable high minded controversialist. At all events, did I suppose that many more such errors and outrages as those above pointed out, would occur in your future letters—for no one acquainted with your genius can attribute them to ignorance—I should be disposed to take up with the advice you give me, paragraph 2, and say to you, "Don't l-e, friend Campbell!"

8. I shall now attend to those parts of your letter that bear the semblance of sober argument. You ask, "What in the name of reason, mean the hundred volumes of Universalists proving that Gehenna originally meant the valley of Hinnom, if they did not thence argue that it could not, in the New Testament, mean a state of future and endless punishment? or that it could not depart so far from its original meaning! And why do you dwell so much upon the original meaning of this word?" Answer—To give (though in something less than a hundred volumes,) not only the true original and literal meaning of the word, but also its figurative or secondary and accommodated sense or meaning—in short, to show in what sense or senses it was actually used by each and all of the Scripture writers, and thus, by an appeal to the "living oracles," make it apparent that no such sense as that of a place or state of endless misery was ever attached to the word by any sacred writer. In this object I think I have abundantly succeeded.

9. Evidently sensible of this fact, and unable to adduce any thing to sustain your view of the word from the authentic records of truth, you resort, in your seventh paragraph, to the Apocrypha and Targums! Alas, alas! that great city! How is she fallen! Had you forgotten, my dear Sir, that one of your own rules for this discussion was, that "no other witnesses than the apostles and prophets, or the spirit of God speaking in them, can be admitted as of any authority"? And what assistance, pray, in determining the meaning of the word Gehenna, could the Apocrypha render you, even if its authority were admitted? for the word Gehenna does not once occur in all the Apocryphal books! And can it be for once imagined by any enlightened and candid person, that the divine Teacher should have entirely departed from the sense in which the ancient prophets and inspired writers used language, and adopted a wholly new and different sense of the word, not Jewish in its origin, but derived wholly from Chaldaic and Babylonish paraphrasts on these scriptures, and that, too, without the least intimation of so doing! Impossible.

10. I was not unaware that you had said the words Jerusalem, Mount Zion, Temple, Circumcision, etc., etc., were sometimes used in the New Testament in senses different from those attached to them in the Old—nor was I unapprised of the fact, that in those different senses of these words the inspired writers had, themselves, fixed the meaning by signs unequivocal and terms unambiguous; and that, too, without ever leaving the endless weal or wo of our race to be merely conjectural or inferential from a particular word, supposed to have a signification entirely different from any that had ever been given it before in the sacred writings, as you suppose to have been the case with Gehenna.

11. But you say, you have proof of your position even in the Christian Scriptures, and from your tenth to your fifteenth paragraphs inclusive, you attempt to bring forward that proof. In reply to your five proofs, as you regard them, it were sufficient to say, relative to the first, Matt. x: 28, that as you have not attempted to gainsay or refute what I said of it in my June letter (properly No. 5), paragraphs 21, 22, nor adduced any argument save assertion in favor of your own view, I may, with equal plausibility, assert that the word Hell, then, indubitably denotes, not eternal but temporal punishment. Relative to your second text, Matt. xxiii: 33, it is sufficient to say that I proved in the aforesaid letter, paragraph 20, that the damnation of Gehenna was used to denote the temporal woes coming upon that generation of the Jews. As to your third proof, I say, of the three equivalent phrases, which you say are substituted for hell, that neither one nor all of them afford any evidence of your position. Of your fourth, that as the "life" with which hell is contrasted, was evidently enjoyed in this state of being, so the hell was evidently suffered in the same state. Of your fifth, that, as you yourself have proved in your Note on Matthew v: 22, hell fire does in one instance at least, signify temporal punishment or destruction, and have nowhere shown that Gehenna necessarily signifies any thing different from that, it can not therefore be adduced as proof of sufferings beyond the present life.

12. With reference to your sixteenth paragraph, I have only to say that "perhaps" the statement of some "facts" in proof of your position, instead of the use of irony and misrepresentation, would have quite as much weight with people of sense and candor.

13. To save you from performing works of supererogation, or from laboring to no effect, let me here once more remind you, that the question at issue between us, relative to Gehenna, is not, whether it signifies future punishment in another state of being, but whether it signifies a place or state of endless misery. You appear not to understand the question. To save you from the repetition of the like blunders hereafter, let me farther inform you, that I am myself, and ever have been since my religious opinions were formed, a firm believer in the doctrine of future punishment. My faith in this doctrine has often been avowed to my hearers and readers, both from the pulpit and the press. But I must say, were there no arguments in its favor but those you have adduced, I should not be a very firm believer in it. But the doctrine of endless misery, (dreadful idea!) if true, must falsify the plainest testimonies of Scripture, transform the Divinity into a fiend, clothe heaven in sackcloth, and fill the universe with sighs and tears. To prove this horrid doctrine, Sir, is the task you have assigned yourself, and that too from the word Gehenna! To your task then, my dear Sir, and linger not about questions not at issue between us.

14. I desire, as well as yourself, that our readers may all see and examine the whole of your note on Matt. v: 22. It will greatly confirm them in my views of Gehenna. In your nineteenth and twentieth paragraphs, you attempt to show that I have not worked by my own rule. You introduce Matt. xix: 16 to the end, Mark x: 17-30, Luke xviii: 17-30, in order to show two things—1. That Christ meant the same thing in these passages, by the phrases, "enter into life," "inherit eternal life," "enter into the kingdom of God," and to "receive in the world to come everlasting life;" and 2. That these expressions all relate to the future and immortal state. The first I grant, viz., that the phrases are here used as equivalents: but I deny the second, viz., that all or any of them in these passages, relate to the future and immortal state of man.

15. You are doubtless aware that the scriptural expressions, olem hazeh, and olem habo, in Hebrew, outos aion and aion mellon, in Greek, and this world or age, and the world or age to come, in English, are often used to designate the Mosaic dispensation or age of the Law, and the Gospel dispensation or age of the Messiah, (the first of which was drawing to a close, and the second about to open, when the Saviour spake the language under consideration). In this sense Dr. A. Clarke understands the expressions in Matt. xii: 32. But though these passages might be so understood, if such were their phraseology, yet the language is not as favorable to your views even as this. For although you say "the answer as stated by Matthew, Mark and Luke is, 'A hundred fold more in the present life and in the world to come eternal life,'" I find you are mistaken. Neither them uses the phrase, "present life," at all. Matthew has neither "present life," "world" nor "time." Mark and Luke both have "the present time" (to kairo touto) and "the coming age" (to aioni to erchomeno). That the texts and contexts relate not to the future and immortal state, appears to have been the opinion of many eminent orthodox critics.

16. Gilpin, in paraphrasing the words of Jesus, says, "How almost impossible is it, says Jesus, turning to his disciples, for a rich man to become a sincere Christian.—It was impossible, he said, for any person, under the influence of such a disposition, (that of trusting in riches,) to be a member of his kingdom." Pearce says, "A rich man shall hardly, i. e., not without great difficulty, enter into the kingdom of heaven, i. e., become one of my disciples." Elsley says, "It may be read 'will' hardly enter; meaning that in the approaching time of persecution, a rich man will hardly be persuaded to be a disciple of Christ, which is here called entering into the kingdom of heaven." See Wall's Critical Notes. Annot. in loco. Kenrick says, "The kingdom of heaven here means, as in several other parts of the Evangelists, the body of Christians. To come into this kingdom, therefore, is to become a disciple of Christ." Rosenmuller says, "To enter into the kingdom of heaven is to join the company of Jesus and become his follower," etc. Schol. in loco. Our readers will thus perceive, that many eminent critics on your side of the question about hell, agree with me in the meaning of these passages.

17. On your twenty-first paragraph, I remark, that the texts you quote form no exceptions nor objections to my views, but rather go to confirm them. The exhortations to "lay hold on eternal life" imply that it is within the reach of mankind. And as there is "nothing impossible with God," even the rich may lay hold of it, though with more difficulty than others. With reference to the last text you quote, Titus i: 2, I would only remark, that I have never denied that "eternal life" might, in some instances, be used with reference to a future state.

18. Having seen that your five principal proofs that Gehenna punishment is in the future state, are entirely powerless and irrelevant—in fact, that they are but unsupported assumptions, let us see what is your sixth and last proof. Why, forsooth, it is this: "Gehenna or hell in the New Testament, can by no possibility of interpretation, refer to any earthly punishment: for besides the reasons already given, neither Jesus nor his apostles did at any time threaten temporal, physical or corporal punishments to those who disobeyed the Gospel!" The reader is now requested to read attentively Matt. xxi: 41-44, xxii: 2-7, xxiii: 35-39, xxiv, entire; Luke xxi: 20-26; Acts v: 1-10; Rom. xi: 17-23; 1 Cor. xi: 30; 1 Tim. i: 19, 20, and numerous other parallel passages where Jesus and his apostles threatened the disobedient with severe temporal punishments, which were actually executed upon them, and then say whether my learned opponent must not have been dreaming when he penned his sixth argument. Death by civil wars, famine, pestilence, and a distress so great as to cause mothers to kill and eat their own children, may well be called a "sorer punishment" than being stoned to death under the law.

19. Your letter is answered. Due attention was early paid, on my part, to the "rules of discussion," etc., and a request made for you to copy my addenda thereto as I had yours; but I have not seen it done in the Harbinger.

Yours truly, D. SKINNER.

AUTUMN.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

The glory of Summer has departed. The frost-wind's breath has chilled the last lingering wild-flowers, and their beautiful tinge has faded. The green livery of Summer is exchanged for the russet brown; and the scarlet and yellow intermingled with faded green, give beauty and glory to the solemn robe of the waving woodlands. How sweet to ramble amid the whispering shades, and muse upon the departing glories, and listen to the spirit-voices that moan among the swaying branches, as the soul arises on the wing of devotion to realms of empyreal light, and worships at the throne of Him, who has promised that seed time and harvest shall return in their seasons, to cheer and gladden the hearts of the sons of men.

The flowers that are swept away by the eddying blast, and the waving fields that give place to desolate plains; the forest glades, shorn of their leafy screen, and the ruin and desolation which come on the wing of the blast; are but so many tokens of the frailty, the change and decay of the passing race of mortals. Behold, the mourners go about the streets, because man goeth to his long home. Loveliness and worth are passing away—the light of joy is turned into the darkness of sorrow—the music of the sweet singer is a burden to the ear, and the voice of the bird has lost its charm, for the silver cord is loosed, and the golden bowl is severed, the pitcher is broken at the fountain, and the wheel at the cistern; and the dust returns to the earth as it was, and the spirit to God who gave it. But Spring shall return in the pride of her glory, and crystal fountains shall gush forth beneath her tread—the bud on the tree shall expand as her warming breath passes over the winter-bound plains—the flowers shall rise in renovated beauty, and the warblers shall cleave the trackless air, and ascend on the wing of the morning far up the ethereal, and the burden of their songs shall be praises to the Creator of this glorious world, who hath blended variety and contrasts, to gratify the taste, and administer to the happiness of every creature.

Shall man sit down in the supineness of sorrow, because decay and darkening change come over the sky of mortality? Arise, thou that sittest in darkness and the shadow of death, for a light has arisen upon the gloom, and Truth with her dazzling pinions is sweeping away the dark clouds of superstition and ignorance, and the glory of the everliving God beams over the dark mountains of sin, dispensing life to the dead. Mourn not when the winter of death draws nigh, for though we go down to the silent chambers of the grave, and repose in oblivion's gloom; yet, the day is at hand when death, the dark destroyer, shall yield up his dominion, and the Son of man ascend the throne of his glory, and the sceptre of righteousness be swayed over the vast concourse of created intelligences; while the flowers of intellect that faded on the shores of time shall spring forth in immortal glory; and songs and anthems from the redeemed ones, shall swell the pæans that rise from golden harps through the realms of eternity.

ORTHODOXY, INFIDELITY AND UNIVERSALISM.

One extreme leads to another. Thus has it been with Christianity. The popular forms of Christianity, as exhibited in the creeds and pulpits of its professors and only orthodox believers, so outrage common sense and right reason as well as legitimate interpretation, that thousands have been driven to believe the whole system a mass of nonsense and a tool of priests who love to bear rule. We can not wonder at this. We see something similar in the history and fate of all the ultraisms of the present day. Former ages were unprovided with any half-way-house; the "whole hog" must be swallowed, or none of it. Less would not satisfy the self constituted dictators and despots of society. Happily for the present and all subsequent generations, a half-way-house has been established; and the fare of this house is Christianity, pure, and lovely, and beneficent—Christianity, without these impurities and corruptions which have heretofore rendered it unacceptable to men of sense.

To this house we would invite all worthy men—all men of right minds, upon either extreme—the extreme gauche or the extreme droit, as the French have it. Hither we would call the weary, the heavy-laden and the dissatisfied—here they will find truth, satisfaction, and, above all, rest unto their souls.

SUNDAY.

The orthodox or prevalent opinions regarding the proper sanctification or observance of the Sabbath, among the Jews, were very far from receiving the approval of Jesus, eighteen centuries ago. Few, we presume, will doubt, that if he should make another visit to our planet now, he would find the prevailing opinions on the same subject, among Christians, no less erroneous than those which he had occasion to rebuke among the Pharisee-led Jews. We do not know to what errors of an opposite description the sanctimonious observance of the seventh day inculcated by the Pharisees, did lead; but, in proof of the proverb that one extreme will always lead to another, we have no lack of evidence before our eyes, upon the first day of every week, that while the modern Pharisee or dictator of our religious faith and practice, has long been in the error of ultra-rigidity, those who despise his yoke of ceremonies, are decidedly entered or verging upon the extreme of ultra-laxity. Both these parties, whom we may call the priest and anti-priest parties, or the lax and rigid, or the ceremony loving and the ceremony despising, are equally in the wrong; and it were not difficult to demonstrate that the error of each proceeds from the same cause—withholding attention from the design and uses of the Sabbath. Strange! that the disciples of a Teacher who taught that the Sabbath was instituted for the improvement, advantage and happiness of man, not man created for a blind, unmeaning and useless regard for the day—strange, that those calling themselves disciples of such a Master, should lapse into the very errors which their Master reproved!

What cause is more prolific of infidelity, than the absurd errors of our modern Pharisees, regarding the keeping and breaking of the Sabbath? They enjoin their sanctimonious observances as part and parcel of the system of morals inculcated by God. This is their radical error; but "seeing, they cannot see," and so they blindly and obstinately adhere to it. The effect of a belief of this supreme authority for sanctifying the Sabbath as by them enjoined, is, that many of those who do not abstain on that holy day from every thought, word and deed, of a secular nature, (and who does?) fly to infidelity, more or less openly, in self-justification, and from a regard to consistency refuse to admit the claims of those precepts or that revelation which contains this unwelcome and oft-violated one. We know infidels and despisers of Christianity, who have become so, in consequence of the orthodox interpretation of the fourth commandment; and of such the number to us appears greater, than of those who are disbelievers in consequence of the Calvinistic dogmas of a trinity, etc. We knew one young man, whose conscience was first seriously burdened on account of having read a novel on Sunday; not only did this make him very unhappy, but it urged him on to break through more and more of the restraints and rules of society. His subsequent course was unwise and downward, for the ban of clerical excommunication was upon him like a blight, and destitute of liberal views of Christianity, he had nothing to support and console his too-sensible, yet noble nature. Yet but for the too-prevalent views of Sabbath desecration, his downward career had never commenced; and spell-bound by imaginary crime, he had never sunk.

Will not the friends of man—weak and unreflecting as we find him—will not each lover of his kind, arouse him and exert him, to rid society of these baneful extremes? Will not every one who knows this antidote, make known and recommend it? We could name smaller evils, less afflictive and grievous to man, against which are arrayed some of the most pompous and notorious of our benevolent societies. With whom is the antidote, then? To Universalists, to Unitarians, to liberal Christians of every name, I would say, IT IS WITH YOU. Ye know the sacred and sweet uses of this day. Without resorting to the unconvincing argument, that the first day of the week is to be observed by Christians, as the Jews were commanded to observe the last, you can recommend the adoption, in the love of it, of a day of rest, and of hours devoted to intellectual, social and moral improvement, from the conduciveness of such to man's progress, perfection and happiness. Ye can prove that days or hours, at any time, but especially at a set time, devoted to the contemplation of religious subjects, are highly useful to the promotion of intelligence, virtue, piety and holy living; and in so doing, you prove more convincingly than by quoting chapter and verse, that it is the will of God that such times should be observed. "Hours of deep religious meditation are the cool, and silent, and shaded fountains, whose waters spread freshness and verdure, and hallow the whole scene of our daily labors and enjoyments." These, whether on Sunday or Monday, is the will of God that we should not neglect it nor be without.

"BE YE ALSO PATIENT."—JAMES V: 8.

To an attentive observer of the various causes which influence the conduct of man, and keep him from the lethargy and stupor of the brute creation—it appears obvious that the enhancement of sublunary enjoyments, is the most effective. Every individual has in view some favorite object, the possession of which he fondly anticipates will afford him consummate happiness; but no sooner is it acquired than he feels a desire for new acquisitions rising in the heart and inciting him to action.

We see men in the daily avocations of life, directing all the powers both of mind and body to the accumulation of wealth—vainly looking forward to the period when they shall tranquilly enjoy the felicity accompanying its possession; but, when we follow them through the various vicissitudes of fortune, down to that era in their lives when they anticipate a full fruition of amassed wealth, we find that disappointment is the common fate: the attainment of one object brings with it new desires and cares, thus keeping the human breast continually agitated and disqualified, alike for the habitation of peace, and unalloyed enjoyments.

We behold the pale visage and emaciated form of the antiquarian, bending over musty pages and plodding his way through the intricacies of unexplored paths, to adorn his intellect with the rich gems of ancient lore, which, but for their influence and subservience in promoting distinction, the hope which they afford aspiring genius for the gratification of its wishes, in raising him to the highest pinnacle of human greatness, and thereby consummating his happiness, would lie concealed beneath the rubbish of antique remains, and be spurned as objects unworthy of pursuit.

And not unlike are the motives of the intrepid hero, girding on the armor of war and rushing into the fearful conflict—resolved to part with his life on the field of battle, or to achieve the victory; actuated by a love of chivalry, and urged on by a thirst for the renown of the conqueror, he braves the pointed steel of the enemy until the last conflict is gained, when, like Alexander, he mourns that his ambition finds a limit within the narrow bounds of a single world.

And so, in all the various concerns of active life, whatever be the assigned motive for our conduct, by tracing it to its origin, we almost invariably find, that the increase of happiness is the primary incentive; and though acting up to all the faculties both of mind and body for its attainment, we seldom or never fail to encounter disappointments. Man is constituted with a mind ever aspiring after new acquisitions, and vain is that thought which supposes him capable to enjoy full and perfect happiness without applying the soothing balm embraced in the noble injunction, "be ye also patient."

No circumstance or capacity in life awards unsullied and lasting enjoyments to the human breast, unless patience reigns with uncontrolled dominion and sways her gentle sceptre within; the humblest peasant who earns his daily sustenance under the oppressive rays of a Summer's sun, or amid the storms of a bleak and rigid Winter, if he submits patiently to the will of Heaven, receives more real and substantial enjoyments, than the monarch reclining upon the gilded couch within his gaudy palace, and swaying the sceptre of a mighty kingdom, while impatient to augment the extent of his power, or perchance threatened with an usurpation of his crown.

The necessity of the exercise of patience, to the well-being and happiness of man, is admirably illustrated and clearly set forth, by the state and disposition of mankind in that age of the world when the apostles went forth to promulgate the glorious doctrine of the restitution of all things. Corruption and error, ever the fruit of ignorance, were spread over the earth, and added to this, was every impediment that human ingenuity could devise to obstruct the progress of the tenets they inculcated; indeed, the imagination was almost exhausted in inventing a variety of tortures, to inflict upon the votaries of Christianity; and though the wheel, the rack, the stake and the prison, were all subsidiary to the promotion of wicked designs, we find that wherever the advocates of Christianity travelled, they inculcated principles tending to annihilate things venerable to their persecutors—enjoining the renunciation of their licentious passions, as well as their shameful practices. Thus, with patient and untiring efforts in establishing the cause of their Master, they in no long time, triumphed over all the powers of confederated nations, associated against them.

But we need not refer to the prejudices and superstitions of the ancient Jews and Heathens, to exhibit the necessity of the exercise of patience by those who are called to defend truth and combat error. Latter ages confirm the truth of the position, and afford ample illustration of the fact. But a few years since might have been seen on the shores of America, a solitary individual standing forth in defence of the Gospel of God our Saviour, enduring slander and persecution from every direction, for propagating sentiments adverse to popular opinion; and though the progress of the principles he inculcated was comparatively slow, the conviction that "truth is mighty and will finally prevail," added a new stimulus to his exertions, and by an unyielding perseverance, and the interposition of Heaven, he established his doctrines upon a basis not to be shaken by the united efforts of all its enemies.

But the state of human society at a still later period, affords another illustration of the position taken. The promulgators of the Gospel of God, the Saviour of the world, are called to encounter great opposition at the present day. Prejudice and error still retain a strong hold in community; and there is yet, as it were, a world to be brought to a knowledge of the truth. But the work is too vast to be accomplished in a single moment. And how is it to be effected? "Behold, the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and latter rain." In like manner, "be ye also patient," and, in due time, the most zealous opposers of the doctrine of a world's salvation will become the recipients of its truth, and moral righteousness characterise every nation.

THEORY AND PRACTICE.

One great reason why Christianity has not been more rapid in its progress, and why all are not partakers of its vivifying influence, is obviously owing to the variance of the theory and practice of men. This state of things is really deplorable. When men practice the reverse of their professions, just so long will the good effect of Christianity be subverted and counteracted. Society can not be benefited, nor any good possibly result from such professions. Theory without practice availeth nothing. No matter how well we know the theory of a thing, yet without seeing the effect of its practical operation, we can never make men believe the inevitable result. How necessary, then, that we carry out our theory by practical demonstration—by our “daily walk and conversation.” This is of the highest importance to those who preach the “Gospel of good tidings of great joy which shall be unto all people.” They may insist on the necessity of repentance and reformation—of ceasing to do evil and learning to do well—to foster virtue, discard vice—they may declaim with all the vehemence of passionate oratory, against the soul-blighting tendency of sin, and its attendant train of evils—yet nought will be effected, unless it be exemplified in their own conduct. If men preach up the necessity of loving God, our neighbor as ourselves, and all men as brothers—they should live up to their own doctrine, by carefully fulfilling the same, as they have opportunity. Unless they do act in conformity thereto, all their efforts will be palsied—all oratory vain.

All preaching should be accompanied with spirit, feeling, and understanding—all ministers should be familiar with their subject, should have experienced the two opposites of happiness and misery—and then they may effectually apply the remedy to others. If this were the case, men might be universally benefited. But, so long as men preach, who do not feel—so long as we have the same cold and formal discourse published from the pulpit—so long will sin and unbelief prevail. Until men can be practically convinced of the reasonableness of devotion—of the happiness resulting therefrom—of the pleasure of doing good—and, on the contrary, of the blighting, soul-withering consequences of sin and wickedness—never will Christianity universally triumph. When a preacher feels the magnitude of his subject—when all the fibres of his heart are woven in sympathy—when aside from his ministerial duties, he relieves the distressed, poor and needy—visits the widow and fatherless in their afflictions—by the eloquence of such a man, the whole congregation are melted into one mass, and the universal impulse is, let us “deal justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with our God.”

NEW-YORK.—The greater part of this Report has already appeared in this paper—the remainder only is added here, in full—it being presumed to be of more immediate interest to the majority of our readers than that of any other State.

The Genesee Association, formerly the Erie Association, was set off from the Niagara Association, in October, 1833—its limits then being fixed to embrace the counties of Erie, Genesee and Allegany, and that part of Livingston west of the Genesee river. It was organized in 1834, when it took the name of Genesee, which had been dropped by the (now) Ontario Association. By the formation of the Allegany Association, in June, 1835, its limits were confined to Erie and Genesee counties, and the part of Livingston before named. In the session of 1836, 8 societies were represented in the Council, and complaint was made that several others were not represented. But in 1837, but five societies were represented; and 16 preachers were present.

The Hudson River Association was organized in November, 1825, and embraced all the counties bordering on the river, from Lake Champlain, to the Atlantic, with a part of Connecticut. By the organization of the Southern Association, the portion of Connecticut was separated from it, and by that of the New-York Association, the Southern counties were separated. At its session in 1835, 7 societies were represented in council—15 preachers were present, one of whom was a new accession.

The Staten Association was set off, (and organized,) from the Genesee Association at the time it assumed the title of Ontario, in October, 1834. At its session in 1836, 10 preachers were present, but the number of societies represented in Council, is not stated in the minutes.

The Cayuga Association was set off from the now Central Association, in the Autumn of 1823. At its session in 1836, 9 societies were represented in the Council, and complaint is made in the Circular, that others were negligent in sending delegates. At the same session 12 preachers were present.

The St. Lawrence Association was organized out of the Black River Association, in April 1828, and embraced the counties of St. Lawrence and Franklin, and the adjacent borders of Upper Canada. At its session in 1837, one new preacher was fellowshiped; but neither in the minutes of this or last year, is the number of societies named.

The Black River Association was organized out of the now Central Association in 1823—and now embraces the counties of Oswego and Jefferson. In its session of the present year, 9 societies were represented in Council, one of which was a recent accession. There were present also 11 preachers.

The Mohawk Association was organized in 1826, under the title of the Conventional Association, out of the now Central Association. In June, 1831, it changed its name to the present title, and fixed its limits to embrace those parts of the counties of Oneida, Herkimer and Montgomery, lying North and East of the Mohawk river, and such societies in their vicinity as may prefer to unite with this Association. There are at present but two preachers residing in this Association. At its session in 1837, 7 societies were represented one of which was a recent accession. The cause is prosperous in this Association, so far as the labors of its preachers are extended.

The Chautauque Association, was first organized in July, 1825—became extinct, and was again revived by being set off from the Niagara Association in October, 1833—organized in August, 1834, when it embraced the counties of Cattaraugus and Chautauque, N. Y., and 3 counties in Pennsylvania. In 1835 it set off the county of Cattaraugus (except Dayton, Persia, and Perryburg,) to the Allegany Association. At its session the present year, 4 societies only were represented in Council—it has several others in this State, and none in Pennsylvania were represented. The cause is spoken of as being prosperous.

The Allegany Association was organized in June, 1835, out of parts of the Chautauque and Erie (now Genesee) Associations. It embraces the county of Allegany, and part of Cattaraugus. At the time of organization, it had 9 preachers in its limits. The minutes of 1836 do not give the number of societies represented, and I can not now find those of 1837.

Societies for the relief of widows and orphans of deceased Universalist clergymen, have been formed in the Central, Mohawk, and Otsego Associations; and measures have been taken to form similar societies in several others. Their utility will depend on the efficiency of the brethren, and the liberality of the public, interested in them.

The Clinton Liberal Institute, is a seminary of learning, originated by the Universalists, but unsectarian in its character, and therefore, partially supported by some who are not Universalists.

There are three weekly and one monthly Universalist periodicals besides several publications, published in this State, during the present year.

Universalist Union,	New-York, circulates 4500 copies.
Magazine and Advocate	Utica, “ 7300 “
Herald of Truth,	Rochester, “ 2000 “
Christian Preacher,	do, “ 500 “
Disc.—Ely and Thomas—sold since Sept. 1835	6000 “
Argument for Christianity	do, “ 1856 1800 “
Sunday School Hymn Book	“ “ 2500 “
Mirror of Partialism	“ “ 1300 “
Register and Almanac	“ “ 12000 “
Other pamphlets	“ probably 3000 “

Recapitulation.—The State of New-York has within its borders, 15 Associations,—of which are in fellowship with the New-York Convention. Of these the six from which information has been obtained, have upwards of 73 societies, 53 preachers, and 40 meeting-houses, including union houses. The whole number of preachers in the State, is probably not less than 125—of societies and churches 150—of unorganized congregations that have stated preaching 50—and of meeting-houses owned wholly or in part by our denomination 100.

Periodicals circulated 14,300 copies—books sold, printed in the State, in two years, about 7800 volumes, besides the Mirror of Partialism, and Register, as above, and a variety of other pamphlets, etc.

The foregoing is a meager sketch, poorly filled up for want of the proper materials. But it is to be hoped that a perseverance in the measure of annual letters from each State Convention to the General Convention, will yet induce all who have the means, to unite in bringing them forward, that a full and accurate account may be obtained annually of the condition and progress of our cause in each State and territory of our Union.

In behalf of the New-York State Convention of Universalists.

A. B. GROSH.

Pennsylvania.—In Philadelphia city the two societies under the pastoral labors of Brs. A. C. Thomas and S. W. Fuller, are prosperous. Sunday schools are connected with each, also a Universalist Institute is connected with each—all of which are flourishing. A society of Germans, believers in the Restitution, under the pastoral labors of Rev. Mr. Ginal, has been organized during the past year, and intend building a house for public worship for themselves. In Reading, there is a small society, owning a meeting-house, and employing Br. J. Perry all the time. A flourishing Sunday school is connected therewith, and the cause is decidedly advancing. Br. Ashton preaches in the counties of Perry, Dauphin and Cumberland—Br. Myers in Lancaster, York, Berks, etc.—Br. Weiland finds but poor encouragement. There are societies and meeting-houses in Womelsdorf, Reamstown, and a Union house in Marietta, where they have occasional preaching—there are meeting-houses, but no societies, in Hinkletown, Petersburg, Leacock, and Cumberland—but they seldom have preaching. Believers are scattered in every place in the Eastern and Middle section of the State—but preachers are poorly, if at all, supported. In Pittsburg there is a good society, owning a meeting-house, and enjoying the pastoral labors of Br. S. A. Davis the whole time. Br.

M. A. Chappell labors in that vicinity, and Br. Hiram Torrey of that city is preparing for the ministry.—Br. Babcock labors in the vicinity of Oil Creek, Crawford county; and Br. L. Harris around Springfield, Warren county. The society in Columbus owns a meeting-house. There are also societies in Warren, Oil Creek, and Union Mills. Cause prosperous, but unorganized. The Glad Tidings, a weekly periodical, circulates 400 copies in Western Pennsylvania. In Wayne, Susquehanna and Bradford counties, there are several societies, which enjoy the pastoral and occasional labors of Brs. S. P. Landers, T. S. Bartholomew and G. S. Ames. [The cause in this last named section is very prosperous. It is a pity the brethren did not report its condition to Br. S. W. F.—A. B. G.] Br. Longenecker, of Womelsdorf, one of our preachers, departed this life in the triumph of faith, in June last. On the whole, the cause is prosperous and advancing in this State.—Signed by S. W. FULLER.

OHIO.—Br. West, in a letter to the Clerk of the Convention, says the church in Cincinnati has increased three fold within the last twelve months. It owns a house, and has a Sunday school of 100 scholars. [It is to be regretted that Br. West was unable to report the prosperous condition of a number of societies in other parts of the State. In the Northern part of Ohio, especially, our cause is rapidly improving in power and prosperity.] Br. West says, "there is but one thing wanting to ensure entire success in the West, generally (including faithful and consistent preachers,) i. e. an efficient plan for the support of our ministry." Signed by WILLIAM WEST.

No Reports were received from the New-Hampshire, Vermont, Maryland and Virginia, South Carolina, and Western Conventions—which were not represented this year. A. B. G.

LETTER FROM BR. SKINNER.

Richmond, Va., November 10, 1837.

Brs. GROSH and HUTCHINSON.—You have probably expected a letter from me before this time; and, indeed, I had intended to write you ere this, but have not found it convenient.

I will first give you a brief sketch of my journey hither, although nothing occurred in it very remarkable. On the day we left Utica, (October 19th,) we proceeded regularly and uninterruptedly on our way to Albany, where we arrived without accident, about 3 o'clock, P. M. Here I bespoke dinner for myself and family, and while it was preparing, went to procure tickets and berths on board the steam-boat for New-York, and to see our baggage put on board; for I had already learned that there was no safety in trusting to runners for rail roads or steam-boats, baggage carriers, etc. I had given my trunks in charge to a man who said he was an agent for the boat, and that I had better hurry on to secure my berths, and he would immediately be there, that I might myself see them on board. Accordingly, I went to the boat, procured my tickets, etc., and waited and looked till my eyes and my limbs were fatigued, but saw nothing of my trunks, or the man who had taken charge of them. At length, after every other vehicle and all other baggage had arrived, his waggon hove in sight, and on examining and taking out its contents, one by one, from top to bottom, I found but one, the smallest of my three trunks. The others were missing, but where to look for them was the next question. The man who had taken charge of them had sworn, till he got to the bottom of his waggon, that they were all there. But like some of the ancient pretended prophets of Israel, he had sworn falsely. Well, I then left the one in charge of a confidential friend, and posted down the river to the wharf where lay the other boat for New-York, thinking that some baggage-seizing wight might have taken it there for the better securing of a double baggage fee.—But lo! it was not there. Back again I posted to the upper boat—nothing to be found of the lost trunks. So securing a carman, I posted back once more to the rail road depot, and there had the singularly good luck to find them both on the very spot where I had first given them into the hand of the boat agent. Securing them and keeping them constantly under my eye, I next went to look for my family, who fortunately had dined without me. After a short interview with Br. S. R. Smith and lady, who very providentially were passing that way at the instant, and whom I found in usual health, just commencing citizenship, (the best ship in the world to enter,) we proceeded to the boat, and I was quite satisfied to go on board, without my dinner, and find myself, and family, and baggage all together once more, in a fair way to pursue our journey, just before the boat got under way. By the bye, I have scarcely ever passed through Albany without a similar scramble for baggage. Whether there is any remedy for the evil, I know not; but I am sure there ought to be. Some travellers have berated our little city, Utica, in very severe terms for such things. But, certainly I have never seen half so much to complain of there, of the kind, as I have in Albany.

Well, the boat De Witt Clinton, a very good boat, by the bye, was quite crowded—all could not get berths—even several of the ladies had to go without—but we were comfortably provided for: and the next morning, at 6 o'clock, found ourselves in New-York. We stopped at the Pacific Hotel, on Greenwich-street, kept by Mr. Nichols, a brother of our friend in Utica, in company with Messrs. McBride and Ballou of our city, where we had every accommodation. Here we remained one day, called on Brs. Price, Harsen and Le Fevre, found them all well, except Col. Harsen, whose health is still very delicate, and sister Le Fevre was also quite ill.—Br. Sawyer and family, we learned were well, but had not time to call. The day was quite rainy.

On Saturday morning, at five o'clock, we took the steam-boat for Philadelphia, by which, and the rail road, we reached the city of Brotherly Love about noon.—Fine day and pleasant passage. Here we found Br. S. W. Fuller, a short distance from the landing of the boat, who greeted us with a very cordial welcome, and after dinner conducted us to the house of Br. John Eckstein, 36 No. 3d-street, a plain, unsophisticated, sensible, frank and benevolent man, a pillar in the society in which Br. F. preaches, with whom and his amiable family, we tarried until the next Tuesday morning. The time we spent there was very pleasantly employed. On Sunday we attended the Calhoun-street church, heard Br. A. C. Thomas, in the morning, on exchange with Br. Fuller, and in the evening I attempted to preach. Our cause in Philadelphia appears to be moderately and steadily prosperous. During our stay here we visited, accompanied by Br. Fuller, the massive buildings now being erected for the Girard College, that splendid monument of the miserly hoardings of an active and money-making life, and of the outpourings of death-bed munificence, from the walls of which, after its completion, we the clergy, are wisely enough to be forever excluded; Also Fair Mount—which every body has seen who was ever in the city—the institution for the instruction of the Blind, under Dr. Friedlander, which many more ought to see than have yet seen it—the Marine Hospital, a beautiful structure and most commodious and noble institution, and several other public buildings and works in and about the city. Mrs. Skinner was particularly delighted with the place, the scenery, the public works and curiosities, and not less so with the agreeable society, we enjoyed while in the city.

On Tuesday morning we took leave of our kind friends, and at 7 o'clock left for Baltimore, by steam-boat, where, after a pleasant passage, we arrived about 3 o'clock, P. M. We had a short interview with Brs. S. F. Streeter and S. P. Skinner, and were by the latter conducted to the house of Br. L. S. Everett, the pastor of the Universalist society in the Monumental City, with whom we tarried over night. On Wednesday morning we visited the new Universalist church, just completed and dedicated. It is a truly magnificent work, both for size and richness of appearance. It is perfectly plain, without the least gaudiness of appearance, but neat, tasty and rich. It has been reared almost as by magic, at an immense expense, in these disastrous times, without interruption or failure. And Br. Everett says all pecuniary contracts and matters pertaining to its erection, are in a favorable train for final, successful adjustment. I think much praise is due both to the pastor and the society, for the achievement of such a work, and that with a moderate share of zeal, prudence and perseverance, they can hardly fail, in a population of 100,000 people, of soon having a very large and flourishing society.

Between 8 and 9 o'clock, A. M., we took seats in the rail road cars for Washington, where we arrived about noon; and spent the afternoon in viewing the city, public buildings, Capitol, etc. Washington is rather a dull place when Congress is not in session. The inhabitants I think, live on strangers during the session of Congress, and on one another during its recess. At 9 o'clock, P. M., we went on board the steamer lying in the Potomac, and took lodgings for the night. Next morning when we awoke, we found ourselves some distance on our Southern voyage, breakfasted on board, soon after which we took coaches for Fredricksburgh, on arriving at which place we took seats in the rail road cars, and did not leave them till we were safely landed, bag and baggage, in this city, about 4 o'clock, P. M.—just one week from the day on which we left Utica. We were cordially welcomed by our friends on their learning our arrival.

We did not, until this week, fix on our boarding place and get into the room which we expect to occupy for the Winter. I have spent two Sabbaths here, preaching one sermon on each day, the meetings being well attended. I intend, if health permits, to preach at least two sermons per day, after a few weeks more. My health has been quite as good since I left Utica as it had been for some weeks before. Being resolved on trying the efficiency of Dr. Cooper's prescription, and to combine therewith some things recommended by Dr. Coventry in the article he published during the Summer past, on the chronic sore throat, I resumed, on Monday last, the use of the sulphate of copper combined with gum ammoniac, in nauseating doses, and at the same time, applied a large blister to the throat, extending from ear to ear. The next day, in order to make it more sensibly effective, I stripped off the skin, and reapplied the blistering plaster to the quick unerskin, and took off another layer. The operation produced a most copious discharge, and, as you may well suppose, a considerable degree of soreness; so that it may truly be said of me that I am "stiff-necked," if not "uncircumcised in heart," and in connexion with the nauseating effect of the other medicine, puts me in a mood not the most pleasant for writing. Nevertheless, I have pretty strong hopes, from present appearances, of a favorable result of the treatment.

The day of our arrival here was very rainy—cleared off cold at night, but soon became warm and pleasant, and has been ever since almost like a Northern Summer, remarkably pleasant. My family are well, and unite with me in the best wishes and respects to you and all inquiring friends.

Not a syllable yet from my friend Campbell! What can be the reason? You will hear from me again sometime. Farewell. Yours truly, D. SKINNER.

THANKSGIVING.

"Ye humble souls approach your God
With songs of sacred praise;
For he is good, immensely good,
And kind are all his ways."

In the end of the year when "the harvest home" hath been shouted, and the sickle lies still and the reaper's heart is glad within him—when our garners are stored and our hearth-fires burn clear—it is good, it is comely, to bow down and worship "in the beauty of holiness," at the feet of the Creator and Preserver of all things.

The custom of setting apart a day annually, for public thanksgiving, which we have received from our ancestors, we deem a wise and a pious one. Although each heart should ever be a shrine fragrant with the incense of gratitude, yet it kindles this affection into a brighter and holier flame, when we assemble "in the great congregation," and meet, as kindred around one family altar, to pour forth our praises. We feel then more deeply than ever, that we are all children of one Father—that many have been his tokens of love to each one of us—we know by acknowledgments for individual benefits, that "He is good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all his works"—and we depart to our several stations with resolutions to trust in Providence at all times, more deeply and vividly impressed upon us.

Surely, the past year has been one, for which we have great cause to be thankful. It has had, it is true, its peculiar train of evils. There has been much gloom around us. The course of trade has in many places been rendered stagnant, and the whole chain of business operation throughout the land weakened by special pecuniary embarrassments. Yet, as one who believes, that out of seeming evil arises good, we can not but think, that these things are only clouds which momentarily obscure our vision. We believe that they will soon pass away, and that whatever may be the causes to which we attribute them—or wherever the blame in regard to them may lie, we shall be the wiser and the better for these adversities.

But, weighing the evil with the good, should we not be grateful, very grateful? These few years past, the corn and the wheat, the necessities of life, have been but scantily produced, and had it thus happened at a timelier time, our case would have been a deplorable one. But the past season has been one of comparative plenty. The sunshine and the rain have been poured out, the earth has yielded its increase, and by the sheaf-crowned field, and the glowing fruit-tree we have had manifestation that however man in his affairs may have conducted wrongly or imprudently, the God of nature has not deserted us nor withdrawn his loving kindness wholly from us.

Again, as a nation, we have great reason to be thankful. Perhaps it is too much the case with us, that "We love our land because it is our own,

And scorn to give aught other reasons why."

Yet, with all its evils, its follies, its crimes, we must give vent in trite expressions to the feelings of our heart and say that we think it

"The loveliest land on the face of the earth."

Though goodly it is with its mountains and forests, its streams and valleys, yet not so much for them, as it is beautiful for its homes and hearth-shrines, its fanes and altar-places, its lofty and free institutions, its unshackled privileges, its wide spread habitations, its far-sweeping commerce, its deep-flowing traffic, its treasure of great names, of noble minds—beautiful, beautiful with the story of its pilgrim-hallowed deeds, the memory of its red and holy battle-fields.

And this land has God given us. This is our inheritance. Here we may worship in the way each conscience shall dictate, beneath the temple's arch, or the cabin's roof, or the open sky, or in our closets, with none to molest or make us afraid.

Should we not be thankful for our country? for the blessings which God has lavished upon it? Let us come then, as a nation, and "kneel and bow down, let us worship before the Lord our Maker," with gratitude gushing full from our hearts, that he hath given us a birth-place and a home in a land like this.

Finally, as individuals, who hath not cause for thanksgiving? Let those of all classes and stations in life, reckon up the bounties and chastisements which they have received from their heavenly Father, and see if the good gifts do not far outnumber the afflictions, and if even the chastisements do not appear messengers of mercy. Is there any upon whose path the flowers are all dead and the sunshine hath been shadowed—who have seen a dark wing flitting before them, smiting down the bright, "the loved and the lovely"—who have sat down, veiled, amid the desolations around them—watcher at the sick-bed, weeper by the grave-mound, mourner for the loss of this world's goods, afflicted one, wherever thou art—tell me, have there no joys sprung up amid thy sorrow? has no consolation been administered to thy grief? If temporal good hath been withheld, have there been given no spiritual blessings, hallowing the hour of sadness and causing pure and living fountains to well up in the deep places of the heart—causing thee to rejoice that the Lord is thy salvation—to fasten thine affections upon things eternal, unfading—things that the storms of time can not reach, the blast of death can not wither.

To all, then, we think it will appear, that there have been meted out benefits calling for ardent and devout gratitude. We are too apt, to disregard the many comforts and blessings which cluster in our path thickly and daily. But they are no less blessings and comforts because unmarked and unheeded. Why, every glorious ray of light, and every freshening breath of air, is a gift which we are by no means to slight in offsetting the good to the evil. Let us not plod on in stern and callous indifference to these and the thousand other benefits which fall to our lot. There is "a still small voice," as we toil, and struggle, and rush on through life, inviting us to pause, remember, and render love and praise to Him, who is, of all good gifts the Giver—and an opportunity like a day of public thanksgiving should not be suffered to pass by unnoticed. At a time like this, also, let us not forget our poorer brother or sister, but remember that "it is more blessed to give than to receive." Let it be a day of praise—a day when we being glad may make others glad with us—and let each heart be an altar, sending up a thank-offering, pure and devout to the eternal Father of mercies. E. H. C.

APOLOGY.

Some obituary and hymenial notices which should have appeared in this week's paper, were not prepared by me in time, in consequence of some unexpected and unavoidable engagements which occupied me to the neglect of every thing else. They will appear in our next.

Several other items, proposed and promised, and some partly finished, have also been postponed from the same or similar causes. I hope soon to be able to pursue my editorial avocations with more certainty and less interruption than it has been my lot for several weeks past, to do. But the close of the volume is approaching with its host of peculiar duties; and our pecuniary matters are by no means such as to allow much play of the mind and ease of thought on other subjects. I wish some of our delinquents had to edit the paper a few weeks in our situation and with our feelings! I am not malicious, I hope—but, that's all. A. B. G.

THE DISCUSSION.

I should have stated in our last, that in every case save one, two copies of every Letter from Mr. Skinner to Mr. Campbell, have been mailed, in proof sheet, several days before our paper is published, carefully directed to Mr. Campbell, at Bethany, Va. To make sure of their arrival in the shortest possible period of time, and in safety, we send one copy by way of Rochester, Pittsburg, etc., and the other copy by way of New-York, Philadelphia, etc. In addition to the two proof copies, we send the paper, duly directed to the Millennial Harbinger, Mr. Campbell's paper, by the ordinary course of mail. Thus three copies of each letter have been sent to him; if he has not found them on his various returns home, it is certainly no fault of ours—and if the blame is not in those entrusted by him with their reception and preservation for him, it must be in some very unusual and singular defect of the mail transportation! At all events, three copies have been, and will continue to be forwarded—and duplicate copies of the missing number will now be forwarded again.

Mr. Campbell's last letter, although dated so early, did not reach here until on or about the 9th of November—and one copy only has been received at this office. By reference to Br. Skinner's reply in this paper, it will be seen that the copy directed to him, was not received very early, either. Mr. Campbell, or those he has left charged with the business of forwarding them, are informed of these facts, that they may not blame us for the late appearance of his last in our columns. It was received too late for publication in our paper of the 10th—Br. Skinner's reply came just in time to enable us to publish it this week.

With the controversy I have nothing to do—but those arrangements in printing and publishing which devolve on me, I am not only anxious to discharge promptly, carefully and impartially; but am also anxious to have it believed I have thus performed my duty—and that, whatever failures may occur, are not justly chargeable to me. "PARLEY'S BIBLE GEOGRAPHY."—Parley's works are so well known as to need no commendation. This one is admirably adapted for the use of Sunday schools, Bible Classes, etc. There is but one sentiment that I have found in it, which is in a slight degree objectionable, and that is lost almost in its many and great merits. Grown people even will find it interesting and instructive. * * * For sale at this office. A. B. G.

POETRY.

"And my words shall e'er be, Thou art welcome again."—
A. B. G.]

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE INDIAN'S LAMENT.

The style in imitation of Mrs. Hemans.

"Didst thou not know I loved thee well?
Thou didst not, and art gone,
In bitterness of soul, to dwell
Where man must dwell alone!" IVAN THE CZAR.

The sternness of the Aborigine character is pretty well known. Yet, notwithstanding its apparent indifference in the family circle, there is doubtless an under current of deep and thrilling tenderness, winding its way beneath a frigid exterior; which, but for the inveteracy of custom, would at times break forth. The following poem is based upon the supposition. The tradition is simply, that an aged Indian Chief, called Sleepless Panther, was decoyed by an enemy from his home, and in his absence, his only child, a beautiful young girl, was murdered.

The Autumn wind moaned hoarsely through a dark and ancient wood,

Within whose wild and silent depths a lonely dwelling stood,
And the faint red flush of sunset, thro' the half closed door found way,

Where a form of youthful loveliness in death's deep slumber lay.

Over the still and pallid face an aged warrior bent,
And mournful were the words that from his full, bruised heart found vent—

A broken arrow at his feet, a bow string by his side, Told that by cold and treacherous hands his dark-haired one had died!

"Was it for this," the chieftain said, and winds the echo caught,
"Was it for this, with eagle speed my forest home I sought—Scouring the deer that crossed my path, the birds that soared above,
And hearing but that voice whose words were ever words of love?"

"My child—my child—my last, lone flower—the spoiler's hand hath swept
The beauty from thy fragrant leaves while the Sleepless Panther slept!

Woe! for the voice that lured me from my vine-clad home away,

Leaving my young and timid lamb to bloody wolves a prey!

"Fairest thou wert—ay, fairest of all our noble race,
And the glory of a brighter land shone ever on thy face;
Thy step was as the morning breeze upon the silver stream,
And the mournful light of thy dark eyes, like the moon's departing beam.

"Fairest thou wert—ay, fairest—thy form was like the pine,
That shade its long and slender leaves where deep spring waters shine,

Thy voice was as the voice of leaves, when the mystic dew drops fall—

Woe, that I call upon thee now, and thou answerest not the call!

"My child—my child—my morning star—the daylight of my path—

One thought of cruel bitterness pursues me in its wrath;
I never gave thee look of love, nor spoke one word to bless—
Oh, for one hour to tell thee all this heart's deep tenderness!

"One little hour—but thou art gone, like the mist-wreath from the hill,

Thou art journeying to the land of dreams where the moon and stars are still—

Thine ear will drink the voice of birds where deathless flowrets shine,

And catch from other lips, the praise that never fell from mine!"

And thus he poured his wailings forth, till the moon had sought the West,

When he bore, with slow and solemn step, his treasure to its rest—

Burying with her—his murdered one—life's last remaining joy, Save the stern hope, ere moons should wane, her murderer to destroy.

COMPASSION.

There is a rich though melancholy luxury, in sympathy with the afflictions and contributing to the necessities of our fellow-creatures. Selfishness may withhold the needed bounty, and seek an excuse for her parsimony, by tracing the cause of distress to idleness, dissipation, and crime—but charity is disposed to restrain censure, however just, until a more propitious hour, and smooth over with a plastic hand, the failings and frailties of corrupt nature, until the anguish of affliction shall have been soothed, and the distresses of want alleviated. It is one of the excellencies of our holy religion that we may weep with those that weep, and it often affords a wholesome lesson to enter into the feelings and sympathize with the sorrows of the distressed around, and learn something of the pangs of those who are doomed to

"Drink the cup
Of baneful grief, or eat the bitter bread
Of misery!"

By commingling our tears with theirs, we shall help fill up the cup which is required at their hands, and shall lay humanity under a claim, which some son or daughter of charity may repay, when it becomes our turn to learn the fluctuating nature of sublunary scenes. "Mercy to him that shews it," is part of the grand economy of an overruling Power, and though the entreaties of compassion may sometimes avail in behalf of the undeserving, yet it is dangerous for any one to calculate upon that boon from his fellow-men, whose heart is steeled against the woes of human anguish. Although it is befitting to man to partake so deeply of this sympathetic spirit as to indulge in unceasing grief on account of the trials that are incident to humanity, and inseparable from it, yet it is a no less enviable extreme, to be so completely enslaved to a sordid selfishness, as to smile at the voice of woe, or revile the tale of sorrow. We need not live in continual grief because sickness, and suffering, and death are forever ravaging our world; yet, when it comes within our reach to awake the smile of joy in the wretched countenance, and to visit and console the bed of languishment, or of death, it is meet that we should suspend for a moment the frivolity of youth, or stoop from the high dignity of manhood, to perform those offices of tender mercy, which are due from man to man; and should a vagrant tear at such a moment suffuse the eye, it need not excite a blush; it is the offering of feeling at the shrine of compassion; it is registered by the angel of love, and the reward shall in no wise fail. Sorrow, like death, is the common lot; like death, too, it is the tyrant of humanity; and at every moment it is swaying its ruthless sceptre over the human race. At one time it lays the gripping hand of want upon the prosperous; at another it destroys the bloom of health, and smites the fair brow with ghastly languishment; at another it hurls reason from her throne, and infuriates the mind with wild insanity, and, at another, it severs the bond of affection, and clothes the lover and friend in the habiliments of woe—a feeble emblem of the anguish of a broken heart.—Sentinel and Star.

POETRY.

The poetry of the imagination, although it may glitter more, is neither so rich nor so glorious as the poetry of the heart. We have very few poets of the latter description. In childhood, and sometimes in youth, we are alive to the poetry of the heart. While the mind is pure and artless, devoid of everything that can be termed sinful—free from anxious and corroding cares, all nature appears to us very much as Eden appeared to our first parents. Every thing upon which we gaze seems to be good, and lovely, and beautiful. Our hearts claim acquaintance with all that meets the eye, and we feel deeply impressed by every little event which takes place around us. To such poetry as this, the beatified inhabitants of another world are no doubt awake; and as they touch their golden harps, their living souls seem to leap along the strings and float on the harmonious notes as they rise like incense to the great Fountain of love and joy.

In this world poetry does not always mingle with devotion, though I believe that a poetic soul is generally impressed more easily with devout sentiments than those minds which are of a more earthly cast. But I believe that in the world to come, poetry and devotion become melted into one—that we are rendered keenly and acutely sensitive to all with which we hold intercourse, and thus our bliss becomes heightened into continual rapture. Indeed the representations of heaven which we have in the Scriptures, appear to favor such an opinion. We read of the hymns and harps of the angels; and the inspired prophecies of the ancient prophets are the very essence of poetry.—Ladies' Repository.

RELIGION.

If you are disinterested in religion, religious duties will not be a task to you. You will not go about religion as the laboring man goes to his toil, for the sake of a living. The laboring man takes pleasure in his labor, but it is not for its own sake. He would not do it if he could help it. In its own nature it is a task, and if he takes any pleasure in it, it is for its anticipated results, the support and comfort of his family, or the increase of his property.

Precisely such is the state of some persons in regard to religion. They go to it as the sick man takes his medicine, because they desire its effects, and they know they must have it or perish. It is a task that they never would do for its own sake. Suppose men loved labor as a child loves play. They would do it all day long and never be tired of doing it, without any other inducement than the pleasure they enjoy in doing it. So it is in religion; where it is loved for its own sake, there is no weariness.

I place a cheerful trust in Providence. The triumphs of evil, which men call great, are but clouds passing over the serene and everlasting heavens. Public men may, in craft or passion, decree violence and oppression. But silently, irresistibly, they and their works are swept away. A voice of encouragement comes to us from the ruins of the past, from the humiliations of the proud, from the prostrate thrones of conquerors, from the baffled schemes of statesmen, from the reprobation with which the present age looks back on the unrighteous policy of former times. Such sentence the future will pass on present wrongs. Men, measures, and all earthly interests pass away; but Principles are Eternal. Truth, justice, and goodness partake of the omnipotence and immutableness of God, whose essence they are. In these, it becomes us to place a calm, joyful trust, in the darkest hour.—Channing's Letter to Clay.

DEATHS.

At his father's residence in Stark, Herkimer county, September 26th, CAPT. JOHN L. YOUNG, eldest son of Lewis and Eve Young, in the 25th year of his age. By his gentle manners, amiable disposition and virtuous conduct he was deservedly endeared to a large circle of relatives and friends, who deplore his early departure.—He died in the enjoyment of a firm faith in God as the Father and Saviour of all men, notwithstanding the zealous efforts of some mistaken friends to terrify him into an abandonment of his consoling trust in his Maker.

His funeral was attended on the following day, at the Otsego meeting-house, when a consolatory discourse was delivered to the large circle of mourning relatives and friends, by Br. J. D. Hicks, from the words of Jesus to Martha—"Thy brother shall rise again"—John xi: 23.—Com.

On the 5th of October, at his residence, at Howlet Hill, Mr. GILES CASE one of the first settlers in the town of Onondaga. He had attained to upwards of 80 years of age, and died lamented by all who knew him; for he had exemplified in his life that religion which is pure and undefiled before God and the Father, and which consists in "visiting the fatherless and the widows in their afflictions, and in keeping ourselves unspotted from the world." His funeral was attended on the 7th, at the Baptist church, and the consolations of peace tendered to the mourning relatives, and sympathizing friends by the writer. H. BOUGHTON.

A VOICE TO YOUNG MEN.....CHAPTER XI.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

POLITICS.

I deem it not improper, in addressing young men, to make a few observations respecting politics. It is well for the stability of our republican institutions, that the people are divided into parties. This leads to a strict scrutiny of our public functionaries—to the exposition of their faults and a commendation of their wisdom and virtue—and all this has a tendency to keep them faithful in the discharge of their duties.

There are two prominent evils in regard to politics, against which young men should be upon their guard. The first, is the changing from party to party, for the purpose of obtaining popular applause, or office, or emolument. Such conduct betrays an entire destitution of moral principle and rectitude. If you adopt these motives as the basis of your political bias and proceedings, it is quite certain, although you may be successful for a season, that your object will eventually be discovered, your character and influence will be lost, and all parties will despise and neglect you. A shuffling, time-serving demagogue, a political weather-cock, veering in the direction of every wind that blows, without regard to principle, is a most despicable character; unworthy the privileges of a freeman.

The other evil to which I allude, is upon the contrary extreme—a blind and servile adherence to party—an infatuation, by which every measure, however dangerous, is supported, that is dictated by the leaders, the wire-pullers of the party, and every principle, however valuable and salutary, opposed and condemned, whenever they give the signal—an infatuation, under the degrading influence of which, men abandon their birth-right of freedom of opinion, and are willing to see with the eyes, and hear with the ears, and understand with the judgment of those whom they permit to lead them. This servility to party tactics, party measures and party men, is an evil greatly to be deprecated. It is rife with dangers—dangers that reach the very vitals of our free institutions.—Should the day ever arrive when this degrading party servitude becomes general, when it winds its enslaving chains around the great mass of the people, the sun of this Republic will wane to the horizon, and early set in clouds and darkness.

In former years, it was the fortune of the writer of these chapters, to be engrossed to no inconsiderable degree, in the political strifes of the day. From the peculiarly favorable opportunities which I then enjoyed of judging the designs and motives of political leaders, I became fully satisfied, that the degrading principle of servility to party measures, is designedly diffused through community, by interested men for their personal aggrandizement—and that the strife, and clamor, and bitter acrimony that convulses society at the approach of important elections, is caused mainly by the struggle between the "ins" and the "outs"—between those who are in office and wish to keep in, and those who are out and desire to get in! Were it not for the contentions of these two classes, the clangor of political battle would be hushed, and the people would calmly and peaceably adopt the proper measures to continue our institutions in their purity, and keep the wheels of government in well balanced motion. Young men should be aware of these things, that they may "see through" the sophistical and bombastic declamation of political demagogues. "Measures and not men," was the motto of the founders of our Republic; and it still remains the popular cry of all parties. But it requires only a single glance at the proceedings of politicians at the present day, to discover that, with too many of them, this maxim has become reversed—and their great object is men and not measures!

It devolves upon the young men who are now coming upon the stage of action, to arrest the progress of this growing evil, and to diffuse abroad a love for political independence and purity. To this end, allow me to urge every young man whose eye rests upon these lines, not to attach himself so strongly to any party, that he can not without improper bias, exercise that privilege of deciding for himself upon the propriety or impropriety of principles and measures, which is the invaluable legacy bequeathed to us by our fathers! Avoid all party chains and shackles, and all party measures, that are not plainly and strictly for the benefit of the whole body of the people, all attachments to men and names—every thing that can have a tendency to blind the judgment or deaden the love for principle. Understand me—I do not object to political parties. In a Republic like this, there must be parties while men continue to differ honestly in opinion. But I object to that degrading attachment to party, by which the judgment is so blinded as to consider the interest of the party paramount to all other interests—that dangerous infatuation, which says—"the party must be sustained, at all hazards!" Let it be your highest ambition to be a republican, in the broad and true acceptance of that word—a lover of enlightened and well regulated liberty, of equal rights and privileges—a supporter of the best interests of your country, irrespective of the rise or fall of parties or men. When measures are brought to your consideration, do not inquire who originated them, or by what party are they supported, or what men will they elevate or overthrow?—but only ask, are the proposed measures called for by existing exigencies—are they consistent with the genius of our free institutions—are they compatible with republican principles—are they calculated to enhance the public welfare? If, after strict and candid examination, you can answer these inquiries in the affirmative, support the measures; but if not, reject them entirely. And when an individual is held up for public station, let not the question be, by whom was he nominated—or to what party does he belong?—but ask, what are his principles, his abilities?—apply the text of the patriot Jefferson—"is he capable, is he honest, is he faithful?" Never give him your support until you are perfectly satisfied upon these points. Let the young men of this Union, free themselves from all debasing manacles, from every improper bias, and pursue an upright, manly, independent course in regard to politics, and the evils that are now sapping the foundations of our Republic, will become annihilated. And I can not avoid here recommending young men to patronize more extensively, those public prints that are neutral respecting politics—those papers which freely and boldly canvass the political questions of the day, without becoming attached to any party or any set of men. One publication of this character, conducted with ability and discrimination, will throw more light upon the actual state of the country, the true nature of its interests, and the character and tendencies of the current and prominent measures of the times, than a score of those papers that are wholly devoted to the upbuilding of a particular party. Those young men, therefore, who are more deeply interested in the welfare of the whole country, than in the welfare of political parties and individual aspirants, will do well to become patrons of these neutral periodicals.

CHEERFULNESS.

"All the days of the melancholy are evil;
But he that is of a cheerful disposition, hath a continual feast."

So spake the Preacher of Israel. How did he make the discovery? Simply, by looking about him, and observing the dispositions of those around him. We may make the same observation, for ourselves, almost daily. There is no reader of this, but may certify himself of the truth of Solomon's aphorism, by recurring to what he has observed in some of his former or present acquaintances. It may be no unprofitable employment, for each reader just to look back upon the panorama of life, and reflect a little upon some of the instances which he has witnessed, illustrative of the motto above.

We may relate one of our cases or observations. A young man who was "smit with the love," not of sacred song, but of rising in the world, made himself quite remarkable in our eyes by a constant habit of complaining. His business prospered as well as commonly happens, his health was good, and to the on-looking of his acquaintances, his prospects were fair—yea, promising. Meet this man where you would, he ever presented a bustling, dissatisfied air. If he could not tell you that the weather was bad, or the latest news from abroad was bad, or that some house had stopped payment, or that the last novel was poor stuff, you would not twice in a year escape without some tale of complaint. His mind, timid and never satisfied with things as they were, was ever busy in fearing evil, or contrasting what he could obtain with what he would wish; and out of the abundance of his heart his mouth spake. Most melancholy were his croakings. With him there was something rotten, not only "in the state of Denmark," but in every thing in the heavens above, and the earth beneath. We do not mean that he was very peculiar in this respect; for, how many do any of our readers find of their acquaintances, who do not treat them at almost every meeting, to some complaint or other? Our friend only carried his fears, his forebodings, and his complaints, about one degree farther than the average practice of the major part of men; and we believe this arose from his haste to be rich, and great, and in all respects as he would like to be. His desires were large, and he had not patience to wait on the slow progress which was making towards his accomplishment.

Seeing in the future nought but ill, it is wonderful he should have married: but so it was. His wife was either naturally of a happier temperament, or seeing his foible, (for she was a woman of great good sense,) she thought it proper to assume a more cheerful carriage than was her wont. She had the faculty, as much as any we ever knew, of making things "go straight" in her own department, and therefore, her temper being unruined by confusion or mistakes, and having the pleasure of seeing all things prosper in her hands, she might well afford to be of a pleased and merry heart. The atmosphere in which she lived was, therefore, peace and content; and every thing in her happy home, seemed absolutely to breathe into you the spirit of contentment and serenity. On the streets, our friend continued the same croaker as before; but at home, how could he? With every thing neat, tasteful, comfortable, and with a wife cheerful, intelligent, and ever ready with some interesting and agreeable topic for social chat, the out-breakings of his discontent were repressed or much subdued. It was evident that he felt that his fireside was altogether an unsuitable place for these—he seemed to feel as if he would be contradicted by the very air or walls of the room. Wisely, we thought his wife seemed not to notice his peculiarity; but seeing it marred his happiness, she endeavored to ascertain the cause of his melancholy musings, to correct the erroneous views in which they did originate, and to familiarize his mind with those great truths which were the foundation of her own complacency and cheerfulness. These great truths related to the benevolent and fatherly character of the Supreme, and to the wise, kind, and bountiful provisions of Heaven. These she had imbibed from her father, a man of liberal and enlarged thoughts, and of uncommon dignity and composure. He and she, father and daughter, will, ere this time, (we can speak confidently, though now absent,) have become familiar with Dr. Smith's work on Divine Government, and Mr. Combe's on the Constitution of Man, for in them they will have found their own views clearly expounded and eloquently enforced. He that walketh with wise men shall become wise, it is said—and our friend verified the proverb. Gradually he left off his discontent and complaints. From his wife he has learned how to enjoy a perpetual feast, and now he knows from past and sad experience, that all the days of the croaker are evil indeed. A. N. S. S.

FRIENDSHIP.
BY REV. J. G. MCADAM.

How common place are the general opinions concerning this holy principle! The merest act of kindness, accidentally or inadvertently performed in favor of another, is termed friendship. The repetition of a few such acts, the sublime of friendship. While these are, perhaps, the stunted offerings of a beggarly disposition, performed under the certainty of not enriching the beneficiary, and the hope of benefiting themselves. Thus men make a trumpet of their virtues, through which they echo every petty act of seeming good, and seek to write their names in the dust of their own meanness, while, perhaps, the great volume of their conduct is a clear refutation of their pretensions. Though some, dazzled by the tinsel of a few gilded offerings on the shrine of heaven, invest the donor with the halo of a saint. And thus, on the great platform of the world, some pretenders to the noblest elevations are the merest plebeians in spirit, whose gifts weigh like air in the balance of substantial good—whose acts are as far from true greatness as Quixotte's adventures were from true chivalry. And yet, a corrupted taste awards to some such men the laurel and the crown. Give me the man whose life breathes a prayer for his race—whose whole conduct proves a consistent essay on the rights of man—whose pecuniary oblations are laid upon the shrine of friendship, by a hand that in the unseen walks of life restrains the flood of grief and wipes off its falling tears—oblations that spring from the promptings of a heart which bleeds at sorrows that it can not heal. It is, in fact, a principle too divine, to be measured by the standard of earthly things, or weighed in the balance of drachms or scruples, and can be witnessed in its purest forms when it is seen rubbing out the blots and stains, by which an unholy agency has dimmed the worth, rights and hopes of the unfortunate suffering poor—now bringing forth from the shades of adverse fortune, the youth of genius and intellect—and now stemming the overwhelming torrent of popular indignation until its victim has found shelter—now wresting the character, the dearest jewel of man, from the insidious attacks of slander—and, unpaid and unblest, restoring it in its original beauty to its owner. This is friendship. The man who thus acts toward me is my friend. The man who thus acts toward his fellows, is animated by principles of friendship, of that pure and holy kind, which warmed the bosom of our Saviour when "he laid down his life for us." "Be ye followers of him as dear children."

WISDOM.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

Doth not wisdom cry? and understanding put forth her voice? She standeth in the top of high places, by the way in the places of the paths. She crieth at the gates, at the entry of the city, at the coming in at the door. Unto you, O men, I call—and my voice is to the sons of man."

How desirable is wisdom! How much more valuable than rubies or choice gold! To win her garlands, how many lay aside the delights of youthful sport, and spend the spring-time of life in endeavoring to reach the portals of her sacred temple. The cheek grows pale in the midnight vigils—the lustrous eye grows dim, as the solitary lamp sheds its faint beams upon the mystic page of science. The veil is raised from nature's mysteries, and the student penetrates into her secret caverns. He looks upon the mysterious progressions of the vegetable Kingdom, from the forest hardy sons, to the flexile flowers that bend to the evening zephyr. He ascends in aerial cars to the regions of ethereal light, while the clouds are rolling and bounding beneath him; the air is thin and chill, the sun gives a faint and sickly glare, and with joy he returns to the dwellings of the sons of men. He descends to the depths of the earth, he goes down to the bottom of the mountains, and becomes acquainted with the laws by which the material world is governed. He makes the ocean chariot his home, and traces out his path upon the white foaming billows of the deep, whose ceaseless anthems sound like seven-fold thunders, and in undying melody, chant the praise of Him who holds their waters in the hollow of his hand. But, with all these evidences before him of a supreme intelligent First Cause, he often turns in derision away, denies the God that made him, and ascribes all to a blind deity called chance. Has he found wisdom? No, she still crieth at the gates, at the coming in of the doors, by the way in the places of the paths. Let him enter the gates of the city, where art and science build their shrine, and see the grasp of intellect that is necessary for the continuance of the varied specimens of mechanism before him, and thence ask himself whence came this mighty power of mind?—this gigantic sketch of thought—that makes the winds and waves subservient to the will of man? Is it the work of chance? Why then, is it not all as easy for this wondrous being to produce the articles ready made? When he enters the abodes of men, and studies the various bias and different capacity of the human mind, does he not perceive the actual necessity of a conviction of and confidence in the overruling care of a good and wise Being, for the happiness of mankind, and the regulation of their conduct towards each other? Blessed are they that walk in wisdom's ways, that hear instruction and refuse it not. For the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom; and the knowledge of the Holy is understanding.

PREJUDICE.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

Nothing is more difficult to eradicate from the human mind than prejudice. And the reason is, that those who labor under this difficulty seem to be insensible of it. They imagine that they are candid and willing to hear arguments against their peculiar views. It is worthy of remark, that those who are in this state of mind are the first to find fault with others. It is far more difficult to remove prejudice than vice; for the difference between right and wrong is so obvious that very few, if any, can be vicious without feeling it sensibly and wishing their conduct had been otherwise.—We generally know what is right, though our appetites and passions too often gain the ascendancy, and deter us from following the dictates of reason and conscience. But not so with prejudice. The strongest arguments may be urged, and the most cogent and conclusive reasoning may be employed, but still the mind remains unconvinced. Such being the state of the moral world, many have concluded that all attempts to destroy prejudice are of no avail. But if the obstinacy of mankind were a sufficient reason to relax endeavors, then all schools and means of instruction might be laid aside. Each one should do his duty. Every attempt should be made to enlighten the world; then if men prefer ignorance to knowledge, or darkness to light, they must suffer the consequences of their own choice.

But how shall we know who are prejudiced? Is there any test sufficiently plain, so that the line may be distinctly drawn? The great Locke, speaking of him who professes to have his mind free, offers the following test:—"Now if after all his profession, he can not bear any opposition to his opinion, if he can not so much as give a patient hearing, much less examine and weigh the arguments on the other side, does he not plainly confess it is prejudice that governs him?.....For, if what he holds be as he gives out, well fenced with evidence, and he sees it to be true, what need he fear to put it to the proof?" Let every one bring his mind to the standard here presented, and he will soon learn whether he is prejudiced or not. Each one should be open to conviction, remembering that there is more light to dawn upon the world. God reveals truth as fast as the human mind can bear it. He places it within the reach of all who sincerely desire it. "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him. But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering." God says to man, "Come, let us reason together!" Now it is evident that he who allows his mind to be swayed by prejudice, does not comply with the command of Jehovah. Jesus, when on earth, said to the people, "Yea, and why even of yourselves judge ye not what is right?" And it is worthy of remark that he always addressed the understanding and not the passions. Perhaps, prejudice never showed itself more fully than in the age in which he lived. Yet he did not relax his endeavors. What a blessed example for the world to follow. Let us then be guided by him, and we shall never go astray from the path of duty. Let us imbibe his forgiving spirit, and when prejudice opposes, remember his dying prayer for his enemies, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

JUSTICE.

What is justice? What is its definition? One would suppose from the pulpit representations, that it was a monster of the most frightful character—especially when that attribute is exercised by the Deity.

We are told, that the justice of God requires the endless damnation of the whole human family. How often have we heard, in prayer, the following sentiment expressed:—"If thou, O Lord, hadst been just with us, we should, long ere this, have been in hell with the damned, where hope never comes; but, blessed be thy name, there is a way of mercy provided." A way of mercy provided! For what purpose? That man might escape the justice of God, and be saved from it? So it is declared, or, at least, it seems this is what we are to infer. The justice of God requires the endless misery of the whole human family, but the mercy of God, in opposition to his justice, requires a different and very opposite result—viz., the endless holiness and happiness of the human family. Now what a monster this justice must be, to require such unhappy results. If the justice of God requires such consequences, then, reasoning from analogy, an opposite attribute which would be injustice, would require opposite consequences—viz., endless holiness and happiness. This being the definition of justice and injustice, we may well pray to be delivered from the justice of God, as his injustice would be far more preferable.

Now let us look into the definition of justice, according to common sense and the Bible. We look into our common dictionaries for its meaning, and we find it there defined to be, equity, honesty, right. When we speak of a just man, we mean a good man—a man of justice—that he is a man of equity and honesty. We do not consider him a monster, because he is a just man. Nor would we wish to shun his society, because he is a man of justice. No, we love and admire the just man.

What definition do the Scriptures give of the justice of God? "Justice and judgment are the habitation of thy throne."—Ps. lxxxix: 14. What are we to understand by the justice and judgment of God in this passage? Is it that these attributes require the endless misery of man, for his deviation from moral rectitude? By no means, but the reverse, as the remainder of the verse shows—"Mercy and truth shall go before thy face." Again, the Scriptures assure us that "all his (God's) ways are judgment, a God of truth and without iniquity, just and right is he."—Deut. xxxii: 4. What do we infer from this passage? That because God is just and right, and all his ways are judgment, that this justice and judgment require the endless misery of the sinner? By no means; but the reverse; for it is said, "He is a just God and a Saviour." But the address to the Deity by many, is, "If thou hadst been just, we should have long before this been placed beyond the reach of mercy." Now let us place a passage of Scripture by the side of this oft-repeated invocation. "Unto thee, O Lord, belongeth MERCY, for thou renderest to EVERY man according to his work." Ps. lxii: 12. The invocation is, "Hadst thou been just." Why, what then? This is the amount of it—"If thou, Lord, hadst been just, thou wouldst not have been merciful; but as thou hast been unjust, now we expect to obtain mercy." This is a tacit acknowledgment, that for God to be merciful, he must be unjust. A moment's reflection will convince the reader that the justice of God, so far from requiring the endless misery of the sinner, requires his holiness and consequent happiness. I know it is affirmed, and that too with much assurance, that the justice of God requires nothing less than the endless misery of the sinner! But is not the law of God just? Most certainly. What, then, does that law require of the sinner? Does it not require his obedience? Certainly. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, with all thy heart, and thy neighbor as thyself." If this is what the law and the justice of God require of the sinner, how then can the same law require his endless misery and unholiness? Will the same law that requires his holiness, require his unholiness? If, as the Scriptures assure us, "Love is the fulfilling of the law," how happens it that hatred can have the same effect?

We are also told that sinners deserve endless sufferings in hell, and that unless we feel this to be our just desert, we can not be saved.—But I would ask what endless suffering in hell is, but endless unholiness and opposition to God? The amount of this statement, then, is this—mankind have sinned against God: therefore they deserve to sin the more against him! yea; sin throughout eternity! Man has violated God's law, therefore he deserves to violate it continually! Man has become unreconciled and opposed to God, therefore he deserves to remain opposed and unreconciled continually and unceasingly—and unless he feels that it would be just to remain unreconciled and opposed to God throughout eternity, he can not be saved! Now this is a solecism, and can not bear a moment's investigation. If the justice of God requires of the sinner his endless sufferings in hell, it requires his endless unholiness and opposition to God. But this is contrary to fact. "The law is holy, and the commandment holy, just and good." And what does this just law require? It requires love, reconciliation, obedience and holiness; not hatred, unreconciliation, disobedience and unholiness. These can never fulfil the law, or answer its demands. Nothing but love will do this. Love is the fulfilling of the law. If, then, love is the fulfilling of the law, it certainly can not be hatred that will do the same, unless love and hatred are one and the same in essence. But it is said the penalty of the law is endless sufferings in hell. But I would ask, Is not this law addressed to mankind as sinners? Was it not given to them while in a state of sin and unreconciliation? Most certainly. The law in the Old Testament, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbor as thyself," was addressed to men as sinners. And Paul says, "the law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient—for the ungodly and for sinners."

Another thing, If the penalty of the law was endless sufferings in hell, why is it not mentioned in the law? How happens it that a law is given to man, the penalty of which is endless sufferings in hell, when not a syllable of such a penalty is mentioned? Was such a penalty of so little consequence, that the Lawgiver thought it unnecessary to be recorded? Or was the law left with the wisdom of this world to attach such a penalty thereto, without the divine direction? That the penalty of the divine law is endless sufferings in hell, is bare assertion—a groundless assumption—wholly destitute of one particle of proof. If there is proof, let it be produced. This subject is not to be trifled with. We have called on our neighbors, who deny the Resurrection, again and again, for the proof, but they remain silent, like the "dumb dogs, they can not bark, sleeping, lying down, loving to slumber." Isa. lvi: 10. Nevertheless, they assert that endless sufferings in hell is the penalty of the law. These assertions they repeat, again and again, but all without proof. The apostle Paul says, "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." But as the penalty in question is neither good, nor true, it needs not to be "held fast," or "proved"—and we may add, it can neither be proved true nor good, by any human being, priest or layman, in Christendom.

RELIGION.

Religion has had as many definitions, as there have been different sects—all professing to give its only and true meaning. The Pagan has defined it to be the worship of idols. The Mahomedan, to be the acknowledgment of the Koran; and its author, Mahomet, to be a true prophet, sent by God to publish it among his fellow-men. And by many of those who profess to be the followers of "Jesus of Nazareth," to be a supernatural work, resulting in a change from "nature to grace."

Since all have given it a definition, may I be permitted to give one which, by careful observation, I have gleaned from experience? which is as follows, viz., a knowledge of the character and perfections of God.

The reader will readily discover the difference in the above definitions; one, being the worship of idols; one, the acknowledgment of the truth of the Koran, etc.; and another, a supernatural change; while the one last given, is simply a knowledge of God and his perfections. It recognizes no miracle: there is nothing about it but what is in accordance with the every day dealings of our Creator with his creature, man.

But perhaps this definition may be objected to, on the ground that it is contradicted by facts; for instance, the conversion of the apostle Paul. But if the reader will again examine the account, he will, I think, be satisfied that there was nothing miraculous about it—i. e. it was the communication of knowledge. He was miraculously stopped in his wild career—but his asking the question, and the answer given, Acts ix: 6, show plainly, that that knowledge which he afterwards possessed, was not given him by the miracle. See also Acts ix: 16, 17, 22.

The above disproves the idea that it is a miraculous change; for, if the only case in the Scriptures which is brought to support it, can be shown not to be miraculous, it must be admitted, that the Bible affords no evidence that it is. But, finally, let us heed the exhortation of the apostle, to "grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord, Jesus Christ," and then we shall know "of a truth," whether "these things are so" or not. TO UNIVERSALISTS.

We see abundantly around us, religionists whose religion seems to bear fruit chiefly in missionary efforts—in contributing to send Bibles, missionaries and tracts throughout the world—in establishing Sunday schools—in educating young aspirants to the ministry, and in similar endeavors. The state of religion is computed among such churches, by the sums subscribed for some of the above purposes. With such religionists, the work seems to be without—in remote regions—in showy and splendid exertions on a large scale.

These are the easiest of—can I say Christian?—duties. The whole machinery of such societies can be kept in operation, without a single particle of the genuine spirit of Christ. By whatever fruits others choose to be known, may we, above all things, desire to be known and recognized as the followers of Jesus, by having abundantly among us not such far-off-working machinery as the above, but within us such virtues as these—"Love, joy, peace, long-suffering, kindness, goodness, fidelity, weakness, temperance." These duties are more difficult than the other; and they have less of the applause of men to recommend them. By such inward qualities, instead of outward operations, may Universalists determine to become known unto all men. The time, we trust, is at hand when a man's religion will be tested, not by the number of his ceremonious observances, not by the number of his contributions to benevolent societies, but by the number, the strength, and the fruitfulness of his truly Christ-like virtues—when the sanctity and benevolence of man's heart will be judged by the tenor of his deportment in privacy and in the domestic circle, not by his showy exhibitions on Sundays, and great days, and on public occasion—when it will be required which is the most regarded and the most influential, the eye of God or the eye of man. Let us, now, make the wise choice, and as that coming day dawns we shall be found clothed in white robes, and in that wedding-garment which is a passport to heavenly joys. For, with such virtue, we shall have a heaven within, yea, "a heaven upon earth."

My friends, allow me to ask you to ask yourselves this question;—When we see any one with a great deal of visiting and negotiating to do abroad, do we not generally find, or have good cause to suspect, home to be a cheerless, joyless, unpeaceful abode? You can make the application.

EFFECTS OF THE FALL.

Not long since, I was asked by a lady, who was languishing upon a bed of sickness, what I thought the cause of disease was. I replied, that "I believed it was occasioned by the violation of some organic law." To this she objected, adding, that "she believed it was brought upon us in consequence of Adam's fall."

I thought that if this was true, and that scripture also, which says, "Behold, the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth, much more the wicked and the sinner," the father of our race must have borne a heavy load indeed; especially, as one of his offspring declared that his punishment for a crime, (which was occasioned by the first transgression,) where the consequences were nothing, compared with what followed the partaking of the forbidden fruit, was "greater than he could bear."

Again, if Christ suffered the penalty, why do we suffer it over again? J.

EXTRACT.

BY J. W. CLOWES.

The world had rolled round upon its axis, unvarying in its orbit, raising its alternate surfaces to the sun, bringing in their turn the heat of Summer and the cold of Winter, presenting at one time, the lap of Nature filled with an abounding plenty, at another, her fair form with a sad reverse. Time, the fell tyrant of the world, had reigned triumphant, prostrating, in his course, empires, kingdoms, and republics, leaving nothing unscathed by his desolating hand—sinking, with one mighty sweep of his stalwart arm, millions to oblivion—consigning to the dust, without remorse, the most distinguished monuments of human greatness. Where now is Palmyra, once magnificent in the works of the sculptor and architect? Where is Babylon, renowned for its brazen gates, and the magnitude of its walls? Where is republican Athens, once the common patroness of Greece, and the school of the world? Where is Carthage, the proud rival of Rome? Where now are the vast multitudes which their walls enclosed? Razed in the dust, and swept away upon the never waiting tide of time.

"Gone, glimmering through the dream of things that were,
A school-boy's tale, the wonder of an hour."

Men of eminence have arisen in all ages of the world, equally distinguished in their various professions; some have acquired renown by their military achievements, some by their wise legislation, some by their rhetorical displays. But where are they now? Where are the immortal heroes of Marathon, of Thermopylae, of Leuctra, of Canæ? Where are they who fought in defence of their country and of freedom? Where are the lawgivers of Sparta and Athens? Where the Senate of Rome, which once gave laws to the world? Where are the god-like orators of Greece and Rome? Time tells the tale: nought but their names remain to show that they were, but are not.

ADVERSITY AND PROSPERITY.

BY REV. M. SANFORD.

"Thy rod and thy staff, they comfort me."—DAVID.

Thus sang the sweet Singer of Israel, as he cast his eye over the chequered scenes of life, and raised his thoughts to the Source of his blessings.—Casting his mind over the past history of his life, he views God as a Shepherd: "Thou hast made me lie down in green pastures, and led me beside the still waters." Viewing his present circumstances, he regards the hand of his Benefactor as loading him with benefits: "Thou preparest a table for me in the midst of mine enemies: my cup runneth over." Looking forward to the future, he trusts in the same goodness as measuring out the means of his onward progress towards perfection. "Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life; and I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever." Wild enthusiasm forms no part of the picture, his capacious mind surveys the tempest as well as the calm; he looks as steadily upon the storm that spreads gloom and dismay over the face of creation, as the serene sunshine that succeeds. He sees that affliction and suffering are mingled with the ingredients of his cup, and turns his eye upon death as his bitter portion. These scenes so full of terror to the most of mankind, do not shake the composure of the Psalmist. Considering God to be their cause, and happiness their effects, he rejoices in the rod and the staff of the Almighty: "yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil for thou art with me: thy rod and thy staff they comfort me."

Happily for the welfare of virtue, there are but few who are so dead to feeling, that they can not grasp the staff of prosperity and say, "it comforts me." But unhappily for the possession of a firm and lively hope in the wisdom and goodness of God, there are but few who can stand under the rod of affliction, and say, "this also comforts me."—When Summer smiles, and all nature's face is enamelled with flowers and scented with fragrance, we can easily rejoice in the plenty given, and pour forth our gratitude to the bountiful Giver.—But no sooner does cold Winter begin to scatter the flowers, and spread frost and snow over the landscape, than we commence our complaints, and arraign the affairs of Providence before our feverish tribunals. Weak, foolish judges! Have we not yet learned that the Winter is needful as the Summer? that rain is as useful as the sunshine? If not, let us enter the school of experience, and begin to learn. Let us look at things as they are, and facts will show us that they are just as they ought to be. What if the people of these Northern States, who are complaining about long and severe Winters, could succeed in having no Winters at all? The consequence would be, the soil would not freeze, the earth would not be softened, and like flour without yeast, it would not long afford us "the staff of life:" these mountains would become parched and desolate, and the raven wing of desolation would be spread over all our dominions.—And what if the rude sons of our hills could bring down those rude mountains which obstruct the traveller and attract the storm, to a water-level? The rivers would cease to flow, the rains forget to fall, the fruitful fields become a desert, the wilderness a dreary waste, and our happy country be as cheerless and desolate as the sandy plains of Sahara! Why, then, do we complain of cold Winters and rough mountains? It is because we are ignorant of the ways of God. His ways are above our ways, and our feeble minds do not comprehend them at one view. The fact is, God has wisely and mercifully arranged the diversities in landscape, and the changes in atmosphere from pole to pole; and such is their adaption to the inhabitants of every zone, the best means of happiness are secured to all, from the pale dweller on "Greenland's hills of cheerless white," to the tawny sons of "the burning line."

"This earth is a true map of man." There are hills and dales, storms and calms in the journey of life. A chequered scene is spread out before us. And it is well that it is so. Such is the weakness of human nature, the spring of happiness would become a monotony of unenjoyed blossoming, were it not often visited by the rough winds of adversity. If there were no diversities—no hills and dales, on the surface of life; if no agitations disturbed the atmosphere of mind, human society would be reduced to a moral desert; no competition would create ambition: no temptation heighten the triumph of virtue; and no exposure to suffering arouse the energies of the soul to improvement and bliss. Man would sink down into languor, stupidity and uselessness. The streams of pleasure would cease to flow—the gentle and refreshing dews of kindness forget to distil. And yet, alas! how blind is man! He murmurs at what he should bless—he condemns what he should approve. If his voice could be heard, he would reduce the society from which he draws all his strength, to a moral waste. By removing temptation, pain and affliction, he would bring down the laboring intellect to grovelling idiocy. But, thank Heaven, the reins of government are not in his hand. Like Xerxes, he may speak to the mountain, but it will not obey him. He may shrink from the rod, but he can not hide himself from the purifying influence of its correction.—He may charge the Deity with cruelty, but He who "seeth in secret" knows better than he, the nature of his offspring, and the best means of improving their enjoyments.

It is true there are visitations of sorrow and suffering, of which we can not divine the reason, because we can not look beyond the present and calculate their effects—as there are mountains so high, we can not see their use; but it ill becomes us to say these are cruel and unjust, when we see the benevolent tendency of less severe afflictions:—as it would be foolish to condemn the use of the White Mountains, when we know the benevolent use of smaller elevations. The truth is, if God is good in sending affliction into a family, by means of which it is awaked from its stupidity to a more active sense of truth and virtue; he is equally good in making way for a heavier storm of adversity upon a city, or country, to warn its inhabitants of the danger of some prevailing or threatening evil, and excite them to a practice of nobler deeds. And that this is the tendency of all the afflictions of the Divine rod, none can doubt who credit the Scriptures, or read the history of human experience.

The positive benefits of affliction may be found in the good which it confers. Every scene of suffering may be regarded as a school of virtue.—Pains begets pity; pity creates charity; charity stoops to relieve the wants of the sufferer. What child is it, over which the mother watches with the tenderest anxiety, and for which she braves the most difficulties? It is the very one which has caused her the most hours of trouble and care. The pain of the little sufferer, creates in the fond mother a love and a tenderness which nothing else could create. In every house of suffering, there is an influence exerted on the side of virtue, the extent of which is in proportion to the amount of pain endured and the number of its witnesses.—And in every province of human government, want, pain and grief exert a more powerful influence in promoting the righteousness of the people, than the combined energies of their legislators and governors. Could we duly estimate the amount of good that adversity spreads through society; could we clearly see that purity and affection, that strength in attachment, that sympathy in suffering, and that endurance in patience, which nothing but the rod of affliction could have created; we should say with the Psalmist, "The earth is full of the goodness of the Lord." And when the storms of adversity gathered over our heads, and the hand of pain was laid upon our frames, looking beyond the hour of suffering, and seeing that it is preparing us for a more splendid triumph, and to others giving a stronger love of humanity; we should raise our eyes to Heaven, and calmly say, "thy rod and thy staff, they comfort me."

CONVERSION—WHAT IS IT?

We often see in the religious newspapers, etc., of our Partialist friends, exulting accounts of the large number of "hopefully converted" during their protracted meetings; and I can well remember the charm of sanctity, the awful and mysterious dignity, that my young mind would throw around the recently "converted sinner." My young imagination saw him at once changed to another and a loftier being; I regarded him with feelings of awe—nay, almost of idolatry. After seeing him for some weeks the subject of a "sickly and moping melancholy," (the stage of "conviction,") or through nights of agony quivering on the anxious seat, or long, long days of protracted despair—to behold him suddenly delivered of his load—the chains burst asunder, and the disenthralled captive leaping high in air, clapping the hands, shouting praise to his Redeemer, and boasting of his victory over the fear of death—to observe this, I say, was lofty and imposing to the young imagination; and such an one was at length "converted to God."

I thought it the work of God, and prayed—oh! how fervently prayed—that I, even I, might feel the happy renovation. I knew their joys would last forever—and why? for God had given, and who should take away his power in the soul? I prayed for "conversion," but in vain—it came not. True, I often, on reflecting on the goodness of God, and on his plan of salvation, felt to rejoice and give him praise—but was this being "converted"?—was this the new birth? No! oh, no! I expected to see the converted run and not weary, to walk and not faint—but, alas, I am older now; I look for them, and where are they? Sunk into coldness and apathy, or gone back into worse practices than before!

Now allow me, reader, to cite your attention to a genuine case of conversion, and observe how different, how much less like enthusiasm it appears. You remember the apostle Philip, journeying in the desert, and overtaken by the Eunuch; how he "opened his mouth and preached unto him Jesus"—the Eunuch's request to be baptised, and Philip's answer, "If thou believest with all thy heart, thou mayest." What a beautiful creed, reader, did the Eunuch confess! Eighteen centuries have produced not one so full, so comprehensive—"tis the Scripture creed, and the only one the Scriptures recognize: "I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God." Philip never questioned another word, but went down into the water, and baptised him. Here was no groaning, no agonizing, no attention to meetings, night following day, and day following night—no belief in an endless hell or an angry God—but simply, "I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God"; and with this belief he "went on his way rejoicing." That, reader, was a genuine "conversion."

But I intended this article for a very short one, and to retain it such, must cut it short where it is, hoping to say more on the subject presently.

LETTER,

TO REV. E. E. GUILD.

DEAR BROTHER—I have lived sufficiently long in the world, not to be over-surprised at any measures resorted to by our opposers to injure the cause which we mutually love, and labor to maintain; but I was not exactly prepared for the reception of your letter, published in the Magazine of the 17th inst. I lose no time in laying before you such facts as will place the Rev. Mr. Clark in a dilemma, from which a dignified silence will not extricate him.

Some time about the middle of September last, I was informed by a member of my society, that a Mr. Henry Beedle lay dangerously sick, and would be pleased to have me call and see him; I accordingly did so, and received an introduction to him for the first time. He stated to me (what I afterwards learned from others), that he had been for many years a believer in the doctrine of Universalism—he then remarked that there had been much effort to change his views since his confinement, and that he thought it very strange that individuals should wish to deprive him of that which afforded him so much support and consolation—he spoke of his interview with his son, who is a Presbyterian minister, and related some of the conversation which passed between them. He then remarked that he could not live but a very short time, but says he "I die in peace, which would be impossible did I believe in endless misery for one individual of the universe." Much conversation to this effect passed between us. He wished me to pray with him, both at this time and at all my subsequent visits up to the Saturday previous to his death—which was my last visit. He died on a Tuesday. On parting with him at this time, he took my hand and remarked that he should see me no more in this world, remarking, "I am almost gone, but I die in peace." I replied to him, that it was a glorious thought that we should all meet in a better world, to which he responded heartily—"yes, it is!"

After the publication of your letter containing the statements of Rev. Mr. Clark, I called on Mrs. Beedle, the widow of the late Henry Beedle. Mrs. Beedle is an exemplary member of the Presbyterian church. I stated to her the reports circulated in Harpersfield, in relation to her deceased husband. She appeared somewhat surprised, and remarked emphatically, that Mr. Beedle died a Universalist, and that a short time before his death, he requested that I should attend his funeral.—She says further, that she was constantly with him, and certainly should have known it, had he renounced his faith in universal salvation, and that she told Mr. Campbell that he died a Universalist. (Mr. C. is our Presbyterian minister.)

CERTIFICATE.

This may certify that I was present at the interview between Rev. Mr. Whiston and Mrs. Beedle, and the conversation which then passed is correctly reported above. CYRUS CLARK.

The lady who watched with Mr. Beedle two nights previous to his death, says that she was present at the time when Mr. Beedle made the request that I should attend his funeral. To this request his wife says, "what difference can it make with you, my dear, who attends your funeral?" He replied, that "it did make a difference," and if it would be congenial with her feelings, he hoped Mr. Whiston might attend his funeral, and gave as a reason, that should it be attended by another, it would be said that he had renounced his faith.

I have now given you, Brother Guild, but a small portion of what might be given in evidence that Mr. Beedle died firm in the faith of the salvation of a world. If the stories reported by Mr. Clark be true, it is passing strange that the first information received in this village, should come from Delaware county. Mr. Beedle has been dead about two months, and I never heard it intimated in this place, that he renounced Universalism.

And now, Br. Guild, into thy hands I commit this Reverend Mr. Clark. Give not sleep to his eyes, nor slumber to his eyelids, till he has publicly retracted his vile slander of the dead and the living.

As ever, yours,

O. WHISTON.

REV. A. F. McCABE.

Br. GROSH—Permit me, through your paper, to ask information on the following subject. Last April, in No. 16 of the Magazine and Advocate, the Trustees of the Universalist society in Hamilton informed the public that they did not consider Mr. McCabe worthy of being a preacher of the Gospel. Mr. McCabe replied, stating that he intended bringing their assertions to the test before a proper tribunal. And I perceive by the Universalist Register and Almanac for 1838, that Brs. Sanderson and Whiston have put him down as one of our preachers. These facts lead me to inquire—

1. Did not the Trustees of the Hamilton Universalist society come forward at the session of the Central Association, in June last, prepared to satisfy the Council that, if Mr. McCabe was in fellowship with our denomination, that fellowship should be withdrawn?

2. Did not the Central Association conclude that, as Mr. McCabe was not in fellowship with our denomination, the Council could not act on the complaint—and that the notice already given would put a veto on his preaching, until, at least, his threatened prosecution of them had set aside public confidence in them?

3. Has Mr. McCabe since then received our fellowship—or done ought to retrieve his character from the stigma of his sudden discharge by the society in Hamilton?

4. If he is in fellowship—or is generally considered to be a Universalist preacher—why did not the Cayuga Association, (in whose bounds Mr. McC. has almost altogether resided since his conversion was first announced,) at its last session refer his case, as well as Mr. Annear's, to their committee of discipline for investigation?

5. If not in fellowship, should Br. Sanderson have given him a place in his list of our preachers?

6. As matters now stand, (and unless Mr. McCabe sees proper to render any such action unnecessary,) should not the committees of discipline in the Central and Cayuga Associations take the matter in hand and investigate it?

It is not from any unkind feelings to either of the persons herein named or alluded to, that I ask these questions—but a regard for the cause of truth and righteousness, as well as respect for the persons concerned, has induced me to make these calls. If Mr. McCabe has been charged with impropriety of which he is innocent, it should be known; and if he is really unworthy a place in the ministry, he should not be classed with the preachers of reconciliation. INQUIRER.

REMARKS.—The above is from a gentleman of worth and respectability—of undoubted attachment to Universalism, and whose name is in our possession. Being one of the committee of discipline for the Central Association for the last and present years, I would reply in part, and for myself alone, that the case was presented to us for investigation, and proof offered to sustain the charge, but that Mr. McCabe not being either in the bounds of the Central Association nor yet in fellowship with the denomination, we referred it to the Council; who discharged us from further consideration of the subject. Consequently, I do not feel at liberty to act upon it even did I deem it necessary. We have no possible jurisdiction over him. Br. Sanderson's error places him not in our fellowship, and if it did, he is not in the bounds of our jurisdiction. Should Mr. McCabe attempt to pass himself for a Universalist clergyman in any wise injurious to the cause, the committee of discipline of the Association in which he resides, might notify the public of the falsity of his pretensions, and disclaim all responsibility, on the part of the denomination, for his acts.

In the present state of things, it seems to me, that we in this Association, have done all that is necessary for us to do—that a correction of his error by Br. Sanderson, is all he can do—and that until Mr. McCabe claims to be in fellowship, or to be countenanced by us, in his preaching (if he should preach, as I believe he does not,) or conduct, no one of our denomination is called on to act in reference to him. Such is my opinion—I give it as my own, merely—let it pass for what it is worth, and no more.

THE RECORD.

I am yet considerably in arrears in relation to the proceedings of our public bodies, etc., for reasons not necessary to be stated here. MOB IN ALTON, ILL.

We received, but too late for our last, two letters from friends in Alton, giving accounts of the melancholy and disgraceful proceedings there, which resulted, for the third time, in the destruction of the presses and other printing materials of the abolitionist journal of that place—and, horrid to relate! in the murder of Rev. E. P. Lovejoy, its Editor, and the death of a Mr. Bishop.—We are grateful to our friends for their kindness, but must refer our readers for particulars to the secular papers, where they are given, generally correct. Of the affair itself I would speak in SOLEMN PROTEST against mobs, for whatever purpose raised, or by whomsoever composed.

The freedom of the press—the liberty of thought and speech, are to us no mere by-words—they are part and parcel of our country's institutions—the palladium of her civil and religious liberties, the only guaranty of every citizen's rights. "Error of opinion may safely be tolerated, while truth is left free to combat it"—but every mob is based on the opposite principles—intolerance, bigotry and persecution. If Mr. Lovejoy could rightfully be called on to desist from publishing his paper, because a majority of the people of Alton willed it—then may the political papers in New-York city, of the minority, be stopped by the majority—yes, and our press be driven from Utica—from the state of New-York—from the UNITED STATES—to-morrow!

But Mr. Lovejoy is said to have been in an error.—Admit it, and is error to be cured by such means?—Far from it! Every drop of his blood will spring up a thousand abolitionists, each as brave and determined as himself. Yes, the lovers of freedom and order, even of those opposed to the measures of abolitionists, will flock to their ranks in defence of the liberty of thought, speech and the press! "The blood of the martyrs," in this case also, will be "the seed of the church"—and even Alton will yet support an abolition press! We have the precedent of Utica and its mob, in proof of the effects of persecution on abolitionism.

But he is called rash and obstinate. Perhaps he was so; but placing myself in his situation, I believe he did well—did nobly, in dying in defence of, not only his rights but those of his fellow-men—of the darling feature of all republicanism, all Christianity—free discussion.—I know that no "public opinion"—no "majority" of citizens of Utica, could ever persuade me to give up the publication of the Magazine and Advocate, which the mass of them consider so ruinous, not only to the mere property or lives, but to the immortal souls of men. God, who made us, only, knows what we would do, if tried—but I do say, that that man is a traitor to duty, to liberty, to his country, who will tamely yield up rights guaranteed to him by his God, his nature, and by his country's Constitution and laws. Hence, whatever may have been Mr. Lovejoy's errors of opinion or faults of character, he is deserving the epithet and epitaph of "A MARTYR IN THE CAUSE OF THE LIBERTY OF THE PRESS."

QUERY.—As mobs shelter themselves under the plea of "public opinion," would it not be well for every press in the Union (for each one may be mobbed in turn,) to speak out boldly and plainly, and let them know what "public opinion" is? A. B. G.

FUTURE EXISTENCE.

It is probable, that almost every reflective mind has had its moments of skepticism. Of those who have come out from this gloom of doubt, we think the majority believe that there is a self-existent, overruling Creator, and that life is as a stream, running into a vast ocean whose entrance is beyond the bounds of time, and whose confines are as limitless as eternity.

For the proof of a Deity, we deem the argument from design sufficient and unanswerable. By these visible, tangible, irresistible evidences, we are, as it were, compelled into conviction. But, that we shall exist after the death of the body—that we shall live after that has been laid down in the earth—how do we know? Why have we arrived at such a conclusion? Are our hopes founded upon a rock? Are our stays the unfailing promises of God? Or, have we built upon mere speculation?—Is it a course of philosophic reasoning, alone, that has led us to this result? Do we deny the Divine authority of revelation, and are these things, upon which we depend, enough? Perhaps they afford a momentary quiet to the eager and weary thought—perhaps they illumine by a passing hope the darkness that shadows the grave—but, are they sufficient to give a lasting rest—to give a firm, immovable and unchanging faith?

We think a future existence, independent of revelation, a reasonable hypothesis, but not a proved matter of fact. In controversy with the Deist, we would ask him questions like the above and urge upon him the importance of examining thoroughly the evidences for the Divine source of the Gospel, in which "life and immortality are brought to light." For, if its source be Divine—if God has spoken through it to man—if Christ has risen from the dead—it is a rock and a stay against every billow that may dash and every storm that shall rise. If it be "a cunning invention," a false record, it must take its place with other human teachings and opinions, and, with all the aid that hope and philosophy give us, we deem, that a life beyond the grave will be to our vision wavering and uncertain.

We know, that the thoughts of man "are forever wandering abroad unsatisfied." That he has an ever-glowing desire within him for something purer and higher than he now possesses. That it is hard to think when the ties of kindred and friendship are strengthened, and linked in the very heart—when intellect has achieved its lofty triumphs and ascended high in the scale of being, and has woven its power into song, and breathed it in living language, and left it in sculptured beauty, marble columns and towering piles—when the noble and the good, and "the loved and the beautiful," have passed to the grave—oh! I know that it is hard to think that we shall never behold the lost of earth again—that "the eagle thought" shall never soar up, forever—that the storms which sweep around us, are but the heralds of a night when no existence is—this is hard, and we cling to the hopes which spring up amid these dark thoughts and tell us these things are not so. We look for analogies in nature to confirm these hopes. We behold the mean and grovelling worm of to day, transformed, on the morrow, to a thing of glory that flutters in the beauty of a new and bright-winged existence, and we say, "thus shall man die and live again!" We behold the seasons of the sere leaf and the falling fruit—the snow-wreathed hill and the ice-bound stream—and when they pass away, and when "the glad earth" rejoices again and the streams break their fetters, and the trees put forth their loveliness, and the flowers look up and smile to us, we exclaim, "thus shall man, who fades away like the Summer flower or the Autumn leaf, break from the bonds of death, and exult in new being in a clime where all is bright forever."

These are some of the things to which man has looked in order to satisfy his mind and make firm his hopes. We grant, taking in view with them the attributes of the Deity, that they make supposition strong.—But, are they what is called proof? Are they such palpable evidences as we give to the atheist, when we take him out and show him a flower, or bid him look at the mechanism of an eye. Can we say that the proofs of a future existence, by the aid of nature alone, are as clear to us, as are those which prove a self-existent Creator?

Now, the Deist objects to the authority of what we call Revelation, because, he says, it is supported by miracles, and these are contrary to the laws of nature. We respectfully ask him, if he is acquainted with all the laws of nature? Does he know that the Great Framers of these laws did not imbue them with a power by which a certain cause, at a certain time, should produce a certain effect? If he does not know this, how knows he that these miracles are contrary to the laws of nature? They may be contrary to all human knowledge of the essence of those laws—but where was he, where were we, "when the foundations of the earth were laid?"—Does he not believe that all God has made has its design and its appointed end? And can he tell all the ends for which these "laws of nature" were made? And can he say that when the Maker spoke through his apostles and prophets, and by his Son, can he tell that then effects were not springing from causes designed for such times from the period of, or before the world's birth—can he say that there were not laws of nature operating then, existing though unknown laws, laws made immutable by the fiat of the Lawgiver, which nature was consistently and humbly obeying? And Christianity he can not believe, because its miracles are interruptions of the laws of nature! We triumphantly ask, once more, does he know every law of nature? Is there no possibility of there being a law which he has not discovered, superior to those with which he is acquainted? Why, let an inhabitant of some darker and ruder sphere, come into this our world, in all its blaze of glory, and in, what is to us, the ordinary course of things, would he see no miracles? Let him behold "the subtle alchemies" which are at work in the deep laboratory of earth, and the things which spring therefrom—let him look at all the beautiful analogies from which the Deist deduces arguments for a future existence, and he will see miracles. Let him gaze upon the wonders of the heaving deep, miracles, miracles, to him, are there. Let him be one to whom the sky has been a far dim thing, and every star that rolls above him will be a miracle glittering to his vision! Then let him return to his own orb and tell this to its inhabitants, and would they believe him? If not, why? because to them it would be "contrary to the laws of nature."

But we must now be brief and this is somewhat of a digression. Our purpose was, to show the better ground for a belief in a future life afforded by Revelation, in comparison with that afforded merely by nature. If the Deist denies miracles, we will leave him with the Atheist, and with all his analogies, what will the Atheist tell him. He will say to him, that "man perishes as the beast." That he believes in "the laws of nature."—That with all his analogies from the butterfly and the Spring-time, for his part, he has never seen a human being rise from the grave, or a visitant come to him from the immortal state, but, that generation after generation dies and is seen no more. That hope by the aid of metaphysics and poetry, builds beautiful theories, and weaves bright imaginings. And, that education instils strange notions into the mind. And what will the denier of miracles do? What "law of nature" will he produce that can raise a human being from the dead? Has one ever arisen?—will one ever arise? Let him look for an answer to nature. The stars will burn down upon him and give none. Call upon the great sea, and its surges boom on over "the brave hearts" and the fair forms that lie pillowed in its coral tombs and give no answer. Come to earth and speak to it when it is in its most pleasant mood—when sunshine-smiles are upon it and flowers bedeck its breast—ay, flowers, many of them, too, growing thick and beautiful by the green grass-mounds that mark the places of the departed—call solemnly upon earth, and of the myriads which have gone down age after age, will earth give answer that they shall live again? When the icy hand of death has stopped the blood mid-current, and the heart beats not, where is your analogy from nature that the identity which was, when life glowed in that frame, shall know or perceive aught again?

Brother, who rejectest the evidences of the Gospel because of its recorded miracles, we think thou dost greatly err, "not knowing the Scriptures nor the power of God." We beseech you, examine thoroughly the Gospel evidences! If they are sufficient, thou hast proof of a future state that the Atheist can not overthrow. If they are false, we are beset by doubts and cunning objections. We have arguments for and arguments against a future life, and our hopes are wavering. The Christian believes these evidences to be sufficient, and he lays his hand upon the everlasting promises and is sure. He looks to Christ and beholds in him "the first fruits of them that slept."

"Prove all things," Brother, "and hold fast that which is good"—and if Christianity be a doctrine from God, it is good—it is a sure foundation—and death and darkness no more make the grave terrible, for, "life and immortality are brought to light in the Gospel." E. H. C.

OUR ASSISTANT.

It is grateful to hear ourselves, and those persons and things connected with ourselves, commended by those whose good opinion we value highly—though awkward to bring forward those commendations to the notice of others. Accordingly we have passed silently by some previous voluntary tributes to the articles of Br. Chapin, our Assistant in the Editorial cares for the next volume, and the remainder of the present. But the esteemed author of the following—an entire stranger, personally, to us all, and residing in a distant State—deems it but justice to E. H. C. to have it published, and in accordance with his wishes as well as our own opinions of its truth, we give it place.

A. B. G.

"Br. GROSH—I do most feelingly congratulate you upon your acquisition into the Editorial corps of one able to write as E. H. C. has written in No. 42, current volume. My heart yet burns within me, and my bosom thrills with holiest feelings awakened by the beauty and pathos of the article "FATHER FORGIVE THEM." It is soul-stirring, spirit-stirring, enlivening, purifying. The writer has drank deep into his Master's spirit. May he long be spared to echo worthily that Master's sentiments and sayings, and to infuse into his reader's a portion of that Master's spirit, without which we are none of his."

MR. CAMPBELL'S LETTER.

In copying Mr. Campbell's last letter a word was omitted, whether by the compositor, or in consequence of its not being in the proof sheet sent us. By the Harbinger for November, as well as by the copy in proof sheet sent to Br. Skinner, second page of No. 46, first column, and fourteenth line from the bottom of the page, after "present" read "life"—thus making the sentence read, "The answer, as stated by Matthew, Mark and Luke, is 'A hundred fold more in the present life, and in the world to come, eternal life.'" By referring to Br. Skinner's reply, it will be seen that he corrects the mistake of Mr. Campbell's quotation, and that, therefore, this notice of our omission is important to the sense of the reply.

THE PAINESVILLE (OHIO) REPUBLICAN,

Will please accept our thanks for this, its second publication of the prospectus of our paper. Such favors on the parts of our secular journals, in various parts of our country, entitle them not merely to an "exchange," but our grateful remembrance. We should be happy to receive similar favors from others than the Republican.

We notice a small typographical error, (important in the effect it may have,) in the paper before us. Our terms are mis-typed. Instead of "$2.50 per annum in advance," it should be $1.50—and instead of "$5.50 if not paid within the year," it should read $2.50. Will our friend of the Painesville Republican please notice and correct the error?

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

Messrs. EDITORS.—The following exquisite scrap of poetry I read many years ago, in an Edinburgh Magazine, (Blackwood's I think,) and have taken the liberty to transcribe it for the Magazine. I have written it out from memory, and there may be possibly some verbal errors, but I think few. No praise is necessary, the lines speak for themselves. It appears to me that the perusal (or perhaps repersal) of them will fill every reader with a thrill of delight. M. D.

WEEP NOT FOR HER!

Weep not for her! Her span was like the sky
Whose thousand stars shine beautiful and bright—
Like flowers that know not what it is to die,
Like long linked shadeless moments of polar light—
Like music floating o'er a waveless lake,
While echo answers from the lonely brake,
"Weep not for her!"

Weep not for her! She died in early youth,
Ere hope had lost its rich romantic hue;
When human bosoms seemed the home of truth
And earth still beamed with beauty's radiant dew—
Her Summer prime waned not to days that freeze,
Her wine of life was not run to the lees—
Weep not for her.

Weep not for her! By fleet or slow decay
It never grieved her bosom's core, to mark
The playmates of her childhood wane away,
Her prospects wither, and her hopes grow dark.
Translated by her God, with spirit shrunken,
She passed as 'twere on smiles, from earth to heaven—
Weep not for her.

Weep not for her! It was not her's to feel
The miseries that corrode amassing years,
'Gainst dreams of bailed bliss the heart to steel,
To wander sad down age's vale of tears,
As whirl the withered leaves from friendship's tree,
And on earth's wintry world alone to be—
Weep not for her.

Weep not for her! She is an angel now,
And treads the sapphire floors of Paradise,
All darkness wiped from her effulgent brow,
Sin, sorrow, suffering banished from her eye—
Victorious over Death, to her appear
The vista'd joys of heaven's eternal year!
Weep not for her.

Weep not for her! Her memory is the shrine
Of pleasant thoughts, soft as the scent of flowers,
Calm as on windless eve the eun's declan,
Sweet as the song of birds among the bowers—
Rich as the rainbow with its hues of light—
Pure as the moonshine of an Autumn night!
Weep not for her.

Weep not for her! There is no cause of we,
But rather nerve the spirit that it walk
Unshrinking through life's thorny path below,
And from earth's low delinquencies keep thee back.
So when a few fleet swerving years have flown,
She'll meet thee at heaven's gate and lead thee on.
Weep not for her.

THERE IS ANOTHER AND A BETTER WORLD.

The truth is, that mere abstract reasonings, although they look well on paper, and are amazingly powerful in quelling sorrow, before it arrives, fall utterly in giving ease and consolation to the distressed and mourning spirit. But when affliction assails the creature of God, when flames enwrap his worldly substance—when misfortunes of every kind press upon his heart, then let him reflect, that "there is another and a better world," and his consolation will be complete. Here is a substantial comfort. It offers him something in exchange for what he has lost. It tells him not to sit down and forget the blessings which he once enjoyed, but it bids him hope for much more: to look forward to treasures, of which the hand of time can not strip him; to joys which will be poured out upon him in no stinted measure; where the trees have not a canker worm at their root, and prosperity is not disturbed by envy. When the fond mother sits by the bedside of her suffering child, and watches the throes of agony that rend its little bosom, let her remember that these afflictions last but for a season—that, "although sorrow may last for a night, joy cometh in the morning." Short will be the struggles, short the pain and the suffering. Earthly decay is followed by spiritual life—

"On the cold cheek of death, smiles and roses are blending,
And beauty immortal awakes from the tomb."
For "there is another and a better world." When the young bridegroom follows his lovely bride to the grave, ere he has had scarcely time to press her to his heart, and call her his—when he hears the heavy clod thunder upon her narrow house—and when he afterwards wanders at twilight to her grassy grave to mourn his bereavement over the spot where all he loved on earth is laid, let him remember that but a few short years will intervene ere he rejoins her in a world where there is no separation; that her from whom he parted in sorrow, he will meet in joy, where groves of perennial bloom meet the eye, where all is peace, love, and enjoyment. Let all that sorrow, all who despair, remember that "there is another and a better world."—Ladies' Repository.

SPEECH OF ENDICOTT.

"Fellow soldiers—fellow exiles," "wherefore did ye leave your native country? Wherefore, I say, have we left the green and fertile fields, the cottages, or, perchance, the old gray halls, where we were born and bred, the church-yards where our fore-fathers lie buried? Wherefore have we come hither to set up our own tomb-stones in a wilderness? A howling wilderness it is! The wolf and the bear meet us within halloo of our dwellings. The savage lieth in wait for us in the dismal shadow of the woods. The stubborn roots of the trees break our ploughshares, when we would till the earth. Our children cry for bread, and we must dig in the sands of the sea-shore to satisfy them. Wherefore, I say again, have we sought this country of a rugged soil and a wintry sky? Was it not for the enjoyment of our civil rights? Was it not for liberty to worship God according to our conscience!"

"Look ye to it, brethren,"—"if this king and this arch-priest have their will, we shall briefly behold a cross on the spire of this tabernacle which we have builded, and a high altar within its walls, with wax tapers burning at noonday. We shall hear the sacred bell and the voices of the Romish priests saying the mass. But think ye, Christian men, that these abominations may be suffered without a sword drawn? without a shot fired? without blood spilt, yea, on the very stairs of the pulpit? No,—be ye strong of hand and stout of heart! Here we stand on our own soil, which we have bought with our goods, which we have won with our swords, which we have cleared with our axes, which we have tilled with the sweat of our brows, which we have sanctified with our prayers to the God that brought us hither! who shall enslave us here? What have we to do with this miscreant prelate,—with this crowned king? What have we to do with England?"—Taken for 1833.

WHAT IS RELIGION?

The religion which our Saviour came to establish, and that which is contained in the Scriptures, is simply this: a firm, confiding, and practical reliance on the goodness, mercy, and justice of God: and a practical adherence to the precepts contained in his word, with an unaffected love for him, and an ever-ready hand of compassion extended to the creatures he has made. This is pure religion; it bestows on us those endearing qualities which are not of human origin, neither are they so miraculously obtained that any need despair of an object which consists merely in doing the will of the great Author and Source of all perfection. If we possess this, we shall be buoyed up under every calamity, knowing that God is unchangeably good, and chastens only for the final benefit of his creatures; and if prosperity sheds her sunny influence over our happy hearts, we shall be doubly useful in the sphere in which we move; as religion brings into subordination the passions of our nature, and bids us look to the Author of our spirits, [who has taught us to address him by that endearing appellation of Father,] for divine aid in the performance of every duty devolving on us in life; and when the sable curtain of death begins to hide from our view all things earthly, and one friend after another takes the parting hand, and drops the tears of friendship around our couch, how dear to us then will be that confiding faith, which points to that world "where tears shall be wiped from off all faces," and we shall be in a peculiar manner the children of God, being the children of the resurrection.—Trumpet and Magazine.

DEATHS.

In Marathon, November 1st, Mrs. — COMSTOCK, consort of the Hon. Cephas Comstock, aged 49 years.—This truly worthy woman, died beloved and regretted by a large circle of friends and acquaintances, to whom she had strongly endeared herself by her amiable and benevolent disposition. Throughout a long illness (pulmonary consumption,) she exhibited great resignation and strength of mind. Her funeral was attended on the following Sunday, in the Presbyterian meeting-house, and a discourse delivered to a very large and attentive congregation, by Br. Bullard.

[The following with the accompanying hymenial notice, was unfortunately mislaid at the time of its reception. A. B. G.]

In Laurens, Otsego county, September 18th, Mr. JOSEPH DOLLIVER, aged 80 years. Mr. Dolliver was a soldier of the Revolution. His funeral was attended on the 20th, and a discourse delivered by L. HYATT.

At Rochester, on the 21st of September, Miss HELEN MARIA MUNGER, aged 13 years, and 26 days, daughter of Perly Munger, Esq., of Morrisville, Madison county.

The deceased left home on the 10th of August, full of health and promise of life, to visit a short time a sister in Rochester, and then return to the embrace of her doting parents, who regarded even a short separation as a painful intervention of their domestic happiness. But a few days only had passed, when the sad intelligence came to her parents that Helen was languishing on a bed of sickness, which drew the anxious mother immediately to her bedside. A few hours more, and again the news came that Helen was fearfully seized, and rapidly closing her career on earth. The father reached her dying chamber little more than time enough to receive her last expression of farewell, and witness the dying scene of a lovely daughter, which admits of no description.—The mother was there, smitten to the heart—the sisters were there—the father was there. Though Helen was, she was not. They were strangers, among strangers, and mourners, suffering a vicissitude which all sigh to pass in the bosom of their friends.

Helen was a favorite child and a dear sister in her family circle. Her disposition was amiable—her mind was active, and capable of high mental improvement.—Though young, her conscience was sensitive, for there were few occurrences which passed around her—perhaps none—the correctness or wrong of which she did not comprehend. Religion had so early impressed her thoughts, that all her compositions, which she was fond of writing, always concluded with some moral reflections.

It is to her parents a deep source of pleasure to be enabled to associate with her memory, her amiableness, her active mind, and the religious influence which had given it a happy tendency in childhood.

A VOICE TO YOUNG MEN.....CHAPTER XII.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

MARRIAGE.

Young men should allow matrimony, to be a frequent subject of serious reflection.* I repeat, serious reflection. Although young people are generally in the habit of viewing marriage as a light, pleasant, laughable matter, of no great moment, yet it is a subject which deeply involves their enjoyment, their peace and prosperity through life, and therefore it is one of weight and importance. Marriage is one of the vital institutions of civilized life. In whatever community it holds a high and sacred rank, it is the source of all the social virtues and enjoyments. But wherever its holy obligations are unknown or unheeded, man sinks to the level of the brute, in regard to every thing that is elevating and ennobling.

Marriage is a duty—made so by our Creator. In forming the man, he did not intend him to be a lone and solitary being. The sacred historian instructs us that "the Lord God said, it is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him a helpmeet for him." From the body of Adam, the woman was formed; and Deity uttered the authoritative requirement, "therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife, and they shall be one flesh." Here is a strict command to enter the marriage state.

Matrimony is made a duty by nature. The human race are equally divided into the two sexes, male and female. They are evidently intended for each other's society. The woman, from her delicate constitution, stands in need of the aid, the protection and support of the sterner and more vigorous sex. And it is equally necessary that the man should be civilized, polished, and curbed in the outbreathing of his impetuous passions, under the influence of the purer mind and sweeter affections of woman. There is no way in which these mutual benefits can be so properly and so beneficially bestowed, as through the institution of marriage. The ties thus formed, call into activity, all the kindest and holiest affections of our natures—they bring out the bright virtues and excellences of the human heart, and awaken to life, that love which sweetens the uneven journey of earthly existence.

Every young man should make it the settled resolution of his mind, to enter the matrimonial state. This should be one of the important ulterior objects, to which his earlier plans and exertions should tend. To take upon himself the marriage obligations, with proper views and in proper circumstances, should be the goal at which every honorable young man should endeavor early to arrive. And they should never consider themselves as perfectly settled in life, and prepared to take their proper station in society, until they obtain this "helpmeet," this better half.

"The wish to marry, if prudently indulged, will lead to honest and persevering exertions to obtain a reasonable income—one which will be satisfactory to the object of your hopes, as well as to her friends. He who is determined on living a single life, very naturally contracts his endeavors to his own narrow personal wants, or else squanders freely, in the belief that he can always procure enough to support himself. Indeed it can not have escaped even the careless observer, that in proportion as an individual relinquishes the idea of matrimony, just in the same proportion do his mind and feelings contract. On the contrary, that hope which aims at a beloved partner—a family—a fireside—will lead its possessor to activity in all his conduct. It will elicit his talents, and urge them to their full energy, and probably call in the aid of economy; a quality so indispensable to every condition of life. The single consideration, "What would she think, were she now to see me?" called up by the intrusion of a favorite image—how often has it stimulated a noble mind and heart to deeds which otherwise had never been performed!"* "The first blessing," says Bishop Taylor, "God gave to man, was society; and that society was a marriage; and that marriage was confederate by God himself, and hallowed by a blessing. Celibacy, like the fly in the heart of an apple, sits alone, and is confined, and dies in singularity. But marriage, like the useful bee, builds a house, and gathers sweetness from every flower, and unites into societies and republics, and sends out colonies, and feeds the world with delicacies, and keeps order, and exercises many virtues, and promotes the interest of mankind, and is that state of good things to which God hath designed the present constitution of the world."

Some young men deem it exceedingly wise to make up their minds not to marry at all. But this determination is as ungenerous and dishonorable, as it is unnatural and unreasonable. And those who form it, are treasuring up to themselves evils and sorrows. The disadvantages of a single life are not so sensibly experienced while youth and health continue. But when old age creeps on, and the bachelor becomes wearied with the amusements of youth, and is necessitated to seek out other sources of enjoyment, then he feels the desolation of his condition. Avoided in society, as one who is crusty, sour, cold-hearted and austere, with no domestic circle, no affectionate companion or loving offspring, to welcome, and cheer, and smile upon him in his hours of retirement—he feels that he is indeed alone—a forlorn, isolated, forsaken being; the object of the scorn of the young, and the derision of the old, and the general butt of ridicule and sarcasm. There is no individual in community, more generally disliked and unenvied, than the old bachelor! When sickness overtakes him, he experiences still more keenly, his lonely condition. With no guardian angel hovering around his couch, to present the soothing cordial, and to sympathize in his sufferings, he lingers upon the bed of disease—is administered to by the careless hand of strangers, in accordance to his ability to remunerate them—and finally dies unwept and unregretted, and his name sinks into oblivion! Such is the career of the bachelor! How cheerless and uninviting!

The difference in the condition of single ladies and gentlemen, is strikingly obvious. Many ladies remain single through life, more from the force of circumstances, than from choice. Young men should remember that the condition of ladies, in regard to matrimony, is peculiar. From the usages of society, ladies can not seek out and select companions; but they must remain to be sought. They can reject proposals, but they can not make them—they can decline alliance with individuals whom they dislike, but they can not propose it to those whom they would choose.—

* Young Man's Guide.

From these restraints, imposed by the rules of propriety, a lady is not to be supposed to remain single from aversion to that institution of marriage, which has been formed by the Creator. She is not, therefore, to be disrespected on this account. But the bachelor, from his superior advantages of selection, must remain single only through choice; and thus makes himself justly the object of animadversion and contempt!

A young man has no "right to sport with the affections of a young woman, in any way whatever. Vanity is generally the tempter in this case; a desire to be regarded as being admired by the women; a very despicable species of vanity, but frequently mischievous, notwithstanding. You do not, indeed, actually, in so many words, promise to marry; but the general tenor of your language and deportment, has that meaning; you know that your meaning is so understood; and if you have not such meaning—if you be fixed by some previous engagement with, or greater liking for, another—if you know you are here sowing the seeds of disappointment—and if you persevere in spite of the admonitions of conscience—you are guilty of deliberate deception, injustice and cruelty. You make to God an ungrateful return for those endowments which have enabled you to achieve this inglorious and unmanly triumph; and if, as is frequently the case, you glory in such triumph, you may have person, riches, talents to excite envy; but every just and humane man will abhor your heart."

The proper time for marriage, is a subject of some moment. You should not enter the matrimonial state, until you are competent to support a family in circumstances of comfort. There is a Spanish proverb which says, "a husband without ability, is like a house without a roof." The man who has not the ability to provide for a family, would entail wretchedness, upon himself, and those connected with him, were he to be married. But in this land of plenty, there are no young men possessing health and habits of industry and economy, who are incapable of maintaining a family, by the time they arrive at a suitable age for wedlock. Early marriages are preferable to late ones. By delaying until middle life, or old age, the habits and temper of the parties become fixed, and it is with great difficulty that they can adapt themselves to each other's dispositions, so as to pass pleasantly through life—though it is better to marry late in life, than not at all. As a general rule, young men should not marry before the age of four or five and twenty, nor delay it, except where circumstances imperiously demand, after thirty. "In Wurtemberg it is illegal for any young man to marry before the age of twenty-five, or any young woman before eighteen; and no man is allowed to marry at any age, unless he can shew to the priest, his ability to provide for a wife and family. Such laws are extremely rational and judicious."

The proper qualifications of a wife, is a topic in which young men are deeply interested. It has been remarked—probably by some crusty old bachelor—that choosing a wife, is like buying a ticket in a lottery. Were young men blind and deaf, or void of discrimination, this assertion might be true. But to those youth who see and hear, and who do not allow their imagination to run away with their judgment, the selection of a companion need not be a matter of great uncertainty. In choosing a wife, you should be solicitous to obtain one who is good and useful, rather than one who is only beautiful and accomplished. Say what we will, in regard to beauty of person, and exercise as much caution as may be, against its attractions, still it will exercise all the influence it deserves. I do not caution you against selecting a young woman who is handsome; but I warn you against choosing a wife whose only attraction is beauty of person. The morning cloud and the early dew are not more fleeting, than comeliness of form and features. He who marries a lady whose only desirable qualifications are a handsome face and person, will in a few years, perceive that the object of his choice has become faded and plain; and beauty, her only attraction, having fled, there is great danger that alienation of heart and a life of wretchedness will ensue. While personal beauty will exercise an influence upon young men, I would urge you to seek for other qualifications of a less fleeting class; and if you do not observe them in the female who attracts your attention, beware of an union with her. If a man marries a doll because it is a doll, he must attribute it to his own weakness, if he is doomed to discover that his companion possesses no other attractions but those of a doll!

* Guide.

You should also beware of any undue influence from useless accomplishments. A young lady may dance gracefully, sing delightfully, execute music skilfully, and have at her tongue's end the adventures of the heroes and heroines of all the popular novels of the day, and yet if she possesses a sour disposition, an irascible temper, a cold, ungenerous heart, and is ignorant of domestic duties, she would make a poor and profitless companion. Such ladies,

"May do very well for maidens or aunts,
But, believe me, they'll never make wives."

"There's many a good wife that can neither sing nor dance well." "I am an old fellow," says the poet Cowper, in one of his letters to Hurdis, "but I had once my dancing days as you have now; yet I never could find that I could learn half so much of a woman's character by dancing with her, as by conversing with her at home, when I could observe her behavior at the table, at the fireside, and in all the trying circumstances of domestic life. We are all good when we are pleased; but she is the good woman who wants not the fiddle to sweeten her." A ball-room, a party, or the church, are poor places to select a wife. The fairest appearances are there put forth; but you know not the faults and imperfections in mind, in disposition and habits, which they may cover.—The old proverb wisely says—"If thou desirest a wife, choose her on a Saturday, rather than on a Sunday." A few familiar visits when the object of your attention is engaged in domestic affairs and has no expectation of seeing you, will afford a clearer view of her qualities and habits, than years of intimacy under other circumstances.—You should endeavor to conceive, if possible, what will be the disposition, the habits, the character, of your intended companion, a few years hence, when she will have been tried in the severe school of experience and domestic cares. If you have reason to apprehend that her qualities will not be as valuable and attractive then, as now, you had better abandon, at once, all idea of connexion with her—for marriage with such an one, is far more likely to be fruitful of evil than of good.

Young men should not look for perfection in the female sex, either in beauty of person, or in disposition, or mind. This would not be generous or reasonable—perfection dwells not in mortal frames. But there are a few valuable and all-important characteristics, which every young man should be satisfied dwell in the female whom he selects for his companion.

1. She should be virtuous. Virtue is the basis upon which all other valuable female qualities must rest. Women who are virtuous, although lacking in many other desirable qualifications, may still be valuable and worthy. But when virtue is wanting, the foundation of worth is removed, and no other qualification can atone for its absence.

2. She should have an agreeable disposition and an even temper. "This is a very difficult thing to ascertain beforehand. Smiles are cheap; they are easily put on for the occasion. By a good temper, I do not mean an easy temper, a serenity which nothing disturbs; for that is a mark of laziness. Sullenness, if you be not too blind to perceive it, is a temper to be avoided by all means. A sullen man is bad enough; what, then, must be a sullen woman, and that woman a wife; a constant inmate, a companion day and night. But if you have your eyes, and look sharp, you will discover symptoms of this if it unhappily exist. She will at some time or other, show it to some one of the family; or, perhaps, towards yourself; and you may be quite sure that in this respect, marriage will not mend her."* Good disposition and even temper are important accompaniments to virtue. For although your intended wife may be virtuous and industrious, yet if she has a sour, morose disposition and an irascible temper, the probability is great, that you will live unhappily together. But if she has a kind, pleasant, benevolent disposition and a well governed temper, your prospect is fair, of enjoying a peaceable and agreeable home.

3. She should possess an enlightened mind—or, at least, a mind that eagerly seeks for useful information. It is well known that the mother sows the first seeds of knowledge in the minds of her offspring. How important that she should be qualified to discharge this office in a beneficial manner. Her mind should possess clear views, not only in relation to general knowledge, but especially upon the subject of religion and of moral duties. It is extremely unfortunate to marry a young woman who is destitute of correct religious impressions, and especially one who has no inclination to seek for light upon this important subject. Such an one, would be peculiarly exposed to the thralldom of bigotry and fanaticism, and your domestic peace would be liable to be embittered by the deleterious influences of religious error. See, then, that the object of your choice possesses a sound mind—one that is anxious to acquire a fund of valuable knowledge, and is capable of appreciating the worth of pure morality and of enlightened views of the Gospel of the Saviour.

4. She should be industrious. A wife destitute of industry, is little better than a drone or a block. Whatever may be your circumstances, an industrious companion will be far more valuable, than one who prefers to eat the bread of idleness.—They had a correct view of this subject anciently. In Proverbs, it is said of a virtuous or industrious woman—"She will do good and not evil, all the days of her life. She seeketh wool and flax, and worketh willingly with her hands." And from the neatness of his apparel, it is said, "her husband is known in the gates, when he sitteth among the elders of the land." Seek for a young woman, who, instead of devising ways and means to squander your property in useless dress and extravagant display, will endeavor, by industry, prudence and economy, to assist you in securing a suitable competency for life—one who will indeed, be "a helpmeet" for you. If a young lady spends the greater part of her time in languishing over a novel, or drumming upon the piano, or "spinning street-yarn" to indulge in idle gossip, beware of making her your companion—she is lacking in one of the most important characteristics of a good wife—viz. industry.

5. She should be well versed in domestic economy. "Without a knowledge and love of domestic concerns, the wife even of a peer, is of but little value. It was the fashion in former times, for ladies to understand a great deal about these things; and it would be very hard to make me believe that it did not tend to promote the interests and honor of their husbands." Young men should be very cautious on this point. They should never knowingly be joined in wedlock to a female who is ignorant of the domestic affairs of a family. Even though there may be no necessity of engaging in them constantly herself, still it is important for her, to know how they should be transacted, in order that her household may be conducted in a successful and economical manner. With an ignorant wife and ignorant servants, your domestic concerns will soon be in a lamentable condition, and you will suffer in comfort as well as in interest.

Many other valuable characteristics of a good wife, might be enumerated, but these must suffice. If you obtain a companion who is virtuous, of a gentle disposition and even temper, who possesses a well informed and tractable mind, is industrious and well versed in domestic economy—you will secure one of the richest of earthly blessings—she will be a jewel above value. Her features may be plain, her complexion may not be fair—but what are these but fleeting shadows that disappear with the few days of youth. "Beauty in woman is like the flowers in Spring; but virtue is like the stars of heaven." Personal beauty is liable to be destroyed by the first frost of sickness; but if your chosen one possess the qualities I have enumerated, she is adorned with a beauty, which, instead of fading and disappearing, will grow brighter and lovelier with advancing age, and sweeten all your domestic experience.

[This chapter concludes the series to Young Men. In accordance with my original plan, I shall proceed to address a few chapters to Young Ladies.]

LETTER,

TO REV. E. E. GUILD.

Lockport, November 24, 1837.

DEAR SIR—Yours of the 30th ult., published in the last Magazine and Advocate, containing charges against me made by the Rev. Mr. Clark, of Harpersfield, Delaware county, is before me.

As far as relates to myself, I declare the charges false, and have the fullest conviction that Mr. Clark knew he was bearing false witness against his neighbor, when he made them. The man (not the gentleman) alluded to above, I suppose to be the person who resided near Cooperstown during a part of the time of my residence in that village; and who was engaged some part of the time, in a factory, and then as an agent for establishing Sunday schools, and lastly, in preaching, during which time I was acquainted with him.—He made it his business to slander Universalists, sometimes by publicly telling his deluded votaries that some prominent Universalist had renounced his faith on a dying bed, and, when he conceived it would produce a greater effect, he publicly declared that I had renounced my faith in Universalism, a report which, I doubt not, I heard mentioned a hundred times after he commenced his career in Otsego county. No notice was taken of him there, for the doctrine and its salutary effects were too well known to be injured by his vaporings. He was the first man who introduced the revival measures there—having procured his strange fire from Finney's altar, and offered it like Nadab and Abihu of old.

The Presbyterians, both at Cooperstown and Fly Creek, remember to their sorrow, that there were protracted meetings at each place, as Mr. Clark says. A man by the name of Albert North, who lived at Fly-Creek, a deacon of the Presbyterian church, caught the strange fire, and with Mr. Clark, procured Littlejohn to hold a four days' meeting at that place, in the Universalist meeting-house; believing it would root out Universalism, provided I could somehow or other, be got out of the way. They commenced praying for my conversion, and at last, Mr. North prayed for my destruction! to wit, "that God would stop me from preaching at Fly Creek"—"that He would strike me dumb"—"and finally, if I persisted in my course, that He would take my life." This course was persisted in by Mr. North for weeks, and months, until he became impatient, and concluded to take the work into his own hands.

Accordingly, he came to my house in Cooperstown, in company with young Mr. Beedle, the clergyman of whom Mr. Clark made mention.—On arriving at my house, Mr. North said he had come to convince me of my error. They were kindly received, and after being seated, I presented Mr. N. with a Bible, at the same time retaining one myself, observing to him, that I was disposed at all times to appeal to that book, and that the man who convinced me of error laid me under the greatest possible obligations. He replied to me that he did not wish to have any thing to do with the Bible. I then remarked to him, that if he was not disposed to make that Book the standard, his visit might as well be terminated then as at any other time. But he commenced exhorting me to flee from the wrath to come, to which I replied, that his exhortations could not be received until the question was settled, and if I was found to be in an error, and his creed true, then he would be listened to, and not till then.—At length being urged to appeal to the law and the testimony, he read with great apparent reluctance, the 2 chapter of the 2 Epistle of Peter, with much emphasis. After a pause, I called for his application to my case—when he commenced and read the same chapter again, and afterwards, again, He was still pressed to make an application or some remarks, and the only reply was—"that means you." I then inquired of Mr. North whether he had prayed for my destruction, as stated above. I repeating his language. In reply he said he did not recollect whether he did or not, and then added—"God will soon arrest you, either in mercy or in judgments—he will either stop your preaching by converting you, or silence you in death." Here his countenance showed the full depth of John Calvin's vengeance. I then remarked to him, in a plain but mild manner, that he had exhibited clearly, a disposition to take my life; but the evidences of his cowardice induced me to feel perfect security against any harm I might otherwise be exposed to. I then repeated the question, whether he had ever prayed for my destruction, and received an answer, as before.—I insisted on his answering me, either affirmatively or negatively; he then remained silent. I then charged him with having offered such prayers, and pledged myself to prove the charge—to which he replied as before, that he did not recollect. He would often break out into an exhortation, and tell me I was going down to hell. He was repeatedly informed that such declarations were inadmissible, and at length when he so frequently sentenced me to hell, I distinctly informed him that he must not repeat such language again in my house—if he did, he must leave it—that I was a husband and a father, and would not suffer myself to be degraded in the estimation of my household. After much desultory conversation, in which I repeatedly desired him to redeem his pledge which he gave at the introduction, to convince me of my "error" from the Scriptures, and he as often declined, I propounded the following question—viz: "Admitting myself to be in error, as you allege, and God should commit my final destiny to your disposal, what disposition would you make? Would you make me an heir of salvation, or of damnation? He smiled, and said he would save me, by all means. I then replied, that, "admitting your doctrine true, the only misfortune is, that we have not a God of as much goodness as yourself: for in such a case, we should all find salvation, as your goodness is sufficient, but lacks the means." At this saying he appeared much agitated—stretched his arm over my head with his fist clenched, and said to me, "You are going down to hell, and taking thousands with you." I replied, "Sir, you must leave my house"—when he immediately left, without any further conversation.

So much for the story of turning a man out of my house, who "got alarmed about his soul's salvation." This is the whole affair on which the story is founded, and must have been known to Mr. Clark at the time, as he and Mr. North were hand and glove companions then, and for years afterwards, in their revival operations. I have not desired on my part, to keep it a secret, and in publishing the above I do it with a knowledge that there were also present, besides my own family, Mrs. Avery, Mr. Elias Beadle, (now Rev. E. Beadle, of Albion, Orleans county,) and Mr. and Mrs. Comstock, then of Cooperstown.

As to my renouncing Universalism, my public labors must speak for themselves, as I have continued to preach the doctrine for nearly seventeen years, without any doubts of its truth; and hope I may never dishonor God and religion so much as to be left to believe the doctrine of endless misery.

I have given the above statement as briefly as possible, and am happy in being able to prove the same, if necessary.

The propriety or impropriety of the course pursued in relation to Mr. North, I submit to the decision of the candid public, without any misgivings on my part. As to the effect produced on him, as far as the circumstances are known, there has been but one opinion on the subject—previous to the event above alluded to, he was obtrusive, overbearing and abusive, in what he was pleased to term "working for God;" seeking every opportunity in the absence of the male members of families, to exhort those who differed from him in religious faith, to flee from hell—pursuing it from morning till noon, and from noon till night—and when informed that his company was not wanted, he would persist in his course, until he became a pest in his neighborhood. But ever after his visit to Cooperstown, he ceased to be a busy body in other persons' matters, and attended to his own business.

In the case of Mr. Clark—on a survey of the whole ground—his intimacy with Mr. North and Mr. Beadle—their conjoined efforts against Universalism—I think he could have had no excuse for relating such a perverted statement of the wonderful protracted meeting—and of the person under "great alarm about his soul's salvation" being "turned out of doors." Can any extenuation be offered, whereon a rational belief can be founded, that he was not, at the time he made the statement, uttering a wilful and deliberate falsehood? I can find none. And for what purpose did he relate it? To save souls from the wrath of God, and endless misery, and convert them to the "Gospel of truth?" There is not a lover of the Gospel of the meek Son of Mary, but must sicken at the thought! Can such a man believe that there is a "God that judgeth in the earth," and that "all liars shall have their portion in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone?" Will such men and such means ever convert the world—put to silence infidelity, and produce a return of the purity, peace and primitive simplicity of the Gospel? Will not infidelity gather strength from every such occurrence, and the cause of pure religion be depressed? Let it be borne in mind, however, that where slander and persecution commence, the influence of religion ceases. The skeptic might as well blame the sun for all the storms and tempests that have swept over the earth, as to blame religion for all the persecutions that have been in the world. The sun always shines in all his glory and beauty, unaffected by storms or convulsions on the globe. So Christianity is always bright and fair, reigning in its own unsullied glory, far above the passions and weaknesses of men.

In conclusion, may my plainness of speech not be construed into a want of charity, as I have been governed by no motives but those of truth and justice, ever praying that all who have been out of the way in the above occurrences, may be brought to repentance, to the acknowledgment of the truth.

Yours in the Gospel of Christ, JOB POTTER.

RELIGION AND A SICK BED.

That we are mortal, is a position so evident as to need no proof. Let him who is disposed to doubt it, turn aside, for awhile, from the busy bustle of life, and visit the chamber of a dying fellow-mortal. Let him look upon a being of flesh and blood like ourselves, gasping and struggling under the strong arm of "the king of terrors;" the lamp of life growing dimmer and dimmer—just flickering with a transient gleam, and then extinguished. This is the grand consummation of all terrestrial things. Here we behold the end of all earthly wisdom, and earthly greatness. To this point all are tending—this fate all are expecting.

This being the case, we naturally look forward to that time, as the most important event of our earthly existence. And we are often inquiring what shall comfort and support us in that hour, when all the gayeties and vanities of the world, have lost their power to charm. But one answer is ever given to these inquiries—religion—religion—nought but the religion of the Bible can sustain the soul, when sinking under the strong grasp of the angel of death.

But mankind, in the wisdom of their own imaginations, "have sought out many inventions"—have built many and conflicting sentiments, and dignified all with the sacred name of religion.—And although these systems of faith are as innumerable almost as the stars of heaven, or the sands on the sea shore, and each opposed and differing from the other, yet there is one system in particular against which all the mighty energies of the others are united. I hardly need add, the doctrine of Universalism is the one against which all this mighty array is formed. Wherever we go, we hear it ridiculed and misrepresented, and its believers and advocates calumniated. But the great and overwhelming argument which is used on all and every occasion, is this—that although "Universalism will do very well to live by, it will not do to die by." Although this is an old saying, it does not follow as a matter of course, that is a true one. We have abundant testimony, both of the living and also of those who have gone to their last, long home, to prove that Universalism is not only good to live by, but is also good to die by.—Most of us have seen friends and neighbors leave this world in the full triumphs of faith; buoyed up to the last by the glorious hope of the "restitution of all things," and an unwavering confidence in the efficacy of the atonement made by our great High Priest, and the immutable and unchangeable promises of our God.

I myself can testify, that Universalism is not only good to live by when in health and prosperity, but that it is good to support us when sinking under the hand of misfortune—that it smooths the pillow of sickness and distress, and makes the suffering "bed feel soft as downy pillows are." I well remember the time, when a "stranger in a strange land"—far from the friends and the home of my youth—stretched upon a bed of sickness, which I then expected would be my bed of death, with the prospect of the unknown and invisible world full before me. Then it was, that I found Universalism to be a good sick bed companion. All was peace and joy unspeakable and full of glory. "I knew in whom I had believed, and that he was able to keep that which I had committed to him," until I should arrive at the coast of the heavenly Canaan. Universalism is a good sick bed companion.

The pages of Scripture, says Hervey, like the productions of nature, will not only endure the test, but improve upon the trial. The application of the microscope to the one, and a repeated meditation on the other, are sure to display new beauties, and present us with higher attractives.

AMERICAN CHARACTER.

An Oration delivered at the Exhibition of the Clinton Liberal Institute—August, 30th, 1837.

BY J. T. GOODRICH.

Much has been written upon American character. Many foreign tourists have ranked it far below that of the principal nations of the eastern hemisphere. They have overlooked the many in their own country, whose conditions are scarcely preferable to degraded slaves, and pointed to their associates, the few favored by fortune and refined by literature, as the standard of their national character. Taking only a cursory view of us, they often underrate our condition. Cramped into a stage-coach, stowed away upon a steam-boat, or in a rail road car, which moves with the rapidity of the winged wind, their opportunities for observation are extremely limited. Here, all classes are mingled, and the plain every-day laborer contests the attention with the well bred gentleman. In years now gone, when the intoxicating glass was passed around, many have indulged in this low gratification of the appetite, and appeared truly despicable. Moving at home among the most cultivated, who stood much on the rules of etiquette, tourists were unaccustomed to witness such scenes of equality. At any time, or on any occasion, it is utterly impossible for different classes to mingle as equals in their own countries.—Could the very scum of the eastern world enjoy the same privileges that ours enjoy, these genteel travellers would bow their heads and blush at their horrid enormities and disgusting excesses. To judge the character of a nation by one class only, or under such circumstances, is the height of injustice. Foreigners, often mistaking the extravagant dress and supercilious manners, language and behavior of elowins, for gentility, have considered our character truly trifling. On the contrary, the inquisitiveness of the Yankee makes him little liable to such mistakes as these, which reflect so little honor upon the perception of any traveller.

From our diversified habits and manners, others have concluded that we possess no national character. The period has been when this remark was true. Settled by different nations, for a time there was, necessarily, great diversity of manners. But a mutual interchange of feeling soon assimilated man to man. All approximated a common standard. Still character is materially affected by soil, climate and occupation. It can not reasonably be expected, that the traits of every part of a nation, which possesses as great a diversity of these as all Europe, and a much larger territory, should be very uniform. Under such circumstances a difference always has existed, and will exist. But the impartial and critical observer will discover many peculiarities operating over the whole amplitude of American society. He will perceive much national vanity—debasement from avarice—an undue love of office—and unchecked party spirit, tending towards anarchy and not domination. But on the contrary he will also observe a preference of sense to sound, utility to ornament, dignity to foppery, and goodness to mere accomplishments. He will behold much honor, wisdom, and so universal a love and respect for virtue, that no efforts are spared to inculcate its high and holy principles, or to court even its shadow when its substance is wanting.—He will see literary effort encouraged, the arts fostered, genius rewarded, oppression firmly resisted, our rights invariably defended, our laws faithfully executed, virtue amply recompensed, vice adequately punished, infidelity generally despised, man held accountable to God only for his opinions, the great and everlasting truths of religion considered the fountain, and the practical Christian the consummation of human virtue. He will witness an all-pervading spirit of mechanical, agricultural, and manufacturing invention constantly turning and overturning theories and improving the implements of past generations. Though we have not the politeness of high blood aristocracy, we are proud of the welcome greetings of Yankee hospitality. The fact that no writer who has long resided with us has given us an unfavorable description, conclusively proves that our good qualities overbalance our evil.—Those who have ridiculed our morals and been horrified at our depravity, have formed opinions from the slightest views.

Useful knowledge is very generally diffused, still a wide field is open for improvement. We never should cease our efforts to elevate the standard of education, till all in every condition of life feel its influence and appreciate its blessings.

In our country property or ancestry affords but little ground for literary or political preferment.—Franklin was once a poor apprentice boy, and the present chief magistrate of this vast republic, arose from the darkness of poverty and the gloom of obscurity. Hereditary distinctions permit those to sway the rod of empires that are better qualified to wield the spade, but republican equality raises many precious minds from the depths of solitude to the pinnacle of unfading fame. Here, sooner or later, the brilliancy of a superior intellect will be perceived. For a season it may be obscured, but like yon sparkling luminary it shines, and is destined to shine when every cloud shall be dissipated. Devoting all its mighty powers to one great object it can scarcely fail of its accomplishment. Like the flowing stream, its progress may be arrested for a time, but its energies accumulate till it bursts its fetters and swiftly bears all obstacles down its resistless current. How consoling the thought the poor parent may possess—the father as he jogs his little boy upon his knee, or the mother as her little daughter plays so prettily upon her lap, may perceive a genius as powerful as the fabled Hercules as quenchless as the supernal fires. There is not on earth another land where distinctions exert so little influence.—Here, “Honor and shame from no condition rise,

Act well your part, in that the honor lies.”

Here property tends to an equalization. Like water it continually seeks an equilibrium. The wind may raise the waves of the ocean, but they gradually diminish as they approach the shore.—The undulations produced by the fall of a stone are more and more gentle, till they are lost in the surrounding deep. So industry may accumulate a huge mass of silver, but its owner dies to-day and it is divided to-morrow. Hence there is a constant tendency for the poor to grow rich, and the rich, poor. This exerts a favorable and powerful influence upon our character and the stability of our institutions. It frees us from excessive wealth and extreme poverty, and places us in a medium state, which is most favorable to practical morality and virtue. It gives the mass of our citizens a home. The proper management of public affairs affecting their pecuniary prosperity, they feel deeply interested in them. How much preferable is our condition to those nations where property and power are possessed by but few—and how much happier is the master who can cultivate a small plot of his own, than the servant who manages large areas for another? How much harder will he toil, and how much more care will he exercise, when he expects to realize the benefits of his labors? Morally or physically if man can perceive that he will certainly reap according to his work, a powerful influence is exerted. Could all the bearings of this principle be understood, the manacles of every slave would be broken, and every being under the wide canopy of heaven would be free.

Though the mass of our citizens is generous, yet the love of wealth is not wanting. Indeed they pursue it with untiring zeal. It has planted the eastern emigrant near the borders of the Pacific. And it is well that it has been so! for riches in Missouri are preferable to poverty in New-England. It is the great ocean which swallows up nine-tenths of all the streams in our country. It makes business the all-absorbing topic. About this, and this only, many men will talk, of this will they hear, and with it will they be entertained.—Whether eating or drinking, sleeping or waking, marrying or dying, their greatest concern is business. The idler is driven from the shops, or jostled from the walks, and he beholds a sour aspect on every face. One writer calls all America ONE “GIGANTIC WORKSHOP,” over the entrance of which is the blazing inscription “NO ADMISSION EXCEPT ON BUSINESS.” If pursued as a means and not as an end, it is laudable; and the society is good, and the nation prospers that discountenances idleness.

We are an energetic people. We not only act but we act in a hurry. Our smooth-moving boats must scud away with the rapidity with which Phaeton rolled through the etherial vault of heaven; and our rolling cars must move as swiftly as the fabled Pegasus. Those sciences once the labor of years, must now be learned in as many months, and the lawyer's and minister's few brief remarks, that formerly occupied half a day, must now be told in half an hour.

We are a thinking and reflecting people. Witness the intense interest manifested, when an important election is pending. All classes desire every change to improve, but often fear it will injure their condition. They are ever watching, acting, reforming, or maintaining as they think their good requires.

We are enthusiastic and easily excited. In that cold and phlegmatic temperament of our ancestors, whose fancy could never be raised, by all the charms of eloquence, we do not participate.—Our zeal removes indifference and sometimes disregards politeness. However disagreeable, it is preferable to cold formality. The warmth and freedom of opinion require the action of intellect and develop native genius. Excitement pervades all classes and conditions. The owner of the palace and the cottage, the president and the path-master all hope for, dread or feel its power. It forms mobs, parties, societies and combinations, leads public opinion, heats the brains like a furnace, demolishes all reverence for antiquity, and analyzes fearlessly the precedents of authority.

We are enterprising and industrious. To-day our merchants are wrecked upon the shoals of insolvency, to-morrow their scattered fragments are gathered in Illinois. If the minutest insects, by carrying one small particle of earth at once, can rear the islands of the wide Pacific from depths unknown, if the perpetual dripping of a fluid will wear the surface of a rock, they calculate that industry may yet enable them to repose their weary limbs upon the downy bed of ease. Our youths leave their long-cherished homes, and cities spring up before them almost by magic, and the towering forests give place to beautiful and cultivated fields. They annihilate space, navigate nearly every stream, ascend the rugged brows of the Alleghany, and the craggy peaks of the Rocky Mountains, and sail unmolested amid polar ice-beds and burning tropical waves. No project is too hazardous to be attempted, and few obstacles too great to be removed. Yankee enterprise has already navigated the aerial vault of heaven, and we playfully anticipate a time when they will attempt to plant a colony on the moon's dark side, and send their flying ships and winged cars along the milky way! The period will surely come when every part of this vast continent will teem with life and intelligence. That ever restless spirit of enterprise will roll on, and on, and on, till every isle in the wide world is explored and peopled, and every star in the infinitude of space accurately measured. No other nation is capable of enjoying so great blessings. Enterprise produces universal action. Fertile Egypt reads desolation, and Rome destruction upon the brow of inactivity.

We are patriotic. The many changes occasioned by unparalleled prosperity have indeed diminished the fond affection for the parental fire-side and the scenes of childhood; still there are ten thousand ligaments that bind us to our lovely institutions. Let the proud usurper dare to raise an opposing hand against them, and our noble and illustrious defence would "shed unfading lustre upon the pages of history." If the din of war should sound—if a foe should invade our happy land, patriotism would be forcibly felt. We never would relax our energies, till our haughty enemy lay prostrate at our feet—our Eagle soared in triumph over every foe, and the loud clarion of victory, wafted by every breeze, echoed and re-echoed to the remotest part of the universe. Whether amid Alpine rocks, polar snows, or burning sands, we love all that cherish the same liberal principles. This has extended and will extend republicanism until Time's unerring finger shall indelibly inscribe universal decay upon every throne, the last strugling groan of tyranny die upon the ear, and the whole world bloom in immortal vigor and undecaying splendor.

In conclusion; our character is favorable to the permanent prosperity of liberty. The highest intellectual improvement, and moral culture in its widest sense—having Christianity for its acting and renovating principle, will place us on the loftiest summit. It "will rear the fabric of FREE GOVERNMENT to the skies." "God has promised us a renowned existence" if our character merits it. "He speaks this promise in the sublimity of nature. It resounds all along the crags of the Alleghanies. It is uttered in thunder at Niagara. It is heard in the roar of two oceans, from the great Pacific to the rocky ramparts of the bay of Funda. His finger has written it in the broad expanse of our inland seas, and traced it out by the mighty Father of Waters." This vast country, was made for the noblest purposes. O, that her voice may be harmony—her bosom, purity—her ruler, liberty—her duration, time—and her end, eternity!

TO MOTHERS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

In 1832 there died one of the most eminent scientific men of France. When a young man, he was unable to prosecute his education without the assistance and patronage of friends; at his death, we find him loaded with all the honors which universities and scientific bodies could communicate, and elevated equally by Napoleon and the Bourbons, to the highest political station to which the subjects of France may aspire. All these "blushing honors" which BARON CUVIER bore thick upon him, did he mainly ascribe to the judicious care of his mother. Even in his latest years, amid the busy and absorbing occupations of his very active life, we find the memory of his mother vivid, affectionate, and undimmed. Every even the most minute circumstance connected with her memory, he cherished; her many little kindnesses, he loved to recall; and the most trifling occurrence which reminded him of her, was interesting and important to him. The flowers which were her favorites, through life had a charm—a hallowed charm, for him, and from this single instance, a mother's heart can easily picture other consecrated memorials of one that idolized his mother.

What did the mother of Baron Cuvier do, to deserve such hallowed remembrance? Not only tenderly, which every mother might do, but wisely, did she nurse and rear her boy with a constitution and health but feeble. Her superior knowledge of what is injurious to human health, and what is beneficial and promotes it, was, however, but a small item in her claims upon a son's esteem and affection. She devoted herself equally to the cultivation of his mind; and to her wisely-directed, and well-sustained efforts in this respect, did her affectionate son love to attribute all his future career of activity, usefulness, happiness, and renown. Early did she instil sacred and religious impressions; the earthly parent directed her son's earliest thoughts to the wonderful works of his Father above. At the early age of four, she had taught her boy to read, fluently, we are told.

At a neighboring school she had him instructed in the rudiments of the Latin language, and although she was entirely ignorant of Latin, yet she made him repeat his lessons to her, and the effect of this was, that he was always better prepared with his tasks than any other boy in school. Drawing and several other branches of education, she taught him under her own inspection; and by the help of some well-informed friends, she had him supplied with the best works in history, general literature, etc., by which she nurtured a taste for reading, and that ardent desire for knowledge, which became the principal spring of his future strenuous and splendid intellectual exertions.

We could tell other tales of excellent mothers and grateful sons. This, however, is enough, if a few of those mothers into whose hands this may fall, will be stimulated to make such efforts as may qualify them to be judicious, and right-minded instructors of their own families. Mothers, you can do more for the future welfare of your children than all other agents whatever. Mothers, if you perform your humble and unostentatious duties well, you will embalm yourselves in the hearts of your children as no other being can do.

Will one of my readers, think, plan, strive to be a GOOD MOTHER? Will two? Will more?

THE RELIGION OF CHRIST.

BY REV. M. SANFORD.

What was the religion of Christ? Look over the history of his life: his character solves the inquiry. If any being in the form of humanity ever delighted in moral purity and diffusive benevolence, he is the one. Unspotted in his character, it shone in the purer splendor of supreme excellence. Pure in spirit, he keenly felt pity for the sons and daughters of want. Undeified before God, he spent his life in the service of man. Destitute of the riches of this world, "he went about doing good." He turned not aside from any whose condition he could bless. While the Priest and the Levite passed by the objects of compassion, and made their way to the Synagogue to attend the services of the Pharisee's religion, he stopped to bind up the wounds of the sufferers, and restore them to health and virtue. While the sanctimonious religionists of his day sought religion in means to save souls from a future hell, he found it in relieving both the physical and mortal wants of the children of men. While they would avert the wrath of God he would avert the sorrows of man. While they went up into the temple to pray, he went into the house of wo to relieve. While they wore sad countenances to deceive men and women and obtain their substance, he went with his countenance beaming with the smiles of love, that he might cheer their hearts with that affection and love which was reflected so resplendantly from his own breast. And while they were careful to shun the society of publicans and sinners, and mingled with none save those who wore their own phylacteries, he consulted no man's creed or test of merit, but if he found a man in need, whether Pharisee or Publican, his soul sought means to relieve him. He was a friend to the friendless, and a comfort to the afflicted. He healed the broken heart of the widow of Nain; sympathized with the weeping sisters of Lazarus at his grave, and shed tears of compassion over the fate of "the great city." He seems to have felt the tie that bound him to every child of God. He treated every man as a brother, and his devotion to the welfare of man significantly declared that his own glory was bound up in the welfare of the human race.

Reader, such was the religion of Christ in action. "Go thou and do likewise."

BEAUTIFUL METAPHOR—In our adoration, all perfect qualities of mind, and might, and sovereignty, revolve around the name of Father, receiving from it that light and glory, without which they were dark orbs of desolation.—Rev. W. J. Fox.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, D. SKINNER, AND S. R. SMITH, EDITORS.

UTICA, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1837.

APPOINTMENTS.

I occasionally receive letters from ministering brethren, containing requests something like the following—

"Br. Grosh—I should like an appointment somewhere in your vicinity on the — Sunday in — next. Can you make one for me? If you can, please make it; for my travelling expences will be considerable, and I shall need an appointment to enable me to reach my destination."

Now, be it understood, I make such appointments with the greatest pleasure, when I deem them beneficial to my brethren. As proof of it, I have even given up my own appointment, and preached elsewhere at a risk of receiving nothing for my services, to accommodate travelling brethren, who I knew needed the little compensation I was certain they would get in my stead. But when such a request comes, I sit down—count over, one by one, the twenty dead, sleeping, or idle societies around Utica. Some give a preacher five dollars, almost certain, but that will hardly pay the expences of going there and back again—others can not always get the meeting-house, and I do not know on what day they can have it—others depend on collections, and sometimes raise something worth while, and at other times barely enough to render the word "compensation" a misnomer—others neither collect, nor provide payment in any other way—and thus my mind travels from one to the other, without being able to come to any conclusion. If I make an appointment for my brother, it will delay him two or three days on his journey—it will cost him, probably, from two to four dollars to go to and from the place, and he will receive for this delay, this expense, and his labors, from 0 up to six or seven dollars! So, as every one may see, I run the risk of taking money out his pocket—if there is any there—instead of aiding him to replenish his exhausted funds.

These are facts—stubborn, grievous, shameful facts! I have held them back too long—it is time, for the sake of travelling brethren, and of the societies themselves, that they were made known, even if they cause a blush to the latter, and a sigh to the former. I will make any appointments, when requested; but let our ministering brethren remember these circumstances, and make their own conditions.

And now—one word to the societies destitute of preaching around Utica. I am asked why I do not visit you, or send you preachers occasionally. To many of you, I answer, I can not afford it, when I even have the time to do it—and as for sending you preachers—unless where I have reason to believe you will give the laborer the hire of which he is worthy—really, neither my benevolence nor my conscience will permit me to do it. Make arrangements to compensate your laborers in the Gospel field—let me know the amounts you can give, and the times when you want preaching, and if in my power, you shall be supplied. Let none but those societies who are really of the character here described, think I mean them.

CHENANGO ASSOCIATION.

I commented on a resolution passed by this Association at its late session, in regard to Oliver West, calling on the Standing Clerk for information, etc. Br. Doolittle answered my call in due time. He says, "The resolution in relation to said West, as it stands on my record, closes thus:—'therefore, Resolved, That fellowship be withdrawn from him.' I think Br. Guild must have made the mistake in copying the minutes for publication."

RELIEF SOCIETY.

The Chenango Association, says Br. Doolittle, "after some discussion, came to the conclusion that it would be best to give the preachers such a support as would supercede the necessity of forming a society for the relief of their widows and orphans. So mote it be! Amen, my Br., with all my heart! Let every Association not only conclude that it is best so to do, but do it, and I will advocate the dissolution of all such societies already formed, and the expenditure of their trifling funds immediately, in any praiseworthy object in which the contributors thereof may agree. But until this is done, I shall advocate the formation of Relief Societies in our denomination—not that I expect (God grant that I or mine may never need it!) to be benefited by them, but because I sincerely believe that the general good of preachers and laymen will be promoted thereby.

THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT.

We believe it to be often the case, that men in the search for truth, becoming bewildered and perplexed by the various antagonist doctrines of Christian sects, calmly acquiesce in the tenets taught them from childhood and without further examination live and die in the religion of their forefathers, or wander in the mazes of skepticism, or plunge into open infidelity. We think one reason for this to be the neglecting of the teachings of Jesus, and the implicit confidence placed in the opinions and theories of men. They have not gone to the Fountain Head, but have quaffed from streams more or less diverging from the great source, and, as they have diverged, mingling with things far less pure and holy, in their nature.

Learned and great men have been looked upon too implicitly as teachers, and regarded too much, as if they were infallible. In thus doing, various and hostile doctrines have been encountered and these being the teachings of master-minds, the question has been naturally asked, "which of them shall we believe?" And the very fact that adverse theories in the Christian world exist, should have been enough to have convinced the inquirer that he was not searching in the right place for the doctrines and precepts of the Gospel. Surely a virtuous name and a powerful intellect should have all the influence with us of which they are worthy, and a learned and deep-sought exposition should be valued in proportion to the light which it sheds upon the truth. But they should not be allowed to carry us away from the Bible, and the light which develops a truth should not be taken for the truth itself, for the value of that truth is intrinsic and possibly contains much that is yet to be brought to light.

Is not this reverence for great and learned authority, a portion of that feeling with which the decisions of councils and the doctrines of creeds were formerly regarded, nay, with which they are regarded now? To be sure, the stake and the rack do not now await us, as of old, if we dissent from these decrees and doctrines, but does not the influence of the opinion of a great man weigh far too much with us? Is there not too much of a veneration for the Fathers? Is not an appeal to the doctrines of this or that illustrious teacher, during the past ages of the church, considered too much as the last and best resort in determining the truth of a question? Is not what Calvin taught, or what Luther taught, or what the Reformers said and did, made of too much importance in the formation of our opinions?

If this be the case, is it not a reason why so many are beclouded and led astray in seeking the way of eternal life? Have they not come to the study of Christianity through the medium of those who were themselves but learners, instead of going directly to Jesus? and when they have found contradictions, and dim and mysterious doctrines, have they not said, "why should we search, what we have been taught, shall be our opinions?" or have they not exclaimed, "Christianity is a paradox, an absurdity, we do not believe it?"

Now let them put aside the opinions of men, and read the precepts of our Master as they fell from his lips.—This is the way to become acquainted with Christianity—here is the foundation whereon to build our religious opinions. The fathers, the teachers, and the reformers, were but men—frail, fallible men—and so were, and are, all the learned doctors of modern times. We have access to the same great truths which have laid open to them, and if we come as little children with humble hearts, we shall be taught of their Master and Teacher doctrines, that time can not alter nor opposition overthrow.

One of these sublime lessons is "the sermon on the Mount." It is another of the internal evidences for the truth and divine authority of the Gospel. Here is that which will make one far better, and wiser in heavenly things, than all the polemics, and the learned discussions which have agitated the church for many dark ages—or which have grown out of the light and advantages of more modern times.

After hearing and reading the opinions of men, to open the Bible and read this discourse of our Saviour, appears like leaving the crowded city where we are pained and distracted with the glare, and the hum, and the bustle of humanity, and the various and glittering specimens of art around us—it is like leaving these, we say, and going out amid the fair fields and gazing up into the clear calm sky, and feeling the pure breezes of heaven upon our brow, and finding in "the lilies of the field and the fowls of the air," simple, but more direct incentives to worship and love our heavenly Father, than we have found in all the variety and tumult which we have left behind us. It is a lesson taught us amid the simple beauties of nature. A better lesson than ever came from the priestly council or the student's cell—a better lesson than man alone could ever teach us—is the beautiful one which our Saviour preached to the people, when they came to him upon that mountain in Judea, and he opened his mouth and taught them. As the gentle dew upon the flowers, as the Summer's breeze to the burning brow—as the desert fountain to the parched lip—is this lesson of Jesus to the lone wanderer—the perplexed doubter—the weary one of earth—ay, to any one who would hear things of the kingdom of heaven!

We have said, or would say, that we would not that one should discard any help to the understanding of the truth which they may obtain from the learned and the pious of the past or the present time. But let all opinions be referred to one test, and let that test be the precepts of the Gospel. And let these precepts not only be poured into our ears, but let them be breathed into our hearts, giving life, health and energy to all our thoughts, motives and actions. Let them be not only listened to but practiced upon daily, hourly, momentarily! for Christ says, those that hear his sayings and do them, are the wise men, the builders upon the rock!

PHRENOLOGY.

One objection which is made to Phrenology, is, that it would render blameless the man who committed theft or murder, having the organs of Acquisitiveness and Destructiveness largely developed and wanting sufficient intellectual and moral power to counterbalance the impulse of these propensities. To this we answer, that we think it will not be denied, by the friend or the opponent of Phrenology, that in all accountable men there is placed a tribunal which intuitively decides whether an action, word, or motive be right or wrong. There is we believe, in every land, no matter how dark, in every human-being, no matter how rude, a standard of principle to depart from which is wrong doing, and the tribunal which is the tribunal of conscience, condemns the offender. If he lays unlawful hands on the property of another, he does it in spite of the inward whispers of this monitor—if his knife reeks with his brother's blood he does it amid thunders from the depths of his soul! What excuse would it be for such an one to say at the bar of justice, that he had a strong desire impelling him to commit the wicked act? Could he not be justly asked, if he knew not that the deed was wrong before he performed it? If he did know that it was wrong what told him so? If he did not know that it was wrong is he an accountable being? For, if he knows not that theft and murder are wrong, does he know right from wrong—is he a sane man?

Now, that men differ in regard to the force of evil propensities within them we think all will agree to be a truth. Some, we believe, have a strong inward desire to take from others their property—some, have a blood-thirsty, savage disposition. Does Phrenology create these dispositions? We need not ask such a question. It merely declares that where these propensities exist, there is a development, more or less, upon the surface of the cranium. Like any other rule or system of morals, it would acquit that man who knew not when he committed a wrong action—for he would not be a sane man. Like any other rule or system of morals, it would not accept as an excuse the plea that strong propensities urged to the act, for the moral and intellectual faculties told him it was wrong and he did the foul deed in the light of that knowledge.

Let us be understood, A man may perform a guilty act, when he is ignorant that he is doing it, in a fit of intoxication.

Is he then innocent? No, it was not because of any natural deficiency in moral and intellectual power, that he committed wrong—but it was when he himself had perverted those powers and was guilty, as it were, of moral suicide, that he stole or murdered.

Show me a man with no conscience, or one who has not himself stifled conscience—show me one that has no moral perceptions—and I will show you one who, I believe, is not accountable. In any other case, Phrenology, true or false, he is accountable, and the law, moral and human, takes cognizance of the act.

Phrenology teaches this. It makes no new propensities in man, but notices facts as they exist. E. H. C.

"CHILD'S HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES."

The History of "our own, our native land," is too often neglected, for the study of that of foreign countries. The near, by being superficially familiar, we are apt to remain ignorant of; while no efforts are neglected to become acquainted with the remote, simply because it is strange. We pass by the beautiful and the fragrant clover, which fills the air around us with its perfume, and covers our fields of green with its beautiful crimson and white, to hang with rapture over some strange and scentless exotica. How appropriate, therefore, is the study of American history to the period of childhood and youth, when it, too, is novel; and when that novelty will cause it to be cheerfully, eagerly read—when the young heart, like virgin wax, will readily receive its soul-stirring lessons of patriotism, and treasure up its principles of freedom and equality!

By the politeness of the Agent for the American Stationers' Company, of Boston, I have had presented for my perusal, a copy of the work above named, by C. A. Goodrich—and have read it with much pleasure. I deem it peculiarly well adapted to the comprehension of children, by its style and language—to engage their attention, by the events it narrates, and the manner of relating them—and to imbue them with a lasting love of purest patriotism, and a thirst for more information, by the manner in which he gives prominence to the effects of the first, and makes reference to the latter. I commend it, heartily, to parents and teachers, as one of the best works they can put into the hands of children who have just learned to read. A. B. G.

ANNUALS.

THE TOKEN for 1833, is a splendid work, elegantly bound and embellished, and called superior to any of its predecessors. We have read but few of its articles, and are, therefore, not able to pronounce upon its literary character. The names, however, of Pierpont, Greenwood, Mellen, Sigourney, Sedgwick, and Hale, besides others of high reputation, give promise that this beautiful casket contains rich gems.

Of the articles which we have read, we were much pleased with the story of "Enaticott and the Red Cross," in its description of a Puritan village and its concomitants, and in its delineation of the same spirit which worked to "that deliverance which our fathers consummated, after the bones of the stern Puritan had lain more than a century in the dust." The Token is a pretty poem, as is, also, the piece entitled "The soft Summer rain."

We presume there are other articles in the book superior, even, to these, but, of those which we have read, we give these the preference. Some of the poetry is, to our taste, not more than mediocre, but our eyes have caught the names of Pierpont, Mellen and Sigourney on the pages, and, therefore, we suppose these to be but exceptions.

We are no critic of the fine arts, (we wish we were,) but to our eyes the engravings, such as especially, "English Scenery"—"The fairies in America"—"The Last of his tribe"—are most beautiful. We recommend this work to the public.

THE LITERARY SOUVENIR, edited by William E. Burton, Esq., is another of the annuals for 1833. We have not read it at all, but should think, from its contents, that it would be found a valuable and entertaining work of its class.

The engravings are many of them spirited. Reader, it would afford you no small gratification to look at the sentry-box scene between the widow Wadman and "my uncle Toby"—what tacticians these widows are!

This is, also, a work handsomely got up, and a suitable present for the Holidays.

Alas! Alas! the days of chivalry are gone. The Troubadour's guitar rings no more beneath the lattice! No lute of warrior breathes in the bower of "Ladye-love." Serenading, to be sure is somewhat fashionable, but rather unseasonable—for such gallant devotedness of a cold night, in the face of a North wind, is a species of night errandry, (knight-errantry) which is out of the question.

Annuals, then, at this time are appropriate offerings to beauty—for they are "Tokens" of friendship, "Souvenirs" of affection, and fitting gifts to accompany the best wishes of the season. E. H. C.

ERRATUM.—Br. Doolittle says the original copy of his statistical report to me, on the condition of the Cheungo Association, states that the second Universalist society in Norwich, consists of forty members, instead of ninety, as published in the paper. I copied as I thought carefully, the report he sent me, and the proof sheet was (as usual) read by copy—so the mistake is not in the printer, but must be guessed at between Br. Doolittle and myself. What say you to halving it Br?

EXPOSITOR

AND UNIVERSALIST REVIEW.

The first number of this work will be issued in the beginning of January next. Some improvements will be made in the quality of the paper and type—but the plan and object of the work will remain the same. The present number of names, as subscribers, is only about 500, whereas 1000 are necessary to raise the work above all difficulty. We will give the prospectus a re-insertion in our next, in the hope that some more may see it and be induced to forward their names to Br. G. W. Bazin, Boston.

BILLS TO DELINQUENTS.

We this week commence sending bills to those indebted for the two last volumes of the paper. We charge in the bills for the present volume the same as the last, $2.50, which will be the amount due at the end of the year. Those who pay before the close of the year, will of course make the deduction. And those indebted for the two years, by sending us $5 free of expense before the 10th of the next month, shall be credited in full for the same and $1 on the next volume. We also append the amount due to Br. Skinner from those who have not settled with him.

BEREAN INSTITUTE.

The following is the question for discussion, Tuesday evening December, 12.

"Do the signs of the times indicate the subversion of our national institutions?"

SHORT ARTICLES.

We again call upon our correspondents for short articles. While we return our thanks to those who have contributed to our columns, we would say to them—make the debt of gratitude greater by sending us short, pithy communications. We believe that our readers, as well as ourselves, would be pleased by an abundant compliance with this request. E. H. C.

THE KNICKERBOCKER.

For some reason or other, we have not received any number of this work since the one for September. We should be glad, if it might be so, to have it forwarded to us regularly, as it is a publication which we value highly, and its absence leaves a space upon our table which no literary periodical that we receive can adequately fill.

E. H. C.

THEOLOGICAL WORKS.

Brs. Grosh and Hutchinson have recently made some valuable additions to their stock of theological works.—We intend, from time to time, when our columns will allow room, to notice some of the lately published ones more specifically.

We would now direct the attention of the clergyman and theological student, to such works as Campbell on the Gospels, Locke on the Epistles, Noyes' translation of the Prophets, Griesbach's Greek Testament, Wakefield's Testament, Dabney's Annotations, and Norton on the Genuineness of the Gospels, a new work of which the first volume only has been issued from the press, but which, the author tells us, can be taken as a work by itself.

Of these, as we have said, and of other works of a more miscellaneous character, we will speak anon.

POETRY.

From the Budget of the Berean Institute.

LINES ON THE LOSS OF THE STEAM SHIP HOMER.

The ship went forth in her power and pride,
Careering o'er ocean's foam;
And the waves which dashed from her gallant side,
Seem'd bearing glad hearts home.

The winds of Autumn around her blew,
And she went with the speed of light,
And joyous ones were among her crew,
With their hopes and prospects bright.

But the waves arose; and that frail ship's form
Was too weak to withstand their power;
Her sides were crushed by the gathering storm
In the gloom of the midnight hour!

Then arose the shriek in that time of doom,
And many a stout heart bled
At the thoughts of death and a watery tomb—
And hope's bright prospects fled!

Manhood was there—but at death's shrive
E'en manhood too must bow,
Beauty was there—her form divine
The cold waves cover now!

Children were there—the elastic tread
Of childhood, pressed that deck,
How could they meet the ruin spread
By the wild waves o'er that wreck?

So they have perished!—Manhood's pride,
And beauty's bright career,
And lisping childhood—side by side,
They lie on their ocean bier!

And yet why mourn we? Death's keen dart,
Will soon lay us as low,
His aim is sure—each human heart,
Must quail beneath his blow.

But, thanks to our God!—"death too must die;"
His sentence the Saviour read,
And whether in earth or sea we lie,
They must both "give up their dead!"

At the joyful sound of the trumpet's call,
We shall start to life again:
No more to be held in corruption's thrall—
No more to know grief or pain.

THE NOBILITY OF LABOR.

So material do I deem this point—the true nobility of labor, I mean—that I would dwell upon it a moment longer, and in a larger view. Why, then, in the great scale of things, is labor ordained for us? Easily, had it so pleased the great Ordainer, might it have been dispensed with. The world itself might have been a mighty machinery for the production of all that man wants. The motion of the globe upon its axis might have been the power to move that world of machinery. Ten thousand wheels within wheels might have been at work; ten thousand processes, more curious and complicated than man can devise, might have been going forward without man's aid; houses might have risen like an exhalation,

"With the sound
Of dulcet symphonies and voices sweet,
Built like a temple;"

gorgeous furniture might have been placed in them, and soft couches and luxurious banquets spread, by hands unseen; and man, clothed with fabrics of nature's weaving, richer than imperial purple, might have been sent to disport himself in those Elysian palaces. "Fair scene!" I imagine you are saying; "fortunate for us, had it been the scene ordained for human life!" But where then, tell me, had been human energy, perseverance, patience, virtue, heroism? Cut off with one blow from the world; and mankind had sunk to a crowd, nay, far beneath a crowd of Asiatic voluptuaries. No, it had not been fortunate. Better that the earth be given to man as a dark mass, whereon to labor. Better that rude and unsightly materials be provided in the ore-bed and the forest, for him to fashion into splendor and beauty. Better, I say, not because of that splendor and beauty, but because the act creating them is better than the things themselves; because exertion is nobler than enjoyment; because the laborer is greater and more worthy of honor than the idler. I call upon those whom I address, to stand up for that nobility of labor.—It is Heaven's great ordinance for human improvement. Let not that great ordinance be broken down. What do I say? It is broken down; and it has been broken down for ages. Let it, then, be built up again; here, if any where, on these shores of a new world—of a new civilization. But how, I may be asked, is it broken down? Do not men toil, it may be said? They do indeed toil, but they too generally do it because they must. Many submit to it, in some sort, a degrading necessity; and they desire nothing so much on earth, as escape from it. They fulfil the great law of labor in the letter, but break it in spirit; fulfil it with the muscle, but break it with the mind. To some field of labor, mental or manual, every idler should fasten, as a chosen and coveted theatre of improvement. But so is he not impelled to do, under the teachings of our imperfect civilization. On the contrary, he sits down, folds his hands, and blesses himself in his idleness. This way of thinking is the heritage of the absurd and unjust feudal system, under which serfs labored, and gentlemen spent their lives in fighting and feasting. It is time that this opprobrium of toil were done away. Ashamed to toil, art thou? Ashamed of thy dingy work-shop and dusty labor-field; of thy hard hand, scarred with service more honorable than that of war; of thy soiled and weather-stained garments, on which mother nature has embroidered, midst sun and rain, midst fire and steam, her own heraldic honors? Ashamed of these tokens and titles, and envious of the flaunting robes of imbecile idleness and vanity? It is treason to nature; it is impiety to Heaven; it is breaking Heaven's great ordinance. Toil, I repeat—toil, either of the brain, of the heart, or of the hand, is the only true manhood, the only true nobility! —Rev. O. Dewey.

SONG OF THE DYING.

Disease had well nigh done its work—the flame but glimmered in the socket—one moment more, and it would be out. The dying girl called, by her waving hand, her sister to her, and faintly breathed forth the wish that she would sing—sing some sweet melody, that she might leave earth with the tones of inspiring music lingering on her ear. "And what, dear sister, would you choose for me to sing?" "Sing, Harriet, my favorite—'I leave earth willingly,'" said the dying girl. The sister well knew her choice, and she sat down to the instrument and brought forth its softest, sweetest tones; they were, indeed, born of heaven, and never had music a holier influence than when it breathed forth the elevated thoughts of a dying one, dying in the beauty of her youth, and yet willing to depart. We looked on her with sacred awe; we felt we were in the presence of a being of another world, who was soon to know the mystery of death. What a calm and beautiful expression was on her countenance! What a glow was on her cheek, and a brilliancy in her eye, as the notes of the favored song rose sweet and clear, and seemed to float around the couch of the dying! Oh! is not that religion worth possessing, that enabled her to wear a heavenly smile, at the last moment, and show that she felt the words that were uttered, though she could not speak them! And she died as the sister repeated—

"I would not live away, away from my God, Away from you heaven, that blissful abode."

There was much to wean thee away, fair sister of the gentle speech and tender eye! "Storm after storm" did, indeed, "rise dark o'er thy way," and heaven was fairer to thee than earth. And when the pale conqueror cometh to bear me from this shadowy world, may thy sweet cheerfulness be mine, and some gentle one sing me to death's sleep as thou wert. Sweet sister! We part from earth's melody, for the purer and nobler harmonies of heaven! The strains that greet us as we linger on the shores of mortality are not the last, for there are harps and voices in that home which awaits us all, and everlasting songs will be sung to the praise of our Father and our God!—Mirror.

ORIGINAL SERMON,

BY THE LATE REV. E. SMITH.

"For the Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." Luke xix: 10.

These are the words of Jesus, the promised Messiah, of which Moses in the law and the prophets had testified should come into the world. When the coming of this glorious personage was announced to his mother Mary, the angel of the Lord, the messenger of the glad tidings said unto her, "thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins." A short time previous to this heavenly message, the coming of John the Baptist had been proclaimed, and his office and mission declared by a heavenly messenger. It was said that he should be called the prophet of the highest: that he should "go before the face of the Lord to prepare his way before him, to turn the hearts of the fathers to their children and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just." He it was who said, "I am not that light, but I came to bear witness of that light. That is the true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world."

More than four hundred years had elapsed from the time of Malachi till the coming of John the Baptist, the last prophet of the Lord who prophesied in Judea, before the advent of the promised Shiloh. The voice of prophecy had long been lost in the stillness of night, the tribes of long expecting Israel were anxiously waiting for some prophetic tidings of deliverance, and the nations of the earth had hushed the din of war, and proclaimed universal peace, when the forerunner of the Messiah appeared in the wilderness of Judea, and proclaimed in a voice of power and authority, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." He said, "I am not the Christ. I indeed baptize with water unto repentance, but one cometh after me whose shoes I am not worthy to bear, he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire. He must increase but I must decrease." And when he saw him of whom he had thus prophesied, he said to his disciples, "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world! The Father loveth the Son and hath given all things into his hands. He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life, and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life: but the wrath of God abideth on him. He that hath the bride is the bridegroom, but the friend of the bridegroom which standeth and heareth him, rejoiceth greatly, because of the bridegroom's voice. This, my joy, therefore, is fulfilled."

Thus did this last prophet under the Jewish or legal economy, bear witness of Christ, the righteous branch of Jesse's root, the messenger of the covenant, the Prince, the Messiah; who should reign until sin should be finished, an end made of transgression, reconciliation for iniquity, and until everlasting righteousness should be brought in.

The angels that proclaimed the birth of the Saviour to the shepherds, prefaced their heavenly message with the soothing exclamation of assurance: "Fear not, for behold I bring you glad tidings of great joy which shall be unto all people. For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord." And immediately the peopled plains of dark, benighted and silent Judea, echoed with the symphonious acclamations of the heavenly hosts, which rang and reverberated through the broad expanse of heaven, while they chanted the deathless song of redeeming grace and dying love; saying, "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace and good will to men." Thus was the Son of God ushered into the world amid the glad acclamations of the heavenly hosts!

When he had arrived to that age in which the Jewish teachers entered upon their public duties, he began to declare to the world of mankind the true character of his God and our God, and showed to an astonished multitude that he was the long expected Messiah, by the many miracles, signs and wonders which God did by him. In the course of his ministry, and his travels from city to city throughout the coasts of Judea, at a certain time he passed through Jericho, where resided a chief of the publicans by the name of Zaccheus. This man was anxious to see the Saviour, but could not, because being small of stature he was prevented by the multitude who thronged about Jesus to see and hear the marvellous things which he was almost constantly doing for the benefit of the ignorant or the unfortunate. But so great was the anxiety of Zaccheus to see a man of such uncommon powers and celebrity, as it was reported that Jesus possessed; that he went forward of the procession and climbed up into a sycamore tree, that he might gratify his curiosity for seeing Jesus, as he passed by.

Now, as Zaccheus was not of Jewish extraction, and supposed, as well as the Jews, that Jesus was a prophet only to his own countrymen, the Jews, he was not a little surprised to hear him, on his arrival, saying, "Zaccheus, make haste and come down; for to-day I must abide at thy house."

Although Zaccheus knew that the Jews in their religious pride despised those of his name and profession, and would not so much as enter their dwellings lest they should be defiled, yet he made haste and came down, and received him joyfully. But when the self-righteous Jews saw the kindness and complaisance of their master, and the joyful manner in which it was received by the publican, "they all murmured, saying, that he was gone to be guest with a man that is a sinner." What a disposition was manifested by these narrow-minded, bigoted Pharisees! Although Jesus had told them, that the whole need not a physician, but they that are sick; that he came not to call the righteous but sinners to repentance; and also if they would be the children of their Father in heaven, they must love their enemies, bless those that curse, and do good to all; yet they had learned so little of that heavenly wisdom, that they murmured, because he was gone to be a guest with a man whom they called a sinner. And it is to be feared that there are many in our day, as ignorant of the true nature of the Gospel, and as exclusive and monopolizing of its name and benefits, as were the Jews. But it appears that Zaccheus, on this occasion, exhibited a noble sentiment and pious example well worthy the attention and imitation of every Christian, though followed perhaps by but too few.

"And Zaccheus stood and said unto the Lord, Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor, and if I have taken any thing from any man by false accusation, I restore him four-fold." How few do we find at the present day, even among those who make the highest professions of piety and godliness, who even restore, barely what they have taken away from their brethren, unjustly: much less are they willing to restore four-fold. But the reply which Jesus made to this generous-hearted, charitable publican, is a convincing proof that he regarded him, not as an ostentatious pretender to justice and liberality merely, but as he was in truth, an open, undesigning, honest man. "And Jesus said unto him, This day is salvation come to this house, forasmuch as he also is a son of Abraham." After declaring to the publican, that salvation had already come to his house, he sums up his business and errand in these few words, "For the Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost."

In the brief discussion which we propose to give of our subject, we shall, first, endeavor to show what was lost. And as the text affirms that the Son of man came to seek and save that which was lost, we shall, secondly, adduce a few passages of Scripture, to show that he will not fail in his undertaking, but shall actually accomplish his object. We should deem it superfluous to attempt a formal proof of our second proposition, if it was not confidently believed, or at least asserted by many, that the Son of man would never be able to save all of that which was lost. On our part, considering the power, wisdom and goodness with which the Son of man was invested, we should be willing to take it for granted that he would accomplish the object of his coming; that he would seek out and save all the lost.

But to proceed with our first proposition. What was it that the Son of man came to seek and to save? What was it that was lost? We answer, all mankind, or mankind in the aggregate, was lost. But it may be asked, how was mankind lost? It was lost in sin and transgression; it was lost in moral darkness, and ignorance of the true character of God. All had sinned by violating the moral law of God; all had wandered out of the way of virtue and holiness; had neglected or refused to love the Lord God with all the heart, and their neighbor as themselves, and were lost in the wilderness of sin, enveloped in the darkness of moral night, and at every turn had involved themselves deeper and deeper in the thorny maze, and wandered starless and rayless in the wilderness of their own transgressions, pride and superstition. In proof of what we have already advanced, we would remark, first, that the peculiar language of the text is borrowed from the figurative representations of the Jewish prophets. The ancient Israelites being many of them shepherds, whose business it was to tend their flocks, the prophets frequently spoke of God, as well as of the prophets themselves, under the figure of a shepherd, and mankind generally, although the Israelites more particularly, by a flock of sheep. Thus the Psalmist represents his own wickedness and alienation from God, by saying, "I have gone astray like a lost sheep; seek thy servant; for I do not forget thy commandments."

Here let it be noticed, the Psalmist speaks as though he could not find his way back from his lost condition without a shepherd; therefore he says, "seek thy servant." Again, Jeremiah speaking in the name of the Lord, says, "My people hath been lost sheep; their shepherds have caused them to go astray, they have turned them away on the mountains: they have gone from mountain to hill, they have forgotten their resting place."

It is to be feared there are now, many such shepherds; who cause the sheep to go astray; who turn them from the peaceful, fruitful valleys of Gospel grace and love, and drive them into the cold and barren hills and mountains of doubt and fear, where they have no resting place.

Again, the prophet represents Israel in an individual character, as one sheep scattered from the flock. He says, "Israel is a scattered sheep, the lions have driven him away: first the king of Assyria hath devoured him; and last this Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon hath broken his bones."

The prophet Ezekiel, in the thirty-fourth chapter of his prophecy has carried this figurative method of instruction to a very great length, but as it is applied mostly to the nation of the Jews, we shall only quote two verses, viz., the 6th and 31st. At the sixth verse, the Lord said by the prophet, "My sheep wandered through all the nations, and upon every high hill: yea, my flock was scattered upon all the face of the earth, and none did search or seek after them." At the 31st verse, he says, "And ye, my flock, the flock of my pasture, are men, and I am your God, saith the Lord God."

Although we might cite many more testimonies, showing that all mankind was lost, in a moral sense, yet those which we have already quoted, may be deemed sufficient, considering it is a fact which no one will pretend to dispute, that all mankind have sinned more or less, and, consequently, have been lost in the wilderness of transgression, darkness, and moral night.

But we will quote one more text, taken from the 14th Psalm, which would be sufficient, without any other, to show that all mankind have fallen into sin, and therefore are in a lost condition—without a moral renovation. The Psalmist says, "The Lord looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were any that did understand, and seek God." But what was the result of this scrutinizing investigation? The writer tells us, "They are all gone aside; they are altogether become filthy: there is none that doeth good, no, not one." Now, although it was said there was none good, no, not one—that all had wandered from the fold of God—yet we are not to suppose that every individual of mankind was at that time in a lost condition, because there were prophets, righteous and just men, then living; but we are to understand that mankind, being made subject to vanity, as the apostle declares, had in time past, stepped aside from the path of virtue and holiness, and hence it might with propriety be said, that all had gone out of the way. This is what we are to understand by the language of Isaiah: "All we like sheep have gone astray." It therefore appears evident, that the whole race of mankind had strayed from the fold—from the peaceful pastures of the Almighty, the great Shepherd and Bishop of souls; that men, by their departure from the fountain of living waters, become lost in the mazes of their own narrow, selfish imaginations—wandered upon the barren mountains of pride, and self-dependence, and importance—and have thereby brought upon themselves leanness, darkness, misery, moral night, destruction, and death. In viewing man in this condition, how dark and cheerless is the prospect before him. Without sufficient strength of his own to ensure his safety, or to guard him against the snares and temptations which are everywhere presenting themselves in captivating shapes and colours to his visionary and wizzard imagination, man gropes his way in the midst of the wilderness and darkness of sin, catching at the phantom pleasures and joys which flit before him, but ever elude his grasp. In such a condition all men are said to be lost; and for this reason it was said, "The Son of man is come to seek and save that which was lost."

Our second proposition was to show from the Scriptures, that Jesus, or the Son of man, will seek and save all the lost, or all mankind. In the discussion of this part of our subject, it will necessarily appear still more clearly, that it was the moral purity of all mankind which was lost, and that the Son of man came to seek after the children of men thus lost, and save them from the guilt, shame, and moral pollution, into which their imperfect natures and carnal propensities had unwittingly or stubbornly drawn them.

We have already remarked, that the language of the text was probably borrowed from the figurative descriptions of the prophets. Thus, "to seek and to save," conveys an allusion to the metaphorical language of the prophet Ezekiel, as well as several other prophets. The Lord, by Ezekiel, says, "Behold I, even I, will both search my sheep, and seek them out. As a shepherd seeketh out his flock in the day that he is among his sheep that are scattered, so will I seek out my sheep, and will deliver them out of all places where they have been scattered in the cloudy and dark day. I will feed my flock, and will cause them to lie down, saith the Lord God. I will seek that which was lost, and bring again that which was driven away, and will bind up that which was broken, and will strengthen that which was sick." What a beautiful description is here given by the prophet, of the kind care and parental affection of our heavenly Father for his wayward, wandering, and disobedient children! He will search them all out, and bring them home to his fold; and not only so, but he will bind up those that are broken, and strengthen those that are sick.

We would here remark, that we are not to suppose that mankind is lost or hid from the eyes of the Lord, because he is everywhere present, beholding the evil and the good; but the language respects the moral condition of the lost. Men are said to be lost in consequence of their transgressions, and alienation from goodness and virtue. Their sins darken their moral vision— estrange the affections from benevolence and charity—and they become lost to all those principles and affections which are the light and life of the just, the generous, and the good. Therefore, what we are to understand by the language of the prophet, is, that the Almighty will manifest himself to his creatures by enlightening their understandings, by forgiving their sins, and by causing them to know him. For, says the Saviour, this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent. This is what we are to understand by God's seeking and saving the flock of his pasture, binding up the broken, and strengthening or restoring the sick.

The prophet goes on to inform us of the means by which he will recover his children from their lost and miserable condition. And that he would set up a Shepherd over them who would feed them, and not forsake them, as did many of the ancient prophets.

The Lord says, by the prophet, "And I will set up one Shepherd over them, and he shall feed them, even my servant David; he shall feed them, and he shall be their Shepherd."

Although the Lord calls the Shepherd whom he would set up, David, yet there is no doubt that the prophecy refers to Christ, the spiritual David, because he speaks definitely of one Shepherd, to distinguish him from the prophets; and, also, that he should feed them, which represents that he should be a much greater Shepherd than any of the prophets who had been sent by the Father of all men, to watch over and feed with living bread the children of his love. There is no doubt that the ancient Israelites considered themselves the peculiar people of God. Hence their prophets represent the Jews as the flock with whom the Almighty delighted to dwell, and therefore the Gentile nations were considered by them as outcasts from the care and protection of their Maker, and as not belonging to the same fold. But the new covenant, the Gospel of salvation, which was established upon better promises than the legal covenant, showed that God was no respecter of persons—that the Gentile as well as the Jew was the object of his peculiar care, and that the Son of man, by the effulgent light of Gospel truth, would break down the separating wall, that there might be one fold and one Shepherd. In conformity with the figurative language of the Jewish prophets, Christ declares himself to be the good Shepherd of whom Ezekiel had spoken nearly six hundred years before. He it was who should seek and save mankind from the moral wilderness of sin and transgression. Hence he declares his errand and mission by saying, "The Son of man is come to seek and save that which was lost."

Since we have ascertained that it was mankind in general, or the whole mass of intelligent beings, which was lost, and that Jesus is the one who came to seek and save it from its condition, the only question that remains to be answered, is, Will he accomplish so desirable an object? Will he succeed in seeking out and saving the last miserable, forlorn, benighted, and lost being, who has wandered from the fold of mercy, truth, and grace, and become entangled in the mazes of superstition, error and wickedness? As the Scriptures are the only unerring source of information upon this momentous subject, we shall continue to adhere to their testimony, for an answer to this, as well as all other questions touching the future destiny of mankind.

Since it is universally admitted, that the Saviour of sinners is loving, compassionate, and merciful, we might give a very decided, though brief answer to the foregoing question, by quoting the language of Isaiah, relative to Christ, when he says, "He shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied." Now, if Jesus possess those powers, qualifications, and desires which both the Bible and all Christians readily give him, will any thing satisfy his capacious soul, short of the salvation of every child of Adam? Certainly not. And he has given a pledge that he will do all his will, and therefore be satisfied by tasting death for every man. But not to insist on this, although it is an incontrovertible argument, we will quote the language of Jesus, as recorded by the beloved disciple, John. He says, "I am the good Shepherd—the good shepherd giveth his life for his sheep." What a noble—what a God-like sentiment is here advanced! No human being, unassisted by the divine energies of the Spirit of God, could be prevailed upon to make such a sacrifice. And certainly the Son of God himself, would not thus have suffered and laid down his life without an assurance that the benevolent object for which it was intended, would be accomplished.

But that the believing Jews might not claim the exclusive benefits of his mission—that they might not consider him as a Saviour for their nation alone—he says, "As the Father knoweth me, even so know I the Father; and I lay down my life for the sheep, and other sheep I have which are not of this fold: them also I must bring, and there shall be one fold and one shepherd."

These other sheep which the Saviour mentions as not belonging to that particular fold, undoubtedly refers to the Gentiles. The language therefore shows that the Gentiles as well as the Jews should be sought out and saved. The Lord, speaking by the prophet Isaiah, shows conclusively that the Gentiles should be benefited by the Gospel of Christ as well as the Jews, although the latter in general had expected a Saviour only for their own nation. The Lord said, "Behold my servant, whom I uphold; mine elect in whom my soul delighteth: I have put my spirit upon him: he shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles. He shall not fail nor be discouraged, till he have set judgment in the earth; and the isles shall wait for his law. I the Lord have called thee in righteousness, and will hold thine hand, and will keep thee, and give thee for a covenant of the people, for a light of the Gentiles; to open the blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the prison, and them that sit in darkness out of the prison house."

These are glorious promises, and they represent great blessings which were given to mankind in Christ. He it was to whom power was given to bring the prisoners out of their prisons of darkness, ignorance and sin, to open the spiritual eyes of blinded mortals; to awaken them from spiritual death and bondage, and to seek and save all the lost. He says, "I will bring the blind by a way that they know not: I will lead in paths that they have not known: I will make darkness light before them, and crooked things straight. These things will I do unto them and not forsake them." Again, the same prophet represents the blessings of the new covenant as extending to both Jew and Gentile: and shows that Christ, whom the Lord denominates his servant, should continue the glorious work of his mission till all mankind should be saved. "And the Lord said, it is a light thing that thou shouldst be my servant, to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel; I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation to the end of the earth." Here the Lord declares unequivocally rally that Christ, his servant, should be for salvation to the end of the earth.

We therefore justly conclude that there is no being so vile, no creature so hidden and none so lost, but he will search them out and bring them home to their fold from whence they have strayed, illuminate their minds by the light of truth, and save them with an everlasting salvation. It is represented to be a light thing that Christ should save a part of mankind, and it is therefore declared that he shall save all, both Jews and Gentiles. But how does this agree with the most of modern instructions? Do not our Unitarian brethren give the Saviour a very light task? According to their views he will save but a very small part of mankind, perhaps not so many as the tribes of Jacob and the preserved of Israel. But we rejoice that the Lord has declared that he shall be for salvation to the end of the earth.

In the Acts of the Apostles we are informed by what means Christ will seek and save all the lost family of man. The apostle Peter had healed an impotent man, and while the people were in amazement, and wondered at the mighty power which was given to men, the apostle took occasion to instruct them in the glorious doctrines of the Gospel, and in the conclusion of his instructions, he makes this glowing appeal to his auditors, "Ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, and in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed. Unto you first, God, having raised up his Son Jesus, sent him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities." This language of Peter was but the reiteration of the promise made to Abraham, and confirmed to Isaac and Jacob, that in them and their seed should all the nations and families of the earth be blessed. The seed mentioned in the promise, an apostle affirms to be Christ—hence Paul says, "Forasmuch as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil, and deliver all those who through fear of death were all their life time subject to bondage." Again, "Christ was manifested to destroy the works of the devil." Thus he came to seek and to save that which was lost.

But the Jews as a nation rejected the counsel of God against themselves. Hence their immediate privileges and blessings were taken from them and given to the Gentiles; to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof. When Paul preached the Gospel at Corinth, to both Jews and Gentiles, the former disbelieved his testimony, contradicting and blaspheming, therefore he shook his raiment, and said I am clean from your blood, from henceforth I will go to the Gentiles. "Be it known, therefore, unto you, that the salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and that they will hear it."—Again, Paul and Barnabas declared to the unbelieving Jews, "It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken unto you: but seeing ye put it far from you and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo we turn to the Gentiles: for so hath the Lord commanded us, saying, I have set thee to be a light of the Gentiles, that thou shouldst be for salvation unto the ends of the earth."

But here it will be inquired, how the Son of man can save those who reject him and his salvation? Will he seek and save those who deny his being the Messiah, and who contradict and blaspheme his holy name?

We answer, this argues nothing against their being finally delivered from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the children of God, unless it can be made to appear that sinners are more powerful than the Son of man, or that sin and moral pollution are stronger than the omnipotent energies of the Divine Spirit. We read that where sin abounded, grace did much more abound; that as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign unto eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord. But we will hear what Paul says about those unbelieving, blaspheming Jews. In the eleventh chapter of his epistle to the Gentile church at Rome, he says, "I say, then, hath God cast away his people? God forbid. For I also am an Israelite of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin." He then introduces the testimony of the prophets relative to the wickedness and blindness of the Jews, and the punishment which should come upon them. At verse 11, he says, "I say, then, have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid: but rather through their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles." He then goes on to argue that if the Jews were permitted to remain in ignorance and blindness, that the Gentiles might have the opportunity of embracing the Gospel, then certainly the Jews should afterwards receive the same blessing—"For," says he, "if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be but life from the dead." Again, he reasons metaphorically, "For if thou wert cut out of the olive-tree, which is wild by nature, and wert grafted contrary to nature into a good olive-tree; how much more shall these, which be natural branches, be grafted into their own olive-tree? For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, (lest ye should be wise in your own conceits,) that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in." Again, Jesus says, "All power is given to me in heaven and earth." "All that the Father giveth me shall come unto me, and he that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." "All things are given to me of my Father." "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men to me." Thus will the Son of man seek and save all the lost family of man, and then give up the kingdom, and God be all in all.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER TO REV. N. STACY.

Washington, Mich., June 20, 1837.

REV. AND DEAR SIR—The Central Association of Universalists of Michigan, which held its annual session at Ann Arbor, 7th and 8th inst.,

"Resolved, That Br. Nathaniel Stacy be respectfully requested to prepare a memoir of his life, including a history of the rise and progress of the doctrine of God's impartial grace, so far as his personal knowledge extends, and that the Clerk be requested to forward to him a copy of this resolution."

In accordance with the wishes of my brethren, I have the honor to transmit to you a copy of the foregoing resolution, and in so doing, may I be permitted to express my personal regard for the welfare of yourself and family, and hope that you will be pleased to comply with their request? And may God be pleased to add many years to your life of usefulness, is the prayer of your brother in the bonds Christian fellowship.

THOMAS WHEELER, Clerk.

Rev. N. STACY.

REPLY.

Ann Arbor, October 5th, 1837.

MY DEAR BROTHER—Your very kind notice of a resolution passed by the Central Association of Universalists, in Michigan, at its last annual session, holden at Ann Arbor, requesting a memoir of my life, including a history of the rise and progress of the doctrine of God's impartial grace, so far as my personal knowledge extends, has been duly received. You will permit me, therefore, through you, to express to the Association my grateful sense of this token of their confidence, and to remark, that although my life, from an early period, has been zealously devoted to the promulgation of that system of religion which I have espoused with a full believing heart—and although many incidents must have occurred in the course of the labors of thirty-five years, which were employed, more or less, in seven of the States of our Union, and especially in the early stages of the advancement of our holy religion, which might, unquestionably, appear quite interesting to my particular and partial friends, yet I am inclined to think they put a higher estimate upon the work they ask of me, than it can possibly be made to merit.

Notwithstanding, my brethren have a right to demand my best, and all my labor, and it is my duty and happiness to oblige and accommodate them. Should it please God, therefore, to grant me health, and to lengthen out the days of my temporal pilgrimage to a sufficient length to accomplish it, amid the other necessary duties of life, it will be my pleasure to comply with their request.

Permit me, my dear brother, to reciprocate your kind expressions of personal regard; and to offer up to the throne of Grace, my devout supplications for the welfare of yourself and family, and for the prosperity of your labors in the vineyard of our common Lord, with those of the whole family of the faithful with whom we are so happily associated; until the last vestige of moral darkness is dispelled by the light of life, and righteousness and peace shall reign triumphant "from pole to pole, and from the river to the ends of the earth."

Most affectionately, your brother in Christ,

NATH. STACY.

DONATION PARTIES.

Christianity, when rightly understood, is calculated immeasurably to enhance the enjoyments of existence. This fact admitted, to the philanthropic and benevolent mind, impressed with a firm and unwavering conviction of its truth, no object is presented of greater importance. If Christianity is of such inestimable value, its promulgation is worthy our highest regard and attention; and he who foregoes civic honors and domestic ease, and boldly meets the frowns of bigots and the denunciations of persecutors, to strip Christianity of that mystic veil of darkness which has for ages dimmed its brightness, should receive at least a good support; and those who most deplore the desolations of superstition, will be most forward in their exertions to maintain the advocate for it in its purity and truth. In many societies, the amount subscribed for the support of the preacher, is small, and in some necessarily so—insufficient to maintain the clergyman and his family respectably. To remedy this deficiency, I would suggest the expediency of instituting DONATION PARTIES, and would urge the propriety of having them observed by every society of Universalists throughout the world. Let our benevolence be as ample as that of the Author of the religion we profess. By such a regulation, those who are now in many respects destitute, might be furnished with the necessities, and even conveniences, of life.

During the past year, the bountiful hand of almighty Munificence has scattered blessings around us, in rich and unvaried profusion. The gifts of the earth have been unusually abundant, and man is invited to the banquet which Providence has prepared for the recipients of its impartial benefactions. And now, is there a Universalist on earth, who is persuaded (as he must be) that in the propagation of Christian truth is involved the welfare of multitudes of his kindred race—is there one who is unwilling to lend a helping hand, and buoy up his preacher, (who is generally needy and destitute,) in his efforts to emancipate a world from the thralldom of error, and from the baneful influence of those creeds which shed the gloom of fear over every joy of humanity? As a UNIVERSALIST, I answer, No.

Then, let every individual who is interested in the spread of Universalism, engage in this matter heart and hand, and at the commencement of the ensuing year, as may suit the convenience of the respective societies, let an opportunity be presented for the liberal to encourage and support their preacher, that they may, in some degree at least, make glad his heart, and incite him to greater exertion.

Br. GROSH.—Since I commenced the [following] article, I have seen a piece upon nearly the same subject, written by the celebrated Miss Sedgwick, and published in the Metropolitan; in consequence of which I hesitated sometime about sending this for publication. But as this article is rather more of a "religious cast," and as there is no similarity, except in the subject matter of the two articles, I have finally concluded to send it to you for publication, should you deem it worthy.

And as said article by Miss Sedgwick was copied into some of our periodicals, I delayed the publication of the following for a time, that it might not be passed by unread, under a belief that it was the same article.

TRUE PHILOSOPHY.

BY MRS. A. F. STEPHENS.

PASSAGES FROM A MERCHANT'S SKETCH BOOK.

"Father," said an interesting little boy, who had been listening with childhood's curiosity to our conversation upon the "pressure," the "failure," and the "distress," of our beloved country—"father, has every body and every thing failed?" I was about taking leave, and waited not to hear my friend's reply, but saying my farewell, and stepping into my carriage, was soon riding leisurely on an eminence that overlooked our beautiful village and its surrounding scenery. But its unrivalled beauties were then all unheeded by me.—My mind's eye saw nothing in perspective save the haggard form of poverty and its sad train of attendants—I thought of nothing save my own pecuniary embarrassments, and the total failure of nearly all my friends. "Yes," I murmured audibly, as the interrogation of my little friend recurred to my mind, "the world has become insolvent, every body and every thing has failed."

"Not so bad as that neither, my friend," said a cheerful voice near me—"come with us and we will prove to you that we yet have possessions that all the diamonds of Golconda can not purchase—invaluable treasures, that poverty itself can never take away?" On raising my eyes I saw before me a particular friend, who had been one of the most severe sufferers by these unhappy times. Beside him stood his young and lovely wife, and a small, select party of friends, who had just ascended from the village, and were going to our favorite Summer bower on the brow of the hill. I readily consented to accompany them, and we were soon seated in our little arbor, with a scene before us that might have warmed and expanded the heart of a stoic.

"Look abroad my friend," resumed Mr. Weston, addressing himself to me, "look upon this goodly prospect, and confess that we have abundant cause for joy and thanksgiving, instead of murmuring and repining. Yon bright, blue sky, which surely equals, if it does not surpass the far famed skies of Italy—those clear, placid, and healthful waters, which beautify and enrich our village, and fertilize the vales below—and those fields, yellow with grain already ripe for the harvest—all proclaim to ungrateful man the unchanging goodness of our God, and evince that industry has not failed of receiving a rich reward at the hand of Him who "giveth liberally and upbraideth not." And the golden beams of yonder setting sun, the pure air of heaven—health, friendship and affection, the greatest of all earthly blessings, are still all our own—these have not failed. The learned Dr. Scott has very justly and beautifully said, 'the seeming shipwrecks we meet with in the voyage of life often prove the very things which best speed our course to the desirable haven.' The truth of this observation I have experienced. Happiness is the haven at which we all hope to arrive. It is the end and aim of our existence. I have sought for it as for a hidden treasure, and I have found that it consists not in the abundance of our temporal possessions, for they can never satisfy our immortal mind, and must sooner or later fail; but in a contented mind—a conscience void of offence towards God and man,' and a firm unwavering faith and hope of ultimately possessing those untold, inexhaustible riches, 'laid up in heaven for us,' which will never—never fail."

"And those exalted minds," thought I, as I looked at the dignified and cheerful countenance of my friend, "those great and noble spirits, which can pass through all the changes and vicissitudes of life with equanimity and firmness, have not failed."

Mrs. Weston, at the request of her husband then sang with much elegance and feeling the following beautiful lines from Moore.

Thou art, O God the life and light
Of all this wondrous world we see,
Its glow by day, its smile by night,
Are but reflections caught from thee.
Where'er we turn, thy glories shine,
And all things fair and bright are thine.

When day, with farewell beam, delays
Among the opening clouds of even,
And we can almost think we gaze,
Through golden vistas into Heaven;
Those hues that make the sun's decline
So soft, so radiant, Lord, are thine.

When night, with wings of starry gloom,
O'ershadows all the earth and skies,
Like some dark, beautiful bird, whose plume
Is sparkling with unnumbered eyes;
That sacred gloom, those fires divine,
So grand, so countless, Lord, are thine.

When youthful Spring around us breathes,
Thy spirit warms her fragrant sigh,
And every flower that Summer wreathes,
Is born beneath thy kindling eye;
Where'er we turn thy glories shine,
And all things fair and bright are thine.

The tear of gratitude trembled in her dark eye as it seemed to seek the throne of Him, of whom she so sweetly sung; and as the last words died away upon the ear, a clergyman by my side whispered me, "piety and devotion to our God have not failed; neither has their rich and sweet reward, a joy and peace that passeth all understanding."

He then directed our attention to a church-yard, below us, and to a female form kneeling beside a grave. "Look at that mourning mother," said he "and witness that maternal love has not failed.—I know the history of him who sleeps in that narrow bed. He was a disobedient and erring son, and for a long time a wilful, unhappy wanderer from the paternal roof. Intemperance and dissipation brought him to a premature grave, and he returned a penitent to his Father's house, just in time to die. The afflicted mother watched over his dying bed with that deep, enduring love, found no where on earth, save in a mother's heart; and now daily visits his tomb with a faith and hope that fail not of a blessed reunion in a happier and holier world, where sin, sorrow and death, have no dominion.

"Maternal affection is a beautiful, though faint emblem of our Creator's love: deep, strong, pure and disinterested. Yet even this sublime and holy principle, like other fair and bright things of earth, may fail—a mother even may forget her offspring; but our heavenly Father, in the plenitude of his goodness and paternal love, hath promised that He will 'never forget nor forsake us'—that His mercy and loving kindness shall endure forever. Yes, my friends, though fortune may frown upon us, and all earthly friends forsake—though the world and all its glorious things may, nay must recede from our view—although even our heart and flesh may fail, yet God is the strength of our hearts and our portion forever."

EVIL, THE PARENT OF GOOD.

BY THE AUTHOR OF NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

It must be obvious to every mind, which reflects on the constitution and events of this world, that man was intended to be an active, ever-active being. One of the aims which his Creator had in view in his formation, we may justly infer from what we see, was, that he should never become a sluggish, lazy or inactive. The moment we become so, evils come upon us which rouse us to thought and action. We can easily admit that the Being who bestowed upon us such wonderful powers, could just as easily have surrounded us with blessings so that our whole existence might have been uninterrupted enjoyment. But in this case there would be nothing to rouse us to exertion, our faculties, our powers of planning, foreseeing, and executing, would have been unemployed.—We would have been in the condition of the brute animals. Believing, in the language of Pope, that "whatever is, is best," we would rather narrowly and scrutinizingly inquire into the sources of our present sufferings and enjoyments, than fruitlessly waste our time in imagining what we might have been. When we do so, we find that we are placed between evils which we are to avoid or subdue, and good which we are to aim at and enjoy, and that in order to do either the one or the other, we can not sit down with folded arms, but must maintain a perpetual vigilance and activity, and exert to the utmost every capacity, mental and corporeal, with which we have been endowed.

What is the result of this activity? Evils are avoided, mitigated, or made the occasions of good: good is secured; and meanwhile, from the very activity itself we are happy. And what supposition is more probable than this—that suffering is ready to invade us upon every side, just that those very powers of mind and body by the exercise of which we can evade this suffering, may be kept perpetually in exercise, which, in itself, is a source of dignified, and enduring, and satisfying felicity? Our experience testifies, that by the exercise of our various powers we may secure benefits for ourselves, or confer them upon others; and Heaven proclaims by the languor, sense of degradation and other pains and penalties of inactivity, that it is not the intention of the Giver of these powers, that they should repose in indolence, or cease from producing those benefits and enjoyments which, when employed judiciously, they abundantly procure.

Men are much in the habit of complaining—some are always complaining of something. If they can not complain of their neighbors, or of their own bad luck or bad health, they must find a subject in the weather, or the government, or somewhat in the heavens above or the earth beneath. I should like to learn from the lips of one of the most inveterate of these complainers, the catalogue of its pleasures and profits. After hearing the meagre and pitiful catalogue, I might suggest a mode of employing himself or herself, as the case might be, which I would be willing to guarantee to produce ten-fold more pleasure, and a hundred-fold more profit. I would suggest that an inquiry should in every case be made into the cause of the sufferings or misfortunes complained of. Misfortune would so frequently be found the effect of mismanagement that, for very shame, the former complainer would not open his mouth. Suffering would be found not inevitable, and, therefore, in most cases only to be endured if we will passively lie down and let it come upon us. By this process of inquiry, there would be fewer complaints and more wise and happy men.

THE LORD OUR SHEPHERD.

BY REV. N. DOOLITTLE.

The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: He leadeth me beside the still waters. Yea though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me.—Psalm xxiii.

Such is the joyful reflection produced in the mind of the Psalmist by a strong conviction of the infinite goodness and protection of God. How beautiful and appropriate the figures he employs to express the parental care and beneficence of the great and adorable Parent of universal nature! When David penned this Psalm he must have been placed in cheering and prosperous circumstances. The sunlight of heaven was upon his path. Peace and tranquillity had taken possession of his soul. He is mindful of the many blessings of a spiritual and temporal nature which his Almighty Benefactor had poured forth around him.—He is also sensible that the kindly arm of Omnipotence had shielded his head in the day of battle—delivered him from the hand of his enemies and guided him on thus far amid the dangers and evils of life. Convinced of the unchangeable nature of the Divine Being, he was confident that the same kindness, mercy and protection of which he had shared would attend him though every period of his future existence. Hence he exclaims: "the Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want."—"He maketh me to lie down in green pastures." What figure could be better adapted to express those spiritual provisions which God has provided in the Gospel, to supply the moral wants of his children. In reference to them it was prophetically declared, I will abundantly bless her provisions. I will satisfy her poor with bread. This is that bread which came down from heaven to give life to the world.

"Ho all ye hungry starving souls,
That feed upon the wind,
And vainly strive with earthly toys
To fill an empty mind.

Eternal wisdom has prepared
A soul reviving feast,
And 'tis your longing appetites
The rich provision taste."

"He leadeth me beside the still waters."—How appropriate this expression to represent those fountains of divine love and mercy opened in the Gospel for our sinful and erring race!

For every thirsty longing heart,
Here streams of bounty flow
And life, and health, and bliss impart,
To banish mortal woe.

Happy is the soul that hath drank of the waters of salvation! Its peace is "as a river and its righteousness as the waves of the sea." It knows by sweet experience that "the work of righteousness is peace and the effect thereof quietness and assurance forever."

"Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil." How enviable the lot of the Psalmist; though placed amidst scenes of prosperity, with his cup overflowing with the blessings of divine goodness—yet the thoughts of death produce neither despair nor terror. There is one Being in whom we can confide for time and for eternity—whose sustaining presence will not be withdrawn in life nor death.—He was happy in knowing that the arms of eternal kindness were thrown around him—that he should rest forever secure in the pavilion of the Almighty.

O! how unspeakably happy are they, who, moving on in the chequered path of life can exclaim, the Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want. In this conviction they have a solace for every ill—a balm for every wound. The approach of death will be viewed with perfect calmness, sent to free their earth-bound spirits and introduce them to their final home in a brighter world and a fairer clime, where high and holy joys shall spring pure and fresh from the inexhaustible fountain of life and love forever more.

SCRAPS FROM MY DIARY.....NO. I.

"We shall have a first rate walk after all," said my eccentric friend Mrs. R., as we sauntered along the river's bank of a fine October morning. "Now I believe," she continued, "there is nobody in the world, (be it said in all humility,) that can give a better guess at the weather than myself, my weather-wise husband not excepted. Yesterday, the good soul promised a day without clouds, and it commenced raining forthwith—and this morning, he was so positive we should have 'rain and hail and snow,' that he gave up quite a pleasant little journey for the sake of watching his rain guage and barometer, (you know he is deep in Espy's new science of Meteorology,) and he declared that John should follow us with cloaks and umbrellas, though we deserved a soaking for our tenacity—we will have a good laugh at him on our return. But we are almost at the end of our walk."

And, sure enough, we had arrived in full view of the city of Dublin—a name which the home-loving sons of green Erin had pompously given a little village, composed of some sixty or seventy shanties, huddled together, and occupying an eighth of a mile in length, with a street of hardly waggon-width running between. In truth, Dublin junior was not a bad looking little city after all. True, the style of the buildings could hardly be termed Ionic or even Gothic, but they were of a style universally adopted by the canalling Irish, viz. the style of necessity. A little pine-board hut, roof nearly reaching the ground, a barrel-top chimney and a small square opening for light, complete the description. High oak hills rose precipitately on each side, and, a little in the distance, was the beautiful blue river, along whose margin were seen many rustic workmen trailing after them their muddy wheelbarrows and as blithe as the birds that caroled around them.

We passed down the street and encountered many a gossiping eye peering 'neath large lace caps, which are the universal wear with young and old. Washed clothes were hanging on every little bush about the doors, not realizing exactly the poetic phrase of "driven snow," but certainly bearing evidence of an ablutional attempt. Several laughing, half-clad urchins were amusing themselves with a large clever looking dog—some riding, some leading and some whipping him, all which he bore with an air of most enviable resignation. At the lower end of the street we perceived an unusual excitement—women and children darted up the steep hill-side as if in pursuit of some interesting object, and, as excitement is every thing in this moping every-day world, we followed after. The object of anxiety proved to be a child of two years old, who, to escape promised correction, had run away from his mother, and, wonderful to relate, climbed to the top of a tall slender pine sapling, to which he was clinging with his little pale hands, apparently in high glee at the success of his exploit.

"Mikey darlint," cried the mother in an agony of terror, "come down wid ye honey, and its never the likes of a stick I'll be after raisin to ye agin!" The little hero shook his head. "Come down wid ye Mikey and"—"Hush!" interrupted an old crone who had just arrived, "Is it the neck of him ye'd be after breakin wi yere palaver? He'll never climb down that same wi his two hands! Get up wid ye, Patrick Moony, and coax the spalpeen into yere arms!" Patrick started, but the youngster seemed determined to avoid the much dreaded beating by climbing still higher, an attempt which would inevitably precipitate him to the stone covered earth, as the attenuated tree-top was already bending with his weight. Patrick hurried back.

And now what more could be done? The child was evidently getting exhausted and somewhat dissatisfied with his uncomfortable position, and would, probably, in his extreme ignorance and wilfulness, attempt to ascend or descend, either of which would prove fatal. His poor mother could only groan. The rest of us were mute with harrowing expectation. At this crisis, a young lad who had left the spot and had returned unperceived, whispered softly to the distracted mother—"Talk to him, mother, and don't let him see me," and then, with rope in hand, scrambled up a large oak tree which fortunately stood near. We took the cue and made what noise we dared to attract the object of so much anxiety, and the ingenious brother, with a good deal of risk to himself, succeeded at length in getting the rope around the bodies of the tree and child together. How the little fellow writhed and fidgeted when he found himself fairly caught! "Hurry, Jem!" shouted the lad, and a tall Irishman dragged a ladder up the hill, and, placing it against a limb of the oak, the pine tree was soon bent down and the still fearful child placed safely in his weeping mother's arms.

"Bless the Holy Virgin!" shouted the old crone. "Praise the Lord!" fervently ejaculated Mrs. R., and I responded "amen!" with my whole heart. Our walk homeward was enlivened by many pleasing anecdotes and happy reflections, none of which, however, will I at present inflict upon the reader.

A FEW THINGS THAT I HATE TO SEE.

I hate to see a preacher, when travelling in company, try the speed of his horse!

I hate to see people, when they go to meeting, spend all their time talking politics, and about speculating! Such people do not think they make half the disturbance they do. It is sometimes very annoying to have two or three get into earnest conversation, and talk so loud, as to be heard all over the meeting-house, on some subject wholly uninteresting to a majority of those who compose the congregation. I have seen some, who were in the habit of conversing with those who set next them, and so earnestly, sometimes, would the conversation be, that it would be continued after the speaker had begun to read a hymn. I have seen preachers greatly embarrassed in consequence of it—and well they might be, for it is virtually telling them, "Our conversation is of more importance than your preaching!" Now this is wrong; for if these people do not care any thing about the preaching themselves, they should not disturb those who do.

To say nothing of the ungentelemanly appearance of those who thus spend their time; it is, certainly, a very poor practice, and contrary to the express object of meeting together. Reader, if you are in the habit of thus spending your time in the meeting-house, if you will fancy yourself in a congregation of two or three hundred, engaged in earnest discourse on some political question, and the whole congregation telling you by their looks, that they should be very happy to have you close your conversation, you will never indulge yourself in it again.

I hate to see Universalists, that Matt. xxiii 24, may be justly applied to! Their spirits are not so much of that of the Universalist, as of the "Universal-er."

THE RECORD.

Minutes of the Central Association of Universalists of Michigan—semi-annual session for 1837.

Met in Birmingham village, Oakland county, October 11th. United in prayer with Br. Stacy. Chose Mrs. A. Sweet, Moderator; E. Gage, Clerk; N. Stacy, T. Wheeler and C. Carter, committee on fellowship and ordination; A. H. Curtis, Dr. I. Wixon, and N. Stacy, committee to publish in our periodicals, and in the secular papers of Michigan, the place for holding our next annual session; and Clerk to prepare the Minutes and Circular.—Received letters stating the increase and prosperity of the church and society in Ann Arbor, and the societies in Birmingham, Rochester, Plymouth and Canton. Received the following societies into fellowship—Farmington, 26 members. John A. Nichols, Clerk; Oxford, small though spirited, Heman Calkins, Clerk. Voted, that as there is no Universalist periodical published in the State, and no one in particular that is taken by the brethren generally, thus rendering it difficult to notify all the believers in the State of the time and place of meeting, therefore the Minutes and Circular be published in pamphlet form, until we have a periodical devoted to our cause in the State—and recommended that all interested take up collections before each session, in their respective churches, societies and neighborhoods, and forward the amounts to the Council, to defray the expenses of such publication, and that it may be distributed gratuitously all through the State. Br. Stacy presented a reply to the resolution calling on him to prepare a memoir of his life, etc., passed at the last session, which reply was accepted and ordered to be published with the Minutes. Adjourned.

Sermons were delivered by ERS. Sweet, John vii: 37—Stacy, Dent. xxxiii: 16, 17—Wheeler, Mal. iii: 1, 2, 3—Wheelock, Rom. viii: 20, 21—Sweet, Luke xv: 1, 2—Stacy, John xxi: 17—closing addresses, by the same.

Delegates present.—J. Park, H. Castle, E. Gage, F. Belden, C. Carter, P. Ewell, J. Bixby, H. Hollister, D. N. Cowles, I. Wixon, N. S. Philbrick.

Clergy present.—N. Stacy, Ann Arbor; E. Gage, Birmingham; T. Wheeler, Washington; E. B. Wheelock, Farmington; R. Thornton, Itinerant; A. Sweet, Ohio.

The Circular states that it was a joyful meeting, and that the news received of the prosperity of our cause was very gratifying. This Association was organized only in June, 1836, and embraced but three societies—now it comprises one church, eleven societies, and several hundred members. Fifteen years ago, the section in its limits was a wilderness!

The Correspondence with Br. Stacy, referred to in the Minutes, will be found in another column.

MINUTES

Of the "Illinois State Convention of Universalists." First session—1837.

According to previous notice, the friends of Universalism met in Canton, Fulton county, Illinois, November 1st, 1837, and after prayer by Br. E. B. Mann, organized by choosing Br. Ephraim Rose, Moderator, and Br. A. R. Gardner, Clerk.

Voted, that we form ourselves into a State Convention; and appointed BRS. D. Emery, A. R. Gardner, E. B. Mann, J. P. Fuller, and H. Smith a committee to draft a Constitution. The committee reported a constitution, which was accepted. Voted to form a Book establishment, to be called the "UNIVERSALIST MISSISSIPPI VALLEY INSTITUTE," and that BRS. A. Brewer, E. B. Mann, and A. R. Gardner be a committee to draft a constitution. They reported a preamble and Constitution, which was adopted, as follows:—

PREAMBLE.—Whereas the diffusion of knowledge among men, is very desirable and beneficial to all classes of community, and every philanthropist should desire its extension, and use every reasonable exertion, to extend useful knowledge—and, Whereas there is a general want of information in regard to the faith of a denomination of Christians called Universalists, in the great "valley of the Mississippi," and as booksellers have neglected to supply the community with any of the published works of this denomination—Therefore it becomes those favorable to the sentiments of Universal salvation, to establish a medium whereby our friends in particular, and the community in general, may procure a general assortment of the published works of this denomination on the doctrine of universal salvation, and all others which may be deemed expedient, it is therefore unanimously

Resolved, that we, the members and delegates composing the "Illinois State Convention of Universalists," form an institution for that purpose, and adopt the following

CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I. This Institution shall be known by the name, and denominated the "UNIVERSALIST MISSISSIPPI VALLEY INSTITUTE."

ART. II. The object of this Institution shall be the promotion and diffusion of knowledge among men, and all the proceedings of this Institution shall be to effect that most desirable object.

ART. III. The officers of this Institution shall be. First, a Board of Trustees, of not less than three, nor more than twelve, as the Illinois State Convention of Universalists may, from time to time, determine—one third of which, after the first election, shall be elected at the annual session of said Convention, by that body.—Secondly, a Treasurer, who shall be elected for four years, by the Convention, and shall also act as Secretary.

ART. IV.—The Trustees when elected, shall have power to receive all money for the Institution, and when received, shall pay it over to the Treasurer, and take his receipt for the same—to give orders on the Treasurer for money to fulfil contracts, and make all contracts for the purchase of Books, and all other things for the benefit of the Institution they may deem expedient—examine the books of the Treasurer, from time to time—appoint agents, and see that the Treasurer executes a bond with sufficient security, in a sum sufficient to cover all moneys that may come into his hand, which bond shall be filed with the Standing Clerk of the Convention.

ART. V.—It shall be the duty of the Treasurer, before entering upon the duties of his office, to give bond and security, to be approved of by the Trustees, for the faithful performance of his duties, and to account for all moneys coming into his hands. And it shall be his duty to act as Secretary, and keep a true and faithful record of all transactions, and of all money received and paid out, in a book provided for that purpose, and to submit the same to the inspection of the Trustees at any time, and to present it to each annual session of the Convention for inspection. It shall be his further duty to receive all money belonging to the Institution, and give a receipt for the same to the Trustees, and do all other things ordered by the Trustees, and deliver all books, money, papers and all other things belonging to this Institution, to his successor in office.

ART. VI.—The revenue arising from any source to this Institution, shall be under the control and supervision of the "Illinois State Convention of Universalists," and the Trustees shall be guided in their transactions by the instructions of the Convention, when not inconsistent with this Constitution.

ART. VII.—No alteration or amendment shall be made in this Constitution, unless by a vote of a majority of two-thirds of all legal voters present at an annual meeting of the "Illinois State Convention of Universalists."

Voted that the following be a committee to solicit funds in their respective counties for the permanent establishment of the Institute—A. R. Gardner, Henderson, Knox county; James Wills, Canton, Fulton county; Clementius Ewals, Harkness Grove, Peoria county; J. B. Broadwell, Richland Creek, Sangamon county; Jacob Parker, Cold Brook, Warren county; Br. Thurston, Ottawa, for Putnam and La Salle counties. Voted thanks to Esq. Davis, Editor of the "Peoria Register," for publishing the notice calling the Convention. Appointed Br. E. B. Mann to preach the occasional sermon at next session, and Br. Gardner to prepare the Minutes and Circular for publication in the Peoria Register and the Magazine and Advocate, with a request that they be copied by our periodicals generally.

The following persons were chosen officers of the Convention for the ensuing year—Br. Jas. P. Fuller, Standing Clerk; BRS. A. R. Gardner, E. Rose and L. Chapin, Committee on fellowship and ordination; BRS. Harvey Smith, Thomas Wills, and Adam Brewer, Committee of discipline.

The following were elected officers of the Institute.—Trustees—Thomas Wills, one year; Hiram Snow, two years; Nicholas W. Jones, three years. Treasurer and Clerk—A. R. Gardner.

Adjourned to meet in Henderson, Knox county, on the second Friday in May, 1838, for a session of three days.

EPHRAIM ROSE, Moderator.

A. R. Gardner, Clerk.

The Circular states that they were blessed with delightful weather—a good attendance, and harmony in the Council. The cause is spreading rapidly, and the measures adopted are eminently calculated to meet the wants of the brethren, and give a new impulse to the spread of the truth. Five sermons were preached to devout and respectable congregations by BRS. Mann, Fuller and Gardner. It is earnestly hoped that every ministering brother in the region—every friend to the cause, will be present at the next session—and active, in the meantime, in promoting the objects of the Institute formed.

REMOVALS.—Br. F. A. Hodsdon from Amoskeag, N. H., to Levant, Me.—Br. Beckwith supplies at Amoskeag. Br. J. T. Goodrich, late of Clinton, requests his letters and papers to be addressed to Oxford, N. Y.—Br. John Nichols from Watertown to Quincy, Mass.—Br. N. Gunnison from Newport, N. H., to Browster, Mass. Br. J. Hariman, to Newport, N. H. Br. A. Bond to Constantia, St. Josephs county, Mich. Br. E. G. Brooks to West Amesbury, Mass. Br. C. C. Burr from Bowdoinham to Hallowell, Me. Br. J. T. Gilman takes Br. Burr's place in Bowdoinham. Br. H. Jewell from Salem, N. H., to South Reading, Mass. Br. L. L. Sadler, late of Columbus, to Perysburg, Ohio.

UNIVERSALISM IN BUFFALO.

We learn from the Herald of Truth, (what we had heard before from a private source,) that Br. Tomlinson's connection with the society in Buffalo has been dissolved, and that he is at liberty now to engage in any portion of his Master's heritage. The blessing of God go with him, and prosper his labors in the good cause to which he has devoted his talents and his life.

The day I received the above news in the Herald, I was much gratified at receiving a visit—with brevity alone for its alloy—from Br. D. Pickering, on his way to Buffalo, to supply the desk there. He has received and will probably accept the invitation of our friends in that city, to become their pastor. We rejoice in this accession to the ministry in the Empire State—made the second time—and pray God that the connection now formed may be abundantly blessed of him to the benefit of both pastor and people, and the prosperity of the great and good cause in that section of our country.

NEW SOCIETIES.—A new society was organized in Manchester, Ontario county, in September last. They contemplate erecting a meeting-house soon. One of fifty members was organized in Dyberry township, (Bethany,) Wayne county, Pa., in July last. Br. Landers labors there to good effect. One was organized in Winthrop, Me., in September last. They enjoy the labors of Br. Quimby part of the time, and have taken measures to erect a meeting house. Another has been organized in Hallowell, same State, and settled a preacher.

NEW MEETING-HOUSE.—The frame of a new meeting-house was raised in Westport (late Saugatuck,) Conn., in September. It is to be thirty by forty feet, and finished in neat style.

DEDICATIONS.—The new meeting-house in Stratford, Ct., was dedicated October 24th. The sermon was one of the happiest efforts of Br. S. J. Hillyer. The day was fine, the congregation large, and the house is a neat, tasty edifice thirty by forty feet, with gallery at one end. At the meeting of the Penobscot Association in Fiddington, Me., on September 20th, the new meeting-house in that place was dedicated. Sermon by Br. Bates. The new house in Newport, N. H., was dedicated on September 27th. Sermon by Br. A. L. Balch.

FAITH, HOPE AND CHARITY.

There are three principles which live in the believer's heart, and mark his conversation, and purify his life and quicken his heaven-ward impulses—and these are Faith, Hope and Charity. We may call them three cords which link earth to the skies—three blessed influences abroad in the world, lighting up its dark places and making glad the hearts of its mourners—three tokens that we are not abandoned of our God, and that man has within him a spiritual and an immortal nature. We shall speak of but the first of these at present.

And what is Faith? We can not enter into a minute and metaphysical description of it—nor broach the explanations of learned doctors—but we will take the words of the apostle, "Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen"—we will take this definition and consider it briefly, in what we deem its highest and holiest operation—a belief in what God has said, a clinging to his promises, and a grasping of future things, things which the Omnipotent hath said shall be, as though they were present and perceptible. And how soothing and peaceful is the action of this principle! To the individual possessing it, what is sorrow? what is sickness?—what are all the clouds which roll over the heavens and darken mortal vision?—what is death? Why, amid the weeping of the night, Faith sees the joy which cometh in the morning—by the bed of the stricken, it believes that God is able to lay his everlasting arms beneath the sick and raise to health again, and if it is not done, it gently murmurs "it is for the best." It says, the clouds which darken this world are but fleeting things passing beneath the everlasting and invariable light, and that above these are stars and beauty—vistas through which is almost heard the melody of distant spheres—through which is almost seen the bright brows of angels lifted above their lyres. And death, oh! death opens the portals to the land of the undying, the radiant and the fadeless—the land of the living and gushing waters, where is no pain nor sorrow—where are no tears, no shadows—"where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest." And the poor and the toil-worn of earth—bending beneath their burdens, how Faith has sustained them! And the persecuted and the down-trodden, how it has "buoyed their spirits up!" what a characteristic it has ever been of the good and the sainted in all ages of the world! The Patriarchs—the Prophets and the Apostles, Faith, faith was kindling upon the altars of their hearts. And Abel had it, and Enoch had it, and Noah had it! How it glowed in the bosom of pious Abraham as his eye caught the glorious promises and looked upon the innumerable multitude to be blessed by the coming of the Shiloh! And possessing "the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen," Isaac, and Jacob, and Joseph, and Moses, journeyed on in their pilgrimage rejoicing in the light of God's countenance and strengthened by the assurances of his word. And amid darkness and corruption—amid kings and mighty ones, the holy men and prophets fearlessly lifted their voices and performed their appointed work. They looked forward to a time when every valley should be exalted, and every mountain brought low, when Ethiopia should stretch out her hands to God, and the desert bud and blossom as the rose. Strongly, firmly, took they hold by faith of the promises of God and carried on their mission, shrinking not from violence, persecution and death.

But why should I recount what Paul has so eloquently set forth in his eleventh chapter to the Hebrews?—And why should I tell of the Christian Martyrs who clung to the stake as to the embrace of a friend, and moved to the faggots as to a sleeping bed? Oh! why should I tell, were I able, of all the manifestations of this holy principle which have shone forth in all time?

I would say, Christian, hast thou faith? Dost thou believe the promises of God? Art thou ready for that faith to sacrifice the social connections, wealth, health, life? Were the alternative presented thee to-day, to give up thy faith—or else be cast into the dungeon—be stretched upon the rack—or bowed upon the scaffold, which wouldst thou do?

But it is probable in this age thou wilt never be called upon in this way to test thy faith. But hast thou faith in all things? Hast thou faith when the earth has not yielded her increase and the harvest is thin in the fields? Hast thou faith when thy money has has taken wings and left thee poor and destitute?—Hast thou faith when the flame like some sudden and fearful thing has enwrapped thy dwelling? When “the fiery darts of the wicked” are aimed and hurled against thee, is thy “shield” up? Hast thou faith in sickness, in distress, in sorrow, in death? At all times and in all places, hast thou faith in the ever-living and unchangeable God? If so, brother, thou doest well. Let thy faith be founded on what God hath said and then cling to it with an unshaken grasp.

Cling to it, brother, we are pilgrims in a strange land, and there will come to us then airs from heaven and strains from the sweet harps of spirits! Cling to it brother, and thy burden will be light and thy labor easy. Oh! cling to it, brother, for life is but a brief path-way, and “the death Jordan is a narrow stream.” Cling to it, for the good, and the wise, and the holy, have done so—the patriarchs, the saints of old, the prophets and the apostles have held fast to it, and wouldst thou not follow in their steps? It has shed content in the hut of poverty, and peace by the bed of sickness.—It has illumined the prison’s gloom and wreathed flowers for the brow of the martyr. It has kindled in the eye of the dying, and “lit the tear as it fell” at the grave of the departed—cling to it, brother, for earth is so weary without it! Its beautiful things pass away, and its glories fade. But faith knows an eternal and a fadeless home. Oh! possess faith then, true faith, and it will furnish pinions for thy soul when ever it is weary, that shall bear it up from earth to heaven. E. H. C.

MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS.

Br. Price, in noticing favorably my suggestion for condensing the proceedings of our public bodies, and omitting from them all useless or “of course” particulars, says.

“The suggestions of Br. Grosh are all very good.—We see little occasion for varying them materially, and therefore cheerfully transfer them to our columns. We commend them to the serious attention of all those having any immediate concern with our public bodies. It is certain that a great amount of room occupied in our periodicals by the old method, can be saved and appropriated to a more useful purpose. It will be observed on recurring to the back volume of the Union, that we have practiced on the plan, to a considerable extent, in many instances, by condensing the proceedings.—Many times we have saved from one-third to one-half the room, and at the same time given all that was essential. It is considerable trouble, however, to write them out, and may just as well be done in the first record—indeed, better, for then there will be a uniformity, and no complaints can exist of favoritism in noticing some at large, and others in a condensed form.”

Br. Price also adds a suggestion that will be found useful in practice. It is, that the Standing Clerks, or some few of the more active individuals, would, previous to each session, properly prepare and classify the business to be transacted, that the Clerks may immediately commence their record, in the order in which it is to be published. Let sufficient space be allowed for the introduction of new business, and let the mover or introducer of such business, be prepared to do so with well digested and properly written resolutions. Thus the time of the Council will be saved, which is now wasted by the hurried, loose and informal manner of bringing business before it. Br. Price thinks that one-quarter of the time usually required on the present mode, will, by these proposed measures, be all sufficient for the transaction of the usual business. Oh, consummation devoutly to be wished!

One other of our periodicals has also favorably noticed my remarks on this subject, and pointed out the necessity which should render them heeded—but lest some may think publishers too deeply interested to give a fair decision, I will close by giving the remarks of a sound minded, common-sense, ministering brother, in whose opinions on all practical subjects I place great reliance. He says—

“I am well pleased with your plan to condense the minutes of Conventions and Associations, for it is tiresome to read over the same thing, again and again, so often. Were it not for the variations in names, dates and numbers, they, like circulars, might be stereotyped.”

I feel under a necessity of calling public attention to this matter, more than is convenient to me at this season, and more than may be pleasant to many of our readers; by the fact that many do not realize sufficiently the evils and the burdens of the common method. Last week, only, I received the proceedings of two of our Western associated bodies, which, in all, covered three and a half sheets, (14 pages) of cap paper—as much as would have filled about nine columns of our paper! Now every department is behind hand, and will need all the room we can gain to finish completely what properly belongs to this volume. The proceedings must then lie over until February, or I must drop every thing, pressed even as I am, and condense them by writing much of them over anew! This I have done—and, to gain room for them early, I publish them in the editorial department. Yet, after all my endeavors and sacrifices, some brethren interested may be dissatisfied—think I might have published the minutes and circulars entire, or complain that I have not given sufficient prominence to some particular portion! Such are some of the blessings which the present mode confers on Editors in a hurried season—and such are some of my reasons for so perseveringly and obtrusively urging a consideration of the subject at the present time. In the next volume I shall endeavor to carry my theory into practice, unless opposed by the brethren. So far, all with whom I have conversed, agree with me in the necessity for, propriety and advantages of, the new plan. A. B. G.

The following notice of a work recently published by Br. Tompkins, is from the Pearl and Galaxy. We presume “the Palfreys” to be the production of the pen of a fair and highly esteemed correspondent of the Magazine. She is one having the rare gift of poetry—for we believe it to be a rare gift, “the breathing or expression of that principle or sentiment, which is deepest and sublimest in human nature.” We are glad then that one holding the lyre has tuned it so often to Gospel strains, and breathed over its chords the aspirations of holiness.

It will be seen, also, by this notice as, indeed, it was known before, that the same writer is successful and happy in the department of prose writing. We venture to predict for her, yet higher eminence in the literary world, and while we thus prophesy, we express our trust that her powers will ever be dedicated to the service of our Master, and that in whatever manner she addresses the public, her thoughts will breathe of the pure and sanctifying principles of that Master. With these wishes we adopt the language of the last period of the following article as our own. E. H. C.

THE PALFREYS.—A Tale. By a lady, Boston: Abel Tompkins, 32 Cornhill.—This little work of seventy pages, neatly written, without useless episode or digression, is well suited to the juvenile mind, its design being to impress upon the reader the excellence of the Christian graces—those ornaments to the character of man. Lord Chesterfield in his letters to his son, endeavored to lead his mind to cherish the graces, and he concludes many of his epistles with the strong injunction, “study the graces.” Had that Lord read attentively the little work before us, he would have seen that the Christian graces will add much to the character of man, and he might have enjoined it, with more reason, upon his son, to study these graces. The levelness of early piety is exhibited in lives of simple sweetness, and we are sure that as the work is free from any sectarian bias, its hallowed spirit will impart an influence pleasing and grateful to the soul. We sincerely trust that the efforts of so happy a writer will be continued in the field upon which she has so successfully entered.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

TO AN INFANT SMILING IN SLEEP.

Whence, loveliest, that soft and radiant smile,
That so entrances her who bends above
Thy gentle, slumbering form? Thou hearest not
The one dear voice, that cheers thy waking-hours;
Nor seest the eye, whose love-oukinded glance
Calls ever forth thy young heart's joyousness,
E'en though it break through tears. Whence, then, the ray
That lingers on thy sweet and loving lips,
And on thy soft, half-curtained eyes of blue,
Making thy beauty of such cherub mould,
That she who bore thee, feels a thrill of fear
Lest, prematurely, Heaven should claim its own.

Porchance thy spirit, late from Eden's bowers,
Forgetteth not its spring-day happiness;
But walks in dreams beside the tree of life
And the eternal rivulet, whose dowers
Need not the aid of sun and life-fraught dews
To give them star-like beauty, but receive
Their wondrous hues from every varied glance
Of Him who smiles on all. Porchance the words
Of sister spirits fall upon thy ear,
Cheering thee, on thy lonely pilgrimage—
Thy path through thorns and tears—and thou dost smile
To think of that blest home where, freed from earth,
Thou shalt in heaven's triumphant melody
Bear a still higher part. Smile on, fair babe,
And revel in thy heaven-blent memories,
And dwell mid angel visions—ere the world
Hath set its seal oblivious on thy heart.
And thou canst look beyond this misty earth,
But through the glass of faith.

RELIGION.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

We pity the man who has no religion in his heart—no high and irresistible yearning after a better and nobler existence; who is contented with the sensuality and grossness of earth; whose spirit never revolts at the darkness of its prison-house, nor exalts at the light of its final emancipation. We pity him, for he affords no evidence of his high origin—no manifestation of that high prerogative, which renders man the delegated lord of the visible creation. He can rank no higher than the animal nature; the spiritual could never stoop so lowly.—To seek for beastly excitements—to minister with a bountiful hand to depraved and strong appetites—are attributes of the animal alone. To limit our hopes and aspirations to this world, is like remaining forever in the place of our birth, without ever lifting the veil of the visible horizon which bent over our infancy.

There is religion in every thing around us; a calm and holy religion in the unbrent things of nature, which man would do well to imitate. It is a meek and blessed influence, stealing in, as it were, unawares upon the heart. It has no terror—no gloom in its approaches—it does not rouse the passions. It is untrammelled by the creeds, and unshadowed by the superstitions of men. It is fresh from the hands of its author; and glowing from the immediate presence of the Great Spirit, which pervades and quickens it. It is written on the arched sky. It looks on from every star. It is on the sailing cloud, and in the invisible wind. It is among the hills and valleys of earth—where the shrubless mountain tops pierce the thin atmosphere of eternal winter, or where the mighty forest fluctuates before the strong wind, with its dark waves of green foliage. It is spread out like a legible language upon the broad face of the unsleeping ocean. It is the poetry of nature. It is this which uplifts the spirit within us, until it is tall enough to overlook the shadows of our place of probation; which breaks, link after link, the chain which binds us to materiality; and which opens to our imagination a world of spiritual beauty and holiness.—Liberalist.

ASPIRATIONS OF HUMANITY.

The principle of love, the sense of moral beauty, are not less deeply rooted in our constitution, nor have they been less active, than the less noble, the debasing passion of fear. Tradition, poetry, mythology, philosophy, are all rich in aspirations after something far purer, lovelier, brighter, than the world has ever seen. The feeling might be traced in a thousand intermediate forms, through the immense gradation from barbarian fictions of a golden age of innocence, to the lofty dreams, and unearthly reveries, and shadowings forth of spiritual perfection, in the mystical philosophy of Plato. All fiction tells this truth that humanity has the wish and the want for something above its present moral condition; and that while it is of the earth, earthy, it aspires to be, and would now see and love that which is as are the angels of God in heaven. Hence tales of long-past ages before the world grew corrupt, when all was infantine simplicity and innocence; and of coming ages when goodness shall re-appear and elevate the race perhaps to earthly immortality. Hence contemporaneous fictions of happy valleys and blessed islands, far in the West, where the sun shone benignantly after traversing a guilty and a troublous world. Hence the characters in whose conception romance and poetry delight, with all their godlike attributes. They are the prayer of the universal human heart to nature and to God to show us, though it be but for once, the blessed sight of humanity in its best estate, free from guilt, from weakness, from impurity, from selfishness, without stain, spot, or soil; the softened but unclouded reflection of its pure and holy Creator. And God granted the prayer in Jesus of Nazareth. There was the purity of infancy with the full development of maturity. There was tenderness without weakness, and energy without harshness. He benevolently consorted with the vilest, while his goodness shamed the righteousness of the severest. He was in the house of feasting and in the house of mourning, and the heart revered and blessed him in them both.—He was in the bosom of his Father and unfolded the truths of heaven and the mysteries of eternity, and the while his eye rested in love and gladness on the sparrow's wing and the lily's blossom. He wrought miracles and wiped away tears. He was not of the world; that world which he lived and died to redeem. By his side on the couch at the last paschal supper, by the foot of his cross as he was expiring, his eyes and heart rested on "the beloved disciple;" that heart whose universal benevolence so identified him with humanity that he was one with the whole human race, who all live in him as they died in their first progenitor; "for as by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead; and as in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive."—Rev. W. J. Fox.

It is much easier and more common to over-estimate human wickedness, than human weakness.

MARRIAGES.

DEATHS.

[The following has been omitted until this late hour for want of the proper particulars.]

In Fairport, Ohio, October 16th, Mr. JOHN CULVER, formerly of this city, aged 55 years. Dr. Culver fully exemplified the all-sustaining power of Universalism in adversity, sickness and death. For several years, he hung, as it were, on the brink of the grave, kept there by a painful abscess; but he looked into its gloomy depths with a serene eye, for he saw the glory of immortality beyond it. During all the long periods of pain and debility through which he passed, previous to his removal to the West, and afterwards until death, his language was that of the joyous exile ready to return to his Father and his home, and mourning only for those he should leave behind. His bereaved widow and son, beside some other of his relatives, are consoled by the hope that cheered him—a hope vast as the universe, glorious as heaven, and its fruition unending as eternity.

His body was brought to this city by his family, on their return to this vicinity, and attended to its last home by a respectable number of relatives and friends, to whom the writer tendered the consolations of the Gospel.

A. B. G.

In this city, on the 29th of November, WILLIAM WALTON, of the late firm of Walton and Hardaway, in the 53d year of his age. He was one of the excellent of the earth, and lived esteemed, and died regretted by all who knew him. His last years, though clouded by adversity, sickness and pain, only added to the brightness of his character, by clothing it with those Christian graces which shine most resplendent in surrounding gloom.—His death, easy as an infant's slumber, took place but a few moments after a visit to him in which I found him leaning on the bosom of his God, strong in the consolations of unfailing and universal goodness. His funeral took place on the Saturday following. A. B. G.

In Sandy Creek, Oswego county, October 6th, of consumption, Mr. JOHN CURRISS, formerly of Oneida county, in the 37th year of his age. He endured the protracted sufferings of his illness with patience, and met dissolution with the resignation of a sincere believer in God's impartial goodness. He has left an affectionate wife and two children, and an extensive circle of relatives and friends to mourn their early loss—but the most of them mourn not as those that have no hope. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the afflicted relatives on the 8th, by Br. S. Jones, in the Methodist meeting house of that place, which was kindly opened for the occasion.—Com.

In Hamilton, November 12th, ISAAC BUTTLES, aged 31 years. Br. Buttles in early youth was deprived of the use of both hands, by falling into the fire; but by his skill and perseverance he maintained himself and family during health. But his widow, who is also lame, is now left with two small children, one of them ill of a fever, needs the consolations of the Gospel, and the assistance of the benevolent. May our brethren and sisters remember that the religion of Jesus, is practically what it is in theory, full of mercy and good fruits, and leads to visiting "the fatherless and widows in their afflictions," as well as "to keep ones self unspotted from the world." J. B.

In Lenox, Madison county, October 15th, DOROTHY WHITE, consort of Abraham White, aged 36 years, leaving five small children (one, a helpless infant) and an affectionate husband to mourn their loss. A fond mother, surrounded by a happy family, has thus been hurried from them, as it were, in a moment, leaving a void in their earthly bliss which time can never fill. But they are consoled with the assurance of a reunion in another world, where joys are purer, affections more refined, and where death, nor sorrow, nor parting are ever known, and where God, our Father, is the all in all of every member of his vast family.—Com.

In Toledo, Ohio, October 24th, Mr. JOHN BALDWIN, aged 37 years. Mr. Baldwin was an early settler of that town, and a man of active business habits. He held the office of Justice of the Peace for the term of seven years—was subsequently appointed Judge of the Court of Common Pleas by the Governor, and afterwards by the Legislature of the State. These offices he filled with credit to himself, and with general satisfaction to the people. His death will be deeply felt by the inhabitants of the place to whom he was generally known; and by whom esteemed. His burial took place on the following day, when the consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the relatives of the deceased, and a large concourse of sympathising citizens, who came to pay the last tribute of respect to the departed. PROSPECTUS.

OF THE FIFTH VOLUME OF THE HERALD OF TRUTH.

To commence January 1st, 1838. Published in Rochester, New-York.

We again invite the attention of our patrons, and the Universalist public, in behalf of the HERALD OF TRUTH, a periodical devoted to the dissemination and defence of the principles, both doctrinal and practical, of Universalism, or "the Gospel of the grace of God." We are obliged to call loudly on our friends for help. As we have not paying subscribers enough to meet the expenses of the establishment, our labors are consequently embarrassed, and we have not been able to do that justice to the paper, that we otherwise might. It is a truth which we have no wish to conceal, that unless we have a considerable accession to our patronage, we can not close the next volume without incurring a heavy debt. Anticipating renewed exertions in our behalf, we venture to commence another volume.

The HERALD OF TRUTH will be published as heretofore, every Friday, on a royal sheet quarto form, at $1.50 in advance, $2.00 if not paid within three months, and $2.50 if not paid within the year. We earnestly look to our friends, from the West particularly, for aid in extending the circulation of this periodical.

LECTURE,

Delivered before the Utica Berean Institute.

BY R. T. HALLOCK.

It was remarked by Addison, in one of the numbers of his Spectator, that it was not to be expected, in this late age of the world, any new ideas should be brought to light—that the knowledge and wisdom of antiquity had left nothing for us to do, but to remodel old ideas, clothe them in new language, and in brighter colors. But if this observation was true in Addison's time, with how much more propriety may it be applied to our own; and how much less may we hope to produce any original ideas, or add any thing to the vast treasures which have been for ages accumulating in the store-house of knowledge! For this reason, I have attempted nothing new; but, on the contrary, have chosen a subject for this evening's lecture, which has employed the pens of thousands, and has elicited such interest, such eloquence, and such deep research, as might well preclude me from entering into the same field, were it not that the subject itself is exhaustless!

The principal object of this lecture, then, will be to prove the existence of a GREAT FIRST CAUSE, as deduced from a comparison of the works of art with the works of nature. "The proper study of mankind is man," says the poet: and whence came we? what are we? and what is to be our destiny? are the most important questions which the mind of man can ask of itself. Ushered into being the weakest and most helpless of all animal existence, we see in him the dawn of an intellect, which, in its development, grasps at creation, and makes "fire, air, and earth the vassals of its will!" The earth is one vast store-house of materials, out of which human ingenuity has constructed a creation of its own—a creation which, when we take into consideration the weakness and imbecility of its author, is wonderful beyond the power of expression! Be not startled, therefore, when I say, that similar genius, similar intellect, and similar knowledge of the laws of cause and effect which produced a steamboat, created a world! The same adaptation of the means to the end which marks that wonderful monument of human genius, is equally characteristic of the works of nature; and the steam engine proves not more clearly the existence of human intellect, than do the phenomena of nature prove a God! Man in the mechanical arts, is the imitator of Nature, or rather, the same kind of knowledge which the almighty Architect must have possessed in arranging and giving permanency to his works, is apparent in his creature, man. Thus we support our buildings by braces, for we know they would have no permanency without them—and these braces we proportion to the size of the building. Now, if we will look at a stalk of Indian corn, which is calculated to sustain a great weight in proportion to its size and strength, we shall see a display of the same ingenuity; for, a few inches above the root, and just in time to support the accumulating weight of the growing ear, appears a set of braces, running from them to the ground. Now what is all this but ingenuity and contrivance? And wherein does it differ in design from our own? It does not differ, for we support our buildings in the same manner. The white oak, which is many years in coming to maturity, and consequently has to stand the peltings of many a storm, is constructed upon mechanical principles; and the Eddystone light-house, a structure which will probably stand the concussion of winds and waves through all coming time, was built after the model of an oak tree! Thus, the wisdom which caused the tree to assume a shape so necessary to its maintenance in an upright posture, is the same kind as that which marked the fact and applied the principle to the erection of a tower.

The feathered tribes, particularly such as are adapted to swimming, exhibit wonderful ingenuity and contrivance in their construction. They are propelled by paddles, on the same principle as a steamboat, and without which, neither could make any headway in their liquid element. They are also supplied with oil, to render their feathers water-proof, as without it, their buoyancy would be very much diminished; and in the construction of vessels, oakum and tar are used for the same purpose. In short, our steamboat is nothing but an automaton bird, which our ingenuity has supplied with power to "walk the waters like a thing of life!"

In these simple and familiar examples, we see the same ingenuity which characterizes the works of art, only in the former case the principle is carried to an infinitely greater extent. Nature's machines are all perfect in their kind—they all move on in harmony and order; where braces are wanted, they are made to grow, and where paddles are necessary, they are supplied. Strange, indeed, as it may appear, it is nevertheless true, that this very order and regularity in the works of nature, has induced some to think that its operations were performed by its own internal impulse. This is just as an ignorant person, unacquainted with the nature of steam, would think, were he placed beside an engine in motion. While he contemplated the exhibition of its mighty power, he would doubtless conclude, that wood and iron had taken unto themselves motion, and were performing the functions of living and breathing things! To him all would be inexplicable, and the very perfection of its movements, would induce him to think that it was the offspring of its own power. But, place a man capable of tracing effects to their causes, in the same situation, and how different would be his thoughts! He would never deem, because the agent was invisible, that it did not exist. He would be aware that wood and iron possess no power in themselves to produce this result; for he knows that matter in itself possesses no property of motion, and moves only as it is impelled by superior force. And has the machinery of a steam engine been produced by mind, and the machinery of nature without mind? The most stupid dogma that ever disgraced the darkest age of the world, is not more inconsistent than such a supposition. But the careful observer of the works of nature, sees the same design manifested therein, which he sees in the works of art, and hence he is just as certain of the existence of a designer in one case as in the other; and in the mind of man he sees a copy (in miniature) of that mighty mind by which worlds were brought into existence, and their various laws and operations modified and arranged.

The substance of the foregoing arguments, may be condensed into the following syllogism, viz:—

The works of art prove, beyond all contradiction, the existence of an artist;

The works of nature are similar to the works of art;

Therefore, nature had an Artist.

But, says the objector, "if from the evidence of design you infer a Designer, from whence did He originate?—who made HIM!" Now, this being a question which no man can answer, it has been supposed, by some, to be a total overthrow of the whole argument. Let us examine its validity. I readily grant, that we do not know the origin of the Creator; I acknowledge there are mysteries annexed to the subject—and I rejoice that it is so; I glory in that ignorance! For what kind of a God would he be, that we, with our limited abilities, could fathom and fully comprehend? Such a God could be neither greater nor wiser than ourselves—because, for us to know and comprehend the existence of Deity, as we comprehend each other, he must be brought down to a level with our own capacity. But there are depths which reason can not fathom, and heights which it can not scale; and as he who has mastered Euclid's problems, is as wise as Euclid, so he who can comprehend Deity, must be himself God! But we can only know God through his works, "for no man hath seen him at any time;" yet what folly would it be for us to doubt his existence, because that existence is wrapped in mystery, when the simplest thing in nature is to us inexplicable, and as incomprehensible as the God who created it! But if we doubt the existence of God, on the ground of the incomprehensibility of his nature and origin, we must doubt the existence of a blade of grass, for the same reason. Could an ignorant man expect to understand the nature of that mighty mind which first conceived the steam engine, when the engine itself was above his comprehension?

I have said we can only know God through his works, and so we can only judge of his character by his works. These works shew wisdom and benevolence in their design, and power in their execution. Hence, wisdom, benevolence, and power, are the attributes of their Author; but beyond this we can know nothing—all is dark, inscrutable, mysterious! But the existence of a great First Cause, is the easiest of all beliefs—it being forced upon the mind from necessity—there being no other way of accounting for the phenomena of nature; and for this reason the poet beautifully observes—

"Not books on books, in phalanx deep,
Need we, to prove a God is here;
The daisy, fresh from Winter's sleep,
Proclaims the truth in lines as clear.

"For who but HE that arched the skies,
And pours the day-spring's living flood—
That works and dwells in mysteries—
Could rear the daisy's purple bud;

"Mould its green cup, its wiry stem—
Its fringed border nicely spin—
Or cut the gold-embossed gem,
That, set in silver, gleams within;

"And fling it unrestrained and free,
O'er hill and dale and desert sod;
That man, where'er he roams, may see
In every step the stamp of God!"

The existence of God, then, being established, an answer to the three questions to which I alluded in the commencement of this lecture, becomes comparatively easy. First—Whence came we? We are aware that we did not make ourselves—we are equally sure that our ancestors did not make themselves—and we must naturally suppose that it was no easier for a man to have made himself five thousand years ago, than it is now. By this mode of reasoning, we are necessarily carried back to a time when man was not. Now, the same reason which led the poet to ascribe the origin of the daisy to the almighty Architect of the universe, applies equally to man. Man, then, with all his various organs and wonderful symmetry of form, is not the offspring of chance—he had a Maker—he came from God!

Secondly—What are we? Having deduced our origin from Jehovah himself, we must stand to him in the relation of offspring. We are, then, the children of God—bearing the same relation to him that our children do to us, with this difference: in a few short years the mental and physical capabilities of our children will be developed, and they will take their station in the scale of beings, our equals. But in reference to our heavenly Father, we shall be forever children. Though we may rise higher and higher in the scale of perfection, we can never reach the summit, for the Almighty alone is there; and “to the veil of his brow” all the light of created intellect “is dim.”

Thirdly—What will be our destiny? Having, as I think, clearly deduced the existence of a great First Cause, and traced from the similarity of our nature with his, our connection with him, this most interesting and important question can not be very difficult of solution.

In vain do men assume an indifference on the subject of futurity. In vain do they endeavor to cheat themselves into the belief, that it is immaterial to them whether they shall be blessed with endless felicity in another mode of existence, or die and be dissolved into the elements. Man can not be thus indifferent. The desire of happiness is too strongly implanted in the human mind, to admit for a moment of this indifference.

I assert from the premises, that man is immortal; and by immortality, I mean endless duration connected with the consciousness of existence, or the knowing that we exist individually. Without this consciousness, immortality would be a mockery. It will doubtless be admitted, by those at least who admit a great First Cause, that the Being who called us into existence in the first place, can continue that existence if he pleases. And why is it any more improbable that we should continue our existence in another state, than that we should have commenced it in this? Besides, the productions of the mind, i. e. our thoughts, are capable of immortality. “Statues of brass or marble,” says a beautiful writer, “will perish; and statues made in imitation of them, are not the same statues, nor the same workmanship, any more than the copy of a picture is the same picture. But print and reprint a thought a thousand times over, and that with materials of any kind—carve it on wood, or engrave it on stone—the thought is eternally and identically the same thought in every case. It has a faculty of unimpaired existence, unaffected by change of matter, and is essentially distinct, and of a nature different from every thing else that we know or can conceive. It, then, the thing produced, has in itself a capacity of being immortal, it is more than a token that the power which produced it, which is the mind, can be immortal also; and that, as independently of the matter it was first connected with, as the thought is of the printing or writing it first appeared in. The one idea is not more difficult to believe than the other, and we can see that one is true. Now, the consciousness of existence is not necessarily confined to the same form nor to the same matter, even in this life. We have not in all cases the same form, nor in any case the same matter, which composed our bodies twenty or thirty years ago; and yet we are conscious of being the same persons. The most beautiful parts of the creation to our eye, are the winged insects, but they are not so originally: they acquire that form and that inimitable brilliancy, by progressive changes. The slow and creeping caterpillar-worm of to-day, passes in a few days to a torpid figure and a state resembling death; and in the next change, comes forth, in all the miniature magnificence of life, a splendid butterfly. No resemblance of the former creature remains—every thing is changed—all his powers are new, and life is to him another thing—yet we can not conceive that the consciousness of existence is not the same in this state of the animal as before.”

Hence I infer that man is capable of immortality, and of retaining the consciousness of existence in any form which it may hereafter assume. And “though it doth not appear yet what we shall be,”

it matters not—secure in the thing itself, let us leave the manner of it to the all-wise Being who created and will dispose of us according to the dictates of best wisdom! But the desire of immortality itself, is one of the strongest evidences in support of it—for why should this, the most natural desire of the mind, remain forever unsatisfied, when our most common wishes are provided with the means of gratification? Not a single propensity, passion, or inclination, connected with our temporal well-being, but may be satisfied to the full. Do we hunger?—look at the ample provision for its satisfaction. Do we thirst?—see the limpid streams bursting from every hill-side, and fertilizing every valley. Do we require clothing?—from both the animal and vegetable kingdoms we are abundantly supplied. And with this ample provision for the comforts of an hour, shall we ask for immortality and be met by ANNIHILATION? Reason and common sense alike forbid it!

Again—if this desire is destined to end in total disappointment, upon what principle of justice has ability been conferred upon man to conceive of it? Why should he alone be permitted to entertain desires that earth can never satisfy? The inferior animals, when their physical wants are supplied, appear to be perfectly happy; they have no anticipations of the future, and no idea of death. Man alone knows that “this is not his continuing city,” and this knowledge prompts him to look for another.

A word, now, on the consequences of this immortality, and I have done. It must have been conferred upon mankind for some purpose. The Creator must have had a design in this as well as in every thing else. He never acts without a reason, as all his works abundantly testify. But to bring a race of beings into existence, and to immortalize that existence for the purpose of punishment, would be ascribing to God a course of conduct which we would not wish to impute to ourselves. It would be acting in direct contradiction to that benevolence which is displayed every where in his works. It would be as if we should erect a splendid mansion—decorate it within and without with every thing beautiful and lovely—compel tenants to occupy it—and then reward them for that occupancy, with the blackness of despair and the horrors of interminable woe! But this can not be. We were created for a better purpose than merely to satisfy vindictive wrath. Reason and philosophy, when unfettered by superstition, point to a better destiny—they assure man that he is not a mere “clod of the valley”—they point upward to their own high origin—they tell of brighter realms and purer skies, where the mind of man, which has but commenced its development on earth, shall continue it in the Paradise of God!

REPENTANCE.

BY REV. F. HITCHCOCK.

Mankind are frequently called upon in the Scriptures to repent, but we have never been able to find an instance of their being threatened with endless punishment to make them repent. At this day, nothing but the fear of hell in the future world, is presented to the sinner's mind as an inducement for him to repent. A Methodist preacher, in this vicinity, was recently holding forth on the beauties of his favorite theme, endless damnation. He had preached the terrors of that awful pit to his hearers, for the purpose of bringing them to repentance, until his patience was well nigh exhausted, when he gave vent to his feelings by declaring, that he had sometimes wished that the sinner could feel the awful wrath of God for a moment! that he might know what would be his portion forever, if he did not repent, etc. His meaning obviously was, that he wished the sinner might be in hell a moment, to awaken him to a sense of his danger. Poor soul! he finds that people are beginning to exercise reason upon religious subjects, as they do upon others—and, consequently, his unsupported threatenings of endless damnation pass off like the whistling of the idle wind. He has not yet learned of Paul, that the “goodness of God leadeth to repentance.” He appears to be a disciple of Nebuchadnezzar, who, when he had set up his great golden image, threatened the people with a “burning fiery furnace,” to make them fall down and worship it. Nebuchadnezzar, not only threatened, but put his threat in execution—and so it seems our Rev. Methodist brother possesses the will, if he has not the power, to make the sinner feel the pangs of infinite despair. This appears to us a little like the spirit of John Calvin—but we will impute no bad motives to our brother, but admonish him to lay aside the creeds of men, and preach Christ, and him crucified. If he would lead men to repentance, he must preach the “goodness of God” to them. If he would persuade men to love God, he must convince them that God loves them. And we most earnestly pray that his eyes may yet be opened to the truth, and that he may become an able and bold defender of the “Gospel of the grace of God.”

LOVE OF POPULARITY.
BY REV. J. G. MCADAM.

A more bewildering passion than the love of popularity, can not occupy the mind. The splendor of its sunshine is so dazzling, so deceptive, that many are led away from their devotion to principle, to bask in its radiance. It is well to gain a name—it is well to strive earnestly after those qualities and attainments, which pave the way to an honest fame—to drink at those streams which will enable us to bear the heat and burden of the day, in running the race of virtue—to eat that food which will give us strength to fight the good fight—to fill our quiver with well formed shafts, that our aims may come as nigh the mark as others—it is well to gain, by every honest means, a name as great, as famed as that of other men;—but if in the path of duty—if in adherence to principle, the star of hope looks dim, to wander from that path—to abandon those principles, must eventually enrobe that star in an eternal cloud. How much more peaceful—how much more glorious is the unseen path of him who, for virtue's sake, pursues his peaceful way, bearing the high stamp of honesty upon his brow, and the heart that thinks no evil in his breast; than is his, who, to gain a crowded path, would break the cords of virtue and tread on sacred things!

This is the way which many take, but it is a way too broad to lead to life. The way to life is straight and narrow, and few are walking there. To unmoor oneself from the safe anchorage of eternal truth—to change with every breeze, to ebb and flow with every tide, to assume the changing hues of the chameleon, is to undo oneself forever. If a Franklin's or a Howard's fame could be gained by every thing that spreads a sail upon the tide of hope—if an honest notoriety could be gained by every changeling of the day, an article so cheap would soon become a tinsel brooch which every fool might wear upon his breast. Even mushroom popularity can not belong to every one that swells a crowd. Many who rush there to be seen, only crowd into concealment, or appear as cyphers to another's unit. Much less can renown be gained by craft. It can not be bought by flattery, else why the ceaseless flame upon the simple grave of Ayrshire's rustic poet, when his proud compeers, who, living, wore a star upon the breast, but died to mingle in forgetfulness! Or why flourishes the fame of Washington in fadeless beauty, beneath the star gemmed banner of his country, when his proud rivals are only seen as the shades upon the canvass, and the better show his loveliness? Why? because fame admits none but demi-gods into her temple—she gives her wreaths and crowns to men of tried virtue—to men consistent in their rectitude—to men whose nobleness of soul leads them as far above the crowds who, hunting popularity, herd the crowded temple, and lick the dust around the altar of their hope—as far above the menials who bend a servile knee to fame, as the heavens are above the earth! Fame can not be gained as we would win a race—it can not be bought as we would buy a robe—it can not be placed upon our heads as we would place a mitre on our brow. Its smiles, and robes, and crowns, are beyond the Hero's ken. They are things that other hands must shape—they are things that, dew-like, sparkle on the long grass of the grave!

Therefore, those men whose childish natures lead them to wear their honors now, must have such as a busy world can give—a world busy with its present wants—busy searching among the ruins of the past for broken columns of an antique mould, or for spirits to embalm—busy raising monuments to those who, though in the vaults of death, still live and speak. Wreaths plucked in haste live but a day. The pillar of mushroom growth, like a mushroom dies. Those who love such wreaths, can buy them very cheap—those who choose to run such races, can easily gain the mark—those who wish to fight such battles, can easily chase a thousand men. But none will enter in these lists but silly men; for the prize is dross and shame. And as the nobler kind is reserved for few, and hung up in the porches of the future, not to be awarded until, like gold seven times purified, the hero's fame shines in undimmed brightness—why, then, should we vainly hope to win in life, what we never can gain in life. But knowing this, why search it in a crowd?

There is but one name which all can earn—which all can wear without a blush—it is the name of honesty—honesty in its highest sense. There is a goal which all can reach—there is a crown which all can gain—goodness—the only true greatness. And there is an immortality in store for all who love to soar on everlasting wing—that immortality is life beyond the grave. Peace on earth, and hope beyond the grave, are easily won. Pilgrim, seek, and you shall find.

CREEDS AND CONFESSIONS OF FAITH.

In an article on Episcopalianism, in the thirty-third number, current volume, Br. Grosh remarks, that its creed, or "Thirty-nine Articles of Faith," are used, not to be believed, but merely to be signed. To such "vile uses" have we known other similar documents put. In the Church of Scotland, Presbyterianism and its Confession of Faith, reign in all their glory; but not to the exclusion of almost every variety of religious opinion among the clergy of that Church. We have it upon good authority, that there are not a few of her ministers who believe in the truth of opinions professed by Unitarians, Universalists, and other liberal Christians, who, nevertheless, attach their names to the Confession of Faith—that precious document for preserving uniformity of faith. Even the seats of learning, whence issue the clergy of that church, are not free from suspicions of heresy. Not twenty years ago, an eminent Greek scholar, the son of an Episcopalian bishop, succeeded in being elected to a Professorship in one of the universities of Scotland. The installation came, and with it the scene of subscribing to the creed of a church to which neither the new Professor nor his fathers belonged. Many anxious eyes were upon it, and upon the Professor, who was not considered quite so orthodox as John Knox. The Confession was at length presented, and he who presented it for signature, simply enough asked the Professor elect, if he believed it. This the learned gentleman very well knew "was not in the bond." "With that," said he, "I believe you have nothing to do—hand it here, and I'll sign it."

A VOICE FROM FANUEIL HALL.

"The Cradle of Liberty" has again been put in motion, and an increasing, dreadful and relentless foe—because internal instead of external—must sink to rise no more. The question is not whether we will pay a two penny tax on a pound of tea, not imposed by our proper representatives; but whether we shall relinquish the right of speaking our thoughts whenever a majority of our several neighborhoods declare those thoughts disagreeable to them! The liberty of speech and of the press, is dearer far to every freeman, than even the right of representation; for without the first, the latter is of no avail—can not truly exist. Hence the grief and shame every reflecting mind has felt, at the rising of lawless, brute force to put down opinions, however erroneous (as the destruction of the press and of several valuable lives in Baltimore, in 1811, or driving the Mormons from their lands in Mississippi)—or to prevent the assembling of people for whatever purpose, (as the anti-abolition mobs in New-York, Utica, Boston, and elsewhere)—or to obtain summary redress for supposed grievances which were even without the reach of law (as the anti-bank mob in Baltimore, and the anti-gambler mobs in Vicksburg). I care not for what purpose mobs are raised, they are a far worse evil than any evils they can be used to exterminate. It is a devil easy to raise, but difficult to manage, and harder to lay again. Anarchy is the worst of all despotisms—and mobism is the worst form even of anarchy! I rejoice, therefore, that, at last, our whole community is awakened to this subject by the tragedy at Alton—that even of that affair, the slaveholding States are speaking out in tones of reprobation and indignant foreboding. But of all the expressions of public sentiment yet seen by me, the following resolutions, (said to have been penned by Dr. Channing,) passed at a public meeting of the citizens of Boston, in "Old Fanueil," seem to me to be the most firm and mild, just and temperate, correct, severe, and yet conciliatory. The moral force and strict truth of the 7th, 8th and 11th resolutions, are worthy of especial and frequent consideration—and the 10th appeals to every man's conscience who has yet been silent on the subject, and carries us back to revolutionary times, when far less aggressions on a citizen's rights, sent an earthquake of public indignation through every part of the land—while the calmness, mildness and affection of the 13th resolution, is "just the thing." Let all imitate the spirit, and act up to the principles of these resolutions, and mobism and Lynch laws will soon be known only as things that were, but are not. Amen.

A. B. G.

1. Resolved, That our civil and religious liberties, which have come down to us from our fathers, sealed with their blood, are a most precious bequest, and that when liberty is invaded, this consecrated hall is the chosen spot where its friends should meet together to pledge themselves to its support.

2. Resolved, That we are assembled here to assume the badge of no party, to narrow ourselves to no local or temporary interests, but to maintain the supremacy of the laws, and to give expression and support to those universal principles of justice and freedom, on which popular institutions and the hopes of philanthropy rest.

3. Resolved, That it has pleased God to commit to this people, above all others, the cause of human freedom; that we are called to the high office of manifesting the power of free institutions to ennoble and bless a people; and that in proving false to this trust, we shall not only cast away our own happiness, but shall betray the interests of the human race, and shall deserve the condemning sentence of all nations and of future times.

4. Resolved, That to offer violence to the rights of the citizen in a free country, where these rights are understood and recognized and taken under protection of the laws, is a more heinous crime and of more fatal influence, than the oppressions of absolute hereditary power.

5. Resolved, That among our rights, we hold none more dear than the freedom of speech and the press; that we look to this as the guardian of all other rights, and the chief spring of human improvements; so that to wrest it from the citizen, by violence and murder, is to inflict the deepest wound on the republic.

6. Resolved, That by the ordination of Providence, we are passing through a stage of society, in which principles and institutions are subjected to the severest scrutiny; and that, in such a period, earnest conflicts of opinion can not be escaped, and ought to be cheerfully endured as inseparable from the exercise of a privilege which is essential to the progress and best interests of the human race.

7. Resolved, That it is the fundamental idea of the freedom of speech and the press, that the citizen shall be protected from violence, in uttering opinions opposed to those which prevail around him; that if by such freedom nothing more were intended than the liberty of publishing what none would deny, then absolute governments might boast of it as loudly as republics; so that, to put the citizen in peril, on the ground that he presumptuously perseveres in uttering what is unpopular, or what the majority do not approve, is to assail this freedom in its very foundation, and to destroy its very life.

8. Resolved, That in a free country, the laws enacted according to the prescriptions of the Constitution, are the voice of the people, and are the only forms by which the sovereignty of the people is exercised and expressed; and that, of consequence, a mob, or a combination of citizens for the purpose of suspending by force the administration of the laws, or of taking away rights which these have guaranteed, is treason against the people, a contempt of their sovereignty, and deserves to be visited with exemplary punishment.

9. Resolved, That the spirit of mobs is a spirit of indiscriminate destruction; that when the press shall have become its prey, its next victim will be property; that there is no power on earth so terrible as human passion, unbridled by principle and law, and inflamed to madness by the sympathies of a crowd; and that if we silently and passively abandon any portion of our fellow citizens to this power, we shall have no right to complain, when our own turn shall have come to feed its rapaciousness and fury.

10. Resolved, That in this country the mightiest influence is public opinion; that mobs can not prevail without a criminal apathy in the public mind; that one of the darkest omens of our times, is the indifference with which the nation has looked on the triumphs of lawless force; and that the time is now come for this people to shake off their lethargy, to vindicate the insulted majesty of the laws, and to pronounce a sentence on unprincipled violence, which the reckless and turbulent will be unable to withstand.

11. Resolved, That when a fellow citizen has been destroyed in defending property and the press, it is alike weak and criminal to reproach him as responsible for the deed, because he refused to surrender his undoubted rights at the command of his murderers; that with equal justice the highwayman may throw the blame of his crime on the slaughtered traveller, who refuses when summoned to surrender his purse; and even if our fellow-citizen who recently fell in defence of the freedom of the press, was driven by the violence which assailed him, into rash and injudicious deeds, we are bound so to express our grief as in no degree to screen his lawless assailants from the reprobation which is their due.

12. Resolved, That the Christian is not authorized by his religion to look with indifference on public affairs, and that he ought particularly to be roused by acts of cruelty and violence, which degrade our country to the level of heathenism.

13. Resolved, That we deem this occasion too solemn for the language of passion; that we have come to this place to establish and diffuse the principles of order and peace; that we acknowledge our obligation to cherish in the community a spirit of mutual forbearance and good will; and that we earnestly desire, whilst we vindicate the rights of speech and the press, that these may be most conscientiously exercised in obedience to the dictates of justice and philanthropy.

14. Resolved, That our affection for our country is undiminished, by the public crimes by which it is dishonored; that we implore for it the blessing of Almighty God; and that we pledge ourselves, according to our power, to sustain its laws, to give stability to its union, and to transmit its free institutions unimpaired to posterity.

CHARACTER OF CHRIST.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

No character presents such a variety of beautiful traits, as that of Jesus Christ. Whatever view we take of it, excites astonishment and awe. In all other beings who have appeared on our earth, there has been some stain—some faults have always been discoverable. But here every virtue meets—every thing that is lovely and pure seems to mingle together, like the varied colors of the rainbow, or like the light of a thousand suns centering in one point. His power and wisdom merged into benevolence. His whole soul was filled with love. It was his delight to alleviate human sufferings. In fine, so many noble qualities were never seen before in our world. No wonder, then, that the officers, when sent to take him, were so overpowered by his heavenly wisdom, that they returned without their victim, saying, "Never man spoke like this man." "And the Centurion, when he saw what was done, glorified God, saying, certainly this was a righteous man." "Never," says Bishop Newcome, "never was a character at the same time so commanding and natural, so resplendent and pleasing, so amiable and venerable. There is a peculiar contrast in it, between an awful greatness, dignity, and majesty, and the most conciliating loveliness, tenderness, and softness. He now converses with prophets, lawgivers, and angels, and the next instant he meekly endures the dulness of his disciples, and the blasphemies and rage of the multitude. He now calls himself greater than Solomon, one who can command legions of angels, and giver of life to whomsoever he pleaseth, the Son of God, who shall sit on his glorious throne to judge the world; at other times we find him embracing young children—not lifting up his voice in the streets, nor quenching the smoking flax—calling his disciples, not servants, but friends and brethren, and comforting them with an exuberant and parental affection."

Such, then, being the character of the Redeemer, it becomes our duty to imitate him in the example which he has set before us. True, there are some things which he performed, that are beyond all human power. We can not control the winds nor the waves. We can neither raise the dead, nor impart hearing to the deaf, nor open the eyes of the blind. These things we are not required to perform. God, in laying upon us his commands, always consults the extent and capability of our powers. But we may practise many of the virtues that shone forth in the character of his Son. If we can not give life to the dead, we may comfort those who have lost their friends. If we can not open the blind eye, and unstop the deaf ear, we can assist those who are so unfortunate as to be thus afflicted. There is no possible situation in life, where we can not imitate some one or more of the virtues exhibited in the character of the Saviour of the world. Are we placed in difficult and trying circumstances? Then remember his prayer: "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless, not my will, but thine be done." Are we persecuted? Call to mind his peffition in his dying moments: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Do friends leave us in adversity? Remember that his disciples all forsook him and fled. Are we slandered? Then bear in mind that his enemies even procured false witnesses. Are we obliged to contend with all the inconveniences of poverty? Jesus, our great Master, declared to one who said he would follow him, "The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head."

Thus I might proceed and show, that in every possible situation, we may find a glorious example in Jesus Christ for us to follow. Let us, then, show our love to him, by a faithful adherence to his precepts, remembering the test of Christian character: "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye love one another."

DEATH.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

How chill, how dreary is the gloom,
That gathers o'er the silent tomb—
Oblivion's cheerless banners wave
Round the lone mansions of the grave;
And silence her pavilion spreads,
Where ghastly ruin darkly treads.

I have seen the aged lie down on the bed of death, and close their eyes upon all that was dear to them. The palsy hand of disease had unstrung the delicate mechanism of humanity, and decay had traced his mournful lines upon the faded, yet noble brow, and the tears that welled forth from affection's holy fount, told how deep were the loves that had clustered around that pallid form, whose temples were now wreathed with the icy coronal of Death. I have stood by the bed of youth, when the light of life was waning in its socket, while the young roses of this existence, were fair and fresh to the fond imagination, and its horizon was gilded with the illusive beams of happiness—ere disappointment's cruel blast had swept the spirit-cords, or adversity's blighting mildew had withered the joyous flowers of hope—and marked the fearful struggle of the yearning spirit, when the chilling grasp of death's leaden fingers pressed on the shrinking heart-strings. Oh! how mournful, to see youth, in the pride of its loveliness, fall a victim to the shaft of the gloomy archer—when the radiance of intellectual glory that flashes from the spirit-urn, beams forth like starlight from the mirrored orbs of the soul. I have seen the cherished visions of infant loveliness fade from the parents' gaze, and marked the bitterness of the pang that wrung the sorrowing mother's heart, as she looked her last farewell upon those marble features whose image was imprinted upon the tablet of her soul.

And is this all? Does this life end in the cheerless blank of annihilation? Every feeling of the lacerated heart rises in opposition to the thought. Reason lifts up her voice against so degrading a sentiment. Every scene in the wide-spread universe, goes to disprove the cheerless creed of the atheist. Is it possible that the mind, the mysterious, incomprehensible principle which is joined with, and operates upon, the dull frame of clay, is no more than a passing vapor—an exhalation from the ocean of chaos—wafted onward by the breath of chance, until it melts away into nonentity? Can the utmost stretch of the most giant intellect, grasp the idea of nothingness? Is there any thing in nature by which we may compare it, and fix its image upon the tablet of our hearts? No, no! The earth is teeming with life and beauty; the heavens are full of the glory of God; and the ocean lifts up its swelling waves to shew forth his power; while the chiming billows roll on the eternal anthems of praise to the omnipresent Creator—though man, vain man, looks with careless eye upon the magnificence of nature's works, and denies the evidence of the all-forming Hand. Loftier and more hallowed are the aspirations of the soul, when it is entranced by those perceptions of grandeur and sublimity that lift us above the shadowy scenes of time, than it is in the power of language to embody or express. And shall the mind, that reaches so eagerly toward the things that are beyond its comprehension, never arrive at the perfection which is so necessary for its happiness? Surely there is a brighter, a holier sphere, where the soul shall expand its limited faculties, and be freed from the frailties of mortality, and be satisfied with contemplating the wonderful works of Him who hath made us a little lower than the angels, and endowed us with faculties and perceptions, that might lead us, even in this dark world, to rejoice in the glorious boon of existence, and look forward with happy anticipations to a glorious immortality, where evil shall be forever dispelled, and darkness be known no more. A firm belief in this glorious consummation, can disrobe death of his terrors; and though the heart will bleed when the silken ties of affection are sundered, yet this faith can calm the troubled waters of affliction, and soothe the wounded spirit, by pointing to that "better land" where partings can never annoy.

Some weeks ago we announced to the youthful readers, especially, of the Magazine and Advocate that we were about to select from a series of family letters, such passages as might prove interesting or instructing to those connected with Sunday-schools or Bible-classes, or to such as were engaged in studying, or in earnest to understand, the New Testament. We have accordingly made some selections, and are now about to submit to the public those which have any reference to the fifty-two portions of Scripture which we have selected for study on the several Sundays of the coming year. Each No. of the Magazine will contain specimens from the correspondence which we have the pleasure of editing, illustrative of the passage which is placed against the Sunday following to the day of publication. If those who wish to become proficient in the knowledge of the Christian Scriptures, take the advantage which a previous knowledge of the passage to be commented upon affords them, they will have made each passage the subject of thoughtful and (may I add?) prayerful consideration before the day on which they receive their copy of this paper, which is to contain illustrations of the same. It was in the hope that this useful, profitable, and agreeable mode of study would be adopted by many of our readers, that the Table herewith given was constructed. In illustration of the advantages which may be derived from the practice we have indicated and which we would earnestly recommend and enforce, we think we can not more plainly or forcibly state them than in the words of Dr. Henry Owens, in his Directions for Young Students in Divinity. "No commentator," says Dr. Owens, "should be consulted until we have previously investigated the Sacred Writings for ourselves, making use of every grammatical and historical help, comparing the scope, context, parallel passages, the analogy of faith, etc., and even then commentaries should be resorted to, only for the purpose of explaining what was not sufficiently clear, or of removing our doubts. This method of studying the sacred volume will, undoubtedly, prove a slow one; but the student will proceed with certainty; and if he have patience and resolution to persevere in it, he will ultimately attain greater proficiency in the knowledge of the Scriptures than those who, disregarding this method, shall have recourse wholly to assistances of other kinds. From the mode of study here recommended, many advantages will result. In the first place, the mind will be gradually accustomed to habits of meditation, without which we can not reasonably hope to attain even a moderate, much less a profound knowledge of the Bible.—Secondly, those truths will be more readily as well as indelibly impressed on the memory, which have thus been 'marked, learned, and inwardly digested' in the mind by silent thought and reflection;—and thirdly, by pursuing this method we shall perceive our own progress in sacred literature more readily, than if (like idle drones in a bee-hive) we devour and exhaust the stores provided by the care and labor of others."

We can venture to say that no one of our readers, youthful or adult, who will adopt the plan we advise, of previous thought and meditation, and therein persevere until the end of the year, will feel otherwise than proud of his progress and persevering exertions, and be ready to endorse all of the above quoted paragraph. We trust—we pray, that many will put their hand to the plough, and having done so will not, through indolence or love of ease, be persuaded to shrink from the task.—To such, we are well assured, there is a "great reward."

A word in relation to the letters from which we are about to make selections, and in explanation of the name which has been given to the correspondence en masse. We had, at one time, the good fortune to be intimately acquainted, and not remotely connected with an excellent and highly exemplary family. The venerable father had received a finished or first-rate education in the best public schools and a far-famed University. Having hesitated long in the choice of a profession, having objections to engage in any of them, which objections were chiefly conscientious, he, at last was saved from the necessity of a choice, by the opportunity of settling himself at ease in the country, to take care of his estate, and there enjoy otium cum dignitate. During his classical studies, the theories or doctrines of the different philosophic teachers of Greece and Rome seem to have been the chief topics of his attention. These studies, along with his natural temperament and his not being obliged to enter into any active employment, made him a man more of contemplation than of action. With the moral systems of Plato, Zeno, Epicurus, Socrates, Pythagoras and other ancient seekers after wisdom, he had made himself familiar. The names, the deeds, the characters of multitudes of men who had become noble examples of what human nature, even unassisted by revelation may become;—these he could talk of with the facility and interest which could only have been expected from his having seen them himself. These men seemed to have lived and acted under his own eye. These systems and these men were the favorites of his youth; subsequent and more mature reflection enabled him to behold the imperfections of these ancient doctrines of morals, and of the virtues which were produced under their influence, and having admired the beauties and perfections of the moral system of Jesus, he embraced him as the Greatest and Best Teacher of Wisdom, and Surest Guide to Happiness. As his family grew up, he, above all things, endeavored to imbue their minds with the principles and views inculcated by the founder of Christianity. Sunday was always, with him, strictly devoted to the cultivation in himself and family, of the most useful habit of thinking, of inquiries after further truths, and especially of those views and those virtues which Jesus, his loved Master, came into this world to disseminate. Some portion of the New Testament was the common theme for the whole family during each week, and on the Sunday following, our venerable friend, by questions, by written exercises, by suggestions and in sundry ways would elicit the products of the meditations of his children, and endeavor to enforce upon them sublime, and consoling and useful views of God's government, man's constitution, duties and felicity, and of other subjects embraced in the Christian Revelation. When his children left home for the purposes of education, or of entering into business, it was the parental request that they should write every Sunday evening, giving an account of the serious thoughts of the week and of the day, and of all these occupations which had reference to their advancement as intellectual, rational and moral beings, but especially of their thoughts upon some portion of the New Testament. He had four sons and two daughters, and all of them, when from home, answered this parental request for Sunday communications to him. From this series, extending through many years, which our friend entitled his Sunday Mail, we are now, by favor, allowed to extract, we hope for the benefit of many. That the example should be followed extensively by parents and children, would be the best reward of the Editor of these letters.

PARABLES.

BY REV. F. HITCHCOCK.

It is well known that many of the parables of our Lord are supposed to furnish the most conclusive evidence of the truth of endless misery. But we think a correct understanding of the nature of parables, will satisfy every one that they are "a broken reed" to the advocates of that sentiment. The best definition we have ever seen of a parable, is that given by Horne, in his "Introduction to the study of the Holy Scriptures." He says, "According to Bishop Lowth, a parable is that kind of allegory which consists of a continued narration of a fictitious event, applied by way of simile to the illustration to some important truth." If the reader will understand this distinctly, he will find in it a key to unlock the mystery of parables. If this definition be correct, a parable is not the narration of an event which has actually taken place, but of a fictitious event, or a supposed case, and this is applied by way of simile, to the illustration of some important truth. It is obvious, then, that the truth which the parable was designed to illustrate, is not to be sought in the parable itself—but in the subject with which it is connected. It is the most consummate folly, then, for any person to adduce parables as proof of any particular sentiment. They are not to be used as proof; they were not so used by the Saviour.—He used them as illustrations, and his followers have no right to use them in any other manner. Instead of looking to parables, then, for proof of any particular sentiment, we must look at their connexion to understand their meaning.

Take an instance in point. In Luke xviii: 10-14, we find the parable of the Pharisee and publican. It reads, "two men went up into the temple to pray, etc., etc." Now if we rest in this parable, without looking at its connection to find the true meaning of it, we shall never understand it correctly. It will only lead us to suppose, that the Saviour related an event which had actually taken place. But by looking at the preceding connection, we learn that he spake this parable to reprove certain individuals who were puffed up with self-righteousness. See the ninth verse. "And he spake this parable unto certain which trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others. Two men went up into the temple to pray, etc." The reader is requested to observe distinctly, that this parable is the narration, (not of an event which had actually taken place,) but of a fictitious event, or supposed case, and this is applied by way of simile, to the illustration of something else.

So it is with all our Lord's parables. They were designed to illustrate some truths which he had in his mind at the time they were spoken, and there is no way by which we can learn what that truth is, but to look at the connexion of the parable. This is a point on which people frequently err, and this error has doubtless been one of the strongest props to the doctrine of endless woe.—Perhaps there is no part of the Bible which is relied upon, with more confidence, to prove that doctrine, than the parables of the New Testament. For instance, the parable of the "Rich man and Lazarus" is supposed to furnish the most absolute proof of it. But those who view it in this light, interpret it literally, notwithstanding they are forced to admit that it is a parable. If this method of interpreting Scripture be allowed, we can make the Bible teach just what we please. But every rational man must admit that to interpret a parable literally, is a most gross perversion of the laws of interpretation. If this portion of Scripture be a parable, it should be interpreted as such—and that it is a parable, must be allowed by every biblical student. We discover, then, that to understand this passage correctly, we must examine its connection—for the parable was spoken, by the Saviour, to illustrate some truth which he then had in his mind. If the believer in endless misery, then, can make it appear that the Saviour was speaking of a future state of existence when he uttered this parable, he may possibly make it appear, that the doctrine of endless woe is here taught. But by looking at the connection, we learn that the subject of the Saviour's discourse, was the close of the Jewish and the commencement of the Christian dispensation; or in other words, the putting away the law, and the introduction of the Gospel—and this was the subject which this parable was designed to illustrate.

Here we must leave this subject, hoping that these imperfect remarks may throw some light on the nature of parables, and thus deliver many souls from the fear of endless torment.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, D. SKINNER, AND S. R. SMITH, EDITORS.

UTICA, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1837.

"OUR FATHER."—MAT. vi: 9.

"Our Father"—"our Father!" oh, what treasures of memory are stored up in that tender, that endearing name! Who, that has had or yet has an earthly parent, worthy of that most holy appellation, does not feel his heart stir within his bosom as he pronounces it? Even ye, my aged brethren and sisters, even ye must feel the treasured fountains of by-gone days swelling their tides, and breaking into remembrance, and pouring their feelings full of thought and affection over your souls.—Years have flown by laden with many cares since ye saw that venerable form—but though they have shrivelled the surface of your hearts, in the inmost core, its image, fresh and unimpaired, is found. The parental affections which lay silently germinating in your hearts, during infancy and youth, were called forth and exercised in their turn toward your children: but they did not—they could not crowd from your minds and feelings the remembrances of a father's care—the love of the child for the parent.

On the contrary, these were but increased. Your own parental relations but disclosed to you the relations of your fathers toward yourselves. The love you felt for your own children, but brought to view the rich, the inexhaustible, and the but partially manifested love of your fathers for you. And what had appeared dark, or severe, or inexplicable in their dealings to you, was enlightened, and softened, and explained by your conduct towards your own children. Hence your grateful affection became redoubled when your own parental feelings were unfolded and developed; and you found what an indefinite—an almost boundless measure of love can be poured into the human heart without crowding its limited space, or overpowering its weakness.

And you, my young friends, who have not the revelations of personal experience to guide you in understanding the language of a father's heart, but who have fathers which yet live to let you experience their tender care and solicitude for you—or you, who are but slightly or shortly removed from this experience, by their distance or their death—what can describe as well as you can feel, all the emotions which swell your bosoms at the mention of a father's name? Nothing—nothing.—Let your minds revert to the aged form—at least more aged than your own—sweating neath the toils of life to procure you sustenance, and comfort, and safety. Let your thoughts fasten on that countenance marked with the furrowed traces which anxious thought leaves on the lofty brow and remember that those thoughts are entertained for your welfare—that those furrows are worn in your service!

We sit down, by the side of the war worn soldier, and with curious fingers trace the gash the pitiless sabre has made in the sun burnt cheek. With pitying eye we look upon the bullet seared skin, or mark where the merciless bayonet, glittering in mockery, made the life's red currents flow. And when we have heard him tell of crushed limbs quivering under the hoofs of the neighboring war horse—or of the streaming bosom burning with the bullet-riddled wounds—or of the dying, madly wishing for death to end the agonies of a thirst which a few drops of cold water would satisfy—the tears of pity roll adown our cheeks, and veneration for his services fills our hearts. But what are these wounds of the soldier in the field of battle, to the agonies that oftentimes wring the father's brow as he meditates for his children's welfare? War—relentless war has maimed and slain its thousands; but mild are its means of death to the agonies with which grief and anxiety sever the spirit from the body, after restless years of intensest agony and strife. The crushed body is nought to the broken heart—the sabre gash is a trifle compared with the wasting power of care and anxiety—and the thirst of the dying soldier, is at the most, as endurable as the despairing agony of suspense, or fear for a child's welfare, that heaves a dying parent's bosom. War may be the public executioner of Death, but grief and trouble are his private inquisitors. The poet therefore has truly said, speaking in the person of death:—

"I have been to the field—and the carnage of war,
Has wrought desolation around and afar;
And I've feasted on thousands and thousands of slain,
Whose bones are now strewed o'er the red gory plain.

Though the blast of the bugle in silence is hushed,
And ceased is the lifefire that rapidly gushed—
Tho' the gleaming of spears and the neighing of steeds
No longer give note of such terrible deeds;
One gash of the sabre in one noble heart
In many a bosom has fastened my dart—
And many are dying, devoid of a scur,
For grief is completing the carnage of War."

And where is the father—the good father of a large family, that has not felt torturing anxiety for his children's welfare—that has not felt as if his heart was bruised and crushed within him, on witnessing their waywardness—that has not felt the gloomy despair of death settle on his soul, as indications of vice led him to fear that they would become profligate and go down to ruin and destruction? Oh, I shall never forget the melancholy tone of an aged friend, when speaking to me of two distant and wayward sons. "I lost a child" said he, "early in life—when it was but a few years old. It was a heavy blow. I thought it was a cruel one. But what anguish had I been spared in the providence of God, had Heaven taken both these boys along with their young brother!—When our children are young," continued he, quoting an old German proverb, as the tears rolled down his cheeks—"When our children are young, they stand on our knees; but when they grow up, they trample on our hearts!"

Oh, my young friends—you who yet have parents left unto you to bless you with their loving kindness—look with reverence and affection on a father's and another's furrowed brow and hoary hairs. Let your young arm uphold their tottering steps—let your straight and manly forms bend in humility to save their bowing frames—and let your lives gladden their anxious hearts.

The love of offspring is generally, as it should be, stronger in the mother's than in the father's bosom.—With what tender anxiety does she watch over the tender, helpless, unmeriting period of infancy. She feels its utter dependence on her—and as she carries it in her bosom, rejoices that she is able to meet its wants. Before it can return her watchful look with smiles, or reward her toils with endearments, she feels the hallowed ties of affection growing in her heart, until they become incorporated with its essence and form a portion of her very nature. The cords of affection that thus become the tendrils of a mother's heart, can be relaxed only when that heart shall cease to throb. It is a love "which many waters can not quench; nor the floods drown;" it is a love which is "strong as death." Who, then, can recount its self-denials and its sacrifices—its unwearied exertions and its constant cares in behalf of its object? And who can truly declare the joy that is felt—I will not say, which should be felt—by every child of virtue and affection?

But what is the love of earthly beings, to that of spiritual intelligences? What the love of parents after the flesh, to that of the Father of the spirits of all flesh? If language fails in conveying an adequate idea of the love of our earthly parents—vain would be the task were I to attempt a description of the exhaustless, endless love of "our Father who is in heaven!" I need not remind you that it is the same kind of love—for in the proper sense of that term, there is but one kind—but, oh, how immeasurably different is it in degree! Without beginning and without end—without bound or limit—directed by the highest wisdom, influenced by the purest justice, acting by omnipotent power, and perceiving every possible period and condition, as man—yea, better than man can perceive the present—it is impossible that man, with his limited powers of understanding and action, can fully appreciate it either in its excellence or its greatness. * But we can understand enough—we can see and feel enough, if we will but turn our attention to the subject, to know that God does love us as a Father possessing infinite goodness—as no earthly parent can love us. If, then, earthly parents, who are necessarily imperfect, know how to give good gifts to their children; how much more shall the all-perfect God give good things to them that ask him? If the sight of his children's pain or suffering is far from being desired by an excellent earthly parent, how much more will God not desire the death of the wicked, but that he turn from his evil way and live. If the earthly father, notwithstanding his aversion to witnessing or inflicting pain, still loves them so tenderly, and desires their good so ardently, as to chastise them that they may become wiser, and better, and happier, how much more may we be certain that God, our Father in heaven, will not suffer us ever to transgress with impunity, but will visit our iniquities with stripes, our transgressions with the rod, and will faithfully correct all our errors with chastisements, not to pleasure himself, but to profit his children by making them the partakers of his holiness.

Hence the paternal character of God renders even his punishments evidences of his love for us—and converts his chastisements into irrefutable proofs of our final salvation. And though he may subject us to much suffering and pain—much inconvenience and misfortune—as the earthly parent subjects his children to the hardships of labor, the punishments of a school, and the drudgery of an apprenticeship—yet we may rest assured, that it is done because the ultimate benefits of all evil will perfect our powers, and crown us with happiness.

God is our father—as a father, even the best of all fathers, he will conduct towards us—as a father he loves all his children and will provide for their happiness; however various the means he may use, however various he may allow their characters to be in this state of existence. Hence, as a father he has very wisely and benevolently provided such enactments, and made such requirements from us, as are calculated to promote our best and dearest interests. For if he is a father, he will govern us with a father's laws. If, therefore, our hearts bound with joy and swell in rapture at the mention of an earthly parent's name—how should we reverence and love that heavenly Father who gave us our earthly parents, and who is himself an infinitely good and wise Father to us and them? A. B. G.

CHRISTIAN BROTHERHOOD.

The bonds of the Gospel, are silken cords of love, linking together the disciples of Jesus and securing unity of purpose and action in all causes in which the spread, truth and purity of Christianity are concerned. Now, in this association of believers, there are individuals of all circumstances in life, possessed of different capacities and advantages, and having their mental and moral vision influenced by various degrees of prejudice and education. Thus, the precepts of our common Master, and of his inspired apostles, will be viewed in divers lights, and there will be a variety of opinions among the professed followers of one teacher.

But who among all these will assume the position, that he alone is right and that the rest are wrong? Who is there that will lay his hand upon these silken bonds, and sever himself from his brother, and refuse to associate longer with him, because he holds a different opinion from himself? To whom has been given the authority to denounce—the infallibility to detect error?—who is there that has come into this vast temple of the Gospel, and mingled among the worshippers that are gathered in its courts, and who has enjoyed its privileges and its blessings, and has been permitted to rear his own altar, and to worship the Father in spirit and in truth—who is there that will deprive his brother of the same liberty, and thrust him out from that temple, and close its doors upon him, and denounce him as a heretic or an infidel? Who is there that will do this—nay, who has the right to do it? Before the Being whom we worship, oh! are we not all infinitely poor, frail and erring creatures? Then will we there, upon the footstool of his radiant throne—in the very light of his presence-chamber—clothed in the weakness of our mortality, will we turn around and hurl from thence our brother, and speak bitter things against him, because we deem him to be in error? Or, shall we set up marks and bounds, and calling those of our own views around us, shall we give them a sect-name, and others a sect-name, and refuse communion and action in concert with those from whom we have separated?

Alas! this has been too much the case in the church of the Redeemer, since the days of those, who seemingly forgetting that one was their Master, even Christ, divided and cried out, "We are of Paul and we are of Apollos," down to the present time. Too many causes has the infidel had to array us, sneeringly, together, and point to our various banners and our various mottoes—to our warfares and our contentions—to the decrees of our councils, and our instruments of torture—to our anathemas and our denunciations upon each other—too many causes has he had to do this, and exclaim, “these are the meek, unassuming, charitable, heavenly-minded followers of Jesus! These are the practical effects of Christianity!” Oh! had he but read the teachings of our Lord, “one is your Master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren”—had he but learned from the Gospel the lesson that no one should judge another, but that to his own master each one stands or falls—had he but learned these things, he would have been constrained to acknowledge, that it was not Christianity, but the contrary to its precepts, that had produced these evil things upon the earth. No! he will not find the principles of the Gospel in the whirlwind which has swept through nations—in the earthquake which has shaken thrones—in the flames which “mitred zeal” has kindled. He will not find them in these. But let him seek by “the waters of Shiloah that go softly”—let him seek at the fountain-head where the fresh and living waters flow calm and peaceful—where they gush forth in their purity and truth beneath the clear light of heaven—untainted with aught that is earthly, unpolluted by the doctrines of men—let him seek there, and in “a still small voice,” with other gentle teachings—there will come to him the precept, “Love one another.”

But we have spoken of sectarian divisions, and here it may be necessary for us to explain. We mean, then, by sectarian divisions, the partyisms of religion. It appears to us, speaking in all charity, that many are concerned only for the building up of a particular sect, instead of advancing the kingdom of the Gospel and carrying out its practical teachings. This spirit appears to run through all the benevolent operations of the day, and to work in all the machinery which is set in action for the amelioration of the present condition of the human race. “The amelioration of the present condition of the human race!” Is not this a cause in which every Christian can heartily unite? Will not each one strongly put forth his influence to check the burning tide of intemperance—to cleanse the fountains of pollution which flow through our land, from the haunts of the profligate—to break the manacles of the oppressed and the down-trodden—to distribute the word of life to the poor and the benighted of earth? Certainly, every Christian will or should join in these things. Every Christian can do these. And why? Because he feels them to be a carrying out of the religion which he professes to believe to be from Heaven. Here, then, and in other practical respects, is common ground. Now, who is entitled to the name, “Christian?” Or, rather, what sect shall arrogate exclusively that name? We say that every one who confesses Jesus—who has searched honestly, candidly and diligently for the truth—who has arrived at his present belief by studious, prayerful inquiry—who exhibits in his daily walk and conversation the practice of the teachings of Christ—every such one has a right to the name and the privileges of a Christian. Now, when this one comes forward to join in the benevolent operations of which we have spoken, when he steps upon this “common ground,” is he to be denied the name of a Christian, and not associated with and treated as such? Is it not subversive of the principle of Christian love to deny him these rights? Does it not savor of pride on the one side—is it not calculated to engender ill-will on the other? Is not this very thing—the denial of the Christian name and privileges by any one sect or sects to any other sect or sects—is not this very thing a great cause of the breaches and dissensions of which we have spoken, in the church of our Lord? Ay, do not the dark dungeons and the blood-stained racks of the inquisition, speak of the effects of this exclusive and denouncing spirit?—are there not yet glowing in the smouldering ashes of the martyr, awful testimonies that these things are but too true. Had each one professing a belief in Christ and performing the Christian practice, been permitted to worship God after the dictates of his own conscience, and to hold his own views of the Gospel teachings unmolested, without being denied the name and the rights which such a belief and practice should have guaranteed him—should we have found blood, blood! upon so many pages of ecclesiastical history? Would the taunt and the sneer of the infidel, have quivered in mock-words, in the places of the church and the altar?

Here, then, is what we mean by dividing into sects. It is the associating together of those who are of the same opinion—and expressing by such association and by their separating from others, that they take unto themselves exclusively the name “Christian,” and that all others are heretics and unbelievers. Or, it is the erecting of a certain standard, calling its inscriptions “the essentials” of religion, and acknowledging all those who assent to these doctrines, but who may differ upon minor points of faith, as entitled to the Christian name—and branding all others with the epithets aforesaid.—It is the substituting of human opinions, or creed-tests, for the word of God—the setting up of human bounds, passing beyond which is judged to be heresy, or infidelity, by fallible man. Of this sectarianism in an odious sense, do we complain. We do not object to the associating together of those holding the same views of the doctrines of the Bible. They may deem others to be in error and in grievous error, too, and may wish to use combined strength in opposing and putting down such error. Some may, also, prefer to use peculiar forms in worship—some may discard nearly all forms. Some may view one precept in a more special light, some, another. There may be a conscientious holding to these things, which forbids a union on many points, and in continued acts of worship. All these we do not object to. Let each one worship at his own altar, and in the way his own conscience dictates—but let not these things be the cause of bitterness. When we have been to our own places of assembling, and have worshipped the Father in the way we deem right—let us come out upon the common ground, and meet together as brethren. Our complaint is, then, not that there are names among Christians, or that all do not worship in one place or in one manner—but we speak against odious distinctions—against an arrogant, exclusive, denouncing spirit wherever it is found. We speak against the refusal to unite with any one professing the belief and practising the precepts of Christianity, in any good work which Gospel principles dictate should be done.

But it may be asked, have none the right to judge, whether that professing Christian does practice according to the precepts of Christ? We answer, try not his conduct by the creeds and the opinions of men, but by the Bible—labor to convince him that he is wrong, by remonstrance, by argument, by persuasion. But if he be honest in his practice, upright and consistent in his course, and differs with you in regard to Christian doctrine and duty, take not from him the name of Christian—shut not upon him the doors of the Gospel temple—refuse not to join with him in the performance of Christian acts—for to his own Master he stands or falls! If he be openly immoral the Bible speaks in every line against him.

There are those who call themselves “liberal Christians,” who profess to be bound only by the Bible, and to reject the supreme authority of human creeds, human opinions, and man-made tests. They profess to be striving for the advancement of Christianity in its brightness and its purity. Are none of these sowing dissensions among brethren? Are none of these merely sect-building? Are none of these stirring the embers of conflicting opinions? Is there no exclusive denouncing spirit among these? Is there no refusal to act in concert upon great truths? Let the history of times past and present, answer. If not, well. If so, are these things right? “One is your Master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren.”

Christians, of all denominations, there are causes in which we can all engage—there are common foes to us all! Let us labor to convince one another of our errors, but let us do it in the spirit of mildness and of love.—Let us draw “the silken cords” around us. Let us meet upon “the common ground,” “shoulder to shoulder,” heart beating with heart! Then will the foe be overthrown, and evil be done away from among men—for then to the powers of sin and error shall we be an invulnerable host—conquering with the weapons of the Gospel—“terrible as an army with banners.”

TO SUBSCRIBERS—THE NEXT VOLUME.

We repeat the notice that all who do not notify us to discontinue before the close of the present volume will be considered subscribers for the next. Some object to this course, and ask why we do not stop all at the close of the volume that do not order their papers continued? We answer, because it would subject us and our subscribers, to ten times the trouble that the present mode does, as nearly nine-tenths of the subscribers generally either continue their subscriptions, or get some one to supply their place, whereas, now, only the tenth part who wish to discontinue are subjected to that trouble, and in most instances the P. M.'s will give the notice, if requested. But, above all things, do not suffer the paper to come to your address for some weeks on the next volume, unless you intend to take them, as a few such subscribers take the profit off from many prompt ones.

These little items may appear insignificant to individuals, but in as large a list as ours, they are all essential to us.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

"TO MY BROTHER."

When fancy lifts her radiant wing,
And morning birds around thee sing—
When Joy lights up thy beaming eye,
And Love's enchantment too, is nigh—
When calm blue waters round thee flow,
Thou hear thy sister breathing low—
I love thee, dearest brother!

Should Disappointment's withering breath
Consign thy brightest hopes to death—
Should Friendship's trust, in boyhood made,
In after years prove faith betrayed:
Then to thy sister, yet return,
For, oh, her heart will fondly burn
To clasp her dearest brother!

Should sorrow cloud thy coming years,
And bathe thy prospects all in tears,
Remember that the rainbow's hue
Is bright 'mid clouds and sunshine too:
Remember, though we're doomed to part,
There lives one fond and faithful heart
That loves her dearest brother.

HELEN."

REPLY, TO MY SISTER.

BY REV. J. G. MCADAM.

The vows I made in youthful hour,
To guide thy feet to friendship's bower—
Thy childhood watch—protect thy youth—
Shall never know decline;
In storm and shade, I'll wear this truth,
My sister, thou art mine.

Whate'er may reign o'er earth and sea,
The stars of heaven will speak of thee—
The beauty of thy mind will tell,
And music's voice declare,
That thou art worthy, and dost well
Deserve a brother's care.

Though fancy, on her radiant wing,
Should seat me down by hope's pure spring,
Where golden streams roll on—
Where love and joy do reign—
No other care but thee I'll own,
Thy love, my only gain.

But should the power of fortune's breath,
With triumph all my hopes enwrap,
And friendship's trust prove true,
And give me wealth and fame—
I'll bear the richest wreath to you,
For sister, is thy name!

Let darkness cloud my future years,
And blast my hopes, and meet my fears—
Or richest hues of heaven's pure bow
Sparkle with light divine—
A purer ray will cheer me now,
From that true heart of thine.

WONDERS OF THE DEEP.

BY PIERPONT.

"What a wonder is the sea itself! How wide does it stretch out its arms, clasping islands and continents in its embrace! How mysterious are its depths!—still more mysterious its hoarded and hidden treasures! With what weight do its watery masses roll onward to the shore, when not a breath of wind is moving over its surface! How wonderfully fearful is it, when its waves, in mid ocean, are foaming and tossing their heads in anger under the lash of the tempest! How wonderfully beautiful, when, like a melted and ever-moving mirror, it reflects the setting sun, or the crimson clouds, or the saffron heavens after sun has set; or when its "watery floor" breaks into myriads of fragments the image of the quiet moon that falls upon it from the skies;

"Wonderful, too, are those hills of ice that break off, in thunder, from the frozen barriers of the Pole, and float toward the sun, their bristling pinnacles glistening in his beams, and slowly wasting away under his power, an object at once of wonder and of dread to the mariner, till they are lost in the embrace of more genial deeps.—And that current is a wonder, which moves forever onward from the southern seas, to the colder latitudes, bearing in its waters the influence of a tropical sun, and saying to the ice-burys from the Pole, 'Hitherto ye may come, and no farther.' And, if possible, still more wonderful are those springs of fresh water which, among the Indian Isles, gush up from the depths of a salt ocean, a source of refreshment and life to the seaman who is parching with thirst beneath a burning sky. And is it not as wonderful, when, not a spring of fresh water, but a column of volcanic fire shoots up from the dark unfathomed caves of ocean, and throws its red glare far over the astonished waves, that heave and tremble with the heaving and trembling earth below them! wonderful, when that pillar of fire vanishes, leaving a smoking volcano in its place, and wonderful, when that volcano, in its turn, sinks back, and is lost in the depths whence it rose!

"Then there are other wonders in the living creatures of the deep, from the annulcule, that 'no eye can see,' and that scarcely 'glass can reach,' up to that Leviathan which God hath made to play therein." In 'this great and wide sea are things creeping innumerable,' both small and great beasts." Yet He, who hath made them all, even there openeth his hand and satisfieth the desires of all. Wonderful is it, that, of these 'creatures innumerable,' each one finds its food in some other, and in its turn, serves some other for food; and that this great work of destruction and reproduction goes on in an unbroken circle from age to age, in the deep silence of those still deeper waters, where the power of man is neither felt nor feared!

"What a wonder, too, is that line of phosphoric light, which, in the darkest night, streams along the 'way of a ship in the midst of the sea!' What is it that gives out this fire, which, like that of love, 'many waters can not quench, neither can the floods drown it'? Theorists may speculate, naturalists may examine, chemists may analyze; but none of them can explain; and all agree in this, that it is a wonder, a mystery, a marvel. A light that only motion kindles! a fire that burns nothing! a fire, too, seen, not in a lull on Horeb, which is not burned, but in the deep waters of the ocean that can not be! Is not this a wonder!

"And, if that path of light is a wonder, which streams back from the rudder of a ship, is not that ship itself a wonder? That a fabric so gigantic as a first rate ship, of traffic or of war, framed of ponderous timbers, compacted with bolts and bands of still more ponderous iron, holding in its bosom masses of merchandise, under whose weight strong cars have groaned, and paved streets trembled, or bearing on its decks a host of armed men, with the thundering armament of a nation—that a fabric thus framed and thus freighted, should float in a fluid, into which, if a man fall, he sinks and is lost, is in itself a wonder. But that such a fabric should traverse oceans, struggling on amid the strife of seas and storms, that it should hold on its way 'like a thing of life,' may, like a thing of intellect, a being endued with courage, and stimulated by a high purpose, a traveller that has seen the end of his voyage from the beginning, that goes forth upon it without fear, and completes it as with the feeling of a triumph, is, as it seems to me, a greater wonder still. Let me ask you to stand, as you perhaps have stood, upon the deck of such a ship.

'In the dead waste and middle of the night,' now in the strong light of the moon, as it looks down upon you between the swelling sails, or now in the deep shadow that the sails throw over you. Hear the majestic thing that bears you, breasting and breaking through the waves that oppose themselves to her march! She is moving on alone, on the top of the world, and through the dread solitude of the sea. Nothing is heard, save, perhaps, the falling back of a wave, that has been showing its white crest to the moon, or, as your ship is plunging her way, the rushing of the water along her sides. Yet she seems to care for all that she contains, and to watch, while they sleep as sweetly in her bosom as in their own beds at home; and though she sees no convoy to guard her, and no torch-bearer to guide her, she seems as conscious that she is safe, as she is confident that she is going right. Is not all this a wonder?"—Taken.

MARRIAGES.

In Massena, St. Lawrence county, November 22d, by Rev. F. J. Briggs, Rev. E. A. GARFIELD to Mrs. MARY A. CLARK.

DEATHS.

In Westmoreland, at the residence of Captain Bedient, November 26th, Mr. JOSHUA STILLMAN, formerly of Scriba, Oswego county, in the 36th year of his age.—The funeral was attended on the 28th ult., by Br. M. B. Smith.

In Florida, Montgomery county, December 1st, Mr. EPHRAIM BROCKWAY, in the 84th year of his age. For more than sixty years, the doctrine of God's impartial grace was his consolation and joy, his guide in practice, and the theme in conversation that to him was always full of interest. He declared to his neighbors and friends, on his death-bed, that his faith and hope lost none of their brightness, but increased in strength daily. At his request I visited him, to receive his testimony that Universalism was pre-eminently good to die by, as it was to live by—and his exhortation to continue my efforts in its promulgation.

After an irreproachable and Christian life, he was gathered to his fathers, ripe for immortality. His funeral was attended by me, at his house, by his dying request, and a discourse delivered to a large circle of sympathizing friends, on Sunday, December 3d.

M. B. NEWELL.

DISTRESSING ACCIDENT.—Mr. Thomas Brown, 2d, of New-Berlin, N. Y., left his home on the 23d ult., without notifying his friends whether he was going.—Not returning, his friends became alarmed for his safety; search was made, and his body was found under a saw mill, in the neighborhood, with a fracture upon his right temple. From the position of the body and state of the mill, it appeared evident that he had raised the saw gate—that the wheel not starting from the pressure of water, he had used a lever to disengage it, when by a sudden motion of the crank upon the short arm of the lever, he was knocked senseless into the stream and was drowned.

Mr. Brown was a young man of 27 years of age, beloved and esteemed for his intellectual and moral worth, suddenly cut off from future usefulness, leaving a numerous circle of friends, to mourn his sad and premature death.

H. W.

In Denmark, November 11th, Mrs. ISABELLA SYLVESTER, wife of Absalom Sylvester, aged 47 years. In the death of Sister Sylvester, not only her afflicted husband and children, but the community in which she has long lived, (for they were among the early settlers of this town,) have sustained an irreparable loss. She was cheerful, amiable, industrious—bere with astonishing fortitude her long and painful illness—and died as she had lived, a believer in the world's salvation. She could not sufficiently express her thanks that it was not her lot to be afflicted with those distressing fears which haunt the believers of partial creeds, in times of sickness and approaching death.

Funeral solemnities on the following day (Sunday,) by J. FRENCH.

In same place, on the same day, MARY MALVINA SYLVESTER, daughter of Seth and Hannah Sylvester, aged 5 years.

One week previous to her burial she was blooming in health, and her innocent prattle contributed much to the cheerfulness of the domestic circle; but passing a fire in the yard, near the door, her clothing caught the flame. Her mother, though in feeble health, ran to her relief, when the little sufferer clenched her with such violence that both fell to the ground and burned together, till her father came from the opposite side of the house, and with difficulty tore away the child, and plunging it into a vessel of buttermilk, extinguished the fire. She suffered severely the few days she remained in life. The mother who was also severely burned, is slowly recovering.

Oh, how invaluable, in such seasons of sorrow and distress, to know that a Father's kindness rules over all evils, and will cause them to result in far more abounding good! Funeral services on the 13th, by J. FRENCH.

At the residence of his son, Hon. Nathan Kimball, in Augusta, on December 4th, of a cancer, ABONIRAM KIMBALL, aged 76 years and 11 months. He endured this most afflicting disease with great composure—not a murmur escaped him during its ravages. He has left an aged consort and a numerous circle of relatives to mourn their loss.

His funeral was attended on the 6th—sermon by Br. J. Boden, from Luke xx: 38.—Com.

MARY ST. JOHN, consort of Daniel St. John, died August 11th, 1837, aged 55 years, six months, and fifteen days.

RUBY, youngest daughter of Daniel and Mary St. John, died July 18th, 1837, aged 17 years, 8 months, and 15 days.

ROBERT ROWE, youngest son of Daniel and Mary St. John, died July 21st, 1837, aged 10 years, 9 months, and 25 days.

A discourse adapted to the above melancholy occasion, was delivered by the undersigned, in the Methodist church in Brookville, Ia., on the evening of October 5th, to a large and attentive assembly.

Mrs. St. John was a woman whom every body esteemed, and whose death was universally deplored.

SCRAPS FROM MY DIARY.....NO. II.

As I said the other day, my friend, Mrs. R. is very eccentric. Nay, as her good husband expresses it, she is the most nervous creature in existence. With an acute perception of the ludicrous, (a quality which an esteemed brother in the ministry terms talent, and which by the way would make the humble author of this humble sketch a very talented woman,) which often makes her laugh herself into tears, she has also the most morbidly sensitive heart in the world—a heart, which like the quivering leaf of the poplar is in continual agitation—in a continual flutter of excited merriment or sinking despondency. [Alas! that her's is not the only one of the kind we wot of.]—'Twas only the evening after our visit to the shanties, that I entered her little sitting room and found her in a paroxysm of tears. What, Sarah dear, are you weeping? Yes, yes, I am, and the most miserable being that ever lived—'tis nonsense to talk of happiness, or even contentment, in this world—there is no bright side to life, and I will never, even by your eloquence be coaxed into a belief of it again. Pleasure! if it ever existed, 'tis now obsolete. The truth is, to use the words of one we both know,

All dark, all dark
Life's path appears—
Not one bright spark
My bosom cheers.
Cold as the current which divides
The ice-bérge of the Northern seas,
Drag through these veins life's curdling tides—
No joy for me!
Ask not, ask not
The reason why!
My prayers are not
To live, but die.
Enough, that all my hopes are wrecked—
Swept off by fate's o'erwhelming wave—
And that these tears alone expect
The grave, the grave.

No, Sarah, I will by no means "ask the reason why"—I know very well without asking.—You have in the first place sound health—then the most perfect mortal in the universe for a husband—the sweetest, most obedient children—very faithful and orderly servants—the kindest, most considerate neighbors—the most amiable and affectionate friend, (excuse the vanity) and—"Hush! I am already ashamed of myself"—"and, in short not a real unsatisfied want in the world." "Then why this intolerable ennui? how can I get rid of it?" "Can you find no social company?" "No, Charles is necessarily absent evenings, and I can't endure these little parties, where nothing is discussed but the fashions, and the idle gossip of inferior malicious minds. There is not an intellectual person in the place, always excepting yourself." "Thank you. But are our poor all clothed?"—"Yes, our last sewing society finished that, and they may have wood enough for the hauling."—"Well, is there nobody ignorant? No one that you might benefit with your knowledge?"—"Why—ye-s"—after a moment's thought, her face brightening—"Yes, I can think of many—you have opened a world of pleasure to me. And now I recollect, I got last week a new girl—an Irish girl, as ignorant as possible. She don't know even her letters—told me so herself—but also refused to learn them. However, she is a good creature, and I think I may do something for her in the way of lectures—I will begin this very evening"—(with her usual enthusiasm,) "Kathleen, Kathleen, you may bring the baby here a little while—I'll think of a subject while she is coming." A short, thick, coarse featured girl, not half as poetical in look as in name, came in and took her seat modestly in the corner. "It's a very pretty evening, Kathleen, barring the frost," said Mrs. R. encouragingly. "The moon looks very bright—you would hardly suppose it to be 210,000 miles off!" "Sure, and we must have sharp eyes if it be, for I see a man in it every night," replied the girl blantly. "Fie, fie! Kathleen, you don't suppose that you see a real living man in the moon?" "Sure, then, I do ma'am," said she, bridling up—"we say in Ireland he is stealing the bushes out of his neighbor's hedge." "Poh! they are mistaken—those dark spots are but deep valleys in the moon which can not reflect the light." The girl looked skeptical. "I suppose, Kathleen, you notice, while milking, those two bright stars in the East." "Yes, ma'am."—"Well, the people who live on one of those stars can see seven moons as large and bright as ours." "Did you ever see them, Missus?" "No, but great men have with their glasses." "You wear glasses sometimes, ma'am?" "Yes, but not like their's. I see, Kathleen, I am getting rather beyond your sphere, so, we'll come down to what Miss Milford calls, this dusty, rusty, musty, fusty bit of earth. I presume you have heard in Ireland of the earth's moving—it travels a great many thousand miles an hour." "Indeed I have," she replied with a good deal of energy. "My father seed it once with his own two eyes—it went as much as twenty miles an hour, and swept off all the houses, and barns and threes wid it."—"What!" "Why they called it a movin bog, and all the crathures were in great dread of it," rejoined she, rather dampened at her mistress' ill concealed merriment. "I dare say you are right, Kathleen, but its getting late, you may take the baby out." "So much for air-built castles!" exclaimed Mrs. R. as soon as the door was closed and a hearty laugh over. "Well, you have lost your ennui at least." "Yes, at the expense of principle." "And I do not despair of learning that poor thing some thing yet, awkward as she is. I have a plan in my head, and if you will join me, we will set it in operation. The world is full of Sabbath schools, where creeds and many other unnecessary things, are learned by heart. Let us, also, have a Sabbath school, and teach such poor creatures as this, some thing actually useful—some thing that will better the head and the heart. There are many about town who work hard during the week, and spend their only spare time (Sunday) in promenading the streets—perseverance on our part, and emulation on their's will work miracles." Mrs. R. caught my hand and exclaimed enthusiastically, "Join you! yes with my whole heart! how happy you have made me! We can do, I am sure, a very great deal of good. Strange that I can never think of any thing myself!" Beloved reader, there are many kinds of excitement extant, of which I heartily disapprove. But from that attendant upon the anticipation of benefiting any portion of our species, may neither you nor I, any more than Mrs. R., be ever exempt.

"THE END JUSTIFIES THE MEANS"

BY REV. T. J. GOODRICH.

In the thirty-second number of the present volume of the Magazine and Advocate, an article appeared under the above caption, in which a well authenticated story was related to illustrate this principle as a rule of action. The purport of it was, that in the Winter of 1833, during a protracted meeting in a Baptist society in the county of O—, Rev. Mr. C., a Presbyterian clergyman, delivered a discourse in which he endeavored to prove the antiquity of protracted meetings from both the Old and New Testaments. His attempt, though perfectly futile and ridiculous elicited some attention. Upon being closely interrogated by a good Partialist lady, he acknowledged that he did not exactly think that the evidence he had adduced could establish his position, and stated that he thought it was sometimes absolutely necessary to preach what he did not believe, and said that without doing this he never could produce a revival!—The county was Onsego, the clergyman the Rev. Mr. CLARK, then residing there, but now it appears by the letters of Brs Whiston, Potter and Guild, in Delaware county. As he is still persevering in preaching and relating falsehoods—in "doing evil that good may come"—in practicing his favorite precept, "the end justifies the means"—we would caution the public against his impositions. Where he has long resided, nothing is necessary to induce the people to reject his foolish falsehoods and disregard his scandalous aspersions. But as he may yet deceive those who are unacquainted with his true character, we present this as further evidence of his great destitution of moral principle and disregard of truth and decency.—Many of his own denomination have long since lost all confidence in him, but he is still permitted to prowl about—to scatter "firebrands, arrows and death"—and blast the loveliest portions of society. If endless misery is true, and if the blood of souls will be required of the preacher of that doctrine, Mr. C. will certainly find it "a fearful thing" to answer to a just God for his labors. He continues to act upon this principle that "the end justifies the means," though he knows that by his rant and falsehoods, in promoting modern revivals, he had caused at least one case of suicide.* But we doubt not that he will reap the reward of his labors. His speech does not distil like the dew upon the tender herb, or the gentle rain upon the new-mown grass, to revive the spirit of the contrite ones—but sweeps on in its devastating career, withering the fairest hopes, blighting the sweetest joys, clouding the brightest brows, and wringing the tenderest hearts. Such men may be compared to "clouds without water, carried about by winds," which prostrate all that is fair and lovely—to "raging waves of the sea which foam out their own shame." But "their judgment now of a long time lingereth not and their damnation slumbereth not."

In conclusion we would say to each advocate of the polluting sentiment, that "the end justifies the means"—we ask you, we warn you, we beseech you to pause in your career. As you value your own character and welfare, as you regard the welfare of those around you—the cause of morality and virtue—of God and dying humanity—no longer strengthen the bonds of wickedness, nor "make the hearts of the righteous sad with your lies."—Already have you acted upon this man-degrading, peace-destroying principle, until you have hoisted the flood-gates of iniquity and deluged the earth—until you have robbed God of his glory, and man of his hopes. It may be thought that we have spoken with severity, but "whom we love we chasten that they may be zealous and repent."—And "though no chastisement for the present

*Mrs. Husted, of Worcester, Otsego county. This was the opinion of the Coroner and others present at the inquest, and was published at the time in the Cooperstown "Freeman's Journal." Mr. C. had visited her—frightened her with the fear of hell—and had but just left the house when she committed the fatal deed.

seemeth to be joyous but grievous, nevertheless afterwards, we hope it will yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness to him who is exercised thereby."

NO WONDER WE HAVE INFIDELS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

The following narration exhibits the process by which one infidel was manufactured, and that was Frederick the Great, king of Prussia, the patron, admirer, and companion of Voltaire. In two points the method adopted with the royal proselyte, accords with the more usual methods; while in some points it far transcends the ordinary processes, inasmuch as the powers of the persecutor and propagandist exceeded the ordinary powers in the hands of religionists. In all the efforts of orthodox proselytizers we may generally discover the want of meekness and of wisdom; and all of them seem to neglect the excellent advice of Peter, in the 3d chapter of his first epistle, the amount of which is this, that some who are not persuaded by our doctrine, may be won over without doctrine, by the behaviour of professors. Let not our denomination neglect this influence, even although we have a less corrupt and a less revolting doctrine.

At the age of fourteen, young Fredrick exhibited proofs of an intellect superior to his age. His tastes and pursuits were entirely different from those of his father. He loved music, reading, dress, all which his father hated. At this early age his father showed that dislike which continued to increase, until the last days of the old king. The elder sister of Fredrick likewise shared in this dislike, merely because she loved and admired her brother, and joined him in his musical and literary pursuits. At the age of sixteen we find that Fredrick was pursued with great harshness. The poor prince was not allowed the least recreation; music, reading, the sciences, and the fine arts were so many crimes which were forbidden to him. His sister in her memoirs says;—"The pains of purgatory could not equal those that we endured. We were obliged to appear at nine o'clock in the morning, in the king's room; we dined there and did not dare to leave it for a moment. Every day was passed by the king in invectives against my brother and myself. He no longer called me any thing but the English black-guard (Le canaille Anglaise.) and my brother the rascal Fritz, (le coquin de Fritz). He obliged us to eat and drink the things for which we had an aversion, or which were bad for our health; which caused us sometimes to bring up in his presence all that was in our stomachs." If any thing displeased him, he would throw plates or whatever came to hand at their heads, and some of the marks of his cruelty they carried with them to the grave. When this unceasing surveillance relaxed a little, the princess says her brother spent his afternoons with her: "We read and wrote together, and occupied ourselves in cultivating our minds. At the age of 18, Fredrick with his sister was almost starved to death. The king would allow them only coffee and milk and dried cherries. At dinner, if there remained any thing in a dish, the king would spit into it to prevent their eating of it. One morning he seized his son by the throat, and struck him severely with his cane. In short the son and daughter, for no other offence than their tastes and pursuits, and their being befriended by their mother, were insulted, cursed, abused, starved, kicked, caned, collared, and had handfuls of hair torn from their heads by their brutal and barbarous father. Once his father had a cord round his son's neck, and once ran at him with his sword, from which danger he was saved by the servants. He endeavored to extract from Fredrick a renunciation of his right to the throne; but baffled in his attempt, he had him tried before a court-martial, who acquitted, and then before another, who were more pliant to the king's wishes, and condemned him to death. The kings of Austria and Sweden interfered to prevent this; and his sentence was changed to banishment.—He was committed to prison, and allowed only about equal to our shilling a day to subsist upon. He had no chair but his box, and no bed save the floor. He was allowed no pen, ink or paper.—Some who had befriended him were arrested, and one of them was beheaded. By an excess of truly parental and Christian refinement and kindness, Frederick was forced to be present at this scene, and was held by four grenadiers with his face towards the window. This horrible barbarity made the prince swoon twice, and afterwards fall into a fever.

To cure this much-loved son of his fever, and his fondness for French literature, his amiable father sent him a Bible, a few devotional books, and a clergyman!!

Need we wonder at the infidelity of Frederick the second, of Prussia? How unhappy a specimen of Christianity was that father, who would have forced this system down his son's throat!

TO MOTHERS.

There was a man at Carthage, in days long since gone, who for the many crimes he had committed, was condemned to death. When he was being led to the place of execution, he made a request to be allowed to speak to his mother. The request was granted, and the mother was allowed to go up to him. Her son, the criminal, approached as if to whisper something to her, but instead of saying anything to her, bit off a piece of her ear. "I treat you thus," said he to his mother, "to make you an example to all parents who do not take care to bring up children in the ways of virtue." It has been the delightful task of some children to do honor to their mothers, or to their memory; others have had just occasion to blame and accuse them. By early forethought and some exertion, it is pretty much in the power of mothers to determine which of these harvests—of honor and gratitude, or of disgrace and cursing—they shall reap. To mothers, then, especially young ones, we leave the task of making a suitable and profitable application of this story. S. S.

UTICA, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1837,

RANDOM THOUGHTS OF THE SEASON.

Reader, it is what we call a fine Winter's day, this upon which we are writing—a cold, it is true, but a pleasant and a healthy one. All the morning the smoke has been curling tall and blushing in the sunshine, up into the clear blue heaven, and the air around us has thrilled with life and music.

We would like now, despite the cold, to ride for a short time over one of our Vermont mountain-roads, amid a scene like some fairy realm, with the thickly-grouped trees about us, each with its sparkling jewelled top, and with the glittering crystals pendent from its boughs, and the hoar-frost upon its trunk flashing like gems of living light. We love to see Winter as we should see him there, throned and beautiful, with all his regalia and glory around him! It is "not all unlovely"—nay, with other seasons it has its share of charms. It has its own sublimities—its rifted mountains of snow—its lofty pinnacles of ice, crowned with the sunshine, and its robed and awful storms. Ay, and it has its pleasant things, too! Its glorious moonlight nights—its mornings like the one just past—the music of the bells—the "ring of the skater's heel"—the joyous laugh—the stored garner—the plentiful board—the family meeting—the clear hearth-fire and the social circle—these are things peculiarly attendant on Winter, and they give it its charms, and they make it, with all its gloom and its storms, welcome and grateful to us.

And, reader, Winter has brought the present season. By the time this meets your eyes, will have arrived the season of "the Hollidays"—the season of warm-hearted and reciprocal good wishes, of kindly greetings, and long-anticipated pleasure. It is also the close of the volume and the close of the year, and many thoughts and reflections naturally crowd into the mind. We have entitled this article "Random thoughts of the season," for we were aware that it was a time with which were linked so many associations, that our limits would forbid us to expatiate, and that the remarks we should make would thus, almost of necessity, be crude, disconnected and imperfect. But it is well that the season and circumstances should have a passing notice, and we shall therefore comment thereon, though briefly.

It is then, dear reader, the close of the volume. You and I have not long been acquainted through the medium of this paper, and most probably, personally, we are totally unknown to each other. Yet mind in communing with mind, is not long in contracting an intimacy deeper than that which ensues from a mere formal introduction and the shake of the hand. We are, then, in one sense acquainted with each other. This acquaintance as I have expressed, has been brief—yet it is a pleasant one. It is pleasant, this mental communion. It is pleasant to give utterance to our thoughts and feelings, and to know that they find an answering chord in the deep souls of others. It is pleasant to illustrate the precepts of our Master and to speak of the things of the everlasting Gospel.

I have much to ask of the readers of the Magazine, in the way of charity. I am young, and editorial duties, until my connexion with this paper, were almost entirely new to me. Therefore, youth and inexperience are my pleas in excuse for much that may have been wrong or imperfect. I trust that these faults will gradually wear away, and that I may be the means of doing great and extensive good. I hope, that as Editor and Reader, we shall journey along the path of peace together, pausing now to look at the delicate workmanship of a flower, and now endeavoring to scan with our humble vision some of the more sublime and glorious of the creations of our God—but striving in whatever we do, to take that view of things which shall exalt our intellects, and purify our hearts, and fill us with love and adoration of our common Father, and help to the spread and the growth of "the kingdom of heaven within us"—of the kingdom throughout the world!

And it is the close of the year! The time we have said, of kindly greetings. Yes, the hearts of kindred and friends are made glad by meeting with those whom the lapse of a year, perhaps of many, has separated.—And how many happy groups are there, now, in the homes and by the hearth-stones of our land. How many an aged grandsire bows till his silver locks blend with the sunny tresses of the little one upon his knee—to listen to her joyous and artless prattle, and how many wreathed smiles are there that welcome the long wandering, who has returned to rest beneath the paternal roof again! It is also a time of special memories—when the loved and the absent are called up in more vivid imaginings and their names are oftener, even than they are wont to be, upon the lip. The mother more fondly thinks of her wave-tossed sailor-boy, who is afar upon the blue billows, and the household circle speak in softer words of those who went out from them to rear a new home in the deep shades of the wilderness. There are not those external causes in nature to allure our thoughts, which exist at brighter seasons, and the heart, as it were, is left alone to its own silent but eloquent communings. There is a meeting in some old familiar place, of many who have often met there before, and whom time has long severed—the inquiry is for those who are still absent—and the call thrills over every link in the electric chain of remembrance.

It is, also, a time for reflection, and fitting is it that the year should not pass by without comment and thought.—It is almost the close of another of those periods which peculiarly mark the course of our existence, and another of the ties which detain us earthward is about to be severed. Let the feelings, the memories and the associations which naturally crowd upon us have a proper and purifying effect. Let us remember that "we are but pilgrims and strangers" here—that sooner or later you and I, dear reader, will watch no more for the close and the commencement of the years. Earth will be nothing to us, and the shadowy hand that opens the portals of the months will not darken our path, for we shall be with "the sleepers." We shall look no more for the springing grain or the plump wheat sheaves—for the buddings of Spring and the fallings of Autumn. The storms and cold of Winter, will not cause us to gather in our accustomed places by the hearth-fire, and the sunbeams of Summer, which are so pleasant to us now, will rest in their sweet and solemn beauty upon the green places of our graves.

Reader, now at the close of the volume and the close of the year, the writer prays that these and other thoughts may be the cause to us of peace, joy and blessing, and giving you the best wishes of his heart, for your prosperity in temporal and spiritual things, he bids you, for this year and this volume, a respectful and affectionate FAREWELL. E. H. C.

THE SEVENTH YEAR.

For seven years have I now been connected with this paper as an Editor—toiling, generally, all the time I could spare from my labors as a preacher, and often much of the time that should have been devoted to my preaching labors. I was poor—very poor, and in debt when I commenced. I have advanced but very little from those circumstances, in despite of all my efforts; for more than what I gained by my editorial labors, I lost by the disadvantageous circumstances and position they placed me in as a preacher. I may say, then, that I have not yet received Rachel, (freedom from debt,) although I have earned her; but I trust the present pecuniary difficulties are but the disappointment I find in having been put off with Leah; and that Rachel will yet be mine, also. Surely a labor of twelve or fourteen years in my present mind-and-body-destroying station, will allow me to settle down out of debt, with some good society as their pastor, to enjoy for the remainder of my days, the pleasures of uninterrupted reading and reflection—the society of a chosen few—to cultivate in peace and retirement, the joys of the domestic circle.—With this long and ardently cherished hope—this expression of regret at its past and present disappointment, and mingled fear of the future, I bid farewell to the seventh year of my labors as an Editor of this paper, only to begin what may prove another seven year's course of the same cares, toils and disappointments. The will of God be done, for that is best for me, after all. A. B. G.

SMALL, BUT IMPORTANT!

The attention of every one addressed below, is particularly invited to those items which concern him. Read, remember, and act rightly.

1. Agents (and Post riders)—Please regulate your lists as early as possible, that we may regulate our edition with the least delay and loss. Where no great increase or decrease is likely to take place, give the discontinued papers to new subscribers, until your list is regulated, and then give us a full, correct statement of all changes, transfers, etc. Remit what you can collect, as early as possible.

2. Discontinuers—Please get some good person to take your place. If you can not, send notice of your discontinuance by letter from your Postmaster, immediately.—Do not delay, for such delays cost us much every year—and do not make us pay postage, for our burdens in that way, are also, too great.

3. Delinquents—After Monday next, each unpaid volume will be charged to you at the rate of two dollars and a half a year. Such are our terms. Some of you we must, also, strike from our list—the heart is sick with waiting on you—we can wait no longer. But we entreat you all, by every feeling of justice and mercy, remember us early.

One offer more, for you. Each of you, who sends us five dollars or upwards, free of postage, before the first of February next, shall be credited with it, and fifteen per cent, additional, on his account—i. e. with $5.75 for $5.00, and so in proportion. Can you put your money to better profit, for so short a time?

4. Subscribers, generally, are respectfully solicited, once more, to make another effort to get their prompt paying friends or neighbors to subscribe for this paper. They will find it worth the labor and money, and beneficial to the good cause. Those who have already aided us thus, or by prompt payments, are very gratefully remembered. Without such supporters we must have been not only almost, but quite crushed beneath "the pressure." God bless them!

5. Correspondents—How shall we thank you! You have done well, and are gratefully enrolled on hearts and books. But, to the work, once more, dear friends!—This is the season for writing and reading. Do the first, and oh, what stores of the latter we will return to you every week! Let each one (including all ministering brethren to whom we send the paper) send us, as soon as may be, a number of articles of suitable brevity and pith, and see what a paper we will send you for months to come! Believe us, friends, and try it.

6. Those who have ordered a discontinuance at the close of this volume, will, as usual, receive the first number of next volume. If it does not induce them to re-subscribe, let them try its virtues on the subscribing propensity of some responsible friend or neighbor.—They will receive no more without ordering them.—Mind, this 6th article is only for those who have ordered a discontinuance already. G. and H.

THE RECORD.

The following, I believe, renders this department as complete for this volume as we can make it.

CONFERENCES.—A Conference was held in Salina, November 15th and 16th. Brs. Montgomery, C. S. Brown, C. B. Brown, N. Brown, Rouseville and Sanderson were present, and each delivered a discourse.—Though the roads and weather were unfavorable, the congregations were respectable. The cause has progressed well in this place under the labors of Br. S. Barnes, and is progressing.

The Worcester county Quarterly Conference met in Phillipstown, Mass., November 22d. Brs. J. Boyden, Moderator; Z. Baker, Clerk. Resolved to plant the standard of the universal Gospel in every town in the county of Worcester, before June, 1838. Eight preachers were present—sermons by Brs. T. J. Greenwood, G. Noyes, and J. Boyden. The meeting was a very pleasant one. Adjourned to meet at such time and place as Br. Noyes may appoint.

A happy Conference was held in Centreville, Ohio, a short time since. Seven discourses were delivered by Brs. G. Messinger, B. Hickox, and E. Beals.

SOCIETIES.—A good society was legally organized in Denmark, Lewis county, on the second Sunday in September. Br. French labors to good acceptance half the time in this place, and one-fourth each, in Burrville and Lowville. The cause in all these places is steadily progressing. A respectable society was also lately organized in Constantia, Oswego county, under the labors of Br. W. Martin.

REMOVALS.—Br. J. Chase from East to West Bloomfield. Br. L. C. Browne, from Fort Plain to Troy—he was so long about moving that I forgot the fact by the time it was completed. L. H. Tabor, from Shoreham to Montpelier Vt. Br. J. Gregory, from Montpelier, Vt., to Charleston, S. C., to supply the place of Br. Fisk who has withdrawn from the ministry. Br. T. D. Cook, from Wolcott, to Gaines. Br. L. Harris, from Springfield, Erie county, Pa., to Troy P. O., Walworth county, Wisconsin Territory. Br. W. Martin, from Cleveland to Constantia, Oswego county. Br. G. Messinger, late of South Bainbridge, will remain in Springfield, Clark county, Ohio, till after next Spring. Br. J. G. Adams from Claremont, N. H., to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Br. S. Cobb in the first Parish, Malden, Mass.

ORDINATIONS.—Br. T. Barron was ordained in Bridge-water, Vt., November 1st. Sermon by Br. J. Moore. Sermons were also delivered, forenoon and evening, by Brs. J. G. Adams and W. S. Ballou. Br. N. Gunnison was ordained in Brewster, Mass., lately—sermon by Br. J. M. Spear. Sermons were also delivered afternoon and evening, by Brs. Spear and T. K. Taylor.

DEDICATIONS.—The Universalist house in Richmond, N. H., was dedicated, November 22d—sermon by Br. H. Ballou, a native of the town, and whose father was, for many years, the pastor of the Baptist society in that town. The audience drawn by these interesting circumstances, was the largest ever assembled in Richmond. The house is 52 by 40 feet—contains 56 slips, nearly all of which were sold on the day of dedication. Meeting-houses were also to be, and probably have been dedicated in Warren, Mass., December 20th, sermon by Br. M. H. Smith—Lakeville, N. Y., December 13th, sermon by Br. Chase—and Conesus, N. Y., December 14th, sermon by Br. Sanderson. The new meeting-house in Perrysburg, Ohio, was dedicated on the first Sunday in November. Sermon by Br. L. L. Sadler—Brs. T. Strong, H. P. Sage, D. E. Biddlecom and R. Tomlinson took parts in the services. Three other discourses were also delivered by brethren above-named. The house is of brick, 55 by 36 feet, well and neatly finished, with an orchestra, and surmounted by a well proportioned steeple in which is a good toned bell.

A. B. G.

REMITTANCES.—Should be made in United States, New-York Safety Fund, or Eastern States bank bills. These when genuine, and on solvent banks, are next to good drafts on banks, or on good and well known mercantile houses, in this section, for safety and use.—If possible send the above; if not, send such as are next best in New-York city, for which see late Bank note Exchange lists in city papers. G. and H.

CHRISTMAS EVE.

The house was so crowded that many were unable to gain admission to the able address of Br. Smith and excellent concert of our Musical Association. They thus also lost a sight of the decorations of the house, and an opportunity to testify substantially their approbation of the efforts of our friends, and therefore ask a repeat of the Concert. It will be given on

NEW YEAR'S EVE,
Sunday Evening, December 31st,

When an appropriate discourse will be delivered by Br. M. B. Smith, and the same bill of fare, with a few additions and alterations, will be presented by our Choir, (under the efficient direction of Mr. Lane, its excellent leader,) as a New Year's Gift. The congregation will have an opportunity of reciprocating this liberality, and of aiding a Musical Association that not only needs but really deserves all a generous public can find in heart and purse to bestow—a collection will be taken up in the course of the services, to defray the expenses of the evening, and for the benefit of the Choir. A. B. G.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

POETRY.

THE SLEEPERS.

They are sleeping! Who are sleeping?
Children wearied with their play;
For the stars of night are peeping,
And the sun hath sunk away.
As the dew upon the blossoms
Bows them on their slender stem,
So, as light as their own bosoms,
Balmy sleep hath conquered them.

They are sleeping! Who are sleeping?
Mortals, compassed round with wo;
Eyelids wearied out with weeping,
Close for very weakness now;
And that short relief from sorrow,
Harrassed nature will sustain,
Till they wake again to-morrow
Strengthened to contend with pain.

They are sleeping! Who are sleeping?
Captives in their gloomy cells;
And sweet dreams are o'er them creeping,
With their many colored spells.
All they love—again they clasp them,
Feel again their long lost joys;
But the haste with which they grasp them,
Every fairy form destroys.

They are sleeping! Who are sleeping?
Misers, by their hoarded gold;
And in fancy now are heaping
Gems and pearls of price untold.
Golden chains their limbs encumber,
Diamonds seem before them strewn;
But they waken from their slumber,
And the splendid dream is flown.

They are sleeping! Who are sleeping?
Pause a moment, softly tread;
Anxious friends are fondly keeping Vigils by the sleeper's bed!
Other hopes have all forsaken—
One remains—that slumber deep;
Speak not, lest the slumberer waken
From that sweet, that saving sleep.

They are sleeping! Who are sleeping?
Thousands, who have passed away,
From a world of wo and weeping,
To the regions of decay!
Safe they rest the green turf under;
Sighing breeze, or music's breath,
Winter's wind, or Summer's thunder,
Can not break the sleep of death!

TAKE CARE!

It is singular how very thoughtless and imprudent are our females in regard to their health. Warning after warning, enforced by numberless instances of their truth, appears to fall as unheeded on their minds, as if they were not meant in them. The following excellent article is another, that possibly may reach one, or two; but how many that read it, will disregard it in a week, and be added to the list of those who have perished so foolishly!

DANCING.

To those who are in the morn of life, nothing seems more desirable than amusements. The gayety of youth, the light and gladsome feelings of those who are in the spring time of existence, naturally incline them to seek those recreations which will bring them in contact with kindred spirits, and give expression to the lively sensations of the heart. I am not of that number who wish to check these desires, nor do I consider it right or beneficial to take from the young, innocent pleasures and harmless amusements. But it should be our study to have all amusements beneficial, and our wish to have all the pleasures of the young so regulated, that while they shall relax the mind, they may not injure the health and morals.

No amusement is more common than dancing; and as it is generally conducted, none is more injurious to the young. Dancing in itself considered, is a harmless, healthy pleasure. In many nations it is a religious duty. We are informed that David danced before the Lord; and in our land and day, we know that one sect regard this as the most acceptable way to serve the God of salvation. But as this practice exists among us, it has prejudiced one-half of the world against it, and injured the other. Who can see a young female in the depth of Winter, arrayed for a ball, and compare her frail covering, with the comfortable garments she has thrown aside, and not feel sure that she is doing herself a great injury? Can any one follow her to the crowded hall, and see her, after throwing herself into a profuse perspiration, seek the coolest place that her fevered brow may be refreshed with the cold air, and not be sensibly impressed with the fact that bitter sufferings will be the price of such imprudence? Can any person see the throng leave the heated atmosphere of the ball room, and descend to the chilling supper room, where every thing is laid to tempt the appetite, and not wonder that the consumption does not carry off a larger number of the most amiable of our race? Who can follow the company home through the cold, as the light of day streaks the horizon, and see them enter a cold room, or throw themselves upon a still colder bed, and not feel that such amusements are the ruin of health, and those who thus purchase it at the expense of all that is dear. I have seen a fond mother watch the progress of a disease as it wastes away the life of a lovely daughter, say with tears of sorrow, "she was always well till she attended that ball."

A circumstance fell under my own observation, which will illustrate this better than any thing else that I can offer. During one of the coldest days of last December, a young lady entered the room in which I was sitting, prepared for a ball. The dress was uncommonly light and frail, and as I had seen her before, warmly clothed, I ventured to suggest to her that she was exposing herself unnecessarily. She always dressed so when she attended a ball, was the reply. To the remark that she would be exposed in the ball room and on her return home, if she did not provide herself with garments better suited to the weather; she made the reply, that she was always careful, and that the carriage in which she should ride was warm and comfortable. She attended the ball, was subject to more than the usual exposure; and returned late in the night, if not early on the next morning. I saw her about noon the next day; she appeared like another being; and I could hardly realize that intelligent beings could call that pleasure or amusement, which could transform in a few hours, a sprightly, healthy girl, into a faded, dejected, worn out creature, suffering from excitement, and laboring under a fearful cold. I never saw her from that hour; but her story has been told, her race was run; the melancholy peal of the passing bell, has announced to her friends that another has been added to the congregation of the dead,—and those who loved her most have wept over her early death, and have embalmed her in their holiest affections. From the evening in question up to the hour of her death, she was a stranger to health.

To the youth who read this, to parents and guardians I would say, be careful, that while you amuse yourselves, and seek amusement for others, you do not sow the seeds of consumption,—that you do not impair the natural strength of the body, unless you wish to find an early grave, and leave those who love you well, to mourn over your untimely death.—Trumpet.

THE CROSS.

"God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of Christ!" was the feeling exclamation of an apostle that had a mind that could comprehend the moral sublimity of the exhibition on the cross, and would not shrink back from acknowledging the authority and majesty of the crucified Galilean. The sublimity of that exhibition is not known and felt as it should be. The record, the story of it, is too common to be studied much, and is too often passed over without heeding the thrilling incidents therein related. There is much to make the Christian glory in the cross, and cause him to triumphantly point to the story, when the skeptic would tell him that the meek Son of Mary was an impostor. The story of the cross has softened more than one hard heart, and opened more than one prejudiced mind to receive the truth. The Christian may well glory in the cross! How utterly forgotten was self—how mindful was Jesus in the hour of extreme agony to provide for his mother, and how like a God was the holy prayer he offered for his enemies.

Reader! wouldst thou have thy faith in Jesus quickened? Read then, and meditate on the story of the cross!—Ladies' Repository.

THE COMET.

Is it not a grand and vast conception that this wan and misty orb has been travelling swifter than the swiftest cannon ball, through the dim realms of space, since our Saviour slept in the manger at Bethlehem, and the star in the east lit its fires for the wise men's eyes? Is it not like divinity, that power of astronomic prophecy, which pierced the curtains of the future, and foretold the events of this blazing world? Looks it not like sharing attributes with Omnipotence, and circumventing God? And when this generation shall be slumbering in the dust, that predicted orb will again "stream its horrid hair" across the sky. When the lover who has now looked at it with his mistress, shall become a patriarch among his children; when the child now hisping its early inquiries about the wandering star, shall tell the tale in after years to some grand-babe, throned on her knee—then the comet will come again! What changes—what revolutions—what convulsions of states and empires—will chance ere then! My soul expands into a sense of sublimity, as I reflect on the vast world of events between. How many ties will be severed—how many hearts broken, how many tears be shed! Yet while on earth these vicissitudes will advance and vanish, in that far element above and around us, this luminous globe shall wander with its train—flashing and glowing through the fields of immensity. Thought itself—imagination in her boldest flight—sinks with wearied wing, unable to grasp the stupendous, boundless theme! "Truly, said the ancient minstrel: "When I survey the heavens, the work of thy fingers—the moon and stars which thou hast ordained—then I say what is man that thou art mindful of him, or the son of man that thou visitest him?"—Kyck-erbocker.

DEATHS.

In New-Hartford, December 15th, after a long illness, JONATHAN RICHARDSON, Esq., aged 60 years, formerly of Newton, Mass. He held the office of Justice of the Peace for the last 27 years, and was constantly entrusted with important and confidential business by the community in which he lived. Until his 28th year, (about which time he removed to this country,) he was a Calvinistic Baptist; but shortly after, his Christian charity demanded, and found in the Bible, a more enlarged faith. He was one of the earliest members of the Universalist society of New-Hartford, (then Whitestown,) the oldest of that order in the State—and aided in erecting their meeting-house, the oldest now standing in the State.—He was generally a Trustee, and constantly an active, upright member. The faith he adored by his conduct and supported by his means, for the latter half of his life, supported him abundantly in the trials of sickness and death; and his last days were spent in frequent efforts to inculcate its importance, goodness and truth on those around him. A bereaved widow and numerous children deplore their loss of an exemplary and affectionate head—other relatives, friends and community, of a warm friend, a sage adviser, and an honest and industrious citizen. His family are supported by the same hope that sustained him.

The funeral was attended Sunday 17th inst., in the Universalist meeting-house, and a discourse delivered to a very crowded audience, from Heb. xi: 4—"He, being dead, yet speaketh"—by A. B. G.

In Canton, St. Lawrence county, August 9th, Mrs. BELINDA GILL, aged 48 years—and on October 11th, RUTH JULIA ANN GILL—the wife and daughter of Mr. Giles Gill. Last June Mrs. G., attended the St. Lawrence Association—it was the last public assembly of the faithful she mingled in. Immediately afterwards she was attacked with typhus fever. She died as she had lived, a believer in God's universal goodness. At the time of her death, other members of the family were reduced so low by the same disease, that the funeral services could not be attended to. The fever continued its ravages till all but Mr. Gill had been attacked with it.—At last the daughter died. The rest are recovering, and were able to attend the funeral services on November 5th, when an appropriate discourse was delivered by Br. Briggs.

In Harrisville, Medina county, Ohio, October 5th, Mr. JOEL BRIGHAM, formerly of Dunkirk, N. Y., in the 52d year of his age. I called to see him a short time previous to his disease, and found him as he had always been, rejoicing in the faith of universal salvation. He earnestly requested that a Universalist clergyman might preach his funeral sermon—but as we were all absent at that time, it was performed by a Methodist clergyman. I speak the language of all in saying that he was universally beloved as a neighbor—that his life and death were those of the righteous. S. HULL.
